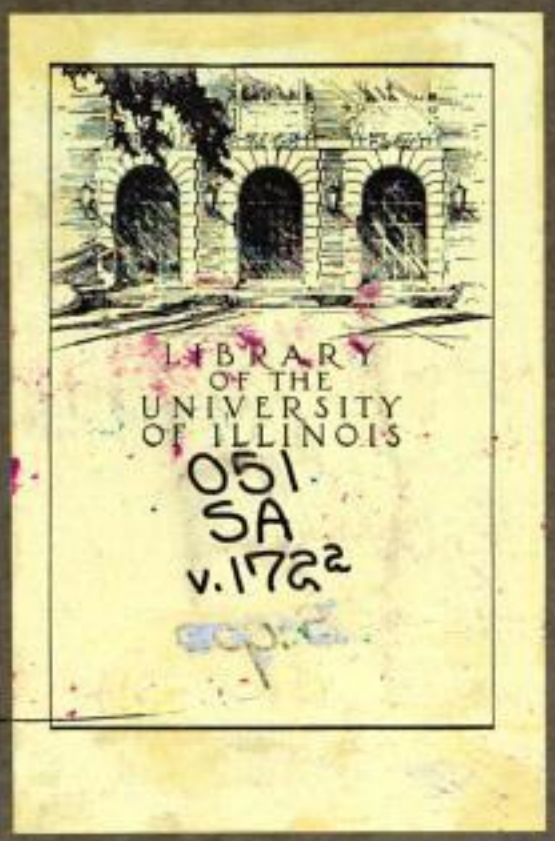
Return this book on or before the
Latest Date stamped below.

Theft, mutilation, and underlining of books are reasons for disciplinary action and may result in dismissal from the University.



University of Illinois Library

NOV 6 1965
JUL 27 1966
JUL 27 1968
AUG 4 1966
JUN 28 1968
BUILDING USE ONLY
OCT 18 1973
BUILDING USE ONLY
OCT 19 1973
BUILDING USE ONLY

MAY 0 9 1981
FEB 0 9 2001
OCT 0 1 1981
SEP 2 9 1981
BUILDING USE ONLY
NOV 0 2 1982
NOV 0 2 1982
MAY 1 7 1983
MAR 2 9 2004
NOV 0 4 2004
OCT 19 1973

L161—O-1096

Digitized by Google

LIBRARY
OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS
051
SA
v.1722

Digitized by Google

Return this book on or before the Latest Date stamped below.
Theft, mutilation, and underlining of books are reasons for disciplinary action and may result in dismissal from the University.
University of Illinois Library

NOV 6 1965
MAY 0 9 1981
FEB 0 9 2007
OCT 0 1 1981
JUL 27 1966
SEP 2 9 1981
BUILDING USE ONLY
JUL 27 1968
NOV 0 2 1982
AUG 4 1966
NOV 0 2 1982
MAY 1 7 1983
JUN 28 1967
BUILDING USE ONLY
OCT 18 1973
MAR 2 9 2004
OCT 18 1973
BUILDING USE ONLY
NOV 0 4 2004
OCT 19 1973
OCT 19 1973
BUILDING USE ONLY
OCT 19 1973
L161—O-1096

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded A^o D^i 1728 by Benj. Franklin

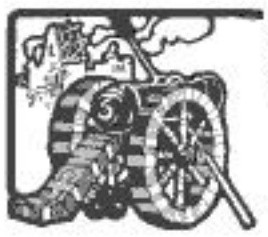
Volume 172, No. 29 — Philadelphia, January 13, 1900 — 5 Cents the Copy; $2.50 the Year

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 421 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

The WORLD'S Wish for PEACE



Why Wars are becoming Rarer and Religions Better

By THOMAS B. REED

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

Digitized by Google

The WORLD'S Wish for PEACE

Why Wars are becoming Rarer and Religions Better

By THOMAS B. REED

THE Creator cares most sedulously not only for the perpetuity of the race, but also for its steady growth in knowledge and wisdom. The race lives; men die. The ocean in its rage kills them like flies in a bowl. The earthquake swallows them up. All new enterprises cost men. Every new country is broken up at the expense of malaria, wasting sickness and death. Livingstone's books and all books of African travel make a man of foresight shudder not only at the terrible malarial ordeal through which the traveler passed, but at the infinite human suffering and death which must come when lust of land and lust of wealth shall turn the resistless human tide, full of youth and vigor, over the vast fertility of Central Africa. When locusts and ants swarm over creeks and ditches, filling them with their dead and making bridges for the living, their march finds its parallel in the movements of the human race. Only by the suffering and shortened lives of pioneers are new lands, the most fertile, made habitable to those who come after. New improvements bring new dangers. Even cities, builded by long and patient years, while they escape malaria, find sewer gas lurking in every household. Death lies in wait for us everywhere. Yet the race lives and thrives. It marches from one endeavor to another, from one conquered hemisphere to the other. So it would seem that God has in special care the growth of the whole race in knowledge and consequent civilization. Communities lapse from wealth and culture. Nations die and dynasties perish, but the world absorbs all the knowledge and culture once got and holds it forever. Water spilled is not lost. By sunbeam and by river it surely seeks the great reservoir of ocean. It is a favorite theme with some, the lost achievements of the past—and yet if there be any useful invention lost, it is because a better has taken its place. There are no lost arts. Oratory has created all that there seem to be.

HOW THE LEAVEN OF CIVILIZATION OPERATES

Even the destruction of great nations, of Assyria and Babylon, of Troy and Persepolis, not forgetting "Tadmor in the Wilderness," caused no loss to the whole world. When the civilization of Greece yielded to the Macedonian invader none of it perished. Some men were less cultured, but all men were more. Throughout a broader mass of men the leaven was stirred and more men acted and reacted on each other. When Rome carried with her arms through the world devastation and despotism, she carried also her arts and knowledge, and they wrought their work, surviving the devastation and turning the despotism into strength and liberty. When the outside barbarians, the Goths and Vandals, the Huns and Franks, poured in successive waves over the Roman Empire they prostrated indeed the outward forms of its civilization, but by absorption became themselves more civilized and so widened and increased the civilization of the world. As the currents of air all tend to where the heat is the greatest, so currents of men seem to flow toward the centre of culture and knowledge. As the warm and cold air became mixed the temperature of one was lessened and the other increased; so when the uncivilized tribes poured over Rome culture became equalized, and while classic literature, Cicero and Horace and Virgil, became impossible, so also did unmitigated barbarism.

But the comparison of currents of air with currents of men should not pass without this addition, that while the equalized air holds only the heat it gets from the hot centres, the human race possesses the power of radiating more knowledge than it absorbs, of adding to the culture which it gets. Indeed, the surest guaranty of the increase of human knowledge is its spread. The more minds there are at work on what knowledge the world has, the vaster the product and the greater the average. It has taken all of us to discover what is known, and the more all of us know the more we shall know. The differences which there are in human minds operate to give to one man the sight of a clue which may be denied to all others. Out of the myriad seeds which a tree drops some survive because of some slight differences which favor their lives, but which no human eye can yet see. Just so, some minds instead of others make discoveries because of differences which are only distinguishable in results. If all intellects, then, could be set to work we should get all possible discoveries. Diffusion of knowledge tends to set all minds at work.

THE INJUSTICE OF BEING BORN A CENTURY TOO SOON

The idea may be illustrated by the story of the inventions of this country. We seem to be ahead of the world. Where knowledge is so diffused that more minds are turned to contemplate the possibilities of improvement, more and greater improvements get themselves made. So rapid has been the growth of man's knowledge within the last few years, which have been distinguished by the wider diffusion of knowledge, that we can see very clearly what has always been true, that it is a great imposition upon any man to have been born at any given time rather than a hundred years later. Think what hard luck a man had who ended his life a hundred years ago. A horseback-and-stagecoach world was ten times as large as a railroad world. If he surveyed mankind from China to Peru he used up the cream of his life. Now an uncle gives a nephew a ticket around the world to give him time to sober off. Whale-oil candles and tinder-boxes were poor substitutes for lucifers and gas. The speed of a horse was the speed of a message. Now we are impatient of the speed of light. To be a poor man now is more comfortable than to have been a rich man then. The wealth of the Indies could not administer chloroform. The bluest blood of Castile flowed from limbs writhing under the knife. Napoleon's marshals could not have from ether that surcease of agony which the poorest soldier is wronged if he fails to have now. The poorest mother can bring her child into the world with a freedom from pain which her Empire could not have purchased for an Empress a hundred years ago. We can talk with our neighbors face to face across a thousand miles of distance, and shall soon be able to talk across a continent.

Unnumbered pages might be used in describing comforts born of the last century, but it will suffice if we can speak of enough to illustrate the idea that the increase of human knowledge bears some relation to its diffusion. If so, then the terrible submergence of civilization by barbarism, as bemoaned by historians, are part and parcel of the plan for the improvement of the race; and the decline and fall of the Roman Empire was but the rise and progress of a riper, better and wider civilization. If the civilization of Rome perished, it perished in the interest of the civilization of the race.

There have been many definitions of civilization, but what it really means is the gradual amelioration of manners and that improvement of the human race which increases the comfort and happiness of mankind. It is a movement of the race, as culture is of the individual. It must be tested by the action of men in masses, and not by the action of individuals. If we could imagine a single one of our Puritan ancestors, divested of his quaint raiment and clothed in the garb of the period, and living among us without the benefit of our two hundred and fifty years of progress, without the enlargement of mind given to us, he would probably cause us very little trouble, and we should much underrate if we did not doubt the difference. But if enough of his kind were again alive and here, women would be burned for witches and government would again be a hierarchy. Inasmuch as the true criterion is the average of the race, it is no wonder that the progress has been slow. When all have to be lifted, time is a pretty essential element.

THE SPROUTING OF THE SEEDS OF CIVILIZATION

What is the cause of civilization? What makes men as a race improve? The answer is knowledge, and knowledge only. Knowledge of all kinds, of pleasure and of pain, physical and mental. Human minds are like soils. They must grow something. If it is not shining grain, then weeds; and weeds are better than nothing. Fetishism is better than no conception of aught outside ourselves. Weeds show that the soil can produce something. Fetishism is rudimentary religion. It is with human minds of different ages as it is with geological strata—the vegetation which flourished in the Coal Period cannot live in the Triassic. So ideas which flourished in human minds and seemed to be eternal verities at one stage of knowledge, perish in another. Every age of progress has to begin with the burial of dead truths, or rather half-truths. As forest soils seem to be full of seed ready to spring up, only waiting for the forest to be cut down, so the minds of the race seem to be full of ideas which only bloom and blossom when old superstitions and old fallacies are cut away by the ax of knowledge amid the tears of conservatism. Thoughts and arguments perfected this century and given to the world may take no root until the next. They are as perfect now and as reasonable as they ever can be, but until the slow rise of human knowledge renders their reception possible by the world, they lie cold and still. Even now, some neglected dreamer may be planting, unnoticed by the world, seed which will shoot into space mighty trees under which his grandchildren shall sit. Or it may be that some man of affairs, some statesman, some John Milton out of joint with the world, may be now throwing out some Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, some Areopagitica at which respectable gentlemen are now smiling, but which in a couple of centuries may be in the world's horn-book of elementary beliefs.

The proposition is that increase of knowledge is increase of civilization. Some think that morality and religion play no small part in the progress of the world. To me it seems that morality and religion are themselves indebted to knowledge for their ripening. When we speak of morality and religion we do not mean rules and tenets, comments and texts, but practical actions of men. So far as definition and exhortation go, morality and religion have been fixed for many years. So far as their practical control over men's deeds are concerned they vary from age to age. As the world grows in knowledge, practical morality grows. As the world softens, religion softens. What have religion and morality done with war? War is a beastly barbarism. It is only murder on a large scale with ranked battalions and pomp and circumstance. Eighteen Christian centuries have not abolished it. The wars which ended in the Dutch Republic were religious wars. Men fought for their religions. When a town was taken the horrors were such that they cannot to-day be put on paper. To read the details of the "Spanish fury" would be to send all women out of the room. The Spanish fury happened only three hundred years ago. There was plenty of religion in the world then. Men bend religion to their beliefs, not their beliefs to religion. When the Ironsides of Cromwell wanted to kill a King they gave the fillip of religious sanction to the deed to call it "hewing Agag in pieces before the Lord." With the Cavalier at the same period of time religion was the mainstay of the Divine Right of Kings. Though the increase of knowledge has not yet abolished war, though it would be rash to say that no wars to-day are justifiable, yet wars are not what they were. Fort Pillow was a mild massacre compared with the incarnate fiendishness which possessed the soldiers in the Netherlands. And yet the indignation of the whole world was aroused about Fort Pillow, and I myself saw the commander in that wickedness, whose brazen tongue had trippingly uttered not one but many orations on conciliation and brotherly love, falter in a set volunteered defense under the spoken indignation of one party and the ill-suppressed disgust of the other.

THE LESSENING OF THE TERRORS OF WAR

What, then, has ameliorated war? Perhaps it will aid us to know how it has been ameliorated. War no longer demolishes cities. Private property is sacred. No pillage is permitted. But for the refusal of the United States no privateering would have been allowed long before the conferences at The Hague and the commerce of mankind would have safely moved over the seas. France and England have great commerce and great navies, and object to privateering. The United States has the same religion, but not the same navies, and thought it would rather issue letters of marque. Interest and not morality seems to act. War is made more and more to respect material interests. Men have found by experience—which is another name for knowledge—that it does not pay in the long run to destroy property, and hereafter they will find out that it does not pay to destroy life. War is dying out because men have something else to do. They are engaged in trade, in enterprises which war interferes with. Life is getting every day to be better worth living. Hence men do not want to lose it. When the life of men, like the life of Australian Diggers, was only an alternation of starving and eating to such repletion as made them roll on the ground in agonies of surfeit, a man must have been very particular who cared whether there was war or not. But when the interests of all nations get so universally interwoven with the warp and woof of trade that the knowledge of its devastations will be brought home to all men, war will cease. But the proclamation that there shall be no more war will come from the tradesman and not from the preacher.

When I say that religion has not caused civilization I take no account of its supposed opposition to new truth. Agassiz used to say that the first remark on a new scientific discovery was that it could not be true because the Bible was to the contrary. When, in spite of that, men believed, the second remark was that the discovery was entirely consistent with the Bible; and, finally, it wouldn't have been discovered if it hadn't been for the Bible. This, however, is only an offensive way of stating a proposition which in its essence had nothing to do with the Bible at all. An objection of that sort is to be charged to man, not to religion. It is the nature of man to dispute new discoveries; and to confront them with old beliefs is the best way. Conservatism resists by the aid of the established, whether it be religion or government. Men might as well say that the British Constitution has done nothing for human liberty because conservatives always try to trip up reforms with it.

THE CIVILIZING INFLUENCE OF THE CHURCH

Nor is it meant to be said that the Church has never been a help to the progress of the world. The contrary is true, but it has been a means, not a cause. In the Middle Ages the Church played a great part in lifting its priests and scholars to the level of Princes and bringing proud Barons to their knees; but the Church was the instrument which knowledge then used. Priests and scholars by their scholarship found themselves the superiors of men of birth and set up the claim of servants of God as against the claims of sons of ancestors. No man to-day would call the powerful engines of superstition which was then employed, religion. Nor is it meant to be said that preachers of religion and teachers of morality do not help to spread the results of human knowledge, do not by line upon line and precept upon precept help to impress upon men's minds the new and higher views of morality and religion which the increase of human knowledge has rendered possible for them to preach and for men to believe. With whatever language we may describe the words and deeds of the saints and martyrs, their words and deeds have been eternal blessings on the human race.

If I may borrow some law terms without meaning to use them at all strictly, I should say that rules of morality, which in one stage of knowledge are of imperfect obligation, may in another stage seem to men to be of perfect obligation. In other words, the increase of knowledge has to make a better religion before a better one can either be preached or believed. That a thing is the truth does not make it believed. There must be a receptive mind. The Pasha in

Editor's Note—This is the fourth paper in a series of articles by Thomas B. Reed. Other papers by Mr. Reed will appear in early issues of The Saturday Evening Post.

Digitized by Google

051
SA
V.172

Marryat's story had no trouble with the preposterous things told by the sailor, but when he came to describe the kangaroo with her young gliding in and out of her pouch the Pasha's mind refused to tolerate such an infernal lie.

HOW THE WORLD IS GROWING BETTER

Our idea, then, is that improvement in morality and religion, like improvement in government, is part and parcel of civilization, and results from the same cause. If not from the same cause, whence does it come? No man will deny that the religion of this century is better than the religion which burned men for opinions, believed in ghosts and witches, led John Rogers to the stake, and put John Bunyan into Bedford Jail. The difference is marked and wide. Between those days and these there have been no new miracles, no new revelations. Men are not more fervent; rather less so. Religion engrosses men's minds less rather than more. Nevertheless, the statesman, though still not without guile, lies less, seldom murders, loves liberty more and power less. Mercantile morality is higher, attorneys pettifog less and help justice more, and the time is coming when all men will realize, as some do now, that Mr. John Rand paid William Pitt Fessenden at his death a finer compliment when he said that "he won every cause he ought to have won" than if he had said he won every cause. If you say that preaching religion and teaching morality have done this, then will you tell us why the higher life we live now was not sooner preached and taught, and if sooner preached and taught, why not sooner practiced? The plain answer is that until the world knew as much as it does now it was not possible to preach or to practice.

WHAT THE FUTURE HAS IN STORE FOR US

But we need not contrast different ages; we can take different countries. The Sandwich Islanders have abolished paganism and professed Christianity, but does anybody believe that religion there is or can be what it is in lands where centuries of culture have enriched the people with the stored knowledge of generations of learned men? Read what Titus Coan, himself a godly missionary, says about the results of their conversion, if you doubt. Is it possible for Christianity in Russia to be what it is in England? Could Christianity in the Middle Ages be what it must be to-day? Knowledge and religion have to march hand in hand or religion does not march at all. When the knowledge of the Lord covers the earth as the waters cover the sea it will be when the sea itself has given up all its secrets, when the rocks are no longer mysteries, when the marvel of vitality is solved, and when the distant twinkle of the star wakes no wonder in the child. The New Jerusalem is builded like every other city. If the streets are smooth and level it will be because hills have been cut down and valleys filled. If the pavements be of gold and the foundations of precious stones it will be because gold and chalcedony, emerald and amethyst have been digged out of the bowels of the earth by the resolute hand of man. If the gates are to glisten in white it will be because by cunning divers mighty oysters have been pillaged of their pearls. Out of the toil and study of man shall come alike the Heavenly City and the Millennial years. And yet we cannot say that they are not "descending out of Heaven from God." What is back of us all human knowledge has not yet reached. Faith, then, has to be both evidence and substance. What has been the progress of the human race in different ages; how the movement of civilization has been accelerated and retarded; what has caused this halt and what that rapid movement we know only dimly and doubtingly now, but soon shall know with assurance. We are getting together the facts. Vast and varied as is the hoard, the human mind will some day widen to comprehend them all. Perhaps then the problem of why we exist at all may be made plain to every living soul.

Of all the joys that await the happy being yet to be born in the distant centuries, I envy him most the wealth of that final knowledge, sure to come, which will enable him to trace the march of human progress through the terrible defiles which its first uncertain footsteps trod where the cruel mountains of superstition and ignorance threw their shadowy phantasms of fear on every hand; into the sandy plains where light was, but where the bloom of vegetation and the song of birds had not yet come; on to the lands of verdure and of blossom where the race in perfect freedom, if not in perfect wisdom, shall pluck the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil and eat thereof never to be satisfied.

LIFE'S LITTLE IRONIES

By Carolyn Wells

THE company we'd like to have we often cannot get;
The company that wants to come oft causes us regret;
The company that stays too long destroys our peace of mind;
But the company we ought to ask—oh, that's the hardest kind.

OLD-SCHOOL EDITORS

By MURAT HALSTEAD

Some Personal Recollections

IF ANY one should say that some of my recollections of editors were founded on fiction I would not insist upon the infallibility of my memory. There are so many things forgotten of the feverish flurries of fifty years that inaccuracies in impressions are possible.

There were a few editors of importance in the days of Webster, Clay and Calhoun, but there is now more ability engaged on the press than ever before; there are not many, if any, towering individualities, but a far greater number of hard-working writers and managers than before the art of stereotyping for daily papers became commonplace and the use of the telegraph a commanding feature of journalism.

It was in the early thirties that I was taught the alphabet in a Democratic weekly newspaper, the advantage of the Jacksonian sheet over the common book being its irregularity. In the late forties I began to write for the press, and to ascertain that the production of matter for newspapers was an occupation; and College Hill, seven miles from Cincinnati, consumed newspapers. One was the Gazette, with a page devoted to literature every Saturday; another, the Commercial, published an original poem on the editorial page every day, and all the favored poets (the price paid was one dollar the stanza) were women.

Journalism was honored in those days by the fact that William Cullen Bryant was the editor of the New York Evening Post. It seemed unfit that one who had written the grand poetry that made Bryant famous in his youth should be hard at work every day in a newspaper office, but he was.

Having a friend in the office of the Post—Mr. Charles Nordhoff—I saw, when calling there, the lofty head of Bryant bowed over his desk, his hand vigorously engaged in penning paragraphs. Of course I remembered Thanatopsis, and forgot to follow what Nordhoff was saying. He knew what spell was upon me, and asked if I would care to be introduced to Mr. Bryant. When the poet-editor had finished his labors I was presented, and received with kindness.

I was almost afraid to occupy even a few minutes of the precious time of Mr. Bryant, lest I might spoil the majestic expression of an idea from the most golden of the mines of American poetry, but the thought came to me of the experience of a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States with Charles Dickens. The Justice, during the first visit of Dickens to America, was a lad at school in a Western city, and passing the Broadway Hotel of the place concluded to march upstairs to the room occupied by the young and glittering novelist.

Finding him alone and seated, the incipient Judge asked, "Am I in the presence of the immortal author of the Pickwick Papers?" Dickens stared, did not smile, and solemnly replied, "Well, young man, I believe you are." The young man was not asked to sit down or to make himself at home, and suddenly and unaccountably feeling awkward, hastened to the street.

I did not ask Mr. Bryant questions, nor attempt an original remark about his poetry. He was surprisingly active and physically strong in his advanced years. He would grasp an object over his head, and, swinging by his arms, lift himself so as to put his chin above his hands six times in succession!

I had the honor, when Mr. Bryant passed through Cincinnati on the way home from Mexico, to entertain him at dinner. Seated next him was Mr. Joseph Longworth, a gentleman of many accomplishments, with a keen sense of the beauties of art and poetry, a wonderful memory, and an elocution so perfect that it had the rare charm of simplicity so absolute that the credit was given to Nature. The dinner was well advanced, and no one had mentioned Thanatopsis or even poetry—Mexico was the leading theme—when suddenly a guest said, "Mr. Longworth, please recite Mr. Bryant's Lines to a Water-fowl."

There was a hush, Mr. Longworth hesitated, and answered, turning to Mr. Bryant, "Not in this presence."

"Do you remember the lines?" some one asked.

"It is not a question of memory of the lines," Mr. Longworth responded; "I presume we all know them."

Then came entreaties that Mr. Longworth would repeat the glowing words, and Mr. Bryant turned a listening ear, but did not second the call except with a look of surprised attention. Mr. Longworth paused a second, leaned backward in his seat, lifted his face, and with thrilling cadence, low and soft and clear, put every word of the poem in its place, and gave each its full measure of music and meaning.

The poet said, as if introspectively and unconscious of speech, "Written fifty-five years ago."

On a farm adjoining the one which was my birthplace resided a lady whose brother had succeeded as a merchant in New York and who sent her the Home Journal, conducted by Willis & Morris. The Home Journal was a model of typography and was printed on beautiful paper. There was an article by Nathaniel Parker Willis in each number, and whatever his pen put on paper was touched with grace.

One day a country boy (myself), who had never written a line for the printers, wrote a letter to "N. P. W." in recognition of his pen-paintings of the charms of country life and the scenery, the wooded hills and the cornfields, and took seriously a romance of travel. In a fortnight I received a letter addressed in a strange hand, evidently written with a quill pen, using abundant black ink. It was from N. P. Willis, and contained a few words of kindly and generous encouragement.

N. P. Willis was best known, in his early fame, for sacred poetry, and letters from Europe, Pencilings by the Way, that told Americans about the literary and other celebrities of London. He was charged with the betrayal of confidences, but it seems to be the sufficient explanation that he wrote with the freedom of private correspondence, not thinking that an American newspaper would find its way to England.

I never saw Willis until I happened to meet him in the City Hall Park, New York, the very place where he was assailed by Edwin Forrest. When I saw him he was writing the Idlewild letters. He showed many gray hairs in his auburn curls and a face full of the marks of care. His step was feeble. He wore a heavy shawl about his shoulders, and the world that had so flattered his gifted and beautiful youth seemed to have turned against him. His gentle bearing toward those who made themselves known to him and solicited his regard, in purport if not in phrase, gave him troops of loving friends who cared for him more and more in his declining years. There were many who did not forget.

It happened some years later that I had business in the Herald establishment with the senior James Gordon Bennett, and found him in a dress coat, standing before an old-fashioned fireplace in which hickory billets were blazing. Mr. Bennett seemed to be the personification of dignity and comfort.

The Herald was, at the time, in a way that could be construed at the pleasure of the readers to be serious or sarcastic, urging that Horace Greeley should be chosen Senator of the United States. I said, "There is much interest in the vigorous support you are giving Mr. Greeley for the Senate." "Yes," said Mr. Bennett, "I think Greeley would be as big a fool in the Senate as anywhere else."

More than once the old Herald played this game. Torrents of praise were for weeks poured on George Law as a most fit candidate for the Presidency. There were editorials about Mr. Law as a matchless candidate. At last a public meeting was held and Mr. Law was induced to be present and make a speech. The next morning the Herald slaughtered its own candidate. The report given of the great man was a masterpiece of devilment. The Herald simply said, "Our candidate will not do." It announced itself ashamed of him, and cheerfully observed that it would be necessary to find another candidate. This levity did much to relieve the press of the pomps of stupidity.

On the day the news came that the younger Bennett had won the famous yacht race across the Atlantic, having had the pluck to go in his own boat, I had a business engagement with the elder Bennett, and congratulated him upon the junior's triumph. The veteran said he was opposed to the race, but was glad to have his boy win.

In 1869 there was a story that the elder Bennett, being dissatisfied with the Herald itself, and convinced that his son would not maintain the traditions when his day came, wanted to sell the paper. I concluded to call on the author and proprietor of the Herald and ask if he wanted to sell. It was not until on the way that it occurred to me there was a certain enormity in the idea.

However, there was no purpose of disrespect in going—it was rather a case of candor—and if Bennett did think of selling it would be like him to be unreserved. When I stated the object of my visit he said, "I do not think my son would care to have partners." "Certainly he would not," I replied; "I had not thought of offering to be a partner if the purchase was possible, but to organize a company and buy the paper." Mr. Bennett was not at all troubled by this extraordinary utterance, but looking me over with gravity calmly said: "I would sell the Herald as I would any other property if I did not believe my son will be the best newspaper man in New York. I think he will be; that he will be first in the business, and for that reason only the Herald is not for sale on any terms."

I said: "Mr. Bennett, I have been sensible that I must be making what would be to you an extraordinary proposal. I thank you for the attention you have given me. I hope your son may realize your expectations." It was a final proof of the elder Bennett's sagacity that he was first to see in his son the qualities that have maintained under difficulties, rapidly and radically changing conditions, the profitableness and prestige of the Herald.

Digitized by Google

The Excellent Revenge of ELEANOR

By Molly Elliot Seawell

WHEN there are only two children in a family—a boy and a girl—Nature very often makes the mistake of putting the boy's spirit in the girl's body, and vice versa. It will be remembered that the Duchess d'Angoulême was the only man in the Bourbon family, so Napoleon Bonaparte said. One of these unlucky blunders was made when Richard St. George Maitland, of Wareham, in lowland Virginia, was sent into this briery world. He was, as infant, boy and man, gentle, forgiving, delicately and darkly handsome, dainty in his ways, and without one spark of spirit. He was not a physical coward in the sense of being afraid of horses, dogs or guns. His early training made those things so familiar to him from the first dawn of his intelligence that he scarcely remembered when he was not an expert with them. He had, however, no robust tastes or feelings, was hopelessly weak, and at fifteen years of age cried bitterly when another boy called him a liar.

In attempting to repair her first blunder Nature made another—a common enough thing in the history of blunders. She sent Eleanor, the sister, a year younger than Richard, into the world with spirit enough for ten men. Eleanor was adventurous, robust, full of courage, humor and vindictiveness. She had an outward softness, just as Richard had a veneer of manliness, but neither was more than skin deep. Eleanor did not talk loud, dress mannishly, nor affect masculine tastes, but her virtues and her defects were those of a high-strung, high-minded boy, rather than a girl. The brother and sister were orphaned before they were in their teens, and they passed under the guardianship of their maiden aunt, Miss Rachel, a timid, incapable creature, who adored Richard, and whom Richard, in truth, resembled more than any other living creature. As Miss Rachel could by no means trust her curled darling to the rude discipline of a boys' school, for which Richard had as little fancy as she, the boy got a straggling and incomplete education from cheap governesses and tutors until he was eighteen. In these lessons Eleanor joined. There was no one to take any particular account of her except Miss Rachel, and Miss Rachel's heart was not big enough to hold more than one affection. Nor could her head hold more than one idea at a time.

She had, however, one honorable ambition for Richard—which was a university course. For that she had saved up a little sum of money from her turkeys, her butter and eggs. When the boy—for boy he always seemed—was eighteen, it occurred to Miss Rachel that he ought to be prepared for his university course by a genuine tutor, something a little different from the green youngsters she had picked up haphazard for several years past at a hundred and fifty dollars the year. Miss Rachel consulted the fount of all wisdom, the Bishop of the diocese, upon this important matter. The Bishop, like Miss Rachel, was hazy about the tutor in all points except one—he must be of good family. In Virginia it is the fine, unwritten law that a governess or tutor shall be received upon a footing not only of perfect equality but of honorable distinction, and consequently they must come from the Brahmin caste. The Bishop knitted his brows and reflected upon the various young men of good family who might be induced to take the place. Then he had an inspiration—George Huntley was the man; none better.

Miss Rachel knew who the Huntleys were—a good old Tidewater family; George Huntley's grandfather had been on the Supreme Bench at Richmond, his great-grandfather had been a professor at William and Mary College, and his father had been killed at Malvern Hills. What more could anybody ask in the way of a tutor? The Bishop mentioned incidentally that young Huntley had been two years at the University of Heidelberg, but that did not figure largely in the matter. He was engaged for the place, and promptly arrived at Wareham the first of October.

The understanding was that he should prepare Richard for the university, and incidentally teach the young sister. No one had specified Eleanor's age, and Huntley had inferred that the girl was a miss of fourteen or fifteen. His surprise and even annoyance were extreme at finding his girl pupil to be a tall, self-possessed young woman of seventeen, and looking every day of twenty. He was in a mood to be churlish; his health was not good, and he had lately encountered a disaster in love—his affair had been of more respectable proportions than those of the average young man of twenty-four. From the first moment he and Eleanor met at the supper-table the night of Huntley's arrival at Wareham, a silent, intense antagonism developed between them. Huntley, not a handsome man at best, looked cadaverous, and had dyspepsia writ large all over him. Miss Rachel, sitting timid and prim at the head of the table, was secretly relieved at the extreme sickliness of the tutor's appearance; she had had horrifying apprehensions of a young Hercules, with the strength of a blacksmith and the skill of a prize-fighter, who might lead Richard into all sorts of athletic excesses; but there was no danger of that sort with this tall, thin wisp of a man.

Eleanor found the new tutor not only sickly but dull and supercilious. Huntley found her scarcely more tolerable. Eleanor had not Richard's dark beauty. She was tall and strong and blond, with a few freckles on her fresh, smooth skin. Her face was comely rather than pretty, and her chief beauty lay in the exquisite and unstudied grace of her movements. Huntley was forced to admit that she had grace, adding to himself, disgustedly, "But to call that girl seventeen—she might be nineteen. And that flippant positiveness of her manner. Young woman, you will have to get over that before you can hope to succeed with men."

The next morning studies began in the shabby old library. Before the day was out Huntley saw that the girl had the better mind, but lacked application, while Richard had a gentle persistence, like a girl's, which told in the long run.

As the days and weeks and months passed on Eleanor and Huntley liked each other less and respected each other more. Huntley was older in character than most young men of twenty-four. He had known sorrow, and exile in a strange land, and ill health, and poverty, and mortified affections; in short, he had lived. Eleanor's life, on the contrary, had been as free from events and emotions as Huntley's had been full of both. Still, she had a singular maturity of character. This absence of childishness, of girlishness was one of Eleanor's chief sins in Huntley's eyes, though, in truth, he could accuse her of no specific cause of dislike; but he disliked her as much as if he could have called over a million faults in her.

As the autumn wore on his health improved rapidly but he became dreadfully bored. Eleanor was a nuisance; Richard was a manikin; Miss Rachel was colorless and stupid beyond belief. There was little society outside, and that little he cared nothing for.

The next place to Wareham had lately been bought as a shooting and fishing place by a number of New York men, and Huntley had hopes that some one from the outside might turn up there during the autumn. One afternoon, late in November, as he was walking along the line fence between the two places, he suddenly came face to face in the narrow woodland path with a gentleman he had supposed not less than four thousand miles away—Count Otto von Reben, Captain in the Imperial Hussars of His Majesty the Emperor William II.

The two men had known each other in Germany many years before, and Huntley had rather disliked the solemn, conceited puppy of a Hussar officer, but he felt a positive joy at seeing even a puppy then, so dreary was his isolation and loneliness. On recognizing one another each man was as surprised as if the other had dropped from the red planet Mars.

"What are you doing here?" both asked in a breath.

Count von Reben found his voice first. "I am here as the guest of Mr. Fountain, of New York—we are here to shoot, and yonder is the shoot-box." Von Reben occasionally slipped up on his English. "And you?"

"I am living as a tutor at Wareham, the old brick house yonder through the trees."

Von Reben, with all his faults (and they were plentiful), was no snob, and took Huntley's announcement with coolness; some people in Germany who have sixteen quarterings are glad in these days to earn their bread as tutors. And then they turned toward the shooting-box and exchanged reminiscences. Von Reben had a year's leave and was spending part of it in the United States. He had a modest allowance, which he frankly admitted went a good deal farther in Germany than in America, but he was determined to see life. He liked the American men fairly well—the women, however, were adorable.

"And, my dear Huntley," he remarked soberly, "'tis a good thing the Emperor puts restrictions on his officers in marrying, for I have seen at least a dozen women since I have been here that but for His Majesty's regulations I could have married."

"Provided they would have taken you," coolly responded Huntley. Von Reben always had been a vain fellow and needed a putting down.

The two men walked together along the path with the broomfields on one side and the red autumn woods on the other, the afternoon sun shining through a red haze. Huntley's old dislike of Von Reben made itself felt; but what with his hunger for companionship and his thirst for communication with the outside world he found himself taking pleasure in what had never pleased him when he had a choice of pleasures—Von Reben's society. As for Von Reben, he was one of those case-hardened egotists to whom one person's society was as good as another's, provided he could always be talking about himself.

The staple of his conversation was the American woman. The notion that a woman might have esprit, gayety and good humor was distinctly novel to him. Accustomed to the elephantine sentiment of the German girls, the airy, brilliant, half-serious coquetry of the American young person amazed and delighted him, particularly as he promptly took their audacious flatteries in sober earnest, and fancied that all the women who flirted with him were desperately in love with

DRAWN BY ANNA WHELAN BETTS

THE NEXT MORNING STUDIES BEGAN IN THE SHABBY OLD LIBRARY

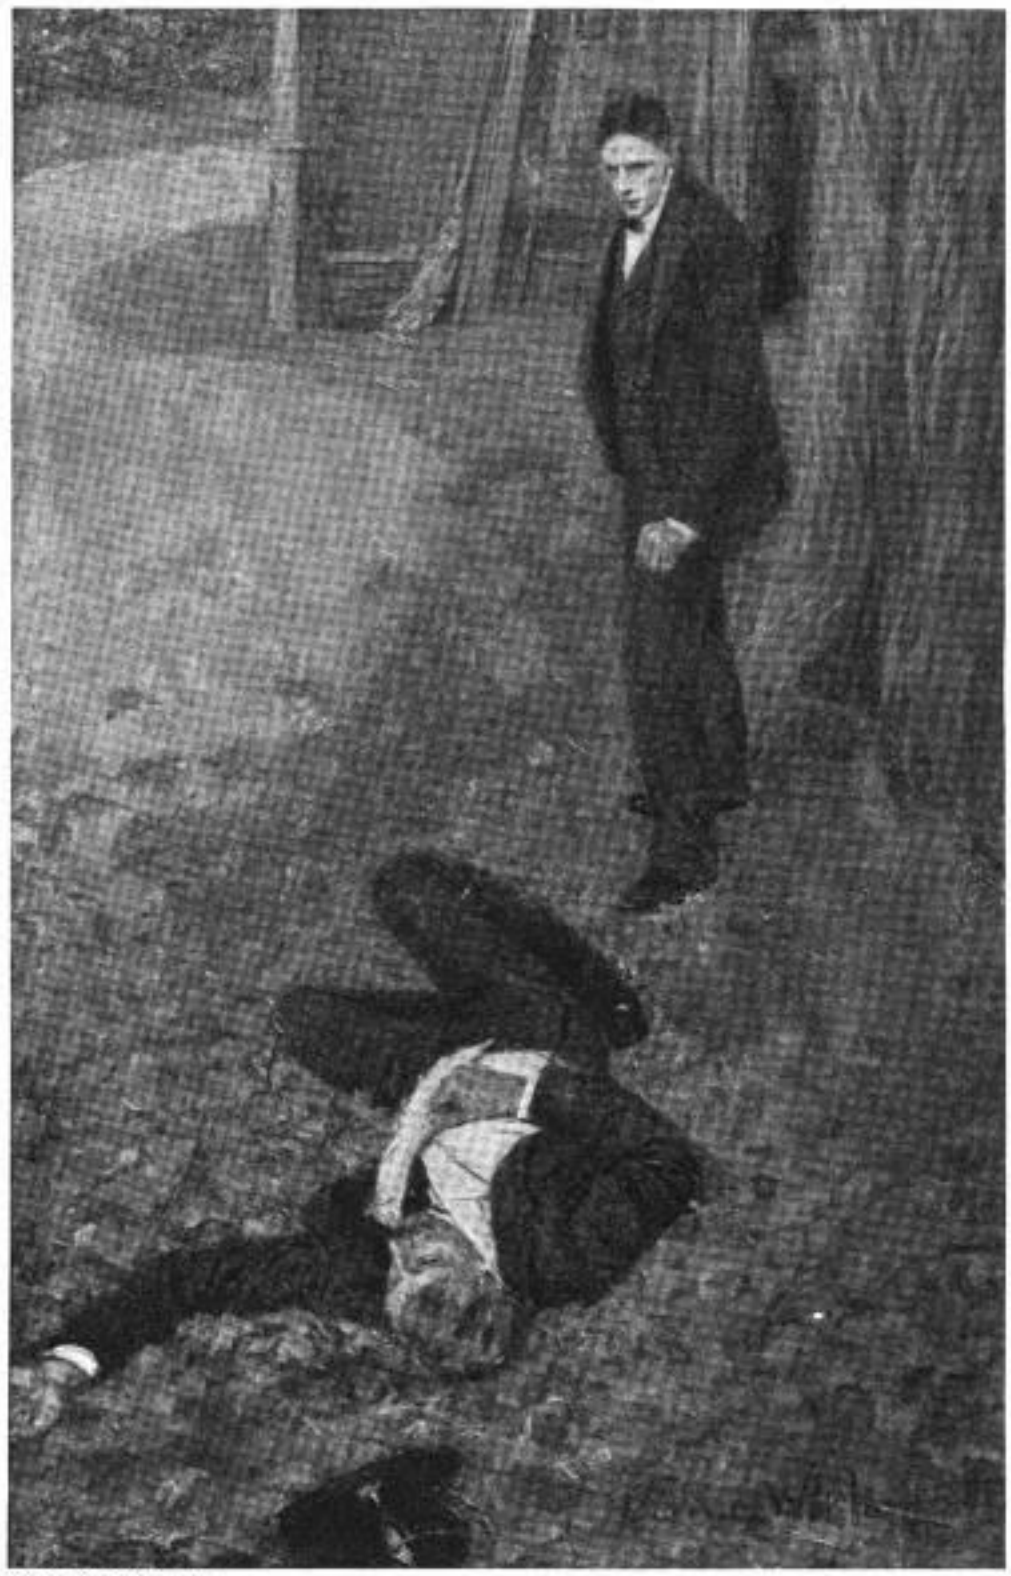
Digitized by Google

him. Huntley listened with a sardonic grin to all of Von Reben's outpourings. Meanwhile they had reached the end of the ragged lawn on which the old brick house with its straggling stables and offices were placed haphazard. At that moment Eleanor Maitland, on horseback, dashed across the lawn. She rode like a lapwing, and looked handsomer on horseback than at any other time.

Von Reben gripped Huntley's arm hard. "Who is that glorious creature?" he cried.

"My pupil," replied Huntley, laughing. "Come in and be introduced to her. She isn't glorious, though. She has freckles and a turned-up nose."

Von Reben needed no second invitation. When they entered the old hall, and Eleanor, in her well-fitting habit—made by her own hands—tripped across the floor to meet them, Huntley grudgingly admitted that she was charming, if not strictly handsome. Eleanor, like most young things, was eager to meet a stranger, and beamed on the German Count. Miss Rachel appeared, and invited him to remain to supper—a courtesy due to the tutor's friend, according to the wholesome custom of the region. Von Reben was at no pains to disguise his admiration for Eleanor, rightly judging that no harm could come of it, as it was plain she would have no fifteen thousand dollars cash to pay over to the Emperor of Germany for the privilege of marrying one of His Majesty's lieutenants. Richard, handsome, gentle and excitable, was immensely taken with Von Reben; so the Count-Captain made a great success among his new-found friends. When supper was over, Huntley took him out-of-doors to smoke. As they walked up and down by the cedar hedge which bounded the lawn, the Count-Captain linked his arm in that of his old acquaintance and exclaimed: "My friend, your pupil is bound some day to be a great toast, as you call it. Let her but escape from this narrow, provincial life and you will see she will have adorers!"



"I think not," answered Huntley. "She is rather handsome, and not deficient in sense—but strangely deficient in attractiveness to men. She is one of the few women I ever saw who I believe will never have a chance to marry, for I don't count your raptures, my dear fellow. It is simply that she lacks softness, coquetry, femininity. She is a good girl—honest, self-sacrificing, and very modest, with a fresh, frank, true modesty—but attractive—no! A man might as easily fall in love with the useful, modest and reliable pump as fall in love with Eleanor Maitland."

Not four feet away, on the other side of the hedge in the moonlight, stood Eleanor Maitland, hearing every word. She had stepped out to see if the turkeys were all in their turkey-yard, and coming back she had waited a moment to let the young men pass, and in that moment she heard words that no woman could ever forget. Deficient in attractions! Likely to die an old maid because nobody would marry her! A good girl! Pah! As soon fall in love with the useful, modest and reliable pump! And that wretched, ugly, dyspeptic schoolmaster to dare to say such things of her! Eleanor stamped upon the ground in her ecstasy of rage, and called upon the golden stars shining above her to bear witness to her everlasting hatred of Huntley. She went back to the house, hurriedly kissed her aunt good-night, left Richard at his studies—her own recitations for the next day she did not condescend to look at—and went to bed to nurse her wounded self-love.

Until one has known real sorrow, few pains are worse than those of insulted vanity. Eleanor lay awake in her little white bed, quivering in a storm of sobs and tears. And as those aspersions which have a basis of fact are always hardest to bear, so was the frightful truth borne in upon her that after all there might be something in what Huntley had said. That was but an additional torment to her wounded self-love.

After an hour of anguish for herself and hatred for Huntley, a thought rushed into her mind which lifted her up in bed as if she had received a galvanic shock. Count von Reben had not found her so unattractive! Other women practiced coquetry—why should not she learn it—she was "not deficient in sense!"—and practice it on Count von Reben? She would, she would, she would! she almost declared aloud—and went to sleep to dream that Count von Reben was on his knees before her.

The next day Huntley was conscious of a curious change in Eleanor. He thought at first she was ill, so gentle and subdued was her manner. She assured him she was not, and the dinner she ate proved she was telling the truth.

DRAWN BY ANNA WHELAN BETTS

—THE COUNT-CAPTAIN MEASURED HIS LENGTH ON THE GROUND

Von Reben came over early in the afternoon, as soon as Huntley was at liberty. The two men went for a walk together. As they were passing across the lawn to the lane they met Eleanor. She had on her prettiest gown, and was swinging her hat coquettishly in her hand; coquetry was new to her, and she palpably overdid it, as she stood making eyes at Von Reben and smiling up into his face. The Count, however, was delighted—another tribute to his power over women! Huntley longed to box the girl's ears, while Eleanor, as she went upon her way, felt certain of being able to make a fool of Von Reben under Huntley's very nose. Another person, however, had succumbed as completely to Von Reben's charms as Von Reben thought Eleanor had. This was Richard, who hung upon the Count-Captain's words and could listen unwearied to the subjects always upon Von Reben's lips—his own adventures, travels, compliments, accidents, and general mode of life.

He was to remain a week as the guest of his New York friend, and when that week was up Richard had become so infatuated with Von Reben that he persuaded Miss Rachel to ask him to come and stay at Wareham. This Von Reben promptly accepted, much to Huntley's surprise. He imagined that a little of rural Virginia would go a long way with the Count-Captain, and was puzzled to find a reason for his remaining. It could scarcely be Eleanor, although the girl was throwing herself at Von Reben's head with an energy and persistence that made Huntley perfectly ill. Nor could it be Richard, although the boy dogged Von Reben's footsteps all day, and spent hours in his room at night after all the rest of the family were in bed. Suddenly Huntley had a moment of illumination. Von Reben had the Continental European's passion for cards—and nothing was more likely than that those midnight seances were devoted to a quiet little game. True, Richard could have little ready money, but knowing his shallow, sinewless character Huntley had no doubt that Von Reben could induce the boy to sign his name to any piece of paper offered him. Huntley was deeply annoyed and perplexed at the wolf he had so unthinkingly introduced into the sheepfold. He turned the whole unpleasant business over in his mind, and it grew not less unpleasant when he found out that his surmise about the card-playing was correct—and Von Reben was not the man to play cards for his health.

Huntley knew the uselessness of appealing to Richard, and he determined to see what a bold front would do with Von Reben. Therefore, one afternoon, a few days later, meeting the gallant Hussar at the stables, the tutor bluntly asked him:

"When do you return to New York?"

"I don't know," Von Reben answered dreamily. "You who have been in the house with that charming Eleanor a long time without adoring her—how can you understand my reluctance to leave her? I cannot marry her—the Emperor will not let me—but I love—I love—I shall always be her lover!" which he pronounced as if it were loafer.

"Perhaps you will," promptly replied Huntley, "but I am not thinking so much of the girl as I am of the boy—for she is quite able to take care of herself. He is not."

Von Reben's blue eyes assumed a look of brooding tenderness, and laying his hands on Huntley's shoulders, he seemed to be gazing far beyond the world of vision.

"My friend," he said, "you do not know—you cannot know—the temptation that besets me to take this adorable Eleanor back to Germany with me. I cannot make her my wife—but if constancy, devotion—all that woman could ask——"

The sentence was interrupted by Huntley's planting his fist so suddenly and so vigorously between Von Reben's eyes that the Count-Captain measured his length on the ground.

He scrambled up at once, too dazed and astounded to be angry. Huntley was standing over him, clinching and unclinching his fists, and sparks of fire flashing from his eyes. "What has happened? What have I said?" asked Von Reben, quite bewildered.

"What has happened," replied Huntley, gritting his teeth in rage, "is that you have said words about an innocent young girl which place your life in jeopardy, and I knocked you down by way of warning. Remember, in this country, where a woman's honor is concerned men do not argue. They shoot—and they shoot uncommonly straight, too. I advise you, therefore, to leave this place by the first opportunity—to-morrow's steamboat."

Von Reben's jaw dropped. He was thunderstruck, but something in Huntley's eloquent and menacing look convinced him he was hearing the truth and nothing but the truth. Nevertheless, in the chaos of his mind one fact struggled to the surface. An officer, receiving a blow, must have satisfaction—and he was not deficient in that automatic courage of his class. He drew himself up and said stiffly:

"I have no friend to represent me here, but I can find one in New York, and if you will not go there to grant me the satisfaction one gentleman owes another I will engage to have my friend come here."

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile Huntley had recovered his self-possession.

"Pray don't trouble yourself about either," he coolly remarked, lighting a cigar. "I haven't the slightest notion of giving you a chance to make a hole in my carcass. The offense of which you have been guilty—an implication against an innocent young girl—places you in imminent danger—but the other fellow doesn't take the slightest risk."

"Do you mean to say," asked Von Reben after a moment of dazed and incredulous silence, "that for a remark such as I made in the frankness of friendship just now I am knocked down, ordered to leave the section under pain of a still worse threat, and no satisfaction whatever accorded me?"

"Precisely," replied Huntley, beginning to puff at his cigar. "No one could state the case better. Did you never hear of the Irishman who wrote back to his friend in Cork: 'Pat, this is a mighty good country for women and cows, and a mighty bad country for men and horses?' Now, this is, in truth, a mighty bad country for men like you—and the sooner you get out of it the better. I give you fair warning. Unless you leave to-morrow, of your own free will, you will be sent away. For the sake of the ladies at Wareham I will say nothing of this until you are gone, but don't abuse my indulgence."

With that Huntley walked toward the house, inwardly swearing at Von Reben, at that foolish boy Richard, at that wrong-headed girl Eleanor, and most of all at himself for introducing Von Reben to the Wareham household. Von Reben mechanically turned the other way, toward the fields and woods. He tried very hard to adjust his ideas to the strange conditions in which he was enmeshed. He had seen and heard a good many things which made him believe that the Americans were, after all, more than half savage; and this last brutal and unintelligible affair convinced him that civilization had made small headway in the United States. He therefore determined it could matter little how and why he left the society of such barbarians, and he would go next day. Turning these thoughts in his mind, he came upon Eleanor on the edge of a field fringed with trees. She was standing under a chestnut tree, and was throwing a stick into the branches to knock down the chestnuts. Her hat had fallen off, and her bronze hair was in beautiful disorder. Her cheeks were flushed, and she had a kind of natural, Dryad-like beauty that might indeed have charmed the great god Pan himself.

She stopped throwing the stick as Von Reben tramped through the dead leaves in the path toward her, and he imagined he saw a soft welcome in her eyes. Eleanor was indeed ready to practice upon him her new-found arts of beguiling, and considerably more than willing to make a fool of him, especially under Huntley's nose.

Von Reben marched up and then with solemn sentimentality said: "Do you know, Mees Eleanor, that I leave to-morrow?"

"Do you?" asked Eleanor, in a tone of acute disappointment; what would she do for a block to try her experiment on?—was the thought in her mind.

"Yes, and it is hard to go"—and then, turning the conversation skillfully into the channels relating to love and marriage, Von Reben imparted to her the financial requirements necessary to marry an officer in the German Army.

Eleanor listened gravely, her sense of humor too intensely tickled for her to lose one word of the information Von Reben was gloomily imparting to her. She looked so quaint, so sweet, so sympathetic, that if she had possessed a hundred thousand dollars, or even fifty thousand, Von Reben would have liked to marry her at that moment.

"And so," she said presently, in a tone of sad abstraction, after hearing him out, "a girl must have fifteen thousand dollars cash in order to marry an officer of your rank?"

"Yes. Alas!" replied Von Reben, with a sigh.

"Well, I haven't that much money to save my life," Eleanor responded with sudden gayety, "and if I had I wouldn't invest it in a German officer when I can get an American just as good without paying anything for him. Come, let's go back to the house."

Surprise, and a faint repulsion toward her, came over Von Reben. He remembered Huntley's words, "flippant positiveness," "no girlishness," "no softness." At that moment he would not have married her for a cent less than a hundred thousand dollars, and his admiration for American women considerably abated. How could they, brought up in the atmosphere of the savagery of American men, be truly admirable? Von Reben was conscious of a want of affinity with the whole American nation just then.

In the house events were taking place. Huntley, going to his room, passed the door of Miss Rachel's. He heard a sound of sobbing, and Richard, in his soft, pleading voice, was saying something brokenly about "my honor."

"Take it, take it, the last five hundred I have in the world," wailed Miss Rachel; "but that man must leave, and I can never forgive Mr. Huntley for bringing him here."

Neither could Huntley forgive himself. He privately determined that Von Reben should not take away with him poor Miss Rachel's five hundred dollars of butter and chicken money.

When they all assembled at supper, the constraint was so visible it might have been cut with a knife. It infected everybody except Eleanor. The girl was in great spirits, and to Von Reben's annoyance plumped out the whole story of the cold cash necessary to marry a German officer, adding:

"If ever I have fifteen thousand dollars to buy a lieutenant with, you may all depend upon it I sha'n't take the first one I see. I shall have at least a dozen sent me to inspect before I lay out my good money."

Von Reben colored furiously, and Huntley, for the hundredth time that week, yearned to box Eleanor's ears. He had suddenly discovered a great deal of the child in this tall young girl, and having disliked her for her want of childishness, he now disliked her twice as much for having so much of it.

As they rose from the table Von Reben announced to Miss Rachel his coming departure next day. She faintly replied she was sorry he was going and hoped he would return—and being inexpert as a liar, the untruth would not have deceived a baby.

Early hours were the rule at Wareham, and by ten o'clock all were in their rooms. But five minutes past ten Richard had stolen into Von Reben's room, had locked the door, and pulling a little calico bag out of his pocket, slapped it down on the table with silly triumph, whispering:

"Here it is. She gave it to me this afternoon—five hundred dollars in gold."

"Good!" softly exclaimed Von Reben, producing at the same time a rouleau of gold such as foreign banks provide. And then began a game of écarté, at which Von Reben excelled and Richard was no better than a nincompoop.

Huntley sat in his room with a book in his hand, listening intently. At half-past ten he got up, pulled off his coat, put on his dressing slippers, and went noiselessly out into the passage. Somebody was there before him. Eleanor drew back into the darkness of a turn in the stairs as Huntley stepped across the hall, and throwing his weight against Von Reben's door, burst it in with a great noise.

Yes, it was just as he expected—cards, and Von Reben plucking Richard like a pigeon. The boy jumped up as pale as death; Von Reben sat still, his cards in his hands, and a frown on his forehead. This intrusion into his bedroom he considered most unjustifiable, and was prepared to resent it. But he was not prepared when Eleanor dashed into the room and, taking in the situation at a glance, walked up to Von Reben and, deliberately slapping him full in the face with all her young strength, cried:

"Oh, you abominable wretch—to come here and swindle this poor, weak boy out of money that isn't his!"

Von Reben sat as if paralyzed—and so stood Huntley and Richard. Huntley had suspected that Eleanor had a good hot temper of her own, but this exhibition of childish rage astounded him. Before he could say a word, or Von Reben could protest, she had swept all the gold off the table into her skirt and turned to go out. "Stop!" cried Von Reben, recovering his voice when he saw his money walking off. "Return my money!"

"I shall not," shrieked Eleanor defiantly. "I don't know which is yours and which is Aunt Rachel's—nor how much you have swindled that foolish boy out of, so I shall take it all!"

Von Reben started toward her, but Huntley quietly placed himself before him, and Eleanor marched out, seizing Richard as she went and taking him along with her.

Huntley and Von Reben were then left alone. Von Reben spoke in a voice of concentrated rage. "I call you to witness that I have been robbed, but I shall have redress."

"By all means," replied Huntley. "I have nothing to do with that part of the affair. But you must leave this house at once. Else I shall get help and put you out."

"Is there no law for the protection of strangers in this country?" roared Von Reben, trembling with wrath.

"Oh, yes. Plenty. But there are certain unwritten laws which decree that when a stranger acts as you have done he has no rights which anybody is bound to respect. And, you know, unwritten laws are much more strictly obeyed than written laws. There is nothing for you to do but to get away as quickly and as quietly as you can."

Von Reben stood up and swore long and loud at the country, its institutions, its men, its women, and its customs, and then went downstairs and out of the house, still swearing, Huntley politely assuring him that his belongings would be sent over early in the morning, but he could not answer for the money.

Going back upstairs, Huntley was met by Miss Rachel in a dressing-gown, her hair done up in curl-papers. She threw her arms around his neck and sobbed out upon his bosom that he was the saviour of her poor, innocent boy. Richard was in a state of maudlin repentance by that time, and Miss Rachel, taking the boy's head upon her lap, proceeded to assure him of her undying affection, and soon persuaded him that he was an innocent victim of circumstances. Seeing nothing of Eleanor, Huntley knocked at her door, and she appeared, fully dressed.

"Will you come downstairs and give me five minutes' conversation?" he asked in a tone that admitted of no parleying.

Eleanor sullenly followed him downstairs into the old library, when Huntley, lighting a lamp and placing it so he could see her face well, spoke.

"Of course you will give me back Von Reben's money. I could not demand it before him, but I took it for granted as soon as you cooled off you would return it."

"I haven't cooled off," replied Eleanor fiercely.

Huntley controlled his temper by an effort. What argument could be use with this unreasonable child? After a moment he said:

"Do you mean to say you will not return it?"

"I do," replied Eleanor, but the note of defiance in her voice was fainter.

"Very good," was Huntley's answer. "There is but one thing to do—to go over to the club-house and ask Von Reben how much he had and to give him my check for the amount. If I have not so much in bank I shall give him my note for the balance."

Eleanor stood for five minutes, the light from the lamp falling full on her face. Huntley was forced to acknowledge that, although not a beautiful face, it was the most expressive one he had ever seen. Without uttering a word, he read in her changing color, her tremulous, mobile mouth, her eyes, now darkening, now lightening, full of fire and dew, all the mortification, anger, resistance, uncertainty, and, at last, the submission that possessed her. When at last she moved off slowly to fetch the money, her downcast eyes filled with tears, her drooping figure, even her small, half-closed hands, were eloquent of feeling. Huntley wondered that he had ever thought her lacking in softness.

Von Reben left the next day, taking his money with him. He had got it, with what he considered a most outrageous note, from Huntley—and so very unpleasant were the Count-Captain's experiences among the American barbarians that he gave up his leave and took the next steamer home, swearing to himself that of all the savages on this planet the Americans were the worst and lowest.

The behavior of Huntley and Eleanor after this puzzled and annoyed Miss Rachel much. Before, as they had hated each other, they had maintained an attitude of perfectly civil ill-will and contempt toward each other. This Miss Rachel took for agreeable politeness and congeniality. After the Von Reben affair Miss Rachel declared that the tutor and his pupil led a regular cat-and-dog life. They were perpetually squabbling, and neither one could be persuaded to let the other one alone. This lasted until the very week before Huntley's engagement closed in June. "And I can't possibly have him here another year," fretfully declared Miss Rachel to Eleanor. "The way you and he dispute and wrangle is perfectly disgraceful. He is very provoking to you, but you are extremely rude to him."

"I know it," said Eleanor in a strange voice. Well, there would be no more wrangling after that week.

She went out of the house, and walked about the lawn in the still June evening, trying to imagine how it would be when Huntley was gone forever. Presently she found herself at the opening in the hedge where she had heard Huntley disparage her to Von Reben that autumn night. She stopped and looked about her at the sweet, familiar scene—the old brick house embowered in trees, a great, smoky, golden moon rising behind the fringe of chestnuts on the ridge before her, the stars shining in the blue-black heavens—how piercing was its beauty then, and how strange and cold and unlovely would it be next week when Huntley was gone. For the knowledge that the light of the moon and the stars and the sound of the summer winds would not be the same without him as with him burst upon her in that moment. She was standing, pale and bewildered with this new and strange discovery, when Huntley stepped through the hedge.

"This place always reminds me of that scoundrel, Von Reben," he said.

"Yes," cried Eleanor, with something like a sob in her voice. "It was here I heard you tell him I had no softness, no femininity—and I was one woman who would remain an old maid because I could not help myself. Oh, I remember it all!" and she burst into tears.

Huntley was cut to the heart. He took her hand and said, "Forgive me. I was ill. I was cross. I had dyspepsia. I didn't know you, Eleanor."

And in some way the touch of her hand made him say what he had not, until that moment, dreamed of saying: "And as to your being an old maid because no man would ask you, dear, I ask you now, and implore you to be my wife."

Eleanor declared, for a whole week, with tears, and laughter, and gibes, and jeers, and taunts, and smiles, and sobs, that nothing—no, nothing on earth would induce her to marry Huntley. Nevertheless, she married him before three months were gone.

Couldn't Fool Inspector Byrnes

WHEN former Superintendent Thomas Byrnes was the celebrated Inspector Byrnes of the New York detective force, he occupied a queer suite of rooms in one corner of the old marble police headquarters in Mulberry Street. It was always a place of mystery. The Inspector sat at a flat table at one end of the room. It was frequently covered with papers. On the walls in glass cases were odds and ends of criminology, bits of ropes that had hanged notorious murderers, black caps, revolvers that had figured in infamous cases, and other depressing objects.

One day the Inspector left a new reporter at his table and went into another room. He was gone half an hour. When he came back the reporter said:

"Inspector, did you have me watched while you were gone?"

"No. Why?"

"There are some pretty interesting papers on your desk, aren't there?"

"Nothing of any great value. Why do you ask?"

"What was to prevent my reading some of those letters and getting a mighty good story for my paper?" asked the reporter.

"Two reasons," answered the Inspector. "In the first place, I never leave a scrap of paper on my desk that the whole world is not welcome to read. Secondly, you couldn't have touched a sheet without my knowing it. Look at that penholder," pointing to a cheap affair laid carelessly across a bundle of papers. "Notice the direction in which it points. One end points at that door knob and the other at that black cap. Now you never would have noticed that, but I did before leaving the room, and if you had touched a single paper you would have displaced that penholder and I would have known it."

Digitized by Google

Through HARVARD on FIFTY Cents

By Garrison Williams

FOR at least a century Harvard has been known as "the rich man's college." The implication of that phrase has doubtless deterred many a poor young man from an attempt to enter her portals. The implication is that Harvard is a decidedly uncomfortable place for the student not possessed of much money; that he had far better look elsewhere.

The contrary is the truth. Wealth by no means assures success at Harvard. Though it is true that the cost of living is greater than the cost of living at Oxford, at Heidelberg, or the other foreign universities, it is none the less possible to secure all of the advantages which the catalogue has to offer for an expenditure seemingly impossible. To have a room in Dunster or Claverly Hall, to furnish one's rooms richly, to keep a stable and belong to the costly clubs of the college, is to spend in the neighborhood of $10,000 a year. But given pluck and brains to pit against the dollars of his more fortunate (or would you say unfortunate?) fellows, the poor man can work his way through Harvard with very little money and very great self-satisfaction, and graduate with honors far beyond the reach of men who waste their time as they waste the parental allowance, virtually buying their diplomas in the end.

THE ANCIENT AND HONORABLE ORDER OF TUTORS

When I say buying their diplomas I do not, of course, mean actual purchase and sale. There is, however, a regularly established system, politely called tutoring, by which students who disdain study may hurriedly absorb such knowledge as they are likely to be questioned about at forthcoming examinations. Among the indolent and well-to-do the "mid-years" and "finals" are bound to find many who are forced to have recourse to printed notes, syllabuses, seminars, and other aids and abetments of laziness. This is the "cramming" of the English colleges, and though the faculty openly discourages it, so long as there are quick wits on one side and long purses on the other some sort of bargain will be struck despite the most awful fulminations of the Dean. Legitimate tutoring is officially recognized. The growth of the University has largely eliminated from all but the most advanced and zealously guarded "starred" courses the personal element of guidance. To meet this lapse the heads of departments post upon the department bulletin boards the names of authorized tutors to the departments, chosen from the poor and brilliant scholars—at once an honor and an aid. The charges vary with the experience and ability of the tutor. The best work brings three dollars the hour, and from there down, as necessity and opportunity may determine.

That the poorest student has an equal chance for education with the richest is evidenced in my own experiences. Poverty, unless it is of the abject, helpless and hopeless kind, should never deter any young man from seeking knowledge at the fountain-head. For those who have no family resources Harvard offers many inducements in the way of scholarships and beneficiary funds. There are open no less than 206 scholarships, with grants ranging from $30 to $300. Every kind of premium is placed upon good scholarship. Had it not been for this fact, I, for one, could never have passed through Harvard. I doubt if any young man ever entered upon a college career under more unfavorable, nay, disheartening circumstances than I did. I was handicapped by ill health, a poor memory, and a reticent demeanor that I could not seem to conquer, be as bold as I might. My record as a student was so mean and unimpressive that I received upon my entrance to the University the maximum number of conditions.

WHAT MAY BE ACCOMPLISHED AGAINST ODDS

I had come to Cambridge with recommendations as a faithful and ambitious student, though I was from a new and therefore supposedly inefficient preparatory school. Somehow I floundered through my examination books, evoking, I am certain, the sympathy of the proctors in charge of the room. You may easily believe I was a happy youth when I saw my name posted in University Hall as admitted. Burdened though I was with drawbacks, my dogged determination had won for me the first step in the realization of all my boyhood dreams—a career at Harvard.

My plight upon arrival was bad enough, but added to my other shortcomings was the lack of funds for my immediate and pressing wants. From the moment I stepped off the car in Cambridge until the hour I crossed the yard for the last time I was thrown entirely upon my own resources in meeting the expenses of my course. Like an ominous spirit, foreboding evil, there arose constantly before me that old cry, "Harvard is the rich man's college." Now I can look back and smile at those first, fearful days, so full of apprehension for the future, so darkened by my worry as to how and where I was to obtain my equipment of books and furniture. I should not like to repeat the experiences of my first quarter-year at Harvard, helpful as those experiences were in making me resourceful and self-reliant. Because of my absolute poverty I learned to know the hard, outside business world much more intimately than do most students. I developed a keen commercial acumen along with intellectual breadth.

When I left Boston for Cambridge I had precisely fifty cents in my waistcoat pocket! I did not dare to spend any part of that huge wealth for food. To complicate matters, I had no idea as to where I should spend the night. I was totally unacquainted with the town. I found myself in the late afternoon in Harvard Square, as hungry and homeless as any tramp. I was travel-stained and footsore. I did not know that a mere inquiry would have set me on the right track to both food and shelter.

A FRESHMAN'S FIRST NIGHT AT CAMBRIDGE

Aimlessly I wandered through Cambridge with about the same feeling of desolation that would have possessed the soul of John Harvard—who knew the old town only as Newtown—had he linked arms with me that memorable evening and gone in search of a room. Through Cambridge Street and Holyoke Street I strolled, "sizing up" the houses in which I had been told rooms were to let. The New England spirit of enterprise that has turned every third dwelling in Cambridge into a lodging-house for students prevented me from securing a room "on trust." My sole baggage was the hand satchel I carried. Finally, in a far corner of Kirkland Street I found a kindly woman who seemed willing to take me in on speculation. I went to bed supperless but not wholly miserable.

I had left my native Pennsylvania town with enough to pay traveling expenses, plus my treasured fifty-cent piece and the promise of a loan of $175 from an intimate friend of my father. The latter was also one of my bondsmen, depositing in due time and order with the Bursar one-half the required $400 as a guarantee against my possible failure to meet all bills. The loaned $175 I fully expected to receive the day after my arrival. My representations to my trusting landlady were based on this assurance. The next day came, but the money did not. I haunted the express office through which it was to be delivered, and thought I saw in the face of the affable clerk the positive traces of criminal tendencies. I was plainly in pawn.

Would he allow me to display my extraordinary skill as a window decorator?

AN APPRENTICESHIP IN PRACTICAL ARCHITECTURE

It was late in the afternoon of my second day when I screwed up sufficient courage to approach the proprietor of one of the Boston bookstores and propose that I should dress up his shop windows with the new books, stationery and writing materials he offered for sale. I spoke very rapidly and earnestly to hide my confusion and humiliation, and declared I could attract in one day more customers by my handiwork than had come into his store in a week. Would he allow me to display my extraordinary skill as a window decorator? He finally consented to my proposition, and the price agreed upon was three dollars if my work proved wholly satisfactory. My impromptu effort was a revelation to myself. I think I did not arrange those books and things with any regard to harmonious blending of colors, but I built up some wonderful arches with paper boxes, and made some striking if inartistic rosettes with a bundle of pen-wipers and a stock of pencils. It is true that some of my geometrical effects in books were marred by placing them so that the casual spectator would have to stand on his or her head in order to read the titles. The chief thing of moment was that I received three dollars for my work. That night I dined—dined luxuriously, it seemed to me—and walked to my room with my chest out and my nose high in the air.

Then came my examinations, and if the borrowed money had not arrived at about the same time I should have flung myself into the Charles River. To be poor of pocket and poor of brain and still have enough perception left to realize one's state of hopeless demoralization seemed to me the very essence of ironical fate. Two of the three dollars earned as a window decorator went to my landlady—a sop to Cerberus. There was left of my original half-dollar just one lonely five-cent piece when my borrowed $175 came along to lift me from my slough of despond.

I felt secure with only my room rent of $2.50 the week to pay and a chance to live gayly on at least $125, allowing $50 for the payment of my first tuition bill in the coming February, which seemed almost far away enough to make me reckless. But I had counted without my host, as the phrase runs. There were incidentals to be paid for, which made the payment something more than a mere incident in my early college life.

I found that for $2.50 the week I could dine at the Foxcroft Club in a way that passeth human belief; with good roast beef at fifteen cents the plate, and side dishes at three and five cents each, topping off with good coffee and the inevitable piece of pie for eight cents, you may dine à la Foxcroft with true epicurean gusto and satisfaction. But what I found was reasonable enough in the way of inexpensive catering to the inner man, I soon discovered was offset by a monopoly in text-books. To-day all this is changed. The Coöperative—familiarly known as "The Coop"—managed by the students themselves, furnishes all necessaries to its members at cost prices.

A SCHOLASTIC MONOPOLY

Text-books were purchasable at but one place, and that place in Cambridge. There were many reasons why it was impossible to buy one's necessary books in any shop other than the Cambridge place, but it must suffice to tell that in the latter establishment text-books could only be bought and paid for at such prices as would appall the bookseller familiar with competition. My text-books did all but send me into absolute bankruptcy. I thanked Heaven my room rent was paid up some weeks in advance, though I trembled for myself when I thought of the likelihood of starving to death. The idea of starvation first came to me as an airy fancy; later, I was confronted by it as a grim and terribly real spectre. My original capital of $175 had dwindled to a $20 bill before I had actually fallen into the routine of my first term at college. In later years I realized what was not evident to me at the start—that the first months, necessitating as they do the purchase of many things used throughout the four years of college life, makes an initial expense larger in proportion than that of succeeding years.

HOW TO LIVE IN LUXURY AT $2.50 THE WEEK

Before the expiration of the spring term of my Freshman year I had imbibed much wisdom other than that printed in my text-books. I had learned how to live more economically than I had been doing, and how to make money within college grounds. Two-thirds of my original "pile" had gone by that time for tuition and text-books, and the balance paid for a few weeks' board and lodging. For the cost of the latter I had no complaint. My landlady was a second mother to me. There were three other student lodgers in the house, but somehow I did not affiliate with them, and none of us saw much of each other.

My quarters were remarkably cozy and homelike; I am certain no such comforts can be found at a cost so low outside of Cambridge. My home (as I soon came to call it) was one of those numerous houses where student lodgers had been catered to for two or three generations. I found that my motherly landlady, though keen enough at a bargain, had supported herself for years by means of her rented rooms. Conceive, if you will, a large, square room, in the old style, the door and window trimmings of Colonial design and painted white, and you have an outline sketch of the place I called home. Nothing was there that might be called luxurious, but everything was useful and some things were beautiful. An old-time mahogany dresser stood between the two windows of the room, and atop of this very dignified bit of furniture an oval mirror tilted between supports. A bamboo bookrack rose from the floor at one corner. There was an open fireplace with grate and fender. In a far corner stood my bed—an iron-framed affair, immaculately spread, and in the centre of the room was the study table, round and heavy, standing on its supports with a suggestion of being built all of a piece with the house itself. I was rich in chairs—four of them; two thickly upholstered ones, a walnut rocker, and the inevitable "Harvard chair"—a compromise between a steamer, a dentist's and a Morris chair, with the virtues of all these and an individuality of its own. For all this ease and comfort I paid the munificent sum of $2.50 the week. I could have lived out the whole of my college life in this sunny, cheerful apartment, but for the fact that it was inconveniently distant from the University, and I felt the need of keeping in hourly touch with congenial fellow-students. It was for this last reason mainly that I removed my few small belongings from the Kirkland Street house, bade my foster-mother a regretful adieu, and made my home for the rest of my Freshman and the whole of my Sophomore year in Divinity Hall, where as one of some half-dozen laymen—a clannish, irreverent but studious crew—I was happy, if poor.

Digitized by Google

WHEN THINGS LOOKED AT THEIR BLACKEST

The means by which I eked out my early college days, after my borrowed money was gone and I had succeeded in accumulating a number of bothersome debts, can perhaps be imagined by a recital of a few of my adventures in search of the elusive dollar. One day when I was completely stranded, with no hope of earning immediate cash (I could not bring myself to borrow from my classmates), I walked through the yard doing some hard thinking. Mechanically I drew out my watch to see the time. Here was my salvation. I would pawn it.

It was with the assurance of ignorance that I hurried into a Boston loan-office and asked for $50—$10 less than the original price. The struggle between my pride and my insistent hunger was sharp, but brief. I received $15 and left my watch. Later I pawned two rings and some silver toilet articles. These latter yielded me $7.50. This was the darkest hour of my college life. In a day of black extremity it was announced that I had won one of several prizes on the Bowdoin foundation, which meant $100, payable at an early date. Later I contested successfully for the Boylston prize for elocution, which yielded me $45. You may guess my condition of mind when I found these honors and (what was more to the point at the time) the accompanying helpful dollars showered upon me. This success changed my whole point of view and gave me a new inspiration to work for success. I determined not only to pay my way as I went, but to lay up riches for the future. I found this latter resolve impossible of realization. I worked and studied as only an ambitious youth can.

AN OPENING CAREER AS POLITICIAN AND CATERER

Another poor student, to whom I had been attracted by that same affinity which draws into congenial groups by themselves tramps, railroad Presidents and house-breakers, had a marvelous possession in a typewriter machine. I was a good operator, and my skill enabled me to earn enough for an entire new outfit of clothing and a few—just a few—little luxuries: a new briar pipe, for example, and a couple of pounds of good tobacco. Upon my borrowed machine I wrote, at a reduced rate per folio, letters, manuscripts and circulars—everything that can be expressed by the characters of the alphabet. For a Boston politician I wrote an address which he afterward delivered to his constituents amid awed praise and wild applause ($10). For a student's dinner-party I turned off twenty decorated menu cards, making the floral borders, etc., with combinations of the X and O signs of my writing instrument (result, $5). A greater part of my work was writing manuscripts for some of the professors, which, though laborious and exacting, was liberally paid for and helpful where the manuscript to be typewritten touched upon a subject in which I was interested. From such jobs I earned about $70. To do this work I had to sacrifice many sleeping hours and permitted myself no recreation. For the rest of my first year I virtually pounded out my living expenses on the typewriter, which I was soon able to rent at a low rate from my friend, who seldom used the machine and needed the money. Only once since I had secured the typewriter was I in actual need of money.

That gloomy time came when my machine collapsed (from overwork, I presume) and had to be laid off for repairs for nearly a week.

A VACATION OF HARD WORK

My vacation was a mere word, for during the summer I worked ten hours a day as porter in a country hotel. There were many humiliations attached to the position, but these were as nothing to the severe ankle sprain I received in handling a big trunk that slipped my grasp and threw me, neck and heels, as a broncho throws an inexperienced horseman, down a flight of steps. I was "docked" a day's earnings for my "carelessness," though my employer, a gruff man with a heart only partially ossified by worrisome years of hotel management, paid my doctor's fee, revoked the penalty, and gave me a fortnight's rest on full pay. At the beginning of my Sophomore year I had earned enough to pay my tuition fee, but that was all. From the loan fund of the college I borrowed $75; from the beneficiary funds I collected another $75; for some newspaper correspondence I received $30, and with small jobs, such as painting a fellow-student's blackened eye to a normal hue, bill-posting, song and speech writing, and my usual typewriting performances, I pulled through free and clear, with a few dollars left in my purse. This was gratifying, because my expenses were considerably higher than those of the previous year. I had bought myself a few luxuries, and had added a number of choice volumes to my growing library. When I moved into Divinity Hall I had hired my furniture and was given the privilege of paying the bill at Commencement. This I was able to do. I had indulged myself in Boston plays, and had spent some money on mild luxuries, and still was on the safe side of the ledger.

My vacation was a mere word

A PROSPEROUS AND BUSY JUNIOR YEAR

During my Junior year my receipts were close upon $600. This good showing I was able to make by doing manuscript typewriting of a technical nature for one of the best-known professors at Harvard. He turned over to me the manuscript sheets of two books, and I translated his scrawl into intelligible English copy for the printer. One of the queer means by which I earned a quick $5 was the removal of a calf's intestines for the use of a professor in the medical school. All was fish that came to my net.

Students are necessarily debarred from the numerous scholarships offered until they have behind them a year's attendance and the records—recitation and examination—of their work. Finding myself eligible for certain prizes, I at once set about competing for them. My success was out of all proportion with my effort, for I attempted to secure everything available, and received—besides $200 from the Price Greenleaf Aid—a $250 award in the Bigelow scholarship, another $250 from the Bowditch scholarship, and a trifle over $50 for coaching a number of well-to-do idlers. Toward the end of my Junior year I secured quite a corner on the "private tutoring" business by forming classes convening for an hour or an hour and a half at a time and putting the delinquents through a rapid "course of sprouts," giving them valuable tips on questions, and bringing them into condition for the examinations. Bunching them together in this fashion, I was enabled to charge from fifty cents to $2 per capita (according to the difficulty of the studies), and as I conducted my educational kalsomining business on a strictly cash basis I made money until the arrival of examination days put an end to my monopoly.

For a Boston politician I wrote an address which he afterward delivered

With an increased income I bought better clothes, paying $30 for a measured suit where formerly a $12 ready-made outfit had to suffice. I began to feel less like an outcast. It is true I joined none of the expensive clubs—like the Porcellian—nor did I become connected with any of the numerous societies which form a social network around Harvard. I kept no high-bred dogs and horses, and had no drains upon my pocketbook from the dues of the athletic clubs, but college life was sweet to me, and the companionships I formed in Cambridge are still as strong as in the early days.

A TRIFLE THAT DETERMINED A CAREER

I began the summer following my Junior year with a brave attempt at driving a buckboard, but soon proved myself worthy of nobler occupation and was elevated to the proud position of hotel clerk—minus the traditional diamond shirt-stud and "loud" clothing. I became so prosperous on $15 a week (board and room free) that I was tempted to embark on the profession of hotel clerk and drop my aspirations to the bar. Something happened which deterred me from adopting a stand behind hotel counters. It was a foolish little incident, but it determined my future occupation, and I am sure I have not yet had cause to regret the choice. A great political discussion had arisen in the country town of which the hotel where I was employed was the chief hostelry. The discussion centred upon whether or not a new and more commodious town hall should be erected to supplant the Noah's Ark box which served as the present seat of municipal business. It was a momentous subject, and the opponents of the new edifice were in the majority—close-fisted farmers, for the most part. A mass-meeting was arranged so that the most eloquent advocates of the town hall question should furnish opinions for the townsmen to act upon at the forthcoming election. More for the fun of the thing than for any other motive, I volunteered to speak in favor of erecting a public structure "in keeping with the beauty and prosperity of the community." To those who opposed the innovation my proposed address was of no consequence. Being a "rank outsider," I was not looked upon with much enthusiasm by those who accepted my services, but they were short of speakers and I "might fill in a gap."

The great night came, and every man of the place who could walk or be carried came to the little toy town hall. I had worked up interest in the verbal contest of the evening among the half-hundred male guests of the hotel, and they helped swell the throng. Speeches in varying degree convincing and ungrammatical had been made when there came a lull in the proceedings.

ATTIC RHETORIC FROM A BARREL HEAD

This was my chance. Mounted on a barrel just outside the door, I began to harangue the crowd which struggled in vain to get through the doorway of the hall. There were almost as many persons outside the building as were within. I began in a loud voice to call attention to the inadequacy of the old structure on such occasions as the present one. I talked of the "penny wise, pound foolish" policy of town and village government. I appealed to the native's pride of citizenship and to his patriotism. I piled quotation on quotation, and hurled Latin and Greek at them in rolling periods. I finally wound up my peroration with a pat and amusing story, and retired amid the cheers of both progressives and conservatives. I had drawn out most of the audience from the hall by the mere vigor of my voice. There was nothing too good for me in the town after that night. A new town hall was unanimously agreed upon. I could have had a political office for the asking. They wanted me to open a law office in the town at once, and said I could enjoy a monopoly of the county's legal business if I would settle there. I think so much flattery turned my head, for I went back to Harvard determined to be a great legal luminary in one of the big cities. One thing saved me from conceit. It was the remark of my employer at the hotel: "You may be a pretty glib talker, an' you may know all about law an' politics, young man, but you're a mighty poor hotel clerk."

My Senior year at Harvard, as was and is the case with every earnest student, found every hour of the day, and many hours of the night, occupied with profitable work, equally profitable schemes, or study. I do not think I squandered a single minute. While, perforce, I studied more sedulously, I also contrived to earn more money than in previous years. This was no easy task. Besides keeping up my "coaching parties," I captured four scholarship prizes amounting in monetary value to $525. I do not think I possess an especial talent for profound thought, and am not much concerned about the elegance of my spoken or written thought. I was as much surprised as any one to find that I could win honors and dollars by working a few hours overtime on prize dissertations. I have the knack of conveying my ideas plainly in straightforward English, and a gift of words was provided for me upon my arrival in the world; and these have done much for me as student and lawyer.

THE PATH TO PROMINENCE AT LAST OPENS

I made an assistant of my fellow-student, whose typewriter I eventually bought outright, and turned out of hand a lot of work by proxy. I found myself respected by the fellows who from the start had stepped naturally into prominence, and not infrequently went to their rooms as a guest. This means something in a community where a student may keep himself as isolated as Crusoe on his island, and where social distinctions of rich and poor, idlers and workers, are as clearly marked as though the University were a big town. What with my several sources of income, my growing name (and its consequent benefit) as a tutor and general utility man, I made my final year at Harvard yield me large dividends. At the beginning of my Senior term I forsook Divinity Hall and moved over to better quarters in the yard. I felt that my larger income warranted this extravagance. Whenever I increased my expenditures I made it a rule to add an equal amount to my income. Thus I made up the added expense of new quarters by acting as the agent for a Boston theatre in the selection of intelligent "supers." I found no difficulty in getting students anxious enough to swell "the mob without" and willing to pay for the privilege.

Digitized by Google

JUST WHAT ONE YEAR AT HARVARD REALLY COSTS

I do not propose narrating every detail of my life during the four fruitful years I lived under the protection of Alma Mater. It is enough to tell that at the end of my Freshman year I was out of debt, and had made my way, an unaided stranger, with an initial capital of fifty cents and a determination to succeed in my endeavor to get an education. I have always been methodical. I believe in the kind of genius which takes pains in doing things. From my first day at Harvard I began to keep an itemized account of my expenditures and receipts. From my memorandum books I have copied the following figures, which, as campaign orators are fond of saying, are "interesting and instructive." These are my Freshman-year expenditures:

Tuition (in three installments of $50 each)	$150.00
Room (in Cambridge; 26 weeks at $2.50 the week)	65.00
Room (in Divinity Hall; 13 weeks at $3.00 the week)	39.00
Board (at the Foxcroft; 38 weeks at $2.50 the week)	95.00
Text-books	30.00
Fuel and light (one large oil lamp)	11.00
Clothes	35.00
Typewriter hire (32 weeks at 25c. the week)	8.00
Typewriter repairs	3.00
Incidentals (including stationery, stamps, etc.)	23.00
	$459.00

These items cover only necessary expenses. For the greater part of my first year I was barely able to make both ends meet. I did my washing and ironing and performed similar menial duties for myself which, though unpleasant, were obligatory. (Of course this was the crucial period in my college career, but it incited me to further effort rather than discouraged me.) My receipts for the first year offer a still more picturesque array of facts and figures, each item the frame of some incident burned in upon my memory as with a branding-iron. Here are my Freshman-year receipts:

Borrowed	$175.00
Window dressing	3.00
Pawned articles	22.50
Bowdoin prize	100.00
Boylston prize	45.00
Small loans	12.00
Typewriting	102.50
	$460.00

At the end of my first academic year I had worked my way to an honorable place in the University, and had one lonely dollar with which to start out on my vacation. That amount, however, was just twice as much as I had when I landed in Cambridge, and I was at least fifty cents "ahead of the game," plus a year's tuition and the honor of being a full-fledged collegian.

CLASS DAY TO A POOR STUDENT

On class day I "spread" modestly. My reception was a poor little effort, compared with the larger affairs of the societies, at the Pudding and the Hemenway Gymnasium, or the brilliant illumination of Beck, with its curtained inclosure and orchestra, but to these my friends had sent me cards, and from my own windows I could look out upon the fairest sight of all, the lantern-hung yard; and the sweetest music of the day, the farewell songs of the glee club, Lena Dear, and the Arion, were equally mine with all the world.

Having graduated, I faced the future with all my debts paid and a record of good scholarship, good behavior, and the good will of faculty and students alike. I returned home with $25 tucked away in my wallet—that money the grown-up child of my poor, little fifty-cent piece of four years before. My university training had cost me less than $2000. I make no boast of this fact, however, for others have gone through for less money, though none, I am sure, ever began a college career in Cambridge as I began mine, with no home resources, no cash in hand, indifferent mental training, and poor health. For my education at Harvard I spent less than many young men spend for pleasures during the same period.

By taking advantage of every opportunity offered to needy students—such helps as the Loan, Library and Furniture Associations; by hard work and earnest effort in securing some of the many cash prizes in which the corporation is especially generous; by keeping alert, cheerful, clear-headed and tactful, any determined young man can secure with economy and honor all the advantages of a university education.

The Automobile in the Public Service

By Waldon Fawcett

FOR no product of the closing years of the century is the future replete with greater possibilities than the automobile.

Considering the position occupied by the self-propelled vehicle as a recent topic of discussion during the past eighteen months, there has been a surprising oversight of its possible value to municipalities and the State. That this is being so speedily and effectually remedied just now is due to a sudden avalanche of practical demonstration. Seemingly almost simultaneously the more progressive officials of the National Government and a number of the larger cities have enlisted the services of the automobile, and the result, from the standpoint of accomplishments, has been as gratifying as surprising. Indeed, the achievements thus far placed to its credit entitle the horseless carriage to a place beside the locomotive, the telephone and the telegraph as a revolutionary factor in the evolution of the methods of administration of public business.

The automobile as an engine of war is likely to be first made an established fact by the war in South Africa. The type which the British authorities have selected as best suited for use as a gun platform ought to turn a Maxim machine gun of the ordinary type into a very effective weapon indeed. The automobile in question is capable of carrying the gun and a thousand rounds of ammunition at a speed of almost twenty miles an hour for more than a hundred miles without the necessity of a replenishment of the fuel supply.

In the United States the initiative in the employment of the automobile as a war agent was taken by Brigadier-General A. W. Greeley, Chief of the Signal Corps of the United States Army, who recently secured three electric wagons, the maximum speed of which is ten miles an hour. Two of the vehicles are designed to carry the instruments and paraphernalia of the corps, while the third is to provide transportation for officers of the corps detailed for experiments with military balloons or wireless telegraphy, as an adjunct to which the automobiles are to serve. The wagons are fitted with electric lights, and later a searchlight will be provided.

Appreciation of the benefits of the automobile is likely to come first to the great mass of the people in America as an adjunct to improved postal service. Already most favorable records have been made. In the city of Buffalo, recently, 150 pounds of mail were collected from thirty boxes, including eight package boxes, in exactly thirty-three minutes, the distance covered being slightly more than eight miles.

A kindred field of possible usefulness is found in the recently inaugurated rural free delivery, which has grown in three years from a total of forty-four to nearly four hundred routes, operated in forty States and Territories.

There are at present employed in the rural free delivery service almost four hundred carriers, and the aggregate length of their combined routes is something under nine thousand miles. It is apparent that the territory served could be doubled in area were the carriers provided with automobiles.

To farmers this would mean pecuniary benefit, for with late information from the markets promptly available there would arise countless instances when farm products could be disposed of to better advantage, and, also, there is to be considered the rise of value in farm lands which follows the improvement of highways as a natural sequence.

Already the French Government has ordered fifty heavy, high-powered wagons for mail carrying in the Soudan.

In the field of municipal administration the advent of the automobile has naturally been made first in the twin departments of police and fire. Ultimately there will hardly be any limit to its usefulness in both. The usefulness of the steam roller, which has come to be regarded as a virtual necessity, probably helped to pave the way for the automobile steam fire engine, which first made its appearance in Boston. Arrangements have been made by other cities to follow this with automobile hose wagons, and hook and ladder trucks.

It is a question, however, whether the motor vehicles which are now being constructed at a Western manufactory for the fire chiefs of several cities will not in the end prove most valuable of all. The automobiles destined for this work are, in all the essentials of strength and weight, racing machines, and they are built to maintain a speed of twenty-eight miles an hour over rough roads. Each is to be provided with two acetylene gas lamps and a powerful signal horn. The premise that these vehicles will prove of unusual value is based on the fact that it is frequently necessary for fire chiefs to cover distances at a speed to which a horse would prove unequal. The qualities which make the automobile advantageous for fire department work apply with equal force to police patrol work.

Unquestionably the kindliest mission of the automobile will be found in the ambulance service. It will insure prompt medical attendance while affording greater comfort for sufferers while en route to hospitals. In point of fact many physicians already use it.

That the automobile is to play a part in the important problem of the cleansing of our cities is proven by the action of a Western city in placing an order for several automobile garbage carts. In street-sweeping machines, too, there is room for further saving.

Nothing can be more certain than the total displacement of the omnibus by the autocar, and the close watch which electric railway officials everywhere are keeping on this newcomer in the transportation world demonstrates that they do not regard competition from that source as an impossibility. In various cities, notably Chicago and Cleveland, there have been projected systems of automobile service wherein the vehicles in service will each carry as many passengers as an ordinary street car and run with the same regularity. As yet, however, none of these projects has materialized.

In New York City shoppers have already had an opportunity to observe how the automobile expedites mercantile delivery, and it is therefore not difficult to give credence to the claims made for it as a successor to the bicycle in the delivery of telegrams and special letters. Even in the development of our new possessions the motor vehicle holds a future, for already a line to run regularly across Puerto Rico is projected. Finally, the vehicles are to be put to many unique uses, not the least of which will be their employment as a motive power on the Erie Canal, should the automobile now building at Hartford for this purpose prove a success. It is believed that it will prove powerful enough to haul a string of six canal boats.

The future of the automobile in public and private service depends much upon its cheapening, but with two hundred manufacturers of the vehicles in this country and two thousand in Europe it is altogether likely that the decrease in price will be far more rapid than in the case of the bicycle.

DRAWN BY J. C. LEYENDECKER

OPPORTUNITY

By JOHN J. INGALLS

MASTER of Human Destinies am I!
Fame, love and fortune on my footsteps wait.
Cities and fields I walk; I penetrate
Deserts and seas remote, and passing by
Hovel and mart and palace—soon or late—
I knock unbidden once at every gate!
If sleeping, wake—if feasting, rise before
I turn away. It is the hour of fate,
And they who follow me reach every state
Mortals desire, and conquer every foe
Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate,
Condemned to failure, penury and woe,
Seek me in vain and uselessly implore.
I answer not, and I return—no more!

Digitized by Google

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

Copyright by London Stereoscopic Co., London

GENERAL LORD ROBERTS

Copyright by Messrs. Russell, London

GENERAL LORD KITCHENER

The Price of British Empire in India

After the defeats in South Africa many of the English newspapers, including the London Times, said it was the most serious setback since the mutiny in India. For centuries this revolt of a subjugated people will be a subject of history and romance. The war and the things that followed gave Rudyard Kipling his material and opportunity. It is an interesting fact about most great wars that the origin or the climax was trivial, and in the case of the Indian mutiny this was peculiarly the case. No historian has ever yet been able to find adequate cause. Of course there were the national antagonisms between the races, but that did not count for everything. Disaffection existed, and in the crisis there was a rumor that the cartridges which had been served out to the native soldiers were greased with the fat of animals unclean alike to Hindu and Mohammedan. The slaughter began. On Sunday afternoon, May 10, 1857, the Sepoys broke in open mutiny, and then for two years the war went on, with the loss of thousands of lives.

When the Boers Whipped the British on Majuba Hill

We never know how much history we have forgotten until some disturbance brings out the details bearing upon great events. In thousands of journals and newspapers it has been asserted over and over again in the past several years that the idea of a South African Empire, holding somewhat the same relations as Canada to Great Britain, was originated, suggested and formulated by Cecil Rhodes and Joseph Chamberlain. As a matter of fact, the credit belongs to Lord Carnarvon, who, after seeing the effects of the confederation act in Canada, suggested that all the European settlements of South Africa be united under similar confederate government. The scheme was adopted, and the British agents in South Africa simply went ahead to annex things in their own peculiar way. It was not until April, 1877, that the Transvaal was nominally added to the British Throne. In order to make the annexations more valid, excuses were found and wars were started to sustain them. The cost was a great many millions of dollars and a number of good English lives. The natives were mowed down, and the whole desperate business made sad chapters in African history. The Boers, who had fled to escape British aggression, at last made their stand. The open troubles began in 1880.

In December, 1880, the South African Republic was proclaimed, with Kruger as President, Joubert Commandant-General, Jorissen Attorney-General, and Bok acting State Secretary. Pretorius joined Kruger and Joubert in the direction of affairs. The English lost heavily during the war. It astonished them beyond measure that they were defeated by such small numbers of the Boers. They made a final stand on the Majuba Mountain, which commanded the Boers' position, but this did not dismay the hardy Dutch, who on February 27, 1881, carried the place by storm, killed 83, including the British Commander, Sir George Pomeroy Colley, and disabled and captured 183. Sir Frederick Roberts—the present Roberts in command—was appointed Commander-in-General, and 15,000 troops were sent to South Africa from all parts of the British Empire. But before they arrived an armistice had been arranged and gradually peace was reached.

Copyright by Elliott & Fry, London

GENERAL LORD METHUEN

It is a fact in history, however, that after the conclusion of the preliminary settlement, while the Boers departed to their farms, the British not only did not decrease their forces, but made open preparations for the renewal of the war. In that contest Europe, outside of Great Britain, was practically one in sympathy with the Boers, and leading men in the Continental countries signed petitions pleading that the Transvaal be recognized as an independent State. With the effect of the defeats and the insistence of the sentiment of the world, Great Britain gave in. No one has ever said a word against the bravery of the Boers in that wonderful fight on Majuba Hill, and it is one of the distinct defeats that befell the English in all their long experiences in war.

Some Famous Setbacks to English Arms

Many interesting parallels have been drawn between the American Revolution and the present contest of the South African Republic. Whether or not the merits of the case are similar must of course be left to future historians, for not even the best of men is competent to judge at short range as to absolutely where the right and wrong belong. History needs plenty of distance.

Possibly there are more contrasts than parallels in these two wars. Great Britain has sent, and is sending, to South Africa more troops than she sent to America during the seven years of the conflict, for in that time the number of British troops and hirelings who crossed the Atlantic was only about 112,000 soldiers and 22,000 seamen. The United States had forces during the same period of 232,000 Continental soldiers and 56,000 militiamen.

Many of us have forgotten that the war against the American Colonies was so unpopular that King George could not raise enough troops in his own country, and had to hire men from the Continent. The present war was at first unpopular with the people of Great Britain, but there has been no lack of readiness on their part to supply men and munitions, although it has been necessary to call heavily upon the colonies for assistance. The history of the Revolution is pretty familiar to all. We whipped the English at the North and in the Middle States, and finally in the South. After the brilliant feats by American armies the climax came in the surrender of Cornwallis. Cornwallis surrendered 7247 men, 75 brass cannon, and 69 iron guns, while several vessels with 900 men and officers were surrendered to the French fleet. Already in the few months' fight in Africa the Boers have killed, captured and disabled almost as many men as the entire forces surrendered to the Americans on October 19, 1781, which sealed our independence.

In some respects there is a better parallel in the War of 1812. Great Britain sent three armies under three Generals to the different sections of the country, and they were defeated even more disastrously than the first armies in South Africa. The most famous of the battles took place actually after the treaty of peace was signed. It was at New Orleans. Twelve thousand picked British troops were defeated by 5000 Americans, the British losing 2000 in killed, wounded and prisoners, while the American loss was only a few men. In that case General Andrew Jackson and his sturdy troops found even greater safety behind cotton bales than the Boers are finding in their mountain fastnesses. This war on the part of the United States was in some respects the most remarkable of the century because it began with a bankrupt treasury and an army of only 10,000 men.

One of the Great Tragedies of the Century

Since the American Revolution England has not been fighting all the time, but she has been in trouble most of the time. Her brilliant victories in the Napoleonic wars make stupendous reading. To all parts of the world have her soldiers gone, and she has contributed marvelous chapters to civilization; yet her finest experiences have not been without their tragedies, although in the end, except in three or four instances, she has known some of the greatest victories in the records of the world.

In the beginning of the forties there was trouble in Afghanistan. "Disaster after disaster occurred, not without misconduct," says one of the most serious of English authorities. The English Army at that time comprised between 15,000 and 20,000 men, of whom many were English soldiers and officers, and the attempt was made in 1841 to force the Khaibar Pass. It was not a success. Then began the retreat. It was in the high altitudes, and the winter was one of the severest ever known. The troops were entirely demoralized, and the march back—or to give it another name, the retreat—was marked by the greatest confusion, and by the most indescribable suffering. Of all this great number, one wounded and half-dead man, Doctor Brydone, reached Jelalabad, and afterward 95 prisoners were recovered. The terrible loss of life was one of the worst disasters in the history of armies. The fact that the Khaibar Pass was afterward forced and England won the day showed the resolution of a nation which, although it may be badly beaten, seldom admits defeat.

The British Reverses in the South African War

Often the sayings of a General become more familiar to the great public than the details of his victories or his defeats. For instance, it has been printed all over the world that Sir Redvers Buller had vauntingly proclaimed before leaving England that he would eat his Christmas dinner in Pretoria, the capital of the South African Republic. It distinctly lowered him in the estimation of those who liked to think of him as a great fighter, and it hurt him personally. But since it has gone its rounds there has come a letter with his signature in which he said: "I was never foolish enough to make any such statement as has been attributed to me. There is an old saying which has sound sense in it: 'Never prophesy unless you know.'" More foolish were the speculators of the London Stock Exchange who, on the declaration of war, sent a message to President Kruger saying, "May the Lord make you thankful for what you are about to receive," and who two months later saw their fortunes toppling like buildings in a cyclone, and themselves shaking and shivering in the midst of ruin.

There were two sides from the English standpoint. One was the every-day, joyous feeling that the war would be simply a picnic march to the stronghold of the Boers. The other was—and this was that of those best informed and conservative—that the South Africans had built up, and were building up, a strong military establishment, with splendid modern equipments, with expert officers from Continental countries, and with all the resources for a modern conflict with a powerful nation. The events since October 10 have more than corroborated this suspicion.

It may be several months before we shall know exactly the official figures of the various battles that were fought, but we do know that the three divisions of the English fighting forces were each defeated in turn; that ending with the year more than 900 English troops were killed, nearly 4000 were wounded, and between 2000 and 3000 were missing: altogether a casualty list in the neighborhood of 7000. Adding those incapacitated by illness this total now exceeds 10,000. When the smaller Generals, such as White and Gatacre and Methuen, were driven back, Great Britain, with that admirable confidence in her men which she has always shown, waited with perfect patience for Commanding-General Buller to force a magnificent victory and thus retrieve the disgrace. Instead of that, he met the Boers with disastrous results, with a loss of over 1000 men and of a dozen guns, and with a shock to British pride that was felt throughout the world.

Britain's Position as a Great Power at Stake

Immediately the true size of the war was appreciated. The London Times, which is never given to sensation and always speaks conservatively for England, declared: "We are fighting not merely for supremacy in South Africa, but our position as a great Power. We know we have miscalculated the strength of our foe, and we are resolved not to make future miscalculations." The English Government called out the available troops of the Empire. People, while they differed as to the justice or the reason of the war, agreed that their flag must be upheld, and on top of all the War Office appointed Baron Roberts Commander-in-Chief, with Lord Kitchener as Chief-of-Staff. These two are the greatest fighters in the English Army—Roberts, who did wonders in India, and Kitchener, who did marvels in Africa, both men of infinite courage and infinite persistence, knowing nothing save duty, and never wearying until victory is won. At once the spirits of the British nation arose, and to-day the English are confident that when the new commanders and the new troops begin their campaign the triumph of British arms will not be long postponed.

But the Boers are not dismayed. In a letter written since the war began their commander, General Joubert, said: "Up to the present time our enemies have fought bravely; but when they begin to suffer the privations of war, demoralization will come upon them, and they will weaken. We are convinced of our own ultimate triumph and of God's aid in this war, as in our preceding wars with the same foes. The blood that must be shed in this struggle, which will last probably more than a year, will not be upon the heads of our children. We fight for our creed and country."

Digitized by Google

MEN AND WOMEN OF THE HOUR

PHOTO BY JOHNSTONE, HARTFORD, CONN.

ELIZABETH ALDEN CURTIS

The Old Lady Who Could Not be Fooled

Miss Elizabeth Alden Curtis, the talented niece of United States Attorney-General Griggs, and one of the latest versifiers of the Rubáiyát, has a penchant for scientific pursuits, and takes great pleasure in mountain-climbing, forest-searching and geologizing.

Last summer while rusticating at Lake George she went walking with a party of friends, chiefly college men and women, and came across some of the beautiful minerals which abound in that district. They picked out a number of specimens which they carried back to the hotel. Here they exhibited their treasure-trove to the other guests, more especially a piece of rose quartz in which were many flakes of plumbago. Miss Curtis, after explaining, left the veranda, giving the quartz to a benevolent-looking, spectacled old lady. She had scarcely departed when the latter, who had been scratching the specimen with her scissors, broke out:

"That girl is either fooling us or else she is crazy. Plumbago, indeed! It is nothing but an old stone with some black pencil lead in it."

Poverty's Day Dreams

Richard Whiteing, whose remarkable studies of life in the East End of London have made so marked an impression upon the reading public, gained his knowledge of the subject by living among the workers as one of them. Many of his experiences among the submerged tenth are even more interesting than those he has told in print.

Once while talking with a grizzled old woman, who lived in the same tenement, he referred to the Queen.

"Oh, 'ow I would like to be the Queen!" said the ancient beldame.

"Why?" asked Mr. Whiteing.

"It isn't because of her 'orses, because if I were Queen I would 'ave a donkey-cart with red wheels; and it isn't because of her band of musicians on horseback which goes ahead of the 'orse-guards, for I'd much rather 'ave a Hitalian with a 'and organ; but just think, if she wakes up at three o'clock in the morning and wants a bite to eat she can touch a bell and 'ave beef and boiled cabbage right away."

A factory girl visited a collection of antique sculptures, and on her return Mr. Whiteing asked her:

"How did you like the statues?"

"None too much at first, sir, because nearly all of them were shamelessly dressed. That made me mad, until I thought that they wuz awfully poor in them days and didn't 'ave money to buy clothes with. Then do you know I felt real bad because there wasn't a single lidy in the whole bloomin' lot of them what 'ad a bonnet to her name."

The Inventor of Rookwood Pottery

Probably few of the people who meet the wife of our new Minister to Spain know that she is one of the first notable potters of the United States. Mrs. Bellamy Storer in her youth was a china painter and porcelain artist of great ability, although she pursued the art as a pastime and gave most of her finest pieces away to church fairs, exhibits, museums and art collections.

She was the head and front of the movement of women china painters in Cincinnati and the West, and helped to organize the first clubs, which have since become factors in forwarding the art. Mrs. Storer next established a kiln, and, with the aid of the best china painters whom she could interest, began experimenting with pottery, colorings and designs.

The result was the Rookwood pottery—named for the town of Rookwood in which the work was begun—which has become world renowned, and which, on its first appearance in Europe, was credited to China, France, Germany, and even Spain. Many consider the Rockwood coloring one of the greatest discoveries in porcelain painting.

A Sincere Compliment from a Native

A prominent figure in Cleveland society is Miss Gabrielle Townsend Stewart. Besides being a belle of many accomplishments, she is a bright writer, and a famous amateur authority upon musical and dramatic subjects. She inherits her talents from her father, N. Coe Stewart, the director of music in the Cleveland public schools, and from her mother, President of the National Homemakers' Association and ex-President of the Cleveland Sorosis. She is a cousin of Edward W. Townsend, the novelist, whose newspaper and literary work has been one of her favorite studies. Many of his Chimmie Fadden sketches she recited with great success at social receptions in London when she was a delegate to the World's Council of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Few of those who heard her knew of the careful preparation she had made to master the curious dialect employed in the work. This included a trip to Chinatown, in the Bowery district, where she passed several interesting hours. In this picturesque neighborhood she met many personages who had been used as models by Mr. Townsend in the creation of his characters. Among them was one whose roughness and toughness made his quick wit and innate courtesy all the more noteworthy. During their conversation he referred contemptuously to several criminals—"fly crooks," he called them—who had moved within a short time into the neighborhood. They were good for nothing, he declared, but for sneak-thieving and robbing children.

Miss Stewart asked: "Do you think it safe to wear jewelry in the streets down here?"

He looked at her beautiful face a moment and then answered: "It's all right as long as I am wid you, and I guess it's all right anyhow; but if you want to be dead right, it's not the jewelry you want to lock up in the safe, but your own pretty self."

How Saccharine was Discovered

Of the many great chemists of the world, none perhaps is better known than Dr. Constantine Fahlberg, who some years ago discovered that curious chemical product named saccharine. It is an extraordinary chemical, being so intensely sweet that a single grain is said to be equal to several hundred times its bulk of the best white sugar. To some friends he recently told the story of the discovery, which like many of the greatest inventions of the world was made while pursuing other ends.

"I was conducting a series of researches in synthetic chemistry," he said, "and had in view the creation of some new compound radicals. One day I had produced a new substance and was separating it from other ingredients. I was tired, and while moving a glass vessel containing hot fluid my hand slipped, so that several drops splashed upon my fingers. I put the glass down and seized the nearest thing to wipe off the liquid, which chanced to be my own handkerchief. A few minutes afterward I wiped my mouth with the handkerchief. Instantly my mouth began to water. I washed my lips with warm water, but it took two or three washings and probably five minutes before the taste of sweetness disappeared. I picked up the handkerchief automatically and my eye rested upon the wet spot. I put it to the tip of my tongue and the secret was out. I spent much time in determining the character of my find. When I saw that it was harmless I announced my discovery to the world."

PHOTO BY MOWBRY, ASHLAND, OHIO

GABRIELLE TOWNSEND STEWART

COPYRIGHT BY ARÉ DUPONT, NEW YORK

MME. MARCELLA SEMBRICH

Madame Sembrich's Photographs

The camera has found many devotees, but perhaps it has none more faithful than Mme. Marcella Sembrich, the celebrated cantatrice now touring this country in grand opera.

Professor Wilhelm Stengel, the singer's husband, treats his wife's love of photographs and photography quite as seriously as she does. He said recently to some musicians:

"Madame Sembrich has her dearest friends in almost all of their expressions and natural poses. She has Eleanora Duse depicted in more emotions than all of her audiences put together have ever seen her in, and she has equally fine impressions of Brahms, Rubenstein and Délibes."

"Don't forget Verdi," spoke up his wife.

"As to Verdi," and the Professor's face took on a half-merry, half-puzzled expression, "you know he sends my wife a copy of every new picture of himself he has taken. Perhaps he patronizes professional photographers and furnishes her with a copy soon after they are taken partly as a matter of self-protection. His last picture was accompanied with many pleasant allusions to the United States."

Versatile Minister Delcassé

If versatility be an American trait, Théophile Delcassé, the ex-Minister of Foreign Affairs in France, ought to have been a native of the United States. He is not yet fifty, but has already attained distinction in many fields of intellectual effort. His first venture was in journalism and literature, where he made his mark. From the press he went into politics, and was elected a deputy in 1889. Here he made his influence so felt that he became Under Secretary for the Colonies in 1893, Colonial Minister in 1894, and Minister of Foreign Affairs in 1898. While in the last-named position he settled the Fashoda affair with Great Britain. Last year he was a special commissioner, or envoy, to St. Petersburg, representing French investors who desired to utilize the financial opportunities presented by the Siberian and other Asiatic railways.

To M. Delcassé the Bourse ascribes the credit of having perceived the financial as well as the political and strategical value of these projected roads. Either through diplomatic channels or through a careful study of the Russian fiscal system, he realized that though Russia might start these roads, its treasury was too weak to finish them.

Henry George's First Friend

In the late seventies, Henry George, the single-tax reformer, came East from California. He was desperately poor and had but few acquaintances.

Shortly after his arrival he lectured before the Saturday Ethical Club, of New York, where his brilliant oratory and shabby attire made so striking a contrast as to excite the sympathy of those present.

After he left, the club appointed a committee to aid him in getting up a public lecture. Among others, the committee included Seth Low, who was then engaged in business. He was in consultation at the time, and the committee were in a hurry, so he told them to send him a lot of tickets. They forwarded twenty to him the same day, and felt happy at having secured twenty dollars for the lecture fund. The next morning came a letter of thanks from Mr. Low, praising the lecturer's intellectuality and inclosing a check for $250. The affair was a success, netting about $300, so that President Low may be said to have been the first man to start Mr. George on his Eastern career.

Twenty years later, in 1897, Mr. Low was the citizens' candidate and Mr. George the labor candidate for Mayor of New York. The latter made a vigorous campaign, and in all his speeches advised the citizens, if they could not vote for him, to vote for his friend, Seth Low; and on one occasion he said that if it had not been for the latter he would not be there as a candidate. Few understood his full meaning.

Digitized by Google

The "Great" Houses of New York

By Mrs. Burton Harrison

MODERN New Yorkers of the wealthy, leisure class, who would otherwise appear to have touched high-water mark in the world's luxury of living, have not, however, quite attained the magnificent proportions of housekeeping in the hereditary homes of England. Our genial ambassador at the Court of St. James told me in August that he had recently complimented an English Duchess upon the charming beauty of her several ancestral dwellings. "Ah!" said she, "but think of having to correspond with twelve housekeepers."

Before the vision of a single housekeeper the mistress of an American mansion is wont to pale. In our establishments, such an intermediary between the domestic throne and its troublous subjects is generally a harassed being, embodying an endless repertory of tales of woe and laden down with petty complaints carried on from belowstairs to the court of final appeal. From the "independent" atmosphere she habitually breathes, the respect yielded to her in older countries is missing. What tourist does not recall some vision of her kind, leading the way through a grand ancestral home of Britain to point out the treasures, her form clad in black be-jetted silk, her hair neatly adjusted under a jaunty lace cap, her manner a happy mingling of condescension to low-born intruders and resignation to their fees. At a country house in England or Scotland one is wont to catch glimpses of this functionary, perhaps at family prayers, acting as a sort of Mother to the Maids, marshaling her white-aproned phalanx in its demure entrance and exit from the scene. To be conducted by the lady of a castle to visit her housekeeper in her own especial quarters is a distinctly pleasant experience. The sitting-room where she holds sway over cupboards full of jam and pickles, cake, and other dainties for the table has been, for generations of the owner's family, set apart for its present uses. It is apt to be solid, clean, homelike, respectable and self-respecting in every part. Nothing there, in its quiet precincts, hints of the internecine warfare, the cabals against authority, the discontent and scandals that arise like noxious gases in the servants' halls of too many American great houses. The laws of service, of behavior, of etiquette, promulgated from that source, are rigorously observed by the employees, and any breach of them means a loss of place through the housekeeper's recommendation for dismissal.

—her form clad in black be-jetted silk, her hair neatly adjusted under a jaunty lace cap

THE VEXING PROBLEM OF HOUSEHOLD MANAGEMENT

In his department, the English butler is equally charged with the responsibility for his satellites, the footmen. Between them, he and the housekeeper occupy positions of real dignity as the deputy representatives of their master and mistress—viceroy and vicereine of the sovereigns, looked up to and obeyed accordingly by their subordinates.

The result of this system, as may be surmised, is a tremendous labor-saving for the proprietors, and if the happy day ever comes to our solvent land when riches can command it the whole problem of our domestic life will be less complex. In that event one may safely venture to predict a more restful era in our homes—notably, there will be less European travel and more contentment with the routine of existence within our own shores. It is the everlasting, the unmanageable servant question here that swells the receipts of the ocean steamship companies and the pockets of foreign landlords. Said a lady of many millions in my hearing: "I should be thankful to give two of my servants the combined wages of my other twelve, on condition that they would do my work and let me have peace." To the natural suggestion that a housekeeper would obviate much of this trouble the answer was: "But they won't respect her; they must always appeal to me. They can't be brought to feel that the housekeeper is any more of an authority than they are themselves. In short, unless I stood at the helm in person we should quickly run upon the rocks. And I confess I am wearied to death with it, and am longing to get abroad, where I can forget all about servants till I come home again."

"The pink one, if you please"

Some imp of perverseness it must be that breathes into the ear of the servant class, producing a discord of ideas as soon as they land upon the soil of America. To begin with, their persistent use of the term "help," an Americanism belonging to the pioneer days of civilization, when a single jealously guarded treasure was cherished by the family in the hope of inducing her to be satisfied, not to do their general housework, but to assist the members of the family to do it, and to look leniently upon their shortcomings. Again, the cool and exasperating habit of alluding to previous employers by the familiar use of the family name without prefix of any kind! These trifles, detected repeatedly in the conversation of what are called "superior" servants here, mark the progress of their continual effort at self-assertion.

THE DEMOCRACY DOWNSTAIRS

But such offenses are as nothing in moral weight beside those of lying, slandering, stealing and drinking, and worse, which the employer of many domestics, of both sexes and of divers nationalities, has, from time to time, to encounter in her household in New York. To discover such enormities in what its owners had fondly fancied to be a clean, God-fearing, Christian home is like coming upon a pit's mouth in a meadow filled with flowers. The experience strikes its victims with dismay, and robs their daily life of security and sweetness.

Given these existing difficulties, it will be seen that the organization and maintenance of a great fashionable establishment here is an undertaking so serious that even dollars play a minor part in its equipment. The householder's first care is to find servants. In order to fill the many niches vacant, she must resign herself to a series of experiments, rasping while in operation, often humiliating in result. During their continuance she can be neither blind nor deaf to their existence. The troubles downstairs can no more help arising to her ears than the smoke of the kitchen fire can avoid escaping up the chimney. Another and continual source of discord in the basement democracy, where kitchen-maid and scullion consider themselves entitled to claim all the rights of the upper servants, is that necessary mixture of nationalities. The English, having been long accounted the most desirable domestics, are now looked upon with less favor, the general agreement of employers being that not only the best of them, but the second best, stay in their own country. Swedes have had great vogue with us, but their day seems to be passing. Now, in the intelligence offices, it is a Tower of Babel combination, from which the employer must pick and choose. Swedes, Finns, Danes, and the Dutch and German element array themselves heroically in our kitchens against French, English, Italians, Armenians, Spanish-Americans, Chinese and Japanese. The following and friends of the several disputants appear in their rear, swelling the chorus. Amid the clamor that ensues, the voice of Erin, whose representatives were once supposed to be our bulwark of household service in New York, and were so derided in print that for a time they went completely out of fashion, is more seldom heard. Yet, as a fact, the respectable class of Irish domestics have been found to remain longer in one family, to be more honestly attached to the family interests, and to be more to be depended upon as friends of their employers, than those of any other nation we employ.

STAFF OF A GREAT ESTABLISHMENT

I have dwelt longer upon this vexed and vexing theme of service because it is the keystone of the arch of housekeeping, great or small. Once safely and substantially in place, it allows the structure superimposed to soar to the empyrean! Without it comes an inevitable crash!

To equip a large and fashionable house of the period there will be found necessary certainly the following domestic staff: a chef, or head-cook—who may be a woman—with two or more kitchen-maids; a scullion, serving perhaps in the dual capacity of useful man; a pantry-maid, two chambermaids, a seamstress, a couple of laundresses, a linen-closet maid, a lady's-maid apiece for the female members of the family; then, in the wake of the butler, three footmen, who wear the livery of the house, wait at table, and do deportment in the hall during calling-hours. There are generally valets for the master and his sons, men for the furnace and sidewalk, a private watchman to patrol the neighborhood at night—and a coachman, groom and helpers swell the list, often enlarged beyond the limits indicated here according to individual fancy or necessity. For the children's department there is a head nurse, a nursery-maid apiece, and not infrequently a specially retained trained nurse whose business it is to keep strict watch over the bodily condition of her charges, summon a doctor at the first appearance of alarm, and lift from the mother's shoulders all that is possible of the burden of care in this respect. Add to these functionaries the daily governess, the masters, the nursery governess or kindergartner, my lady's secretary, and the private stenographer of the lord of the mansion. They must all be paid, fed, humored and induced to live harmoniously with one another and their employers. Verily, the crown of an Empire weighs not more heavily than the duty to their dependents upon Mr. and Mrs. Midas, of New York!

Most of the families known as dinner and ball givers of the first fashion have the matter of entertaining so reduced to a fine art that the mere question of food provision for their guests is as much a matter of course as the bacon and eggs for breakfast of an ordinary household. Possessing a chef whose credit depends upon the opportunity for periodical display, his employers have only to pick out the dates for their parties, make up their lists, and let the decree go forth in the household that the party is to be. The chef, after lending the full powers of his brain and experience to the composition of a series of menus, presents them to his mistress for her nominal approval.

MODERN EVOLUTION IN THE KITCHEN

Evolution has long since carried us out of the artless stage in which Thackeray's Mrs. Timmins made blushing choice between two bills-of-fare offered by the French cook sent in for her famous "little dinner": "The pink one, if you please." Mrs. Midas, of New York, is perfectly au fait of the mysteries of French terms in cookery. Her chef knows he is to have all that flies in the air or swims in the water that ordinary people cannot afford. He must supply dainties out of season and present them in inviting shape. He understands, above all, that his dinner must not be overlong or overdecorated, and that it must include some plain and wholesome dishes for the abstemious gourmet of the period whose fad it is to return to elemental principles in food. If a ball is in question, the supper must of necessity reveal bouillon, chaud-froids, canvasbacks, terrapin, ices and fruits to be served at little tables and in courses as carefully as would be a state luncheon or dinner. Vanished is the old-time buffet supper where male guests joined with football impetuosity in pursuit of sustenance for expectant ladies. In private houses of distinction and fashion the refreshments are served by the footmen belonging to the establishment, recruited by skilled waiters engaged from outside. Hurry there is none; and when one group at a table has satisfied its appetite the participants withdraw in favor of successors from the dancing-room. In the matter of wines it is of course the butler who, after conference with the master, assumes imperial sway. Sparkling mineral waters play now so large a part in all banquets of fashion, that except champagne and whiskey-and-soda, potent drinkables seem to be conspicuous by absence. Many men now decline champagne in favor of whiskey and fizz (usually "Scotch-and-Soda") at even the most formal dinners. Sensible people of adult age very soon find out that, principles of temperance apart, they cannot recklessly indulge night after night in a variety of alcoholic stimulants and continue to keep a clear head and a sound digestion for their lifework during the day. Certain it is that the spectacle of a man unduly excited by liquor is a very uncommon one in what is called ultra-fashionable society in New York. And for this relief much thanks!

Digitized by Google

Many houses where the owners do not feel justified in paying a chef much more than their own university-bred and highly specialized sons receive per annum in business offices downtown for their intellectual services—for many years, perhaps, after entering upon a career requiring education—hire such a functionary for the occasion of a dinner or a ball. There are also women cooks of renown who make a practice of going from one house to another, serving the banquet of the evening, producing symphonies in soup and problems in pastry that crown with laurels the brows of the entertainers. Together with this important motor of the feast, it is possible for would-be hosts to hire additionally a large circular table-top to be fitted upon their own smaller mahogany; china, silver, chairs warranted to squeeze into the smallest given amount of space, a family butler of irreproachable exterior who will look as though he had been born and bred in attendance upon it; footmen in livery as nimble as they are snug; awning and carpet for the steps outside; all coming and disappearing with cheerful celerity for a not unreasonable sum.

PLANNING A WINTER'S SOCIAL CAMPAIGN

If modern ingenuity would furthermore contrive to relieve the hostess by supplying good-looking youths and talkative spinsters to fill the places of guests who at the last moment send regrets, there would be little left to ask! Of all the petty cares of social life, that of bringing the right people together, of getting the guests one really desires to have into one assemblage, is the most formidable. In order to secure this desired result, Mrs. Midas goes to work in a grand sort of fashion and dictates to her secretary invitations to dinner a month ahead. By the end of December people know pretty well where they will dine during all of January; and so on throughout the season. If the natural and inevitable interruptions of death, mourning or calamity in fortune occur, the invited ones drop out and are lost to sight until the turn of the wheel brings them up again before public notice. It is to be feared that the dinner-giver whose plans are thus rudely jostled by adverse circumstances sometimes considers herself the person most aggrieved! Dear old Dr. Wendell Holmes said somewhere in an essay upon modern wealth: "One would like to give a party now and then if one could be a billionaire. 'Guiseppe, we are to have a party a week from to-night—five hundred invitations; there is the list.' The day comes. 'Madam, do you remember you have your party to-night?' 'Why, so I have. Everything right? Supper and all?' 'All as it should be, madam.' 'Send Victorine to me.' 'Victorine, full toilet for this evening; pink, diamonds and pearls, coiffure at seven. Allez!'"

—"full toilet for this evening; pink, diamonds and pearls, coiffure at seven. Allez!"

Alas! Billions have we among us, but not yet has the gentle Autocrat's ideal been realized. Behind the outer show of the dazzling entertainments extolled by the newspapers lurks inevitable stress and struggle. To bring about the vision of "pink and diamonds" alone has required weary hours of waiting on dressmakers, much loss of temper, many disappointments. Everything else is in proportion. The toil for pleasure is daily exemplified in Mrs. Midas' set. At the end of the season it will tell in the strained nerves, exhausted bodies, wan faces of its devotees. Then shall we hear of the owners of these famous establishments "some flying East, some flying West, some flying over the cuckoo's nest"—anywhere so they may leave behind for a space the sumptuous dwelling with its warring factions, its tremendous tax upon time and money and patience, its small returns for vast expenditure! After a brief period of "rest" in travel and hotels, they will return to take possession of other great establishments in luxurious summer colonies where the old tale will all have to be retold. Poor Mrs. Midas! One's heart bleeds for her sorrows!

THE PASSING OF OLD-FASHIONED HOSPITALITY

In spite of the exuberance of entertaining among the fashionable folk which, in their own set, keeps the ball in motion the whole year round, there are few houses to be counted upon in New York for large and gracious—one might say hereditary—hospitality. The only approach to a general reception of friends in most of them is likely to be an omnium gatherum given once in a year or two, when the stings of conscience about old acquaintances and a neglected visiting-list become intolerable. The consequence may be imagined. The dullness of these wholesale gatherings together of assorted generations is appalling. People who have been married, divorced, widowed, forgotten and dug up ad interim rub elbows in a jam that makes them think only of happy escape from the scene. When they are so thoroughly uncomfortable that it can go no further, the guests wedge themselves into doorways and corners and gossip about their hosts. No one dreams of being grateful for an invitation to what is called in London "a general squash." Every one asks inwardly, "Why am I here?" And if the truth were fully revealed, the hostess and her family are longing for the moment when their dear friends will retire again into a long abstention from general social reunion.

And still by such functions the great house continues to declare itself periodically to the world. For the rest of the time it is open only for small parties, dinners of from fourteen to forty, cotillons, "small dances," musicales and a ball or two, from which detrimentals are conspicuously absent.

THE HOME PIANO

By CHARLES M. SKINNER

THERE are more pianos in America, in proportion to the population, than in any other land; and in no country are the poor things more cruelly tortured. It might almost be said that piano-playing has become our national vice, and that it has formed, in that respect, but an indifferent substitute for the chewing of tobacco. Yet it is not the playing that causes so many to suffer, but the tweaking and pounding and ignorant misuse of an instrument that was made for comfort and joy.

When the day's work is over, and before the lamps are brought in, while one lounges in slippers and house-jacket in the easy-chair watching the fall of night through the windows, then blessing on the daughter of the house who goes quietly to the piano, puts her foot on the soft pedal and turns the hour to poetry by playing a Chopin nocturne, a pensive bit of Schumann, or a nuit blanche of Heller. Sweet, with a touch of sadness, such music composes the mind while it stimulates imagination, the home grows cozier and dearer, and the night comes more soothingly. But woe to that house—and it is not always a boarding-house, either—where the confident one with a hard brain, a thick ear and a strong arm slams open the piano cover, glares, squares off, and falls to beating the keys, filling the unhappy instrument with shrieks and the place with trouble. And it may be stated as a rule that the more worthless the music, the more insistent and sonorous will the performance be, and that the less of an artist the performer, the longer he will perform.

We are the most patient people in the world, or we would not endure this treatment of ourselves, to say nothing of our pianos, with the despairing resignation to which we yield when the saleslady from the second floor front, or the bookkeeper from the third floor back, and sometimes both, descend to the parlor, open the doors and windows, and give what rural papers call, with unconscious truth, a rendition of The Tra-la-loo Polka, or Hullo, Mah Rag-Time Gal, or the march from The Blind Cow. It seems as though they had four fists apiece, and were using their chins and feet besides. And if some insatiable and misguided person then wants vocal music, there will presently be a husky and uncertain performance of Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep, and a shrieking of Mother's Bangs Will Soon Fit Lizzie, and woe will brood upon the precincts.

Now, these innocent people do not realize the amount of pain they cause, and once in a while they do not cause any, for they play to an audience as untaught as themselves. It is otherwise, however, in many of the homes of the land where rudiments of taste exist and where there is an honest ambition to know and to excel. We should be amazed at the effrontery of a man or woman who, on being asked to recite for a company—supposing such an extraordinary request possible—should seriously declaim Mary Had a Little Lamb, or Little Jack Horner; yet the music that is played on thousands of pianos, before writhing and helpless companies, is precisely of the grade in music that Mother Goose represents in literature. It is well enough for children, well enough for gutter bands that devastate in low quarters of the town, but unworthy of people who have books and have been to school.

The wretched stuff that is played in so many households and by so many theatre orchestras is written by people of meagre musical education and no inspiration; written mechanically, to supply a presumptive need, and fostered by certain cheap teachers who tell their pupils how to move their fingers, but make no appeal to the eye or brain. The folly of supposing that new music is more desirable than the old is widespread, also, and this search for novelty is responsible for acres of rubbish—the latest coon song, the latest song about Moth-a-a-ar, the latest march, the latest waltz. They are usually abominable, and to be avoided.

For there is more good music than any one player can learn, more than will ever be played by any one person, and parents of musically minded sons and daughters whom they allow to appear before company as performers may properly require as a part of their training, not merely an instruction in technic, but a cultivation of love for real music. This is perhaps most easily and enjoyably acquired by attending orchestral concerts. No silly Daisy Schottische, Silver Spray Fantasia, or other nonsense is tolerable for a moment. It is destructive of taste and artistic feeling. If the best music is often heard by the pupil he will no longer wish to play the worst.

It is objected, sometimes, that "classical" music is too difficult. "Classical" is a word commonly applied by those ignorant of its real meaning to things they do not like, and they are as apt to fit it to a trashy variation on an air from Trovatore, full of vain and exhibitive scales, trills and arpeggi, as to a Beethoven sonata. To their subsequent surprise they learn, now and again, that the "piece" which they have applauded was by Mozart, Haydn, Händel, or some other master, and was undeniably classical. Of course, as a matter of fact, goodness and difficulty have no necessary connection. There are slambang and firework inventions of yesterday that are—thank fortune!—so hard that not one amateur in a thousand undertakes them, and there are—again, thank fortune!—a thousand dances, songs, nocturnes, reveries, marches, adagios and parts of symphonies and sonatas by the masters that are technically as simple as the ballad composed last week by Lazaras McFadden, of the vaudeville, who writes all his own songs, or the Skippity Hop Lancers, by Professor Brownsmith, just out. Music written for display is always bad, and music that is inexpressive is never good. Good music may tire the unaccustomed, but trashy music disgusts the intelligent. Some good music will please the ignorant, but trash can never much please anybody.

What should one play when one has only a limited command of the piano? Why, the simpler things of the masters—parts of a work, when one cannot play the whole. There are a hundred light and pretty bits in Mozart, for instance; there are Schumann's Kinderscenen, and his Cradle Song and Vision in the Album Leaves; in Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words, numbers 2, 4, 9, 16, 22, 27, 28, 44, and 48 are within range of amateurs, and so is the nocturne from his Midsummer Night's Dream. To name, somewhat at hazard, examples of good music that are not very difficult, one may mention the overtures to Faust, Oberon, Euryanthe, Freischütz and Masaniello; Rubinstein's Melodie in F; the opening adagio in Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata; Heller's Tarantelle, Trois Melodies, Promenades d'un Solitaire, Questions, and Romance in F; the march from Glück's Alceste, and passages from his Orpheus; Schubert's Momens Musicaux, especially the second, third, fifth and sixth, and his second Impromptu; Chopin's third étude, or most of it, and his sixth, eleventh, twelfth and fifteenth nocturnes; Saint-Saëns' Danse Macabre, Martini's Gavotte, Vogt's Nachtgesang, Haydn's Serenade, Händel's Largo; the waltz, Elfentanz and Albumblatt, in Grieg's Lyrische Stückchen, the Jungling, Brautleid, Holje Dale's Halling, Sæbygga and Kuhreigen in his Nordische Tänze, and Ase's Death and Anitra's dance in his first Peer Gynt suite; several of Bach's sarabands, gigues, gavottes, minuets, and the capital bourree from his third violoncello suite.

The operas are good things to have, likewise. Shall the player not be allowed to refresh himself with music that has been transposed from the voice to the piano? May he not play Elsa's Dream as well as the Lohengrin March, the love duets in Faust as well as the soldiers' chorus? The Oriental dances in Aida, Senta's song in the Flying Dutchman, and the abendsegen of Humperdinck's Hänsel and Gretel are worthy of attention. Even some songs bear instrumental repetition, such as Schubert's Serenade and Erl King, Spohr's Rose, Thou So Lovely, Falk's Fir Tree and Palm, Pinsuti's Good Night, Barnby's Sweet and Low, and Sullivan's Lost Chord.

Wagner demands the orchestra, yet there are towns that have no orchestra, and the pianist who can play the Siegfried Idyl and Dreams tenderly and with expression may be allowed to discourse the solemn and tremendous Siegfried's Death, if he will leave out the little turns in the high treble, near the close, which have such a tinkling and trifling effect on the piano. In fact, the good music suitable for home playing is so abundant that there is no excuse for persisting in the cheaper sort.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

421 TO 427 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA

January 13, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription

5 Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

Preparation Necessary for Self-Government

IN THE working of institutions which are the product of the race-experience and innate character of the people using them, their dependence upon the habits of the people themselves for their successful operation is not usually perceived. But when the attempt is made to communicate such institutions to other peoples this dependence is at once felt, and the fact presents unexpected difficulties. Troubles of this sort are being experienced in Porto Rico. It has been found that such a fundamental requirement as the habit of submitting to the decision of the majority is lacking. In municipal elections and in the action of municipal boards, the minority which is voted down almost invariably refuses to participate further in the business of government.

Commenting upon this, Secretary Root, of the War Department, in his recent annual report pointed out that there is no way in which such an obstacle to the extension of self-government can be summarily removed, because, as he wisely remarks, "it is a matter not of intellectual apprehension, but of character and of acquired habits of thought and feeling." This brings out a principle which it is necessary to observe in our efforts to benefit our new dependencies, namely, that institutions cannot be made to order.

This principle rests upon the psychologic law that race development is the outcome of special modification of the nervous system through the experience of successive generations, storing its results in the fibre of character until they produce distinctive tendencies. The history of our own race shows how gradual was the development of our political habits and how recent are the institutions which embody them. Although possessing a hereditary drill in self-government through our Anglo-Saxon ancestry, and although subjected to a long period of political tutelage as colonists, the people of the United States did not enter at once upon the full measure of self-government which they enjoy to-day. At first the suffrage was strictly limited. In the State election of 1789 in New York, when intense political excitement prevailed, only 12,300 votes were polled in a population of 324,270. The spread of the suffrage was gradual, as the result of political movements which brought the new electorate into relations with the existing order and trained it in political behavior. There has been only one instance in our history when full responsibilities of self-government were imposed upon masses of people without previous training, and that was in the case of the emancipated slaves.

While self-government is the aim of our policy, it should not be forgotten that "too swift arrives as tardy as too slow." —HENRY JONES FORD.

When the politician begins to explain how the other party won, Truth puts on mourning.

The Gift of the Loveless Hand

PUBLIC provision for the poor out of taxes is so usual with English-speaking communities that it must surprise many persons to find that this custom is almost confined to them, and that it dates back no further than the reign of Queen Elizabeth. In most countries the poor are left to the charity of religious bodies and to the humanity of individuals. And they ought to be so left everywhere. The State exists to secure to every one his rights, and when it undertakes to secure its people against the results of their own improvidence, or even against unavoidable causes of indigence, it steps out of its sphere. It admits in fact the existence of that kind of responsibility which the Socialist tries to establish along the whole line of social existence. When Louise Michel visited England she told the English that as a Socialist she especially admired their workhouses, for in having them they admitted all the premises of Socialism.

The best interests of the poor require the abolition of public assistance in all its forms. It is always a delicate matter to make a gift to any one so as not to hurt self-respect and thus injure character. It is easiest to do this with those who are closest and dearest to us, as it is the symbol of our practical identity of interest with them. It is also possible with those in whom we feel a sincere neighborly interest, and whom we adopt as our own by the very act of giving. A gift in a loveless hand is twice cursed—it curses him who gives and him who takes.

And such gifts are the State's provision for the poor. The State loves nobody, and gives only to escape the disgrace of having any of its people die of want. Those who receive from it are conscious of the want of that which makes the gift a fitting thing, and they feel the humiliation of receiving it. They are hurt in that self-esteem which is the most potent motive to betterment in character as well as in condition. Thus they sink from poverty to pauperism, from unwilling to willing dependence upon others for their subsistence. The English workhouse, which is a place in which nobody works or can work, has been a fruitful cause of degradation to the poorer classes. It is shown to be such in the social stigma which attaches to the children's children of those who have been in "the house." In Ireland the poor in many instances have died of hunger and cold rather than bring such a disgrace upon their posterity.

The care of the poor belongs especially to the Christian churches of the land. At present they undertake little more than the provision for the poor of their own communion, and not always that in any generous measure. They once thought it their glory to care for all in need of their help, whether of the household of faith or outside it. Chalmers, in Glasgow, showed how a Christian congregation might provide for all the poor of a parish in the "wynds" (or slums) of the most diseased, drunken and impoverished city of the British Islands, and that out of the coppers given by the poor themselves. The Church can give with brotherly love, and therefore without either publicity or any other element of degradation. It can give with discrimination, applying the rule that he who will not work shall not eat. It can give without implicating society in any dangerous concessions as to responsibility. —ROBERT ELLIS THOMPSON.

The active congregation makes the useful church.

Americans in the Tropics

WHATEVER may be the final political results of our recent war with Spain and our fighting in the Philippines, we shall have proved to the world that American physique and spirit in trying circumstances are unequaled. The island of Luzon is quite as hot and damp as any tropical country into which a large body of white troops ever ventured, yet the official reports, and even the most sensational news-letters of disgruntled correspondents, show that there is not so much sickness among our soldiers in the Philippines as there was in portions of the Union Army at certain periods of the Civil War. Apparently the trenches and swamps and torrential rains of the Philippines are less fatal to men from the temperate zone than were those of Cuba last year. This year, in Cuba itself, our Army's proportion of sickness and death is lower than that of some American cities. It has not been proved, as yet, that white men cannot live and enjoy good health in any portion of the torrid zone, for the great majority of civilians who venture into such countries are not of the class that is health-respecting and given to self-control.

Soldiers do not profess to be missionaries or philanthropists; some of them are not even moral exemplars, though the average of goodness in the Army is quite equal to that of any large community. In Cuba and Porto Rico our troops are now on amicable terms with the natives. American soldiers, like Americans in general, are sociable, communicative, generous, kind, and not overbearing, and therefore they present an entirely new type of white man to races that have known only the Spaniards. In a single year they have reduced almost to extinction the two great scourges—smallpox and yellow fever—that have had free course in Cuba for centuries. Instead of taxing the people into destitution and apathy, they are helping them to improve their condition and to become forehanded and self-reliant. In Cuba, and even in the Philippines, the Army has begun to teach the masses to use soap—one of the most powerful agents of civilization: no community that uses soap freely is ever infected with the insurrectionary fever.

Self-government is said to be the dream of the Cubans and Filipinos, but so mighty a power cannot be acquired by dreaming. Something about it must be learned from men who understand it. The Spaniards were entirely ignorant of it, but any American soldier knows and will say that his own native State is entirely free and self-governing; that within its borders insurrections are not necessary nor do they occur.

In the ways indicated and in many others our soldiers of all ranks and grades are doing good service in the lands from which they expelled the Spaniards. Avoiding cruelty, malice, oppression, duplicity and extortion, while exerting control through force, they are undermining the influence of many native leaders, all of whom learned all they know in the very bad political school of Spain. No American military or civil officer is filling his pockets from those of the natives; heretofore official honesty has been practically unknown in lands under Spanish rule.

The lessons we are teaching will not be lost; the longer they continue, the better will they be learned, and in the end their practical result will be a conquest more lasting than any made solely by fighting. —JOHN HARBERTON.

General Washington's body-servants are all dead, but the men who sent Dewey to the Philippines will last well through the coming century.

The Earning of the Firelight

THE luxurious know little of the value of luxury because they do not earn it. One who continually rests and enjoys, neither rests nor enjoys. Rest implies labor.

Now that the winter is upon us one homely luxury appeals to all, and that is fire. The high cost of fuel, the ash and dirt that are left not only in the fireplace but on the furniture, the narrowing of chimneys, the danger to crowded tenements from flame, the inability to heat more than a single room with a grate—these things have made the open fire a pleasant memory in many towns. In its place we have the furnace, belching gas and pouring dust through the house; the steam radiator clanking and banging, hissing and leaking, and parboiling the residents; hot water with its plumbing, fire-box and various complications; and electricity.

None of these ways of heating appeals in the slightest degree to sentiment. They add nothing to the home quality of a house or flat we live in. They are necessary in great office buildings, barracks, factories, theatres, schools, churches and jails. We notice their absence on a cold day, but never their presence. We cannot sit before the register and paint pictures in the vitiated air that gushes from it, nor does the family gather to tell stories or gossip in the winter twilight about the coil of pipes in the parlor. Charles Dudley Warner would never be moved to compose a second volume of Black Log Studies with his feet on a water-pipe, nor would an electric heater supply Ik Marvel with new Reveries of a Bachelor. No, indeed! Half the pleasure in a fire is in the seeing of it. It is a gladness to the eye. It is a symbol of the comfort that we feel permeating with such sweet insidiousness to our bones and driving out our tempers and distempers. Given a room with an open fire and another with a register, both at the same temperature, and that with the open fire will seem the warmer.

Hence there is comfort in the discovery that architects and builders are allowing people to sit by open fires once more; that the grandfatherly andirons are coming out from their long retirement and twinkling again in their cheer of flame; that even in cramped quarters of city flats where that honest, useful, but arrant piece of ugliness, the cook stove, has been forced to the task of heating, as well as of baking and broiling, the toy parlor has a little black hole in the wall where a couple of lumps of black coal may often be seen in combustion. For a fire is an eye to the room. An apartment without it in January is like a landscape without water in July. It gives life, promise, cheer, and is an expression of hospitality. The fireplaces of our ancestors, those grand old caverns where one could roast an ox, and where people could sit by half-dozens, looking up at the sparks as they wandered among the stars of a winter sky, are no more. It is as well, for our woods have been wasted too far to allow such conflagrations now-a-nights; but we get as comforting results from fires of a quarter of their size.

For sanitary reasons the open fire is the best of all. It gives a clear, dry heat; it ventilates a room; it does not exhale gas; it necessitates no moisture to rot floors, crumble plaster and nourish mould and mildew; it requires no plumbing; it never explodes and leaves you freezing, with gallons of water turning into ice on your carpet; it cannot be tapped by the families on the first and second floors, leaving you, a fifth-floor tenant, on the bitterest day of the year, with no way to thaw the morning's milk except by taking it into bed with you; and, best of all, it banishes the megrims. Welcome to our homes again, you living comfort, solace of weariness, creator of visions, incitement to mirth! Loves and friendships are welded to long endurance in your glow; eyes shine brighter for the merry dancing of your flames; home is home again with an open fire.

But truly to pleasure by our hearth, and to make the best gain from it, we must earn our firelight. Otherwise it is only half a satisfaction. The peevish home-stayer, the idle and cold-blooded, the timid of winds and chills, do not know the blessing of a fire. This is kept for him who roughs it out-of-doors and wades to it, mayhap, through a foot of snow. We have been in the house too much. We acquire nerves, and are soft and thin of skin. Even war is welcomed as an excuse for taking some thousands of us into the sun and rain, and how greatly stronger we are for that little outing by proxy!

To battle against a northwest gale, to tramp the roads when it is gray, under skeleton trees and swirling clouds—that is to earn the firelight that summons us across the fields. Off with the heavy clothes, and off with the cares. Then you may enter the presence where the fire, true Lar of your household, emblem of the creating and sustaining sun, shines back from eyes that are always tender, and reveal, vaguely, in the shadow, faces that mean to you the best of life. No; no lamps for a time. Prose comes in with them. They declare, while the fire suggests. There is no hearth with a meaning except at home. You cannot buy or rent it, and even at home the light of it must be earned. Having so earned it, we behold it as a window through which may be discovered loves and virtues. —CHARLES M. SKINNER.

Digitized by Google

At the English Court

They gave a big complimentary dinner to Sir Thomas Lipton the other evening at the Carlton, and during the conversation that followed, when the cigars were well alight, an American guest of Lord Charles Beresford got off a rather good illustration of the state of affairs at Ladysmith. What the situation there may be when these lines reach America one can only hazard a guess. But at the time of the dinner General Sir George White, at the head of his little army, was hemmed in at Ladysmith, and the Boers in a tightening coil were making matters extremely lively for the Britisher in Natal. Conversation naturally turned to the war, and the American ventured the opinion that White was holding up the Boer force as effectively as the Boers were holding him. "Have you ever robbed a bumblebee's nest?" he asked Lord Charles Beresford. Beresford was forced to admit that he had not. "Well, it strikes me that the whole war situation is epitomized in the story of the bees, the boy and the bull," continued the American. "White is the bees, the Boers are the boy, and the Army Corps on the ocean is the bull. The boy located the bees' nest in the middle of a pasture field. He gathered together a bundle of switches, tiptoed over, and commenced to whack away at the opening to the bumblebees' nest. Now, if you had ever robbed a bees' nest you'd know mighty well that once you've stirred 'em up, once you've started using your handful of switches and the bees know business is afoot, you've got to keep on a-whacking till the last bee is killed. You can't let up for a moment or the bees are all over you like a red-hot hailstorm. You can't budge, you can't look over your shoulder, but must take your chances and pay strict attention to the bees' nest. The boy I spoke of was so intent on slashing the bees that came boiling out of the ground that he never caught sight of the bull coming on the jump for him. That's as far as I need go with the story now. We'll see what happens when the bull strikes the boy."

There's nothing like giving away information that one cannot make money out of, so let me say that what the Americans call an "elevator" we Englishmen call a "lift." At the dinner to Lipton already referred to a speaker got off a rather clever play on the two words. Lipton's famous threat to "lift that cup" gave the after-dinner orator his chance. He said: "Sir Thomas is perhaps not wholly successful as a lift, but in the important matter of bettering the relationship between the two great English-speaking peoples and placing international sport on a high plane he has proved himself a mighty elevator."

One of the officers captured at Nickolson's Nek was Major W. R. P. Wallace, of the Gloucestershires. He has a little nephew at Borlose School, Marlow. When the account of the reverse of the British arms reached England one of the masters secured a newspaper and began reading the news out to the scholars.

When the name of Major Wallace was reached, a sharp, clear voice rang out in high glee: "Then my old uncle is bagged, too. Hurrah!"

Here is a Kipling snake-story that is true—which is more than can be said of most snake or Kipling stories that are floating about on the journalistic seas. Odd figures sometimes give a better idea of the extent of the British Empire than even a map of the world would. So here, before really beginning the Kipling snake-story, be it told that last year more than 25,000 of our fellow-subjects in India lost their lives by being killed by wild animals. Snake bites account for a large proportion of that 25,000. As a consequence of the frequency with which venomous snakes are met with, Anglo-Indians spend their whole life in thinking of their livers and watching out for snakes. When Mr. Kipling reached London from India in his search for fame and fortune he lodged in some small rooms on Villiers Street, Strand, up two flights of stairs. One morning a friend called, and when he found himself in Rudyard Kipling's sitting-room he was surprised to see a handsome mirror which stood over the fireplace "smashed to smithereens." "Snakes," said Kipling, noticing the look of astonishment on his friend's face. "I was dozing in my chair yesterday evening and my foot slipped out of my shoe, which for comfort I had unlaced. Half-waking, I felt with my foot for the shoe and began slipping it in when my toes touched the leather tongue. Snake! flashed across my sleepy brain; I gave one desperate kick, and when the shoe struck that mirror I realized that I was in London, and not in India."

I will not swear to the truth of this story, because I did not hear the street humorist shout, but I can well believe it, for the British workmen, when the Prince of Wales passes along the streets, afoot or in his carriage, always call out cheerful little bits of information to him, or inquire of him how his relations are, being, it would seem, particularly concerned to hear of the good health of His Royal Highness' mother. The query usually put is, "Hullo, Teddy, 'ow's yer ma?" The "lower orders," in fact, take all sorts of liberties with the Prince, and he seems to enjoy their jokes and impertinences thoroughly. For instance, the other day he was driving along the Embankment at the moment that the evening papers were issued announcing that one of his horses had lost an important race. A Sun delivery cart came tearing along loaded with papers, and passing the Prince the driver of the cart noticed the occupant of the carriage. Instantly reining up his horse, the cart-driver jumped out, grabbed a paper, and running to the carriage, threw in the paper, at the same time calling out the news of the race. The Prince told his coachman to stop, slipped his finger and thumb into his waistcoat pocket and handed the enterprising cart-driver a sovereign. But that is not the story I started to tell.

No doubt the news that the American ladies in England are sending out a hospital ship to South Africa to look after the sick and wounded Britishers and Boers is widely known in America. The other day Mrs. Brown-Potter gave a concert party at Claridges' Hotel in aid of the fund, and the Prince of Wales came especially from Sandringham to attend. He drove from Kings Cross Station and found the usual crowd of loiterers about the doors of the hotel, watching the great ones, English and American, arrive. The usual cheers went up for the Prince, and the usual amount of chaffing fell to his lot. The drivers of 'buses, cabs, drays and the British workman in general never speak of him other than as "Teddy." As His Royal Highness' carriage came to a standstill before the entrance to the hotel one lusty-lunged humorist called out in tones of fear: "For 'Eaven's sake, Teddy, don't go in there, or one of them Yankee girls'll marry yer." But another lifted his voice in encouragement: "Don't you be afeared, Teddy. Walk right in. We all knows as you 'ave a missis, and we'll stand by yer, even if she's the sister of Jim Jeffries." Evidently this satisfied the Prince, for he walked in without a quake.

Sir Henry Verney, a man perhaps as well known in America as he is in England, has been giving the British public his reminiscences of his midshipman days during the Crimea war. At that time the English and French were fast friends, and the middies of the two navies were of course hand in glove with one another, although as a rule they are the most bloodthirsty lot to be found in this world. "One day," says Sir Edward, "I arranged an expedition with a French midshipman, but when the time came I had got into some scrape; my leave was stopped, and I was unable to keep my appointment. The next time I met him I thought well to put a bold face on the matter. 'Hello,' I said, 'how was it you didn't meet me the other day as we had arranged?' He looked a bit confused and replied: 'I was put in the sand-tank for punishment.' 'Never mind,' I replied; 'I did not come myself, as my leave was stopped.' 'Ah,' answered the little Frenchman, 'a midshipman a poor ting in any countree.'" Another yarn:

One day, when Admiral Dundas was leaving the fleet, a sad mistake occurred in signaling. Admiral Dundas signaled with the flags, "Success to you all." In replying, the flags became confused, and Sir Edmund Lyons' reply came out in this curious form: "Hanging attend you." Of course it was only a mistake, and was meant for "Happiness attend you." But the Admirals were known to dislike one another, and the mistake gave real joy to the midshipmen.

In legal circles here they tell the story of one of their distinguished members who had to answer a rather knotty question in New York the other day. The first thing that strikes an Englishman as strange on the other side is the appalling list of questions which he has to fill up before landing. This English barrister reached New York, was confronted by the list, sighed and sat him down to fill it up, being in a way a law-abiding man. On the journey across the page of questions he struck the poser, "Are you married or single?" Now it happened he had left London for the sole purpose of being out of England during the days his wife prosecuted her divorce case. So he was compelled to write on the form, "Sorry, but can't tell till I reach a cable office." E. W. Sabel.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

I have been much interested in the articles under the heading Why Young Men Fail, and particularly one written by Roswell Miller, President of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad.

Being in the employ of one of the best Western railroads, and holding a position which enables me to meet at regular and irregular intervals hundreds of employees and to see their work in all its details, it seems to me that injustice is frequently done them in various ways by their employers. It would indeed be far from difficult to name men who, instead of being merely "time-servers," are working hard, early and late, through holidays and Sundays, and on occasions when almost physically unable. Because of their interest in the work at hand they disregard the rest which Nature demands. They have done this for years.

When a promotion is requested they are put off with excuses, when I know that the real reason is that they completely "fill the bill," and it would be difficult to procure others who could fill their places. They are simply kept there because their work is satisfactory. The remuneration cannot be increased because their particular positions never demanded more than a specified amount, and it would be a bad precedent to change the schedule of salaries by increase.

Then, again, it frequently happens that a man holding a railroad position, who has performed his duties to the entire satisfaction of his superior, may see an opening in some other department where he can better himself financially. He applies for it, but his chances are few because of the disinclination to appoint a man from another department. It is the same thing right down the line. It is almost impossible for an agent on one division to be transferred. The Superintendent does not care to go beyond his own bailiwick, and will rather promote less capable men of his own than be beholden, as it were, to another Superintendent. This is a matter of jealousy on his part. He does not want to have some other official think that his men are less competent.

With another class of railroad men the same thing happens. There are positions which require years of close application and the hardest kind of work at all hours when accuracy and swiftness are essential. When an employee holding a position of this sort has mastered the details so that he can be trusted as to exactness, etc., and after he has proved equal to every emergency which he has encountered during the passage of years of experience, he asks for a change of employment, his prayer is refused. Can his salary be increased? No; the position is scheduled at so much, and like the laws of the Medes and Persians, The Schedule altereth not. There he is, with no opportunity to expand. He will not be discharged, because his work is excellent, and it would require years to train another man for the place. His friends wonder why the Company does not recognize his ability and promote him. Finally they come to think, as he also does, that he is a failure. When that happens his work deteriorates. Because of his discouragement he becomes a "time-server," and he finds himself losing ground after the best years of his life have passed in earnest, conscientious work, unsparing of his time and strength. Then he is obliged to accept a minor position elsewhere, with the hope (?) of "working up" to something better.

I am convinced that the failure does not always depend upon the young man himself. His employer stands largely in the position which our college Presidents are so fond of telling us—in loco parentis. If he will he can assist him greatly by a word of encouragement now and then, and instil a desire for the best results, for what man is there who will not strive harder when he has some reason to think that his efforts are appreciated? It is essential that discipline and strict observance of rules be enforced at all times, but an occasional word of approbation and recognition of good service would bring about most favorable results, and there would be successes instead of failures. A. T.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

As one of the young men, I have read with a great deal of interest the letters of prominent business men on the causes of failure recently published in your paper, and I have no doubt but that the publication of those reasons will tend to lessen the dearth of "$5000-a-year men." But unless I have missed it in reading, the writers have failed to put forward one cause which, if not prominent, is at least often present, viz., the employer. The majority of a man's waking hours are spent in business, with his employer ever before him.

A large percentage of a man's deeds is habit. Many habits are formed when young from example. How many young men are asked to lie or to do a more or less dishonest thing to save the reputation of the "house"? Can a boy of sixteen be blamed for forming his opinion of business men and firms in general from the false method of advertising used by his employer or the masked untruths in the letters he mails at six o'clock?

The employer asks for originality, and yet how often is a suggestion cut short. He requires punctuality and then promotes his laggard son over an industrious outsider. He insists on soberness, and comes back from lunch with a breath that would not deceive the most ignorant. Or he tells the clerks that "honesty for honesty's sake" is the finest thing in the world, and then winks as he tells a customer that he has allowed him his best discount. And these are but few of the "unpracticed sermons" that young men meet with.

I wonder if any of the contributors to the subject of "Young Men's Failures" questioned themselves, when thinking of "failures" under their own observation, as to whether their example or influence had anything to do with the results. Don't blame all the failures on us. Never a subject that does not have two sides.

The best young men of to-day don't ask for a bed of roses, neither do they want to win through a pull, but they do ask for a show and fair treatment. Let the employer remember he was young once himself. The times have changed, also, and beginners now are not commended for doing the things that gave their fathers a start.

Though I have not reached the age of twenty-two, I take the liberty of stating that many a "failure" would have been a "success" if he had had a "David Harum" master, and if ever success knocks at my door I shall attribute nine-tenths of the cause to the hand that is now directing me.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. W. W. Levering.

Digitized by Google

Three MEN on Four Wheels

By Jerome K. Jerome

Copyright, 1899, by Jerome K. Jerome. Copyright in Great Britain

The Subjugation of Ethelbertha

SYNOPSIS OF FIRST CHAPTER—The three men—George, the bachelor, and Harris and the author, who are blessed with wives—decide that they need a holiday and a complete change of scene. After talking the matter over, they agree that a cycling tour in the Black Forest will be the very thing. It is unanimously voted that women and children shall be left at home, and the friends part with a courageous resolve to break the news to their wives without further delay.

I OPENED the ball with Ethelbertha that same evening. I commenced by being—purposely—a little irritable. My idea was that Ethelbertha would remark upon this; I should admit it, and account for it by over brain-pressure; this would naturally lead to talk about my health in general, and the evident necessity there was for my taking prompt and vigorous measures. I thought that with a little tact I might even manage so that the suggestion should come from Ethelbertha herself. I imagined her saying:

"No, dear; it is change you want—complete change. Now be persuaded by me, and go away for a month; no, do not ask me to come with you; I know you would rather that I did, but I will not. It is the society of other men you need. Try to persuade George and Harris to go with you. Believe me, a highly strung brain such as yours demands occasional relaxation from the strain of domestic surroundings. Forget for a little while the children want music lessons and boots and bicycles, with tincture of rhubarb three times a day; forget there are such things in life as cooks, and house-decorators, and next-door dogs, and butchers' bills. Go away to some green corner of the earth, where all is new and strange to you, where your overwrought mind will gather peace and fresh ideas. Go away for a space and give me time to miss you and to reflect upon your goodness and virtue, which, continually present with me, I may, humanlike, be apt to forget, as one through use grows indifferent to the blessing of the sun, the beauty of the moon. Go away, and come back refreshed in mind and body, a brighter, better man—if that be possible—than when you went away."

But even when we obtain our desires they never come to us garbed as we would wish. To begin with, Ethelbertha did not seem to remark that I was irritable; I had to draw her attention to it. I said:

"You must forgive me; I'm not feeling quite myself to-night."

She said: "Oh, I have not noticed anything different about you; what's the matter with you?"

"I can't tell you what it is," I said; "I've felt it coming on for weeks."

"It's that whiskey," said Ethelbertha; "you never touch it except when we go to the Harrises. You know you can't stand it; you have not a strong head."

"It isn't the whiskey," I replied. "It's deeper than that. I fancy it's more mental than bodily."

"You've been reading those criticisms again," said Ethelbertha, more sympathetically. "Why don't you take my advice and put them in the fire?"

"And it isn't the criticisms," I answered; "they've been quite flattering of late—one or two of them."

"Well, what is it?" said Ethelbertha; "there must be something to account for it."

"No, there isn't," I replied; "that's the remarkable thing about it. I can only describe it as a strange feeling of unrest that seems to have taken possession of me."

Ethelbertha glanced across at me with a somewhat curious expression, I thought; but as she said nothing I continued the argument myself:

"This aching monotony of life, these days of peaceful, uneventful felicity, they crush one."

"I would not grumble at them," said Ethelbertha; "we might get some of the other sort and like them still less."

"I'm not so sure of that," I replied. "In a life of continuous joy I can imagine even pain coming as a welcome variation. I wonder sometimes whether the saints in Heaven do not occasionally feel the continual serenity a burden. To myself, a life of endless bliss, uninterrupted by a single contrasting note, would, I feel, grow maddening. I suppose," I continued, "I am a strange sort of man; I can hardly understand myself at times. There are moments," I added, "when I hate myself."

Often a little speech like this, hinting at hidden depths of indescribable emotion, has touched Ethelbertha, but to-night she appeared strangely unsympathetic. With regard to Heaven and its possible effect upon me, she suggested my not worrying myself about that, remarking it was always foolish to go half-way to meet trouble that might never come; while as to my being a strange sort of fellow, that, she supposed, I could not help, and if other people were willing to put up with me it was not a matter that need trouble me. The monotony of life, she added, was a common experience; there she could sympathize with me.

"You don't know how I long," said Ethelbertha, "to get away occasionally even from you; but I know it can never be, so I do not brood upon it."

I had never heard Ethelbertha speak like this before; it astonished and grieved me beyond measure.

"That's not a very kind remark to make," I said; "not a wifely remark."

"I know it isn't," she replied; "that is why I have never said it before. You men never can understand," continued Ethelbertha, "that however fond a woman may be of a man, there are times when he palls upon her. You don't know how I long to be able sometimes to put on my bonnet and go out with nobody to ask me where I am going, why I am going, how long I am going to be, and when I shall be back. You don't know how I sometimes long to order a dinner that I should like and that the children would like, but at sight of which you would put on your hat and be off to the club. You don't know how much I feel inclined sometimes to invite some women here that I like and that I know you don't; to go and see the people that I want to see, to go to bed when I am tired, and to get up when I feel I want to get up. Two people living together are bound both to be continually sacrificing their own desires one to the other. It is sometimes a good thing to slacken the strain a bit."

On thinking over Ethelbertha's words afterward I have come to see their wisdom; but at the time I admit I was hurt and indignant.

"If your desire," I said, "is to get rid of me——"

"Now don't be an old goose," said Ethelbertha. "I only want to get rid of you for a little while—just long enough to forget there are one or two corners about you that are not perfect; just long enough to let me remember what a dear fellow you are in other respects, and to look forward to your return, as I used to look forward to your coming in the old days when I did not see you so often as to become, perhaps, a little indifferent to you; as one grows indifferent to the glory of the sun, just because he is there every day."

I did not like the tone that Ethelbertha took. There seemed to be a frivolity about her unsuited to the theme into which we had drifted. That a woman should contemplate cheerfully an absence of three or four weeks from her husband appeared to me to be not altogether nice—not what I call womanly; it was not like Ethelbertha at all. I was worried; I felt I didn't want to go on this trip at all. If it had not been for George and Harris I should have abandoned it. As it was, I could not see how to change my mind with dignity.

"Very well, Ethelbertha," I replied, "it shall be as you wish. If you desire a holiday from my presence, you shall enjoy it; but if it is not impertinent curiosity on the part of a husband, I should like to know what you purpose doing in my absence?"

"We will take that house at Folkestone," answered Ethelbertha, "and I'll go down there with Kate. And if you want to do Clara Harris a good turn," added Ethelbertha, "you'll persuade Harris to go with you, and then Clara can join us. We three used to have some very jolly times together before you men ever came along, and it would be just delightful to renew them. Do you think that you could persuade Mr. Harris to go with you?"

I said I would try.

"There's a dear boy," said Ethelbertha; "try hard. You might get George to join you."

I replied there was not much advantage in George coming, seeing he was a bachelor, and that therefore nobody would be much benefited by his absence. But a woman never understands satire. She merely remarked it would look unkind leaving him behind. I promised to put it to him.

I met Harris at the club in the afternoon, and asked him how he had got on.

He said: "Oh, that's all right; there's no difficulty about getting away."

But there was that about his tone that suggested incomplete satisfaction, so I pressed him for further details.

"She was as sweet as milk about it," he continued; "said it was an excellent idea of George's, and that she thought it would do me good."

"That seems all right," I said; "what's wrong about that?"

"There's nothing wrong about that," he answered; "but that wasn't all. She went on to talk of other things."

"I understand," I said.

"There's that bathroom fad of hers," he continued.

"I've heard of it," I said; "she has started Ethelbertha on the idea."

"Well, I've had to agree to that being put in hand at once; I couldn't argue any more when she was so nice about the other thing. That'll cost me a hundred pounds, at the very least."

"As much as that?" I asked.

"Every penny of it; the estimate alone is sixty."

I was sorry to hear him say this.

"Then there's the kitchen stove," he continued; "everything that has gone wrong in the house for the last two years has been the fault of that kitchen stove."

"I know," I said. "We have been in seven houses since we were married, and every kitchen stove has been worse than the last. Our present one is not only incompetent; it is spiteful. It knows when we are giving a party and goes out of its way to do its worst."

"We are going to have a new one," said Harris, but he did not say it proudly; "Clara thought it would be such a

I OPENED THE BALL WITH ETHELBERTHA THAT SAME EVENING. I COMMENCED BY BEING—PURPOSELY—A LITTLE IRRITABLE

Editor's Note—Three Men on Four Wheels was begun in the Post of January 6. Each chapter is practically an independent story and may be read with enjoyment without reference to preceding installments.

Digitized by Google

saving of expense having the two things done at the same time. I believe if a woman wanted a diamond tiara she would explain that it was to save the expense of a bonnet."

"How much do you reckon the stove is going to cost you?" I asked. I felt interested in the subject.

"I don't know—another twenty, I suppose. Then we talked about the piano. Could you ever notice any difference between one piano and another?"

"Some of them seem to be a bit louder than others," I answered; "but one gets used to that."

"Ours is all wrong about the treble," said Harris. "By the way, what is the treble?"

"It's the shrill end of the thing," I explained, "the part that sounds as if you'd trod on its tail. The brilliant selection always ends up with a flourish on it."

"They want more of it," said Harris; "our old one hasn't got enough of it. I'll have to put it in the nursery, and get a new one for the drawing-room."

"Anything else?" I asked.

"No," said Harris; "she didn't seem able to think of anything else."

"You'll find when you get home she's thought of one other thing."

"What's that?" asked Harris.

"A house at Folkestone for the season."

"What should she want a house at Folkestone for?"

"To live in," I suggested, "during the summer months."

"She's going to her people in Wales," said Harris, "for the holidays, with the children; we've had an invitation."

"Possibly," I said, "she'll go to Wales before she goes to Folkestone, or maybe she'll take Wales on her way home; but she'll want a house at Folkestone for the season, notwithstanding. I may be mistaken—I hope for your sake that I am—but I feel a presentment that I'm not."

"This trip," said Harris, "is going to be expensive."

"It was an idiotic suggestion," I said, "from the beginning."

"It was foolish of us to listen to him," said Harris; "he'll get us into real trouble one of these days."

"He always was a muddler," I agreed.

"So headstrong," added Harris.

We heard his voice at that moment in the hall asking for letters.

"Better not say anything to him," I suggested; "it's too late to go back now."

"There would be no advantage in doing so," replied Harris; "I should have to get that bathroom and piano in any case now."

He came in looking very cheerful.

"Well," he said, "is it all right? Have you managed it?"

There was that about his tone I did not altogether like; I noticed Harris resented it also.

"Managed what?" I said.

"Why, to get off," said George.

I felt the time was come to explain things to George.

"In married life," I said, "the man proposes, the woman submits. It is her duty; all religion teaches it."

George folded his hands and fixed his eyes on the ceiling. "We may chaff and joke a little about these things," I continued, "but when it comes to practice, that is what always happens. We have mentioned to Ethelbertha and to Clara that we are going; naturally, they are grieved; they would prefer to come with us; failing that, they would have us remain with them. But we have explained to them our wishes on the subject, and—there's an end of the matter."

"Forgive me," said George, "I did not understand. I am only a bachelor. People tell me this, that and the other and I listen."

I said: "That is where you do wrong. When you want information, come to Harris or myself; we will tell you the truth about these matters."

George thanked us, and we proceeded with the business in hand.

"When shall we start?" said George.

"The sooner the better," replied Harris.

His idea, I fancy, was to get away before Mrs. H. thought of other things. We fixed the following Wednesday.

"What about route?" asked Harris.

"I have an idea," said George. "I take it you fellows are naturally anxious to improve your minds."

I said: "We don't want to become monstrosities; to a reasonable degree, yes, if it can be done without much expense and with little personal trouble."

"It can," said George. "We know Holland and the Rhine. Very well; my suggestion is that we take the boat to Hamburg, see Berlin and Dresden, and work our way to the Forest through Nuremberg and Stuttgart."

"There are some pretty bits in Mesopotamia, so I've been told," murmured Harris.

George said Mesopotamia was too much out of our way, but that the Berlin-Dresden route was quite practicable. For good or evil he persuaded us into it.

"The machines, I suppose," said George, "will be as before; Harris and I on the tandem, J——"

"I think not," interrupted Harris firmly; "you and J. on the tandem, I on the single."

"All the same to me," agreed George. "J. and I on the tandem, Harris——"

"I do not mind taking my turn," I interrupted, "but I am not going to carry George all the way; the burden should be divided."

"Very well," agreed Harris, "we'll divide it. But it must be on the distinct understanding that he works."

"That he what?" said George.

"That he works," repeated Harris firmly; "at all events, up-hill."

"Great Scott!" said George; "don't you want any exercise?"

There is always unpleasantness about this tandem. It is the theory of the man in front that the man behind does nothing; it is equally the theory of the man behind that he alone is the motive power, the man in front merely doing the puffing. The mystery will never be solved. It is annoying when Prudence is whispering to you on the one side not to overdo your strength and bring on heart disease; while Justice into the other ear is remarking, "Why should you do it all? This isn't a cab. He's not your passenger"; to hear him grunt out: "What's the matter—lost your pedals?"

Harris in his early married days made much trouble for himself on one occasion owing to this impossibility of knowing what the person behind is doing. He was riding with his wife through Holland. The roads were stony and the machine jumped a good deal.

The three men at the club

"Sit tight," said Harris without turning his head.

What Mrs. Harris thought he said was "jump off." Why she should have thought he said "jump off" when he said "sit tight" neither of them can explain.

Mrs. Harris puts it this way: "If you had said 'sit tight,' why should I have jumped off?"

Harris puts it: "If I had wanted you to jump off why should I have said 'sit tight'?"

The bitterness is past, but they argue about the matter to this day.

Be the explanation what it may, however, nothing alters the fact that Mrs. Harris did jump off, while Harris pedaled away hard under the impression she was still behind him. It appears that at first she thought he was riding up the hill merely to show off. They were both young in those days, and he used to do that sort of thing. She expected him to spring to earth on reaching the summit and lean in a careless and graceful attitude against the machine waiting for her. When, on the contrary, she saw him pass the summit and proceed rapidly down a long and steep incline she was seized, first with surprise, secondly with indignation, and lastly with alarm. She ran to the top of the hill and shouted; but he never turned his head. She watched him disappear into a wood a mile and a half distant and then sat down and cried. They had had a slight difference that morning, and she wondered if he had taken it seriously and intended desertion. She had no money; she knew no Dutch. People passed, and seemed sorry for her; she tried to make them understand what had happened. They gathered that she had lost something, but could not grasp what. They took her to the nearest village and found a policeman for her. He concluded from her pantomime that some man had stolen her bicycle. They put the telegraph into operation, and discovered in a village four miles off an unfortunate boy riding a lady's machine of an obsolete pattern. They brought him to her in a cart, but as she did not appear to want either him or his bicycle they let him go again, and resigned themselves to bewilderment.

Meanwhile Harris continued his ride with much enjoyment. It seemed to him that he had suddenly become a stronger and in every way a more capable cyclist. Said he to what he thought was Mrs. Harris:

"I haven't felt this machine so light for months. It's this air, I think; it's doing me good."

Then he told her not to be afraid, and he would show her how fast he could go. He bent down over the handles and put his heart into his work. The bicycle bounded over the road like a thing of life; farmhouses and churches, dogs and chickens came to him and passed. Old folks stood and gazed at him; the children cheered him.

In this way he sped merrily onward for about five miles. Then, as he explains it, the feeling began to grow upon him that something was wrong. He was not surprised at the silence; the wind was blowing strongly, and the machine was rattling a good deal. It was a sense of void that came upon him. He stretched out his hand behind him, and felt; there was nothing there but space. He jumped or rather fell off, and looked back up the road; it stretched white and straight through the dark wood, and not a living soul could he see upon it. He remounted, and rode back up the hill. In ten minutes he came to where the road broke into four; there he dismounted and tried to remember which fork he had come down.

While he was deliberating a man passed, sitting sideways on a horse. Harris stopped him, and explained that he had lost his wife. The man appeared to be neither surprised nor sorry. While they were talking another farmer came along, to whom the first man explained the matter, not as an accident but as a good story. What appeared to surprise the second man most was that Harris should be making a fuss about the thing. He could get no sense out of either of them, and cursing them for a couple of idiots he mounted his machine again and took the middle road on chance. Half way up he came upon a party of two young women with one man between them. They appeared to be making the most of him. He asked them if they had seen his wife. They asked him what she was like. He did not know enough Dutch to describe her properly; all he could tell them was she was a very beautiful woman of medium size. Evidently this did not satisfy them; the description was too general; any man could say that and by this means perhaps get possession of a wife that did not belong to him. They asked him how she was dressed; for the life of him he could not recollect. I doubt if any man could tell how any woman was dressed ten minutes after he had left her. He recollected a blue skirt and then there was something that carried the dress on, as it were, up to the neck. Possibly this may have been a blouse; he retained a dim vision of a belt; but what sort of a blouse? Was it green, or yellow, or blue? Had it a collar or was it fastened with a bow? Were there feathers in her hat, or flowers? Or was it a hat at all? He dared not say for fear of making a mistake and being sent miles after the wrong party. The two young women giggled, which in his then state of mind irritated Harris. The young man, who appeared anxious to get rid of him, suggested the police station at the next town.

Harris made his way there. The police gave him a piece of paper, and told him to write down a full description of his wife, together with details of when and where he had lost her. He did not know where he had lost her; all he could tell them was the name of the village where he had lunched. He knew he had her with him then, and that they had started from there together. The police looked suspicious; they were doubtful about three matters; First, was she really his wife? Second, had he really lost her? Third, why had he lost her? With the aid of a hotel-keeper, however, who spoke a little English, he overcame their scruples. They promised to act, and in the evening they brought her to him in a covered wagon, together with a bill for expenses. The meeting was not a tender one. Mrs. Harris is not a good actress, and always has great difficulty in disguising her feelings; on this occasion, she frankly admits, she made no attempt to disguise them.

Digitized by Google

* * * * * * * * *

The wheel business settled, there arose the everlasting luggage question.

"The usual list, I suppose," said George, preparing to write.

That was wisdom I had taught them; I had learned it myself years ago from my Uncle Podger.

"Always before beginning to pack," my uncle would say, "make a list."

He was a methodical man.

"Take a piece of paper"—he always began at the beginning—"put down on it everything you can possibly require; then go over it and see that it contains nothing you can possibly do without. Imagine yourself in bed. What have you got on? Very well, put it down—together with a change. You get up; what do you do? Wash yourself. What do you wash yourself with? Soap: put down soap. Go on till you have finished. Then take your clothes. Begin at your feet. What do you wear on your feet? Boots, shoes, socks: put them down. Work up till you get to your head. What else do you want besides clothes? A little brandy: put it down. A corkscrew: put it down. Put down everything, then you don't forget anything."

That is the plan he always pursued himself. The list made, he would go over it carefully, as he always advised, to see that he had forgotten nothing. Then he would go over it again, and strike out everything it was possible to dispense with. Then he would lose the list.

Said George: "Just sufficient for a day or two we will take with us on our bikes. The bulk of our luggage we must send on from town to town."

"We must be careful," I said. "I knew a man once——"

Harris looked at his watch.

"We'll hear about him on the boat," said Harris. "I have got to meet Clara at Waterloo Station in half an hour."

"It won't take half an hour," I said. "It's a true story, and——"

"Don't waste it," said George. "I am told there are rainy evenings in the Black Forest; we may be glad of it. What we have to do now is to finish this list."

Now I come to think of it, I never did get off that story; something always interrupted it. And it really was true.

Not Used to Clipping Texans

WHEN James S. Hogg, whose Bryan speech last summer started a stampede for the Nebraska orator in the ranks of Tammany Hall, was Governor of Texas, he visited New York on legal business and put up at one of the largest uptown hotels. He carefully evaded the reporters, many of whom knew him, and went into the barber shop to have his hair and whiskers trimmed. In the middle of the operation he thoughtlessly closed his eyes for a few minutes, and when he opened them he found that the barber had shaved his cheeks, giving him flowing side whiskers, and had trimmed his beard to a point. His mustache also had been outstretched and partially waxed. The mirror gave back to the astonished Governor the awe-stricken face of a stout Parisian of the ultra-French type.

"What did you do that for?" he exclaimed as soon as he could control his voice. "I'm no Frenchman. I come from Texas."

"All right, sir," replied the barber impassively, and he went at the Governor again. He combed the whiskers straight down, also the mustache, and cut off the point of the beard.

"Now I'm a German," said the Governor. "I don't want to be any kind of a foreigner. I'm an American—a Texan, I tell you. Try it again."

This time the barber ruffled the side-whiskers and tousled the beard so that every particular hair pointed in a different direction.

"I thought I said I was a Texan," said the Governor with dangerous politeness. "Now, my friend, because I come from Texas I want you to understand that I'm no anarchist. I want you to take off every hair on my face except on my lip, and I want my mustache cut short. Understand me, short; and the next time I come to New York I'll bring my own barber along with me."

The LOSS of the DORIC

By H. Phelps Whitmarsh

Author of The World's Rough Hand

McDEVITT'S restaurant lies in one of the narrow streets leading up from the wharves. From its door one can smell the fish depots on Atlantic Avenue and see the East Boston ferry-house. In one of the windows, seated at a desk, the portly proprietor can usually be seen—clean shaven, close-cropped, and in his shirt-sleeves. The other window displays a number of fly-specked bottles and a large white sign. The interior is a long, tunnel-like room with one side partitioned off into little compartments, each capable of seating four persons, and having dingy red curtains to be drawn should the occupants require privacy. One Saturday night, when McDevitt's was at its busiest, when the gas jets were all a-flare and the place besieged by a crowd of Gloucester fishermen, deep-water sailors and dock laborers, a short, stocky man with a black beard and a pair of half-shut, keen blue eyes stepped across the threshold.

He paused uncertainly for a moment, then made his way with rolling gait along the line of compartments, looking for an empty one. Half-way down he parted the curtains before a table apparently vacant, and surprised a swarthy individual sitting in one corner, who immediately informed him, with much politeness and a strong Spanish accent, that the place was engaged.

"Infernal Dago!" growled the man with the black beard contemptuously, as he withdrew and entered the next division. "I can't stand these Cubans.

"I'll have some ham and eggs and a glass of ale," he said to the waiter, who leaned questioningly over him while he studied the fare bill.

The waiter departed. The man thrust his legs out under the table, jammed his hands into his trousers' pockets and gazed moodily at the tarnished cruet. Jack Hammers was not in the best of humors, and, all things considered, it was not to be wondered at. In Liverpool, three weeks before, he had thrown up his command of the Engadine, an old-fashioned clipper in the Australian trade, to take the position of chief officer aboard the new steamship Doric. The passage over had been stormy in more senses than one. Not only was the weather rough and the Doric badly stowed, but the Captain proved himself a morose, fault-finding bully. The Mate had given the Captain a piece of his mind, with the result that, as soon as the vessel reached Boston, he was discharged.

Now, Jack Hammers had been engaged by the ship's owners, and in theory the Captain had no authority to discharge him on such grounds. In practice, however, a Captain in a foreign port can do very much as he pleases, and Hammers, in spite of his vigorous protests, had been forced to leave; not only he, indeed, but also the Third Officer, the Boatswain, and practically all the hands. Such a wholesale paying-off by an English ship in an American port was unusual. It created much comment in sailor-town; the Doric was put down as a "hard packet" and promptly boycotted. The Second Mate, who was in the Captain's watch and appeared to get along with him very well, and the Chief Engineer were the only officers that stayed by her.

The Doric had now been in port a week, and Jack Hammers had, so far, been unable to find a ship to carry him back to Liverpool. He would take nothing but a vessel bound for the British Isles, as it was his intention to see the Doric's owners and lay his case before them.

Meanwhile, the big freighter lay at Pier No. 6, East Boston, taking in the largest cargo of grain that had ever crossed the "Western Ocean." No new hands had been shipped, nor, to all appearances, had her Captain tried to secure any. It was rumored among the "crimps" on "the street" that her crew were coming from New York.

Jack Hammers had been waiting for his meal several minutes when his gloomy reflections were broken into by the sound of a familiar voice. There was no mistaking the loud, blustering tones which carried over the partition. It was the voice of Captain Sharpley, of the Doric. The din of the place was such that, although Hammers caught a word here and there, he could not hear the conversation; yet he listened with all his ears, wondering what could have brought his late skipper to McDevitt's. For him, whose small pay-day was already almost gone, McDevitt's was a natural result; but for Captain Sharpley to eat there was most extraordinary.

He stepped into the room. The curtains at the Captain's table were drawn and he could see nothing. He was about to step out when his eye was attracted by a moving reflection in the narrow strip of mirror above the back of the bar. It slanted forward at such an angle that, from where he stood, he could look over the top of the drapery and distinctly see the inmates of the nearest boxes. One interior claimed his entire attention.

In it he saw two men; one, the swarthy man whom he had so scornfully termed "Dago," the other a heavy red-whiskered personage, wearing a black peaked cap, a red handkerchief tied loosely around his neck, and showing under his old coat a dark blue flannel undershirt. The "Dago" at that moment was busy counting a large package of bills. When he had finished he passed them over to the red-whiskered man, who again counted them and placed them carefully in his pocket.

"Well, I'll be jiggered," said Jack Hammers, as he drew away. "The 'old man' dressed up as a fireman and taking money from a 'Dago'! There's some crooked work here, I'll take my oath."

His suspicions thoroughly aroused, he joined the group of loafers which hung about the door and watched. In the course of half an hour the peculiar pair came out as they had entered—separately, the Captain, with a quick glance up and down the street, heading for the ferry, the "Dago" taking an uptown car.

Mr. Hammers made his way slowly to his lodging, pondering deeply over the strange behavior of the Doric's Captain. That some deviltry was afoot he was convinced; but what particular kind of deviltry was it? That was the first question to be answered.

Next morning, in the hope that he might discover something, he went over to Pier 6. The immense freight-boat was already half laden, and lay under the chutes of the elevator with a slight list to port. Several coal barges were made fast along her outer side—a thing which pointed to the fact that the Doric had burned more coal than was expected on her first trip, for British vessels usually carry sufficient fuel to last them both ways.

He nodded to the Quartermaster stationed at the gangway, and asked for the Second Mate.

"Yes, sir," was the reply. "I'll call him, if you like, sir."

"No, never mind, Martin; I'll go up myself."

"Beg pardon, sir," replied the man, "but Cap'en's orders is that no one's to be allowed aboard without a permit."

"Captain Sharpley's getting funny," said Mr. Hammers, as he turned on his heel.

The following two days he spent in and about the dock, watching, with a suspicious eye, the various merchandise taken as cargo and every person permitted to ascend the gangway. In spite of his close surveillance, however, he saw nothing out of the ordinary ship-loading routine.

On Wednesday morning, as he stopped to make an inquiry at the Commissioner's Office, he was astonished to hear that the Doric had cleared with the early tide.

"Where did she get her crew?" he asked of his informant, a tall, one-eyed man, who was steward of a coaster.

"They came on a late train last night from N'Yawk, or somewheres," was the reply. "A tough crowd, too, by the looks of 'em. Mostly 'Dagos.'"

A week later, his money having given out, and seeing no opportunity of getting an officer's position, Jack Hammers shipped before the mast in a small bark bound for Liverpool, where, after a twenty-seven-days' passage, he arrived. The trip had in no way deadened the feeling that he had been unjustly treated, and no sooner was the vessel made fast than he donned his shore-going rig and, with a determined look on his face, bent his steps toward Water Street, upon which were situated the offices of the "Western Line."

Inquiring for Mr. Dennison, he slowly passed through some half-dozen human filters, and was at last conducted into the Superintendent's presence.

"Good-morning, Mr. Hammers," said that gentleman rather coldly.

"Good-morning, sir."

There was an awkward pause, in which the Superintendent looked up expectantly, and the Mate fumbled the rim of his hat.

"I came to see you about my being discharged in Boston, Mr. Dennison. Captain Sharpley——"

"Excuse me, Mr. Hammers, but I do not think we need discuss this matter. We have all the information necessary concerning your discharge. In Captain Sharpley's last letter he gave us his reasons."

"Would you mind telling me what those reasons were, sir?"

For answer the Superintendent picked up a letter-file which lay on his table and read as follows:

> "As to the chief officer, Mr. J. Hammers, I regret to say that I have also been forced to discharge him. First, for incompetence; second, for refusing to obey orders; and third, for inciting the hands to follow his mutinous example. No one will appreciate more than yourselves——"

"It's a —— lie!" thundered Jack Hammers, bringing down his fist upon the table with a bang. "Bring him here and see if he dare say that to my face!"

The Superintendent looked searchingly at the officer. "Is it possible you have not heard the news?" he said.

"What news, sir?"

"About the Doric."

"The Doric, no; she's——"

"Lost!" said the Superintendent gravely. "That is, we suppose so. She's twenty-eight days overdue this morning and has not been sighted since she left Boston."

"Lost!" echoed Jack Hammers, completely staggered by the information. He stared foolishly at the Superintendent for a moment.

"Well," he muttered, "if that's the case, I'll say nothing against the dead. Good-day, sir."

And in a dazed kind of way he passed through the spacious offices out into the street.

Aimlessly he wandered about the docks all day, unable to shake the thing from his mind. Toward evening he bought a Mercury, and the first thing that caught his eye as he opened the sheet was the headline, "Loss of the Doric." Mechanically he read the paragraph:

Digitized by Google

"New York. The steamship Anglia, of the Waller Line, arrived from Liverpool to-day. She reports having picked up one of the boats of the missing steamer Doric in latitude 45° 58' N. and longitude 52° 50' W. The boat was badly stove in and had evidently been in the water several days. The Anglia sighted a number of icebergs in the same vicinity, and there is no doubt in the minds of her Captain and officers that the loss of the unfortunate vessel is due to these floating menaces to shipping. The Doric was one of the 9000-ton steamers recently built for the Western Line at a cost of £120,000. Besides a large quantity of machinery and other valuable cargo, she carried 136,000 bushels of wheat and 89,000 bushels of corn, the value of which alone amounted to £26,200."

Folding the paper carefully, Mr. Hammers placed it in his pocket, and then, beginning to feel the need of refreshment, turned toward the city. His nearest way lay through the Waterloo Dock, and as he passed along the western end he noticed that the gates were open and that a large iron ship with painted ports was hauling in.

"It's the Caribbean," said Jack Hammers, recognizing her lines. "I must go aboard and see Munro."

Walking around the dock edge he sprang aboard. Without ceremony, he passed into the saloon and banged upon the Captain's stateroom door.

"Come in!" roared a sea-born voice.

Jack Hammers turned the knob and confronted a short, red-faced man, striving, with closed eyes and clenched teeth, to button a stick-up collar around his neck.

"Hello, Hammers, old man," he exclaimed, shaking hands heartily. "Glad to see you alive, anyway. D'ye know, that lubberly pilot told us you were given up for lost. What was the matter—engines break down?"

"I don't know what was the matter, Munro; I wasn't in her this trip, and I'm precious glad. She hasn't turned up yet."

"The deuce you weren't! Where did you leave her?"

"In Boston."

"What in blazes for?"

"Oh, it's a long story, Munro. Where are you from?"

"I've been in luck, Hammers. Took a general cargo out to Quebec, and was lucky enough to get a load of lumber back again; and, d'ye know, Hammers, we sighted the Doric on the run home? Odd, wasn't it?"

"Ay, it was. Where was it?"

"I think we were three or four days out from the St. Lawrence when we saw her. We were on the southerly tack, and she crossed our stern, going very slowly, I thought, and heading well to the no'th'ard. We spoke about it at the time."

"Did you signal?" asked Jack Hammers.

"We hoisted our name, because we wanted to be reported; but I guess the flags got to leeward of the spanker—anyhow, she didn't answer. There, I'm ready now. Come on, old man!"

As they stepped through the cabin alleyway the visitor suddenly stopped.

"Say, Munro," he said, "let's look at your log-book. I'd like to see what position you were in when you sighted the Doric."

"All right," said the amiable little skipper. "Come into the Mate's room."

Rapidly turning the leaves of the journal backward, he rested at the page dated May 21 and ran his fat forefinger along the lines to the "Remarks" column.

"There you are," he said. "'Six A. M., sighted the steamship Doric of the Western Line. Sent up code signal but got no reply. Wind increasing in force steadily. Took in foretopgallant sail, etc., etc.' Let me see. By dead reckoning we were in latitude 50° 12' N. and longitude 42° 42' W."

"Are you sure that's right?" questioned Jack Hammers, as he peered excitedly over the Captain's shoulder. "Yes," he continued, "I see it is. By thunder, Munro, this beats——"

"What d'ye mean, Hammers?"

"First," said Jack Hammers, "I'd like you to tell me how you knew it was the Doric you passed that morning?"

"How did I know her, man? Why, I was in Belfast when she and her sister ship, the Gothic, were launched! I knew her by her rig, her funnels, and her coffin-shaped stern. And, besides, I knew from the papers, when I was in Quebec, that she was to sail from Boston on the nineteenth. The Gothic was the only ship I could possibly have mistaken her for, and she was in Liverpool."

"All right, then," said Jack Hammers. "Now I'll go ahead." And, beginning with his outward-bound passage, he gave a detailed account of all that had happened.

"You see, Munro," he remarked in concluding, "there is a chain of suspicious incidents running right through the affair. Number one"—he was checking them off on his fingers—"is the discharge of the majority of the crew in Boston without any just cause. Number two is the strange conduct of Sharpley in disguising himself as a fireman and taking money from a fishy looking 'Dago.' Three is his shipping a crew of foreigners. Four is his taking in coal, when I'm pretty sure he didn't need it to reach Liverpool. Five is his lying letters to the owners, and six is the astonishing fact that you sighted the Doric away to the no'th'ard of the course, bending still farther north, and five hundred miles beyond the spot where her boat was picked up by the Anglia.

"I tell you what, Captain," he continued, raising his voice, "I believe the Doric has been stolen!"

"Oh, rot!" said the Captain. "Who ever heard of such a thing in these days? Come have some dinner and you'll feel better."

In spite of his friend's ridicule, however, Jack Hammers persisted in his belief. He sat up late that night thinking, and poring over a chart of the North Atlantic. In the morning he took the chart, himself and a theory to the office of the Atlantic Marine Insurance Company.

Half an hour after Jack Hammers passed through the green baize doors of the inner office, a boy with a handful of telegrams rushed out of the building. At two o'clock Sir George Aspinwall, the President, and as many of the Directors as could be present, held a special meeting behind closed doors.

After relating the peculiar circumstances in connection with the disappearance of the Doric, Jack Hammers ended by giving his theory of it. "My belief, gentlemen," he said, "is that Captain Sharpley, the Chief Engineer, the Second Mate and some wealthy Cuban or Cubans deliberately formed a conspiracy to seize the Doric and sell her, cargo and all, to the Cuban insurgents. They bought extra coal, as we know, and doubtless a printing press as well. Then Sharpley covered his track by making false reports to the owners, shipped a crew of New York Cubans, supporters of the rebel cause, and on the regular sailing day cleared the port.

"Instead of making a course for Liverpool, he steers to the northward and slings a smashed boat over the side as soon as he sights ice. He answers no signals, because he does not want to be reported. He steers slowly to save coal. Away up in the Arctic, out of the track of vessels, he banks his fires and sets to work making the vessel look as unlike the Doric as possible; paints her a different color, of course; changes her name, and perhaps her entire deck plan. In the meantime he prints all the ship's documents he wants and forges the necessary signatures. To alter her sufficiently, I reckon he would have to remain in the Arctic about two months; and that, gentlemen, in my humble opinion, is where the Doric is to-day."

"How do you propose to capture her, then, Mr. Hammers?" asked the President.

"If my theory is right, sir," replied Jack Hammers, "and she is bound for Cuba, there are a hundred chances to one that she will go through the Windward Passage. My idea would be to intercept her there by a small steamer rigged as a gunboat."

At four o'clock that same afternoon Sir George and Jack Hammers were in the Birkenhead Float inspecting a small but powerful-looking steamer which lay with a broom lashed to her masthead, announcing that she was for sale.

"Just the thing, sir," said Jack Hammers. "Plenty of beam, you see, sir, and a good solid look about her. Rig her square on the fore, give her a coat of black paint, a cream-colored funnel and a few 'jimmy fixings' and she'll make as smart a looking gunboat as any of 'em."

"Very good, Mr. Hammers," said Sir George; "and—what about—ah—crew?"

"Twenty-five smart hands in addition to the firemen and engineers will be plenty, sir—plenty. Of course, they must be supplied with naval uniforms."

"And—ah—guns, Mr. Hammers?"

"Two dummies, and one for the bow that will bark, Sir George. Revolvers will be all the small arms necessary."

Forty-eight hours later the little steamer picked her way through the gates of the Float and passed into the river. Down through that crowded thoroughfare she sped at a lively rate—out past the New Brighton Pier, the bar and northwest lightships; out into the cleaner waters of the bay, until the twinkling sunset lights of the anchored fleet astern went out and the flash of the Skerries on the bow illumined her path to the sea.

On the ninth day out a permanent lookout was established on the fore crosstrees and the night lookout doubled. The men were ordered to report everything on the horizon.

"IT'S THE CARIBBEAN," SAID JACK HAMMERS, RECOGNIZING HER LINES. "I MUST GO ABOARD AND SEE MUNRO"

Swift's Home Calendar

"Spring"
Reduced from Swift's Home Calendar

The Calendar is in the form of a screen, its exact size being 10 x 25½ inches.

Swift's Silver Leaf Lard—Absolutely pure and wholesome. Grateful housekeepers have learned that they can depend on its invariable quality.

"Summer"
Reduced from Swift's Home Calendar

Four circular panels are joined together by decorative scrolls, with the calendar pages underneath.

Swift's Premium Bacon — Attractive and dainty in appearance—crisp and appetizing when served.

"Autumn"
Reduced from Swift's Home Calendar

In each of the panels is an ideal head, typifying one of the four seasons. These were painted by Percy Morgan, the great water colorist.

Swift's Premium Hams — Cooked in any manner, are always delicious.

"Winter"
Reduced from Swift's Home Calendar

The calendar is lithographed in twelve colors and gold, and the work is so well done that the pictures are absolutely like the original paintings.

Swift's Home Calendar will be sent to any address for 10 cents. Stamps or money accepted. Address Dept. L.

Swift and Company
Chicago

Digitized by Google

Every steamer bound in the same direction was examined carefully through the glasses of Captain Hammers and his vigilant officers, and, if necessary, chased until her identity was known. With the morning of the twelfth day came the rousing cry of "Land, ho!" from the masthead. All hands clustered on the forecastle head to watch what appeared to be a small blue cloud rising out of the sea. It was Watling Island, in the Bahamas, a favorite place for mariners to take their bearings before passing through the Windward Passage into the Caribbean Sea.

No sooner was Captain Hammers sure of his position than he at once altered the course and bore away to the northwest. Then, turning about, he swept back in a wide semicircle to Watling Island, and thus continued to patrol the entrance to the Passage.

This somewhat monotonous routine went on for a fortnight. Captain Hammers began to show signs of impatience and anxiety. What if his theory should prove wrong?

On the morning of the fifteenth day, however, he was startled by a hail from aloft.

"Steamer on the starboard bow, sir!"

❧

For some time nothing of the reported vessel could be seen from the bridge; then a low bank of smoke became visible, later her masts and funnel, and lastly her hull.

"Two sticks and one smokestack—that's not her," said the Mate disappointedly. "Should have two funnels and four masts; shouldn't she, sir?"

"She had when I left her, Mr. Suggitt," answered the Captain, with his eyes still glued to his glasses. "I see there's no white band around her smokestack, and that she's painted lead color," he continued. "All that could be easily fixed, though. But her hull's big enough. Alter the course so as to run alongside of her, Suggitt. Confound it! If she wasn't coming head on I could tell something about her.

"I think, as a matter of precaution, Mr. Suggitt," he said, facing the chief officer, "you had better call all hands, clear away that gun for'ard and hoist the colors. Also run up the signal, 'What ship is that?'"

The Boatswain piped "All hands" in true man-of-war fashion, and in a remarkably short space of time the deck was alive with bluejackets. A string of code flags broke from her fore gaff, and the folds of the white ensign floated gracefully astern.

❧

On came the big steamer, rolling lazily on the heavy easterly swell and emitting volumes of dense black smoke.

"What do you make of her now, sir?" asked the chief officer, springing up the steps of the bridge.

"Nothing," replied the Captain shortly. "And she doesn't answer our signal, either. We'll give her no excuse for that, though."

In quick succession the telegraph in the engine-room rang out, "Stand by!" "Slow!" "Stop her!" And in a few minutes the little steamer lay broadside on, in the direct course of the vessel coming from the northward.

"I fancy she can see our bunting now. Ah! There goes her signal! 'R. C. Q.' Quick with that code, Suggitt!"

"No such signal in the book, sir," said the Mate, running his finger up and down one of the pages.

"It's a bluff, then, by thunder!" said Jack Hammers excitedly. "Run up, 'Heave to; I want to speak you.'"

As the new lot of flags went jerkily aloft, the big steamer, now but a mile or so away, swerved suddenly so as to avoid running the smaller one down. The Captain's eyes followed her sharply until she exposed her side and quarter.

"At last!" he shouted. "The Doric!"

DRAWN BY FLETCHER C. RANSOM

IMMEDIATELY HE WAS HANDCUFFED AND CARRIED INTO ONE OF THE STATEROOMS

The next moment he was thundering orders from the bridge.

As the little steamer slowly gathered way, and spun around in a semicircle toward her quarry, a second signal was run up aboard her. "'Cannot understand your signal,'" read the Mate.

"Then we'll give her something that she can understand," said the Captain savagely. "For'ard, there! Ready with that gun!"

"Ay, ay, sir!" answered the Second Mate.

"Then fire!" yelled the Captain.

There was a flash forward, a dull roar, and a well-aimed shot flew screaming over the funnel of the big steamer.

❧

When the smoke had cleared away it was seen that she was slowing down.

"Now, Suggitt," said Jack Hammers, as they steamed up to get within hailing distance. "I'll go below while you do the talking."

As they ranged alongside a sullen crowd of dark-skinned men could be seen leaning over the rail. On the bridge stood a group of officers closely watching the little steamer.

"What ship is that?" bellowed Mr. Suggitt.

"The Loch Lomond, of Liverpool, bound for Colon. Who are you?" came back in the blustering tones of Captain Sharpley.

"Her Majesty's ship Defense," replied Mr. Suggitt. "Why didn't you answer our signal?"

"Our code book's partially destroyed."

"How is it we don't find your name in the book?"

"She's a new ship, only launched this year."

"Well," said Mr. Suggitt, as if he were almost satisfied, "send your Captain aboard with the ship's papers. If they are all right you can proceed."

After some delay a small boat was lowered from the davits of the Loch Lomond, and her Captain, with four hands, pulled off to the little steamer.

❧

In the clean-shaven man who stepped over the rail there was little resemblance to Captain Sharpley of the Doric, but when he spoke all doubt as to his identity vanished. He tendered the papers with an injured air.

"Ah!" said Mr. Suggitt, glancing over the ship's register, "I see you are both Captain and owner, Mr. Watterson, and, by the way, we shall need the signatures of your officers, too. Perhaps you will be good enough to send your boat for them. The First and Second Mates and the Chief Engineer will be sufficient."

"Is this necessary?" said the Captain of the Loch Lomond, looking suspiciously into Mr. Suggitt's face.

"Quite necessary, sir," responded that worthy curtly. "Rule of the service which must be carried out."

❧

Seeing that Mr. Suggitt was firm, Captain Watterson gave his men the order and followed the chief officer into the saloon. At the table sat Captain Jack Hammers, looking very brave in his second-hand naval uniform.

"How d'ye do, Captain Sharpley?" he said, standing up and smiling.

The Captain of the Loch Lomond started as though he had been shot.

"What is this?" he murmured hoarsely; "a trick?" Then, quick as a flash, he whipped a revolver from his pocket and leveled it at Jack Hammers; but before he could fire it was knocked spinning out of his hand by some one behind him, and the next instant a crashing blow from Mr. Suggitt's ponderous fist felled him senseless. Immediately he was handcuffed and carried into one of the staterooms.

Twenty minutes later the three officers were ushered into the saloon. This time there was no ceremony; they were promptly seized and pinioned, and the same fate was shared by the boat's crew.

Three days later the owners of the Doric were startled by the following cablegram:

"KINGSTON, JAMAICA.

"Doric safe. Await orders.

"HAMMERS."

They replied immediately, telling him to bring her home, which, after delivering his sixty-two prisoners to the police authorities, and shipping a new crew, he did.

Of course the Western Line, and not the Atlantic Marine Insurance Company, paid for the expedition of H. M. S. Defense, and Jack Hammers received a handsome reward and the command of the Doric for his trouble.

Send Us Your Address and we will mail FREE our booklet about

ROYAL DUTCH COFFEE

It is the highest grade coffee grown and the only coffee that can be drunk by anybody without injurious effect, and is safe for the most delicate stomach. The of roasting, which we control, thoroughly refines Royal Dutch and extracts the tannic acid, which is the direct cause of the harmful effect of coffee drinking. With all the badness removed and all the goodness retained Royal Dutch has no superior either for flavor, aroma, smoothness or general quality. Insist on getting it at your grocer's.

Beach Process

(PATENTED)

Our free booklet tells an interesting story. It will do you good to read it.

WALTER McEWAN, Albany, N.Y., U.S.A.

Importer and Roaster of High-Grade Coffees

Automatic Go-Cart

Baby not compelled to sit up as in other Go-carts

Entirely new patented invention. A slight touch of the foot changes it from upright to reclining position; as comfortable as a cradle. Perfectly safe. $5 to $25.

This go-cart positively overcomes the following objections urged against other go-carts:

The child is forced to take an upright sitting position and cannot be down in the ordinary Go-cart. Therefore during its entire outing baby is compelled to assume a fatiguing position, and to depend upon unskilled muscles for support at a time of life when the back easily becomes tired.

We are builders of Baby Carriages, Invalid and Reclining Chairs. Write for catalogue.

If your dealer won't supply our Automatic Go-Cart, we will ship direct from factory.

Philadelphia Baby Carriage Factory

713 and 715 Spring Garden St., Philadelphia

LONG WINTER EVENINGS

when the family is gathered 'round the fireside, the exquisite quality of tone and the delightful music of the delights them all. It is the most perfect instrument ever offered for the money. Very durable. Beautifully finished. Inexpensive and instructive. Anybody can play it without a teacher from the chart fitting under the strings.

Columbia Zither

No. 3 (here illustrated), $6.00
Others from $4.00 to $8.00

If your music dealer hasn't the Columbia Zither, we will send you one C. O. D., or express paid on receipt of price. 500 Extra tunes at 5c. each. Catalogue free.

THE PHONOHARP CO.

Dept. F. 150 Liverpool St., East Boston, Mass.

are perfect in action. Over 40 years' experience guides the manufacture. Get the improved. No tacks required. To avoid imitations, notice script name of Stewart Hartshorn on label.

EUROPE PARIS

SPRING—To Naples, Rome and Northward to SUMMER—To Norway, Sweden, Russia and Southward to , , ,

TWELFTH TOUR. FIRST-CLASS. CIRCULARS READY.

WM. T. SHEPHERD, - 578 Boylston St., Boston

MUSIC & FUN

Flow from our Musical Cannon and Musical Pipe. Any child can play them. Send 12 cents for one, or 24 cents for both, by mail.

National Mailphone Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

DON'T SET HENS THE SAME OLD WAY.

THE NAT'L HEN INCUBATOR has old plan Beat. Little to pay but big money in it. Agts. wanted. Send for cat. telling how to get one free.

National Hen Incubator Co., B 28, Columbus, Neb.

Rev. H. Keuer made a 500 Egg Incubator cost $7.50

Digitized by Google

The Game of CURLING

By Joseph E. G. Ryan

CURLING, the national game of Scotland, promises to become equally as popular a winter amusement in the United States as its sister sport, golf, the royal and ancient pastime, is in summer.

The origin of the game is shrouded in the same cloud of uncertainty that encompasses the birth of golf. Many persons claim that the game originated in the Low Countries; but though dating from a distant era, there is no tangible evidence in Flanders to-day that the game ever existed there. Golf is also said to have first been played in Holland; but it certainly remained for the Caledonians to develop both games, and it is not improbable that both alike had their origin in Scotland.

Tradition is responsible for the statement that James IV, who was killed at Flodden Field in 1531, was an enthusiastic curler, and presented a silver curling-stone to the parishes in the Carse o' Gowrie for annual competition. It is known that curling was played at that time in Scotland, for about fifty years ago a curling-stone bearing the date 1551 was found in a pond near Dunblane, and since then stones of divers later dates have been recovered.

PHOTO BY J. W. TAYLOR, CHICAGO

CURLING IN WASHINGTON PARK

THE MODERN HISTORY OF THE GAME

A game similar to curling is known to-day in Holland as calluiten and in Germany as eisknegeln. The name curling is applied to the game on account of the "English," or twist, given to the stone in delivery.

In the early part of the present century curling was first played in America at Montreal, but it was not until 1867 that the organization known as the Grand National Curling Club of America was formed. David Foulis, of 260 West One-Hundred-and-Fifteenth Street, New York, is the secretary.

In 1865, on Lake Erie, near Buffalo, the first international bonspiel in America was played. Bonspiels are matches between curling clubs, but the term is more particularly applied to the annual championship meeting of the different curling associations. Twenty-three rinks representing the United States opposed the Canadians, who won the contest. Nearly all the matches with Canada since that year have been played at Toronto.

Chicago is the most important centre of the game in the West, although Milwaukee is famous in curling annals for the high-class players sent to the annual bonspiels of the Northwestern Curling Association.

Curling is a very inexpensive game, and may be played on any sheet of smooth ice having the required dimensions. The rink is prepared by first allowing the desired sheet of water to freeze. The surface of the ice is then carefully scraped and additional water run over it. This in turn freezes and is scraped until several layers are frozen, the desired thickness is secured, and the final surface of the necessary smoothness. The number of contestants should be limited to four players on a side, including a "skip." The "skip" is the Captain of the team and the absolute ruler of the rink. He is also supposed to be the best player, and directs the work of his side when the stones are in a position to demand scientific work.

The object of the game is to slide the curling-stone as near as possible to the "tee" at the opposite end of the rink from where the player delivers it.

The curling-stone, which originally had finger-holes on top like ten-pin balls, and a polished bottom, is generally of granite imported from Scotland. It is spherical in form. The modern stone is provided with a handle for throwing, on the upper side, and is finely polished on the lower side, so as to run smoothly and not cut the ice. The weight is from thirty-three to fifty pounds.

The rink is laid out on the specially prepared ice, about fifty yards long and seven yards wide. "Tees" are laid out at opposite ends of the rink, thirty-eight yards from centre to centre. Around the "tee," circles fourteen feet in diameter are outlined on the ice, and two smaller rings are drawn inside in order to make the measurement of distance from the centre easier.

The "head" or "end" of the rink resembles a target placed horizontally, the tee representing the bull's-eye and the rings the distances from it. Twelve feet behind each "tee" is the line at which the player stands. A "hack" is cut in the ice here, in which the player inserts his foot to keep from slipping when driving the stone. This makes the whole playing distance forty-two yards.

The "hog" score is seven yards in front of each "tee," and is indicated by a line. If any stone fails to slide over this line it is called a "hog" and is removed.

WHEREIN CURLING IS LIKE CROKINOLE

The stone is slightly elevated at the start of the delivery and slides toward the opposite "tee." The next player endeavors to get as near the "tee" as possible with his shot and at the same time knock away his opponent's stone. As the game is decided in favor of the side having the greater number of stones nearest the "tee" at the finish, the excitement is naturally at its height when there are several stones played. Each player tries to guard his own side from being knocked out, besides using his endeavors to drive his opponent's stone away from the "tee." This leads to a scientific feature of the game known as "guarding."

The term "inwick" is used when a stone strikes the inside of another and glides toward the "tee," and the opposite movement is called the "outwick." When a stone is on or near the "tee" the object of the side to whom the stone belongs is to place their stones so as to guard it from attacks by their opponents.

After the various stones have been played, their distances from the "tee" are measured and the scores determined, and then play begins toward the opposite "tee" in the same order. The game usually goes to the side scoring the most shots in 16 or 21 "ends."

The fine points of the game are: drawing to the "tee," then "guarding," subsequently removing the guard; hitting the winning stone direct, so as to knock it out; "inwicking" and "outwicking." Drawing requires the most scientific calculation, as where it is often impracticable to remove the winning stone by a direct shot, owing to full guarding, it is often possible to gain the desired advantage by drawing.

A MILWAUKEE RINK (1898)

PHOTO BY STEIN, MILWAUKEE

Dr. J. S. Batchelor W. S. Brockway
F. W. Lorenz John Johnston, "Skip."

A DEEP-ROOTED SUPERSTITION

The broom is a very important adjunct to the game, and is used to sweep the surface of the ice, which is supposed to be perfectly smooth. To a spectator this action seems ludicrous, but the curlers maintain that it polishes the ice and "coaxes the stane alang." When the stone reaches a point where there seems to be an absence of power, the players apply their brooms as energetically as if their existence depended on their exertions in reply to the injunction of the "skip" to "soop her oop."

In the past few years curling has become the winter sport of many of the golfing organizations. At Wheaton, near Chicago, where the amateur golf championship was held in 1897, several rinks have been in use for the past few years, and such well-known golfers as former amateur champion Charles B. Macdonald and D. R. Forgan, the Western champion, and a host of other less prominent players, are among the most enthusiastic curlers. The rinks are inclosed, electrically lighted, and elaborately fitted up. The Washington Park golfers also fit up a series of rinks annually, under the race-track stand, and in many other Western golf clubs rinks are regarded as a necessary winter adjunct.

A NEW APPENDIX TO THE DICTIONARY

Like golf, curling has a language of its own, although similar terms are used in both games, but applied differently. For instance, the "tee" is the starting-point in golf, while in curling it denotes the goal or finishing-point. The expressions "up" and "down" are similarly applied in both games to express the margin of victory or defeat. A curling contest of the regulation number of "ends" or innings takes the same time to play as an eighteen-hole golf match—generally three hours. To appreciate curling it must be played, for, like golf, it is devoid of spectacular features.

As in golf, the game may be played by persons of all ages. It is really surprising to see elderly players shout and work their brooms until perspiration rolls from their faces in a temperature usually below zero.

DIAGRAM TO BE DRAWN ON THE ICE PREVIOUS TO PLAYING, AND REFERRED TO THROUGHOUT THE RULES AS THE RINK

WHAT WILL THE HARVEST BE?

This need never be asked if you plant Peter Henderson & Co.'s seeds, as they are the acknowledged standard of excellence in both hemispheres. Our 1900 Catalogue of

Everything for the Garden

is a 190-page book, 9x11 inches, containing over 700 engravings and 6 superb colored plates of Seeds and Plants—a perfect mine of information on garden topics.

To trace advertising, and give our Catalogue the largest possible distribution, we make the following unusually liberal offer:

Every Empty Envelope Counts as Cash

To every one who will state where this advertisement was seen, and who incloses us 10 Cents (in stamps), we will mail the Catalogue, and also send, free of charge, our famous 50-cent "Harvest" Collection of seeds, containing one packet each of New Large-flowering Sweet Peas, New Giant Pansy, New Giant Comet Asters, White Plume Celery, French Breakfast Radish and New Freedom Tomato, in a red envelope, which when emptied and returned will be accepted as a 25-cent cash payment on any order of goods selected from Catalogue to the amount of $1.00 and upward.

PETER HENDERSON & CO
35 & 37 CORTLANDT ST NEW YORK

"YOU CAN HARDLY MISS IT IF YOU GO VIA THE QUEEN & CRESCENT"

A Southern trip is an ideal trip when it's taken on fast, luxurious trains. That's the kind they have on the Q. & C. and Southern Ry. And over a track that is absolutely SUPERB.

Cincinnati & Florida Limited was sold to Jacksonville. Send 2-cent stamp for book on Cuba and Puerto Rico. W. C. Rinearson, G. P. A., Cincinnati, Ohio

The Lloyd Muffler

Cotton, 25 cts.; Worsted, 50 cts.

Made in colors—White, Blue, Black and Garnet. A perfect protection for the throat and chest against the wind and cold. For Men, Women, Boys or Girls. Easily put on and taken off; fastens in back with clasp. Ask your dealer for them or mail us price—we will send on approval.

STRATFORD KNITTING MILLS
510 Cherry Street, - Philadelphia

The "CHID" A Crackless Cuff

They are new, possibly not yet in the hands of your dealer; if not, we will supply you direct on receipt of price, 25c. the Pair

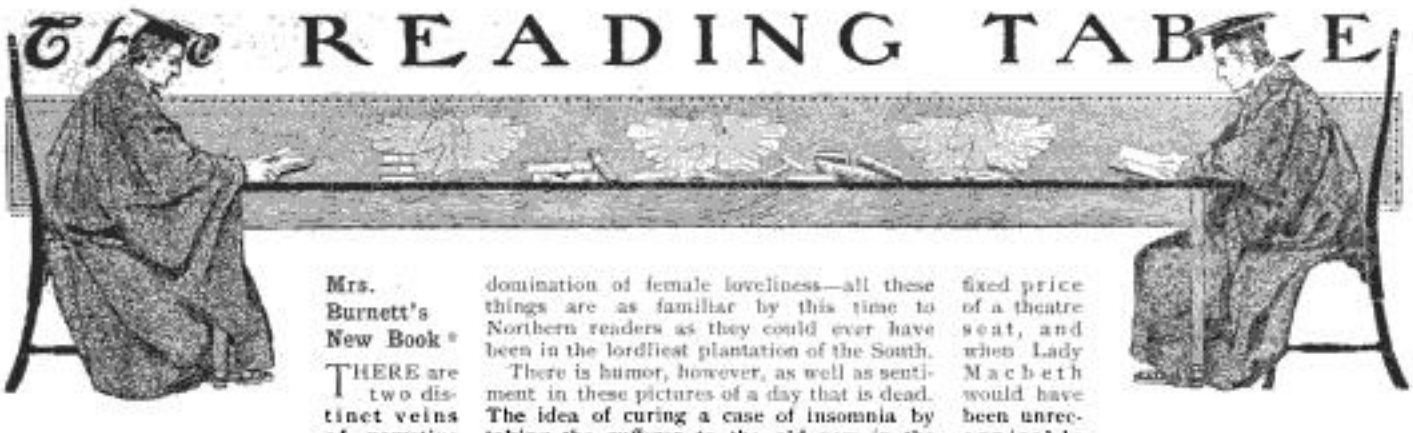
CHID CUFF COMPANY, Lippincott Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

An Open Fireplace and a hardwood mantel mean comfort, beauty and health at home. Write for illustrated catalogue.
ALCOTT, ROSS & SCULLY CO.
2026 North Broad Street, Philadelphia



Why Not Get Up a Play?

Descriptive Catalogue sent for the asking

WE CAN FURNISH ANY TITLE THAT IS IN PRINT
THE PENN PUBLISHING CO., 923 Arch St., Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

The READING TABLE

Mrs. Burnett's New Book*

THERE are two distinct veins of narrative running through Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's last novel, In Connection with the De Willoughby Claim. One of them is lively and sentimental, the other what newspaper reporters term "unpleasant"; and when they meet and mingle the bad tarnishes the good. The first part of the novel tells how Tom de Willoughby, a big, lazy, warm-hearted young man, too lumbering for his Tennessee home and his aristocratic kindred, goes to a North Carolina village and vegetates there as storekeeper and postmaster. In addition to these easy duties, he adopts a girl baby when she is two hours old, and brings her up with such help as his neighbors and a neatly bound Advice to Young Mothers can afford him. Felicia is to be her name; but, as Mrs. Doty truly remarks, "Now thar's Vangerline 'n' Clementine 'n' Everlyne that'd ha' bin showier than Flishyer"; and in the end the country people settle the matter in their own way by calling her Sheba, as a compliment to the ornate character of her baby clothes.

Only the appointed heroine of fiction can grow up in a mountain village without the smallest taint of rusticity. Only in fiction can the villagers talk in dialect and the heroine in purest English. But this is one of the lovable things which differentiates the novel from real life, and to which no right-minded reader should object. So when good Tom de Willoughby wins his claim and becomes enormously rich, and little Sheba marries her handsome cousin, we are willing to believe that she "looked like a young angel," and behaved like one, too, having been a really nice child from the start.

As for the other portion of the story, it is simply unpardonable, not for what it has to tell, but because of the strained and sickly sentiment which pervades it. There has been a great deal of this kind of sentiment in recent fiction, and it is time we put it aside, drew a breath of pure air, looked the facts of life in the face, and realized that to a woman as well as to a man is given the choice between good and evil. Her moral downfall is not an accident to be simply pitied; it is a crime to be condemned.

Some New Southern Stories†

THE arrogance which started the ill-fated Tower of Babel on its skyward progress was never so severely punished as in the modern dialect story; and that we suffer for the sins of our very far-away ancestors does not make the infliction any easier to bear. Mr. Edwards' volume, His Defense and Other Stories, is a pleasant, readable book, save where the negro dialect in all its purity offers an insuperable obstacle to the understanding. The tales have that old-fashioned sentimental flavor of which people seldom tire, and which is distinctly emphasized by their Southern setting. Favorite sisters who marry their music-masters, and from their death-beds send back youthful daughters to be idolized in the old home; faithful servants of the ante-bellum type; swift duels following a word of insult, and the general domination of female loveliness—all these things are as familiar by this time to Northern readers as they could ever have been in the lordliest plantation of the South.

There is humor, however, as well as sentiment in these pictures of a day that is dead. The idea of curing a case of insomnia by taking the sufferer to the old pew in the Presbyterian Church where he fell asleep every Sunday when he was a little boy, and playing over and over again upon the organ the monotonous and once well-known airs until the habits of infancy reasserted themselves, is at least novel and ingenious. There is also an admirable situation in Mas' Craffud's Freedom, where the harassed planter explains to his newly emancipated slaves that, if they are at liberty, so is he, and that they must look out for themselves; whereupon they wish to know "how dey goin' ter git somep'n ter eat"—a view of the situation which was slow to present itself to any one, even to the philanthropists.

The Memoirs of Mrs. John Drew*

WITH little art, but in a charming spirit of affectionate simplicity, Mrs. John Drew—well known to and well beloved by the older playgoers—wrote shortly before her death a brief sketch of her dramatic career, a career which extended practically over the whole period of her life. These reminiscences, illustrated with interesting and amusing old portraits, should delight the hearts of readers who remember the placid days when realism and historic accuracy had yet to be invented, when a dollar was the fixed price of a theatre seat, and when Lady Macbeth would have been unrecognizable had she not worn her regulation costume of black velvet, point lace and imitation pearls.

Mrs. Drew began her stage life at the exceedingly tender age of twelve months, being then carried on the boards to enact the simple and appropriate rôle of a "crying baby." Her début was a failure. Cry she would not. On the contrary, the lights and the audience so tickled her infant fancy that she crowed aloud for joy, expressing even then the "acute pleasure" in her profession which never failed her during the long, hard years to come. She was given childish parts as soon as she could walk and talk, and was a veteran and deeply experienced actress by the time she came to the United States, being then full nine years of age. Here she was accorded the honor of playing the little Duke of York to the elder Booth's Richard the Third, and Albert to Forrest's William Tell; besides which legitimate performances she figured as a sort of "infant phenomenon," amusing sober playgoers by her antics as Little Pickle, and by appearing in five different characters in a foolish play called Twelve Precisely.

Hard work this for a child's feeble strength; but needs were pressing, and pay was poor. There was no lingering in the race, and before Miss Lane was nineteen she had acted every conceivable part, from cheerful chambermaids to Lady Macbeth; had sung as Cinderella and Rosina; had danced the "second Bayadere" in Madame Celeste's company; had married her first husband; had been stranded more than once in the swift wrecking of dramatic ventures; and had accepted joyously and gratefully an engagement as leading lady at the Walnut Street Theatre, with the munificent salary of twenty dollars a week. There is nothing dazzling in this plain history of an honorable and successful life; but it is jocund reading nevertheless, being the record of a woman who did as well as in her lay the work she loved to do.

OF MODERN BOOKS

A Pantoum

By Carolyn Wells

OF MAKING many books there is no end,
Though myriads have to deep oblivion gone;
Each day new manuscripts are being penned,
And still the ceaseless tide of ink flows on.

Though myriads have to deep oblivion gone
New volumes daily issue from the press;
And still the ceaseless tide of ink flows on—
The prospect is disheartening, I confess.

New volumes daily issue from the press;
My pile of unread books I view aghast.
The prospect is disheartening, I confess;
Why will these modern authors write so fast?

My pile of unread books I view aghast—
Of course I must keep fairly up to date—
Why will these modern authors write so fast?
They seem to get ahead of me of late.

Of course I must keep fairly up to date;
The books of special merit I must read;
They seem to get ahead of me of late,
Although I skim them very fast, indeed.

The books of special merit I must read;
And then the magazines come round again;
Although I skim them very fast, indeed,
I can't get through with more than eight or ten.

And then the magazines come round again!
How can we stem this tide of printer's ink?
I can't get through with more than eight or ten—
It is appalling when I stop to think.

How can we stem this tide of printer's ink?
Of making many books there is no end.
It is appalling when I stop to think
Each day new manuscripts are being penned!

Holly and Pizen*

MRS. RUTH McENERY STUART'S little volume of stories, Holly and Pizen, is much too short to satisfy her many readers. There are but five tales instead of the dozen and more which Christmas should have brought us from her pen. All five are good, but by far the best, a very paragon of stories, humorous, tragic, homely and strikingly original, is the Queen o' Sheba's Triumph. Any one who knows the unctuous delight which the negro, like the Celt, takes in a funeral, and in all that appertains thereto, will appreciate the ease with which a poor mulatto dish-washer in a Harlem boarding-house suffers herself to be persuaded by the agent of the Afro-American Funeral Insurance Company to mortgage her slender income, and keep herself on the very verge of destitution, that she may be buried with all the pomp and panoply of woe.

"A white cashmere shroud—an' a cherry-wood coffin—wid silver handles—dicorated wid flowers—an' six veiled mo'ners—an' a fun'al oration—an' de dead-march—an' a plumed hearse—an' fo' ca'iages"—what wonder that Sheba, pausing at the kitchen sink to enumerate these post-mortem splendors,

---

*In Connection with the De Willoughby Claim. By Frances Hodgson Burnett. Charles Scribner's Sons.

†His Defense and Other Stories. By Henry Stillwell Edwards. The Century Company.

*Mrs. John Drew's Reminiscences. Charles Scribner's Sons.

*Holly and Pizen. By Ruth McEnery Stuart. The Century Company.

AT EVERY BOOKSTORE IN AMERICA

WHEN KNIGHTHOOD WAS IN FLOWER

The Book of the Year

A new edition—new plates, new paper, new binding, and a portrait of the author—is now ready.

Illustrated. Price, $1.50.

THE BOWEN-MERRILL COMPANY
Indianapolis, U. S. A., Publishers

An Instant Success

THE BLACK WOLF'S BREED

A powerful story of adventure in Louisiana and France of Louis XIV.

Stirring situations are presented with burly, full-blooded recklessness. Pictures by Relyea. Cloth, $1.50.

AT EVERY BOOKSTORE IN AMERICA

THE ANGLE-LAMP

No Single Thing about a house causes so much concern as the light. In its production or proper use there is always cause for complaint. The Angle Lamp has solved this problem. It never smokes, smells or gives any trouble; it is lighted and extinguished as easily as gas; it saves its entire cost in a short time as it uses but eighteen cents' worth of ordinary oil a month, and this while giving a light more brilliant than gas or electricity. The feature, "Non-Smoke-Shades," allows you, when it is inexpedient, to let lessons fall the light falling directly downward, just where needed. Thousands are in use in homes, stores, offices, churches, halls, factories, etc., and we have hundreds upon hundreds of letters containing enthusiastic praise. If you are tired of the old kind of lamp, with its dirt and trouble, and do not wish to incur the expense of gas and electricity, send for our Catalogue E, showing all styles from $1.50 up.

THE ANGLE LAMP CO.
256 PARK PLACE — NEW YORK

THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS

"Perfect" Scrap Book

Library Edition, $5
College " $2
Business " $1

Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price.

All editions 9½x11½ inches. 50 pages, self-indexing. Sample edition, containing 32 full-size pockets, paged cover, postpaid, for 10c.

THE PERFECT SCRAP BOOK COMPANY
Dept. "E," 335 Broadway, New York

Increase Your Salary

E. H. Bracq, Editor.

Send 15 cents for 3 months' trial subscription to

"The Book-Keeper"

A handsome monthly magazine for Bookkeepers, Cashiers and Business Men. It will teach you Book-keeping, Shorthand, Penmanship, Law, Short Cuts, Corporation Accounting, Banking, Business Policies, Avoiding Arithmetic, Lightning Calculations, etc., $1.00 A YEAR.

The Book-Keeper Pub. Co., Ltd.
170 Buhl Block, Detroit, Mich.

Rent a LIBRARY

BEST AND LATEST BOOKS. THE POPULAR

TRAVELING LIBRARY PLAN

Successful Organizers, Solicitors and Salesmen wanted for Towns, Reading Clubs, Societies, Schools, etc. Very Pleasant, Highly Profitable. Guaranteed Salaries Paid Suitable Persons.

Write THE PARMELEE LIBRARY, 1853 Wabash Ave., Chicago

Gen. Andrew Lewis.

SO YOU STAMMER

Write at once for our new 200-page book, The Origin and Treatment of Stammering. The largest and most instructive book of its kind ever published. Sent free to any address for 6c. in stamps to cover postage. Ask also for a free sample copy of The Photo-Motor, a monthly paper exclusively for persons who stammer. Address

The Lewis School for Stammerers
110 Adelaide Street, Detroit, Mich.

Digitized by Google

should be on fire to die and make such gorgeousness her own. That her old plantation friends should ever witness this resplendent funeral is a stroke of good fortune beyond even Sheba's anticipation; but so it happens, and the consumptive, worn-out servant is carried to her grave in a blaze of glory, silver coffin-handles as promised, black-veiled mourners, artificial smilax, imitation palms, and an oration, necessarily somewhat impersonal, but burdened with all the impressive rhetoric that even such an audience could desire.

Of the other tales, A Note of Scarlet and Holly and Pizen, the story of an old negro doctor who cures his patients by transferring their diseases to himself—a form of treatment not likely to become popular with the faculty—are most excellent. But none equal the masterly Queen o' Sheba. Only Mrs. Stuart could have treated such a theme with that tender laughter which is born of sympathy and is more kind than tears.

The True William Penn *

IT IS Mr. Augustine Birrell who observes that all the time we can spare from making money we devote to hunting for truth, and he is apparently of the opinion that a great deal too much attention has been given to this particular kind of sport. Certain it is that if we have not yet grasped the truth our failure cannot be ascribed to any lack of instruction. Modern historians shrink sensitively from the most beguiling fiction; and biographers, like Mr. Paul Leicester Ford and Mr. Sydney George Fisher, actually christen their books The True George Washington, The True Benjamin Franklin, The True William Penn, lest we should be hopeful enough to doubt the uncompromising nature of their veracity.

Mr. Fisher's last volume, The True William Penn, is marked by the same integrity of purpose—an integrity liable to error—which characterized his earlier works. The author is not without sympathy for the Quakers, preferring them vastly to the Puritans because of their serene tolerance of other men's convictions. That he himself is no theologian is proven by some rash statements anent the early Christian Church, and the much calumniated Middle Ages—statements of the popular, easy-going order, which strenuous seekers after truth avoid as disproven. Neither does it seem necessary to burden a life of Penn with the most scandalous details that can be unearthed concerning the Court of Charles the Second. Even truth-telling does not necessitate the telling of all truths; and Court scandal, passing as it does from one foul tongue to another, is seldom unadulterated candor.

The best and most interesting portions of the book deal with the making of Pennsylvania and the founding of the City of Peace. This is ground which Mr. Fisher knows well, and about which his least word is of value. It is unfortunate that Penn's brief periods of residence in the Colony hardly permit his biographer to linger long amid such familiar scenes. The loyal service rendered by the courtly Quaker to James the Second—who had befriended him from youth—has always scandalized the "unco gude"; but Mr. Fisher is prompt to recognize the manifest injustice of such censure, and he shows how much good was effected by this curious alliance between the most despotic of the Stuarts and the most tolerant of Friends. It would have been easy for Penn to strike the note of high-minded discontent and win applause thereby; he deemed it better to use his influence in helping those who sorely needed help—in seeking out, as he says, a few "bleeding cases," and binding up the wounds. This course of action is never what the world calls heroic; the essential modesty of the attitude—which disavows all claim to censorship—silences applause. But it has at least the merit of doing some good, of easing some burdens, of making some hours of life more bearable for somebody.

—Agnes Repplier.

With Pike and Cutlass †

TO THE small and select band of artists who can write, of whom Howard Pyle, Frederick Remington and F. Hopkinson Smith are conspicuous examples, we may now add the name of Mr. George Gibbs. Indeed, after considering his book from a literary and pictorial standpoint, one hardly knows whether to call him an artist who writes or a writer who illustrates. It is not often that such a high level in both fields is attained and maintained as in this instance.

The book is aptly named, for though in later days the pike and cutlass have become obsolete weapons, superseded by the deadly "eight-inch" and the Hotchkiss rapid-firer, yet the spirit that made the archaic sword and lance potent for victory and slaughter is still with the man behind the gun. There are few records in the history of any nation, especially when the shortness of our period of existence is considered, which are so filled with glory as the history of the American Navy. It is a chronicle of almost unbroken success, and the few defeats which are to be noted are almost as heroic as the victories. It was the bitterest reverse of them all, the capture of the Chesapeake, that gave rise to what has ever been since then a watchword: "Don't give up the ship!"

From this galaxy of splendid feats of arms Mr. Gibbs with wise discrimination has chosen for his entertaining and useful book a number of the most brilliant exploits, some of them common and familiar in every school history, others no less interesting although comparatively unknown. Having so chosen, he has told them with all the dash and vigor and swing of a participant; the men live and move and have a being on his canvas and in his animated pages. We see again half-naked, pigtailed men, armed for battle, blowing their smoking matches, clustered about the rude breechings of the clumsy long guns or stumpy carronades of the past; and the same men manipulate with deadly accuracy the complicated mechanism of modern monsterpieces of ordnance. It takes the same kind of pluck to pass a weather earring on a topsail yardarm in a gale of wind as it does to be bottled up in the fire-room of a battleship in action. And Mr. Gibbs tells us all about these things. It is the same spirit which fights the Guerrière with those weapons, carries the Tripolitan gunboats in hand-to-hand conflict, sends the Gloucester dashing at the Spanish torpedo-boats, enables Decatur to blow up the Philadelphia, Cushing to destroy the Albemarle, lets Hobson try the deadly channel, rushes Farragut over the torpedoes, and permits Dewey and Sampson to break the Spanish power at Manila and Santiago.

All this and more you read in Mr. Gibbs' book; it is a volume to make Americans thrill with pride and pleasure. There is one chapter which is especially commended to the thoughtful. I know of few men who have the knowledge and ability to write so authoritatively of the Passing of the Old Navy. The old Navy has gone, but the old spirit is still in evidence, and one may read in Mr. Gibbs' pages that he himself, an old Annapolis boy and a descendant of the famous Admiral Paulding, partakes in large measure of the same spirit.

—Cyrus Townsend Brady.

* The True William Penn. By Sydney George Fisher. J. B. Lippincott Company.

† With Pike and Cutlass. By George Gibbs. J. B. Lippincott Company.

GLIMPSES OF NEW BOOKS

IN RISING FORTUNES, Mr. John Oxenham has hit upon a theme which is never without interest. He follows the beginnings of Adam Black, journalist, step by step to success and influence. The story of a well-won success is always healthy and active. G. W. Dillingham Company.

More like a play than a novel is Mr. Walter Raymond's A Tangled Web. It has the sharp lines of division and much of the condensation of the drama. Mr. Raymond knows his people—the countryfolk of the Western counties—well, and yet can be sparing in his handling of them. The main action of the play is not clogged or hidden by a superfluous crowd of onlookers, but moves with straightforward, quiet dignity to its logical climax. Doubleday & McClure Co.

The virile figure of St. Paul stands out strong and clear in all we hear of him and about him. Mr. George L. Weed has just added to the literature of the subject by a new Life of St. Paul for the Young. George W. Jacobs & Co.

GOSSIP OF AUTHORS

A Critic Criticised.—The owl-like wisdom of some critics was delightfully illustrated in the treatment of an able story of newspaper life, Taken by Siege, by Miss Jeanette Gilder, which first appeared anonymously. There is probably no woman in the country who is better acquainted with newspaper work than Miss Gilder. Her first story appeared in the New York Dispatch when she was fourteen; at seventeen she was a member of the staff of the Newark Advertiser. She was dramatic, musical and literary critic. She was later correspondent for the New York Tribune and the New York Herald, and for the last nineteen years she has been one of the editors of The Critic. Her novel made a favorable impression upon the press with one or two exceptions. One of these, a New York paper for which Miss Gilder had written for years, summed it up in a calm, patronizing style that must have made the author smile. It praised the general plan and construction of the story, but said that "it was evident that the author knew absolutely nothing of newspapers or newspaper people."

Literature in Rocks.—Miss Hay, daughter of the Secretary of State, has just finished a novel which deals with Washington society. Besides being a graceful poet she is also a lover of Nature study. A favorite summer pastime of hers is collecting odd minerals and fossils. Once when bringing home a lot of specimens she met a friend who commented upon her treasures:

"'Sermons in stones!' You'll get a big library if you keep on."

"I beg your pardon," was the response, "you are mistaken. I am looking for rhymes in rocks, and these are a few of the verses."

Maarten Maartens' Diplomacy.—Herr Maarten Maartens, the famous Dutch novelist, whose real name is J. H. W. Van der Porten, is a country magistrate and lives in the grand old castle of Zuylestyn, near the village of Neerlangbroek. He is rich and has a beautiful but invalid wife. He is fond of politics and the breeding of race horses. On account of his wife's health he is obliged to spend a certain period every year in the South of France. His constituents objected to this, and their differences resulted in their spokesman declaring that the magistrate was no Dutchman, as he spent most of his time out of Holland.

The novelist-magistrate replied: "The only time I am away from my native land is when I am at my wife's side, and that is Paradise. All my earthly hours I spend in Holland."

Best None Too Good.—Norman Hapgood, the critic and biographer, whose recent Life of Lincoln has given him a prominent place in letters, was a reporter in charge of the educational department on a New York afternoon newspaper a few years ago. He reported the doings of the Board of Education and gathered news of the public schools. One day he asked the editor what was the best review in England.

"Why do you want to know?" asked the editor.

"I have something about Salisbury I'd like to submit."

The editor gave him the name of three or four leading periodicals, mentioning one in particular as being the easiest to "break into."

"I want the best," returned Hapgood. "I don't care what it pays or how critical it is."

Receiving the information, he sent his copy over the sea, and in less than ten days he got by cable not only an acceptance of his offering, but an order for three more articles of the same sort. That was the beginning of his literary career.

The Remington

Billing and Tabulating Attachment accomplishes all kinds of Billing, Statistical, and Accounting Work on the New Models of the

Remington Standard Typewriter

as quickly and as accurately as ordinary typewriting is done. It automatically secures perfect perpendicular as well as horizontal alignment.

REMINGTON DEALERS EVERYWHERE SUPPLY IT.

WE have been obliged to increase our mechanical plant fifty per cent. in order to meet the growing demand for

Smith Premier Typewriters

This simply means more SMITH PREMIER users everywhere. PREMIER popularity grows daily.

Send for Illustrated Catalogue

The Smith Premier Typewriter Co., Syracuse, U. S. A.

Study Engineering

TAUGHT ENTIRELY BY MAIL.

One step at a time, with trained instructors and specially prepared texts, you can become a railroad, electrical, structural, mechanical or steam engineer.

Write for free illustrated book describing these courses. It will point out unsuspected profitable ways to employ your spare time. Fees moderate. Monthly payments if you desire.

NATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE INSTITUTE

1942 Second National Bank Building, - Washington, D. C.

PRACTICAL NEWSPAPER WORK

The best course of study ever projected, taught through

EDUCATION BY MAIL.

Our Instructors are men who have risen from reporters to managing editor, chief copyreader and literary editor of leading New York daily newspapers. Lessons hour study; no time taken from present occupation. Low price, monthly installments. Other courses of study are Electrical, Civil, Steam and Mechanical Engineering; Metallurgy, Machine Design, Mechanical Drawing, Art, Architecture, English Branches, Stenography. Sent free to those who enroll now, valuable books, or a drawing outfit worth $15.00.

The United Correspondence Schools

Send for Catalogue No. 28. 154-58 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

Wall Paper Design

TAUGHT BY MAIL

Experienced teachers, low cost. You can prepare for high pay without leaving home. All particulars FREE. A good subject for men or women. Offers are extended to all.

CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL

114 W. 34th St., New York

LEARN PROOFREADING

If you possess a fair education, why not utilize it as a genteel and uncrowded profession paying $15 to $25 weekly? Situations always obtainable. We are the original instructors by mail.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL, - PHILADELPHIA

STAMP COLLECTORS send for my approval sheets at 50 per cent. discount. 250 varieties Foreign and United States Stamps, from South Africa, Turkey, Chili, etc., 50 cts. 1 fine stamps; have you any for sale? H. J. KLEINMAN, 2501 S. Twelfth Street, - Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

JUDGE SETH ON WIDOWS

By CHESTER DEAKE

JUDGE, what did you think of the sermon by the missionary from India?"

The Sunday dinner was over, and the Judge and the party sat under the chestnut tree. The Judge was in a happy mood, although he complained that his two hundred and sixty-five pounds felt heavier than usual—he was afraid he was getting fat.

"It was good of its kind, but I don't much like that kind—one of those sermons about somebody else's troubles—interesting enough, but all the good it does you is to make you feel sorry for the other fellow and wish he would let you alone. I will be ready to think more about foreign missions when we pay our mortgage on the church and our people come to service as fast as they go to a mass-meeting when the brass band's playing. But what he said about widows in India was certainly curious. Just to think! Whenever a husband dies the wife gives up life, and either kills herself or pines away until the end. Just think of it! No wonder the country needs Yankee peddlers and missionaries!".

"Judge, you are evidently a friend of the widow."

"And of the orphan. Don't forget the orphan. Since I have been Judge of the Orphans' Court—I may say otherwise, also—I have found out a great deal about orphans—and, well, yes—widows."

He paused here and looked cautiously around to see if Mrs. Seth was in hearing distance, and finding she was not he proceeded:

"My young friend, you must remember that the country that keeps down widows goes down itself. By the time it conquers the widows it hasn't strength left for anything else. Why was George Washington father of his country? Because he married a widow. Who is head of the greatest Power of Europe? A widow. Who captured our greatest hero? A widow. So it goes! So it goes!"

"Wherein, Judge, is the widow so powerful?"

"The Lord only knows, my young friend, and I doubt if He understands it entirely. Of course, a woman is the greatest power in the world, but a widow is a woman with an extra pull. Much of it is experience, naturally, but sometimes I think that a short course in matrimony is a kind of post-graduate school—that's what you call it, isn't it? Now, put a person in college and keep him there all his life; what would he amount to? But put him there the usual term and then let him out in the world, and he will do something. Well, that's the widow. Certainly it's a little tough on her first teacher, but, as we say down at the courthouse, graveyards don't pay taxes.

"You know the roots of some trees will find their way through solid rock to reach water. Nothing is impossible, and the widow can beat trees just as a thinking man can cut wood. Now, there was Sally Madeson—Jack Madeson's widow. She was just about the right size, with black eyes, and red lips, and real roses in her cheeks. When you put weeds on that style, and when the long eyelashes fall over the black eyes and the roses in the cheeks bloom all the harder for the tears that come down on them—like dew on the real article—well, something's going to happen. On the other side of the road from me Jim Fendel lived, and if ever a man hated women Jim was that person. He had plenty of money, but all he loved in life was his gun and dogs. One day he came to me and said: 'Seth'—it was before my election as Judge of the Orphans' Court—'Seth, it may seem right conceited of me to say it, but doggone if I don't believe that Sally Madeson, or fate, or something, is after me.' 'Said anything to you?' I asked. 'Not a word,' he replied. 'You like her?' I asked again. 'Jehosaphat! No. Didn't I say Jack was the biggest fool on earth to marry her? What I mean is that—I—hang it! I don't know what I mean.'

"Well, I felt then that the outcome of the thing was just as good as decided, but to comfort Jim I told him to keep away from her. And he did. For instance, he took the back road to town. But of course one day as he was jogging along what should he do but meet her—in fact, find her all alone in a carriage that had broken down. Well, he took her home. Of course, the seat was that narrow little thing in his two-wheeled gig. Young man, I hope you never sat on a narrow seat with a black-eyed widow?"

"I never did, Judge."

"Well, never do it; but if you have to do it, don't drive too slow; the neighbors might talk. Then one day he was out woodcock-shooting on the other side of the swamp—out in his long rubber boots. Suddenly on the bank of the creek he saw the widow. She had been over to see one of her workmen who was sick, and the tide of the creek had risen and she couldn't get back. There was only one thing for him to do. He took her in his arms and toted her over. Young man, I hope you never toted a black-eyed widow over a creek?"

"I never did, Judge."

"Well, if you ever have to do it, hold tight, shut your eyes, and pray hard during the ceremony. Of course, that just settled everything. Jim came to me and said: 'It's no use, Seth; it's just fate.' 'It's the widow,' I said. 'It's fate and the widow both,' he said. 'I give it up,' I said; 'the combination's too strong.' 'So do I,' he said. Of course, he thought that all he had to do was to go there and ask her and she would jump right into his arms. He didn't know widows—of course, nobody does—but some facts are plain. As I have said, there is small satisfaction in hauling up a mullet, but there is a heap of sport in playing with a trout—and every widow knows that the easy fish is the least valued—or if I've got mixed, it's words to that effect."

"I have heard, Judge, that Mr. Fendel's marriage was the finest thing that ever happened to him."

"So it was, my young friend; so it was. It was she who made him Governor; and if he had only been born in a log cabin she would have made him President of the United States."

There was a pause, and the Judge continued rather confidentially: "Now you must understand, of course, you need not tell Mrs. Seth anything I have said about widows, but it is all true; and it is my conviction that the reason why widows in India are abolished, so to speak, is that the old maids and the married women control the votes. Of course, India is two or three thousand years old, while we are only two or three hundred, and it may come to pass that after this country begins to slide down hill widows may be buried too, but I'm glad I'll be dead before it happens. But, as I said before, you need not mention it to Mrs. Seth."

"You seem to think, Judge, that married ladies do not like widows."

"Think, my young ignoramus? Think? What's the use of thinking when the fact is before your very eyes? They can't like a widow any more than they can help looking at a new bonnet. They are all naturally jealous of her. Who can blame them? She has got all the good out of her first chance in matrimony, and she is in a position to get the best in a second trial at the same game. I don't say all women want to become widows, but I have noticed in all such misfortunes they all show a powerful lot of resignation."

THE
Singer Cabinet Table
Furnished only with Singer Sewing-Machines

(Copyright 1909)
"THE WRITER"
Sold on Instalments
Old Machines Taken in Exchange
The Singer Manufacturing Co.
"Sewing-Machine Makers for the World"

Argument: Query

DR. NICHOLS, Editor of the Boston Journal of Chemistry—

"Entertains the profoundest respect for a grain of wheat, as it is a most marvelous combination of substances, admirably adapted for the up-building and sustenance of the tissues of the human body."

WHEATLET

made from the choicest selected wheat, is the richest of all cereal foods in these substances. Non-irritating to the weakest stomach and ready for breakfast in a few minutes.

What is the conclusion?

If your grocer does not have it, send us his name and your order; we will see that you are supplied. Postal brings FREE BOOKLET.

The Genuine Made only by
FRANKLIN MILLS CO.
LOCKPORT, N. Y.

"Beacon Hill Prints"
IN PLATINUM
8x10 on 11x14 Mounts

50 Cents Each
Send 2 cent stamp for Illustrated Catalogue
CELEBRITY PHOTO AND ART CO., 256 Boylston St., Boston

HOPPER'S CAN OPENER

Does perfect work
Easy to operate
No jagged edges
Turns edge of can down
Price, postpaid, 25 cents
Money refunded if not satisfactory
CHAS. G. HOPPER, Manufacturer, - Germantown, Pa.

California

Faster than ever
CHICAGO-UNION PACIFIC & NORTH-WESTERN LINE

TWO fast trains every day in the year. No change of cars. First-Class and Tourist Sleepers daily to California and Oregon. Personally conducted excursions every Thursday from Chicago. Illustrated booklet free on application to any ticket agent or address W. B. Kniskern, G. P. & T. A., Chicago & North-Western Ry., Chicago, Ill.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded A^o D^i 1728 by Benj. Franklin

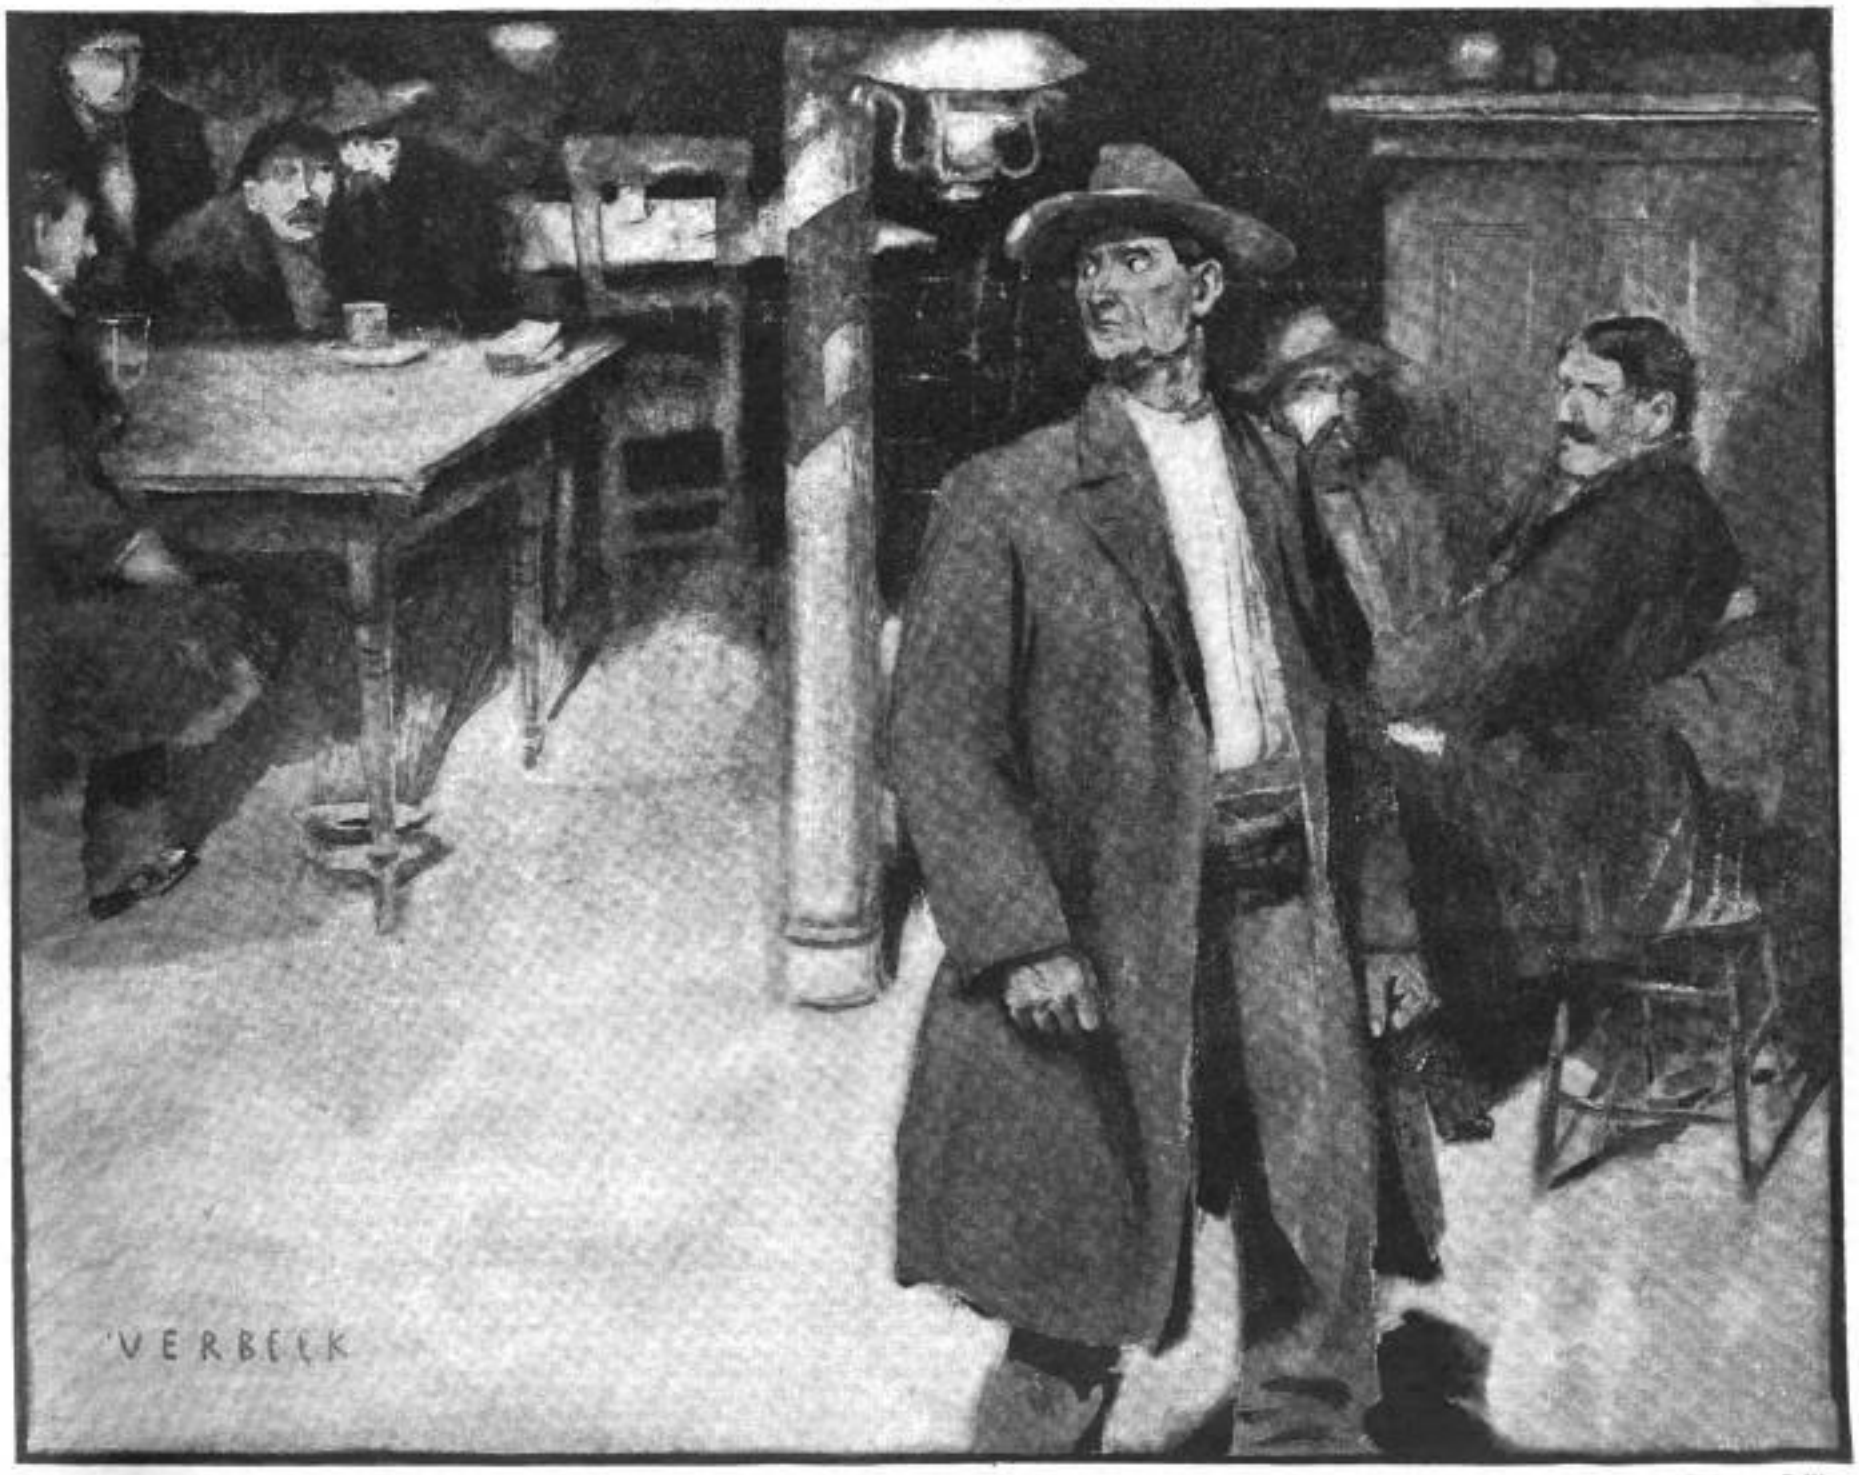
Volume 172, No. 30 — Philadelphia, January 20, 1900 — 5 Cents the Copy; $2.50 the Year

Copyright, 1899, by The Curtis Publishing Company



PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 425 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

Bohemian Days in San Francisco

By Bret Harte

Copyright, 1900, by Bret Harte. Copyright in Great Britain

HE CAST A GLANCE AROUND THE RESTAURANT AND NODDED TO ONE OR TWO

Digitized by Google

Bohemian Days in San Francisco

By Bret Harte

IT IS but just to the respectable memory of San Francisco that in these vagrant recollections I should deprecate at once any suggestion that the levity of my title described its dominant tone at any period of my early experiences. On the contrary, it was a singular fact that while the rest of California was swayed by an easy, careless, unconventionalism or swept over by waves of emotion and sentiment, San Francisco preserved an intensely material and practical attitude, and even a certain austere morality. I do not, of course, allude to the brief days of '49, when it was a straggling beach of huts and stranded hulks, but to the earlier stages of its development into the metropolis of California. Its first tottering steps in that direction were marked by a distinct gravity and decorum. Even during the period when the revolver settled small private difficulties, and Vigilance Committees adjudicated larger public ones, an unmistakable seriousness and respectability was the ruling sign of its governing class. It was not improbable that under the reign of the committee the lawless and vicious class were more appalled by the moral spectacle of several thousand black-coated, serious-minded business men in embattled procession than by mere force of arms, and one "suspect"—a prize-fighter—is known to have committed suicide in his cell after confrontation with his grave and passionless shopkeeping judges. Even that peculiar quality of Californian humor which was apt to mitigate the extravagances of the revolver and the uncertainties of poker had no place in the decorous and responsible utterance of San Francisco. The press was sober, materialistic, practical—when it was not severely admonitory of existing evil; the few smaller papers that indulged in levity were considered libelous and improper. Fancy was displaced by heavy articles on the revenues of the State and inducements to the investment of capital. Local news was under an implied censorship which suppressed anything that might tend to discourage timid or cautious capital. Episodes of romantic lawlessness or pathetic incidents of mining life were carefully edited—with the comment that these things belonged to the past, and that life and property were now "as safe in San Francisco as in New York or London."

Wonder-loving visitors in quest of scenes characteristic of the civilization were coldly snubbed with this assurance. Fires, floods, and even seismic convulsions, were subjected to a like grimly materialistic optimism. I have a vivid recollection of a ponderous editorial on one of the severer earthquakes, in which it was asserted that only the unexpectedness of the onset prevented San Francisco from meeting it in a way that would be deterrent of all future attacks. The unconsciousness of the humor was only equaled by the gravity with which it was received by the whole business community. Strangely enough, this grave materialism flourished side by side with—and was even sustained by—a narrow religious strictness more characteristic of the Pilgrim Fathers of a past century than the Western pioneers of the present. San Francisco was early a city of churches and church organizations to which the leading men and merchants belonged. The lax Sundays of the dying Spanish race seemed only to provoke a revival of the rigors of the Puritan Sabbath. With the Spaniard and his Sunday afternoon bull-fight scarcely an hour distant, the San Francisco pulpit thundered against Sunday picnics. One of the popular preachers, declaiming upon the practice of Sunday dinner-giving, averred that when he saw a guest in his best Sunday clothes standing shamelessly upon the doorstep of his host, he felt like seizing him by the shoulder and dragging him from that threshold of perdition.

Against the actual heathen the feeling was even stronger, and reached its climax one Sunday when a Chinaman was stoned to death by a crowd of children returning from Sunday-school. I am offering these examples with no ethical purpose, but merely to indicate a singular contradictory condition, which I do not think writers of early Californian history have fairly recorded. It is not my province to suggest any theory for these appalling exceptions to the usual good-humored lawlessness and extravagance of the rest of the State. They may have been essential agencies to the growth and evolution of the city. They were undoubtedly sincere. The impressions I propose to give of certain scenes and incidents of my early experience must therefore be taken as purely personal and Bohemian, and their selection as equally individual and vagrant. I am writing of what interested me at the time, though not perhaps of what was more generally characteristic of San Francisco.

I had been there a week—an idle week, spent in listless outlook for employment; a full week in my eager absorption of the strange life around me and a photographic sensitiveness to certain scenes and incidents of these days, which start out of my memory to-day as freshly as the day they impressed me.

One of these recollections is of "steamer night," as it was called—the night of "steamer day"—preceding the departure of the mail steamship with the mails for "home." Indeed, at that time San Francisco may be said to have lived from steamer day to steamer day; bills were made due on that day, interest computed to that period, and accounts settled. The next day was the turning of a new leaf: another essay to fortune, another inspiration of energy. So recognized was the fact that even ordinary changes of condition, social and domestic, were put aside until after steamer day. "I'll see what I can do after next steamer day" was the common cautious or hopeful formula. It was the "Saturday night" of many a wage-earner—and to him a night of festivity. The thoroughfares were animated and crowded; the saloons and theatres full. I can recall myself at such times wandering along the City Front, as the business part of San Francisco was then known. Here the lights were burning all night, the first streaks of dawn finding the merchants still at their counting-house desks. I remember the dim lines of warehouses lining the insecure wharves of rotten piles, half filled in—that had ceased to be wharves but had not yet become streets—their treacherous yawning depths, with the uncertain gleam of tarlike mud below, at times still vocal with the lap and gurgle of the tide. I remember the weird stories of disappearing men found afterward imbedded in the ooze in which they had fallen and gasped their life away. I remember the two or three ships, still left standing where they were beached a year or two before, built in between warehouses, their bows projecting into the roadway. There was the dignity of the sea and its boundless freedom in their beautiful curves which the abutting houses could not destroy, and even something of the sea's loneliness in the far-spaced ports and cabin windows lit up by the lamps of the prosaic landsmen who plied their trades behind them. One of these ships transformed into a hotel retained its name, "The Niantic," and part of its characteristic interior unchanged. I remember these ships' old tenants—the rats—who had increased and multiplied to such an extent that at night they fearlessly crossed the wayfarer's path at every turn, and even invaded the gilded saloons of Montgomery Street. In the Niantic their pitapat was met on every staircase, and it was said that sometimes in an excess of sociability they accompanied the traveler to his room. In the early "cloth-and-papered" houses—so called because the ceilings were not plastered, but simply covered by stretched and whitewashed cloth—their scamperings were plainly indicated in zigzag movements of the sagging cloth, or they became actually visible by finally dropping through the holes they had worn in it! I remember the house whose foundations were made of boxes of plug tobacco—part of a jettisoned cargo—used instead of more expensive lumber; and the adjacent warehouse where the trunks of the early and forgotten "Forty-niners" were stored, and—never claimed by their dead or missing owners—were finally sold at auction. I remember the strong breath of the sea over all, and the constant onset of the trade winds which helped to disinfect the deposit of dirt and grime, decay and wreckage which were stirred up in the later evolutions of the city.

Drawn by Will Crawford

Or I recall, with the same sense of youthful satisfaction and unabated wonder, my wanderings through the Spanish Quarter, where three centuries of quaint customs, speech and dress were still preserved; where the proverbs of Sancho Panza were still spoken in the language of Cervantes, and the high-flown illusions of the La Manchian knight still a part of the Spanish Californian hidalgo's dream. I recall the more modern "Greaser," or Mexican—his index finger steeped in cigarette stains; his velvet jacket and his crimson sash; the many-flounced skirt and lace manta of his women, and their caressing intonations—the one musical utterance of the whole hard-voiced city. I suppose I had a boy's digestion and bluntness of taste in those days, for the combined odor of tobacco, burned paper and garlic which marked that melodious breath did not affect me.

Perhaps from my Puritan training I experienced a more fearful joy in the gambling saloons. They were the largest and most comfortable, even as they were the most expensively decorated rooms in San Francisco. Here, again, the gravity and decorum which I have already alluded to were present at that earlier period—though perhaps from concentration of another kind. People staked and lost their last dollar with a calm solemnity and a resignation that was almost Christian. The oaths, exclamations and feverish interruptions which often characterized more dignified assemblies were absent here. There was no room for the lesser vices; there was little or no drunkenness; the gaudily dressed and painted women who presided over the wheels of fortune or performed on the harp and piano attracted no attention from those ascetic players. The man who had won ten thousand dollars and the man who had lost everything rose from the table with equal silence and imperturbability. I never witnessed any tragic sequel to those losses; I never heard of any suicide on account of them. Neither can I recall any quarrel or murder directly attributable to this kind of gambling. It must be remembered that these public games were chiefly rouge et noir, monté, faro, or roulette, in which the antagonist was Fate, Chance, Method, or the impersonal "bank" which was supposed to represent them all; there was no individual opposition or rivalry; nobody challenged the decision of the "croupier," or dealer.

I remember a conversation at the door of one saloon which was as characteristic for its brevity as it was a type of the prevailing stoicism. "Hello!" said a departing miner, as he recognized a brother miner coming in, "when did you come down?" "This morning," was the reply. "Made a strike on the bar?" suggested the first speaker. "You bet!" said the other, and passed in. I chanced an hour later to be at the same place as they met again—their relative positions changed. "Hello! Whar now?" said the incomer. "Back to the bar." "Cleaned out?" "You bet!" Not a word more explained a common situation.

My first youthful experience at those tables was an accidental one. I was watching roulette one evening, intensely absorbed in the mere movement of the players. Either they were so preoccupied with the game, or I was really older looking than my actual years, but a bystander laid his hand familiarly on my shoulder, and said, as to an ordinary habitué, "Ef you're not chippin' in yourself, pardner, 'spose you give me a show." Now, I honestly believe that up to that moment I had no intention, nor even a desire, to try my own fortune. But in the embarrassment of the sudden address I put my hand in my pocket, drew out a coin, and laid it, with an attempt at carelessness, but a vivid consciousness that I was blushing, upon a vacant number. To my horror I saw that I had put down a large coin—the bulk of my possessions! I did not flinch, however; I think any boy who reads this will understand my feeling; it was not only my coin but my manhood at stake! I gazed with a miserable show of indifference at the players, at the chandelier—anywhere but at the dreadful ball spinning around the wheel. There was a pause; the game was declared, the rake rattled up and down, but still I did not look at the table. Indeed, in my inexperience of the game and my embarrassment I doubt if I should have known if I had

---

Editor's Note—This is the first of two papers on Bohemian Days in San Francisco. The second will appear in the next issue.

Digitized by Google

won or not. I had made up my mind that I should lose, but I must do so like a man, and, above all, without giving the least suspicion that I was a greenhorn. I even affected to be listening to the music. The wheel spun again; the game was declared, the rake was busy, but I did not move. At last the man I had displaced touched me on the arm and whispered, "Better make a straddle and divide your stake this time." I did not understand him, but as I saw he was looking at the board, I was obliged to look, too. I drew back dazed and bewildered! Where my coin had lain a moment before was a glittering heap of gold.

My stake had doubled, quadrupled, and doubled again. I did not know how much then—I do not know now—it may have been not more than three or four hundred dollars—but it dazzled and frightened me. "Make your game, gentlemen," said the croupier monotonously. I thought he looked at me—indeed, everybody seemed to be looking at me—and my companion repeated his warning. But here I must again appeal to the boyish reader in defense of my idiotic obstinacy. To have taken advice would have shown my youth. I shook my head—I could not trust my voice. I smiled, but with a sinking heart, and let my stake remain. The ball again sped around the wheel and stopped. There was a pause. The croupier indolently advanced his rake and swept my whole pile with others into the bank! I had lost it all. Perhaps it may be difficult for me to explain why I actually felt relieved, and even to some extent triumphant, but I seemed to have asserted my grown-up independence—possibly at the cost of reducing the number of my meals for days, but what of that! I was a man! I wish I could say that it was a lesson to me. I am afraid it was not. It was true that I did not gamble again, but then I had no especial desire to—and there was no temptation. I am afraid it was an incident without a moral. Yet it had one touch characteristic of the period which I like to remember. The man who had spoken to me I think suddenly realized at the moment of my disastrous coup the fact of my extreme youth. He moved toward the banker, and leaning over him whispered a few words. The banker looked up, half impatiently, half kindly—his hand straying tentatively toward the pile of coin. I instinctively knew what he meant, and summoning my determination, met his eyes with all the indifference I could assume, and walked away.

I had at that period a small room at the top of a house owned by a distant relation—a second or third cousin, I think. He was a man of independent and original character, had a Ulyssean experience of men and cities, and an old English name of which he was proud. While in London he had procured from the Herald's College his family arms whose crest was stamped upon a quantity of plate he had brought with him to California. The plate, together with an exceptionally good cook which he had also brought, and his own epicurean tastes, he utilized in the usual practical Californian fashion by starting a rather expensive half-club, half-restaurant in the lower part of the building—which he ruled somewhat autocratically, as became his crest! The restaurant was too expensive for me to patronize, but I saw many of its frequenters as well as those who had rooms at the club. They were men of very distinct personality; a few celebrated, and nearly all notorious. They represented a Bohemianism—if such it could be called—less innocent than my later experiences. I remember, however, one handsome young fellow whom I used to meet occasionally on the staircase, who captured my youthful fancy. I met him only at midday, as he did not rise till late, and this fact, with a certain scrupulous elegance and neatness in his dress, ought to have made me suspect he was a gambler. In my inexperience it only invested him with a certain romantic mystery.

One morning as I was going out to my very early breakfast at a cheap Italian café on Long Wharf I was surprised to find him also descending the staircase. He was scrupulously dressed even at that early hour, but I was struck by the fact that he was all in black, and his slight figure, buttoned to the throat in a tightly fitting frock-coat, gave, I fancied, a singular melancholy to his pale Southern face. Nevertheless, he greeted me with more than his usual serene cordiality, and I remembered that he looked up with a half-puzzled, half-amused expression at the rosy morning sky as he walked a few steps with me down the deserted street. I could not help saying that I was astonished to see him up so early, and he admitted that it was a break in his usual habits, but added with a smiling significance I afterward remembered that it was "an even chance if he did it again." As we neared the street corner a man in a buggy drove up impatiently. In spite of the driver's evident haste, my handsome acquaintance got in leisurely, and lifting his glossy hat to me with a pleasant smile, was driven away. I have a very lasting recollection of his face and figure as the buggy disappeared down the empty street. I never saw him again. It was not until a week later that I knew that an hour after he left me that morning he was lying dead in a little hollow behind the Mission Dolores—shot through the heart in the duel for which he had risen so early.

I recall another incident of that period equally characteristic, but happily less tragic in sequel. I was in the restaurant one morning talking to my cousin when a man entered hastily and said something to him in a hurried whisper. My cousin contracted his eyebrows and uttered a suppressed oath. Then with a gesture of warning to the man he crossed the room quietly to a table where a regular habitué of the restaurant was lazily finishing his breakfast. A large silver coffee-pot with a stiff wooden handle stood on the table before him. My cousin leaned over the guest familiarly, and apparently made some hospitable inquiry as to his wants, with his hand resting lightly on the coffee-pot handle. Then—possibly because my curiosity having been excited I was watching him more intently than the others—I saw what probably no one else saw—that he deliberately upset the coffee-pot and its contents over the guest's shirt and waistcoat. As the victim sprang up with an exclamation, my cousin overwhelmed him with apologies for his carelessness, and with protestations of sorrow for the accident actually insisted upon dragging the man upstairs into his own private room, where he furnished him with a shirt and waistcoat of his own. The side door had scarcely closed upon them, and I was still lost in wonder at what I had seen, when a man entered from the street. He was one of the desperate set I have already spoken of, and thoroughly well known to those present. He cast a glance around the room, nodded to one or two of the guests, and then walked to a side table and took up a newspaper. I was conscious at once that a singular constraint had come over the other guests—a nervous awkwardness that at last seemed to make itself known to the man himself, who, after an affected yawn or two, laid down the paper and walked out.

"That was a mighty close call," said one of the guests with a sigh of relief.

"You bet! And that coffee-pot spill was the luckiest kind of accident for Peters," returned another.

"For both," added the first speaker, "for Peters was armed, too, and would have seen him come in!"

A word or two more explained all. Peters and the last comer had quarreled a day or two before, and had separated with the intention to "shoot on sight"—that is, wherever they met—a form of duel common to those days. The accidental meeting in the restaurant would have been the occasion, with the usual sanguinary consequence, but for the word of warning given to my cousin by a passer-by who knew that Peters' antagonist was coming to the restaurant to look at the papers. Had my cousin repeated the warning to Peters himself he would have only prepared him for the conflict—which he would not have shirked—and so precipitated the affray.

The ruse of upsetting the coffee-pot, which everybody but myself thought an accident, was to get him out of the room before the other entered. I was too young then to venture to intrude upon my cousin's secrets, but two or three years afterward I taxed him with the trick and he admitted it regretfully. I believe that a strict interpretation of the "code" would have condemned his act as unsportsmanlike, if not unfair!

I recall another incident connected with the building equally characteristic of the period. The United States Branch Mint stood very near it, and its tall, factory-like chimneys overshadowed my cousin's roof. Some scandal had arisen from an alleged leakage of gold in the manipulation of that metal during the various processes of smelting and refining. One of the excuses offered was the volatilization of the precious metal and its escape through the draft of the tall chimneys. All San Francisco laughed at this explanation until it learned that a corroboration of the theory had been established by an assay of the dust and grime of the roofs in the vicinity of the Mint. These had yielded distinct traces of gold. San Francisco stopped laughing, and that portion of it which had roofs in the neighborhood at once began prospecting. Claims were staked out on these airy placers, and my cousin's roof being the very next one to the chimney, and presumably "in the lead," was disposed of to a speculative company for a considerable sum. I remember my cousin telling me the story—for the occurrence was quite recent—and taking me with him to the roof to explain it, but I am afraid I was more attracted by the mystery of the closely guarded building and the strangely tinted smoke which arose from this temple where money was actually being "made," than by anything else. Nor did I dream as I stood there—a very lanky, open-mouthed youth—that only three or four years later I should be the secretary of its superintendent. In my more adventurous ambition I am afraid I would have accepted the suggestion half-heartedly. Merely to have helped to stamp the gold which other people had adventurously found was by no means a part of my youthful dreams.

He said "it was an even chance if he did it again"

DRAWN BY WILL CRAWFORD

Odd Ways of Gaining a Living

A NEW YORK correspondent of a Boston journal gave an account some years ago of a novel mode of making a living hit upon by a young man at Albany. Having been employed some years at the capitol, and knowing a good deal about the doings in it, he made engagements with a number of large corporations, at salaries ranging each from $200 to $800 yearly, to keep them informed about what was going on there. This he did by sending to each a copy of every bill that was introduced into either House of the Legislature, and by giving them such private information as he could gather concerning any influences that were at work prejudicial to their interests. For all this labor he received about $2500 a year; a little handbook of the Legislature which he published annually yielded an equal sum.

"SPITE" HOUSES THAT PAID

But of all the abnormal ways of gaining a livelihood, that pursued some fifty years ago by a miserly, misanthropic wretch in a large town in the West of England is the most extraordinary. By profession a builder, he spent his time in watching the progress of building operations in the town and "posting" himself in all matters relating to land and houses. When he saw an elegant new house building he would, if possible, buy a small piece of land opposite to it, and there begin erecting a hideous-looking edifice of shingle and brick, with ugly chimneys, and having no resemblance to any other structure, except, perhaps, a dog-kennel. Fancy the feelings of a rich manufacturer on seeing his dream of a fairy palace thus dispelled by a crafty, cold-blooded old villain, deaf alike to entreaty, remonstrance and menace; cool, calculating, persistent, unmoved equally by the cries of "shame!" from the passers-by and by the scowls and frowns of the neighboring householders!

A week or two passes, and the victim of his wiles, writhing with vexation, proposes to buy the nuisance that perpetually stares him in the face: but a price so enormous is asked that he will not pay it. Finally he stops building his mansion for a while, and "Eyesore Jack"—for that was the nickname of this tormentor—follows suit. Delighted and encouraged by this, the gentleman goes on with his building, when instantly work on the dog-kennel is resumed. A hundred remedies chase each other through the man's brain, but in vain; one after another they are all dismissed as useless or impracticable. At last he is forced to yield and buy up the eyesore at many times its cost to its owner.

THE WATERLOO OF "EYESORE JACK"

The wretch continued to pursue his hateful calling for some years till he became very rich, but he found his Waterloo at last in a conflict with two builders who had erected in a genteel part of the suburbs a row of handsome houses. They were expecting to sell them at a considerable profit when one day they learned to their amazement that the old villain, Jack—the terrible Eyesore Jack—had obtained a long lease of a field opposite and designed immediately to begin a brick work on it. The men were nearly mad with vexation, but their whole fortune was at stake, and they determined to fight the wretch to the last extremity. Inducing another person who had been in treaty for a lease of the field before it was leased to Jack to bring an action for its recovery, they outwitted their foe. The villain, so long triumphant, was beaten in the suit, and ultimately lost all his ill-gotten gains and died in abject penury.

Digitized by Google

The ADMIRAL'S Ward

By Molly Elliot Seawell

VICE-ADMIRAL the Honorable Algernon Charles Harford, commanding Her Majesty's Ship Imperious, had the idiosyncrasy common to navy men. Modest concerning his professional acquirements, and singularly just in his estimate of his own powers and qualifications as a seaman, he had a preposterous confidence in himself regarding all shore affairs.

Your true navy man is the most unassuming man in the world in his own sea bailiwick; but put him ashore and there is nothing, from riding a broncho to raising cabbages at a profit, that he does not know more about—or thinks he does—than any landsman going. The more delicate and complicated the affair, the more breezy assurance a sailorman has in his capacity to manage it. Therefore, when Admiral Harford was left guardian of the motherless child of his old friend and messmate, Captain Clavering, he had not a moment's doubt that he was perfectly well qualified and situated to care for that complex creature, a young girl. He was not daunted in the least by the facts that he was a bachelor of confirmed standing; that he had no experience in managing any petticoated creature; that he had never seen Henrietta Clavering; that he was on the China station, and likely to remain there at least two years; that her father had always represented her as a beautiful, willful young thing, not without great intelligence and a warm heart, but difficult to impress with a sense of responsibility, and prankish to the last degree.

The Admiral dismissed all thought of trouble with a wave of his hand. He would get her a good governess, give orders that the girl should be prudent, studious, avoid going in debt and falling in love—and that was all. The plan commended itself to him by its beauty as well as its simplicity. The Admiral did all these things with an infantile faith in their efficacy; and as he got good reports from his ward, concluded that bringing up a young girl by proxy was a plan as admirable as it was easy.

The Admiral was a good-hearted martinet, and he conceived a real affection for the ward he had never seen. He wrote her short but affectionate letters, and she replied with the properest little epistles imaginable, written under the eye of the governess, Miss Elderberry. These the Admiral took for the spontaneous outpourings of a youthful heart. However, he did get a spontaneous outpouring at last. It was almost two years after he had assumed charge of Henrietta that this letter came:

"My dear Guardian: Before dear papa died he told me to open my heart to you whenever I was in perplexity. I have not had occasion to do this before, as Miss Elderberry is a good soul and has not troubled me much. Lately, however, she has been quite troublesome. You must know that for some time past I have been engaged to Lieutenant Roger Fonblanque. As we have no thought of being married until his cruise is up, we agreed to keep it secret. And as we had to be separated in any event, I was delighted when he was ordered to the Imperious last autumn. It seemed to me providential that Roger should serve under your eye, so you could see his many noble and exalted qualities.

"But now comes the trouble. Miss Elderberry has found out that we correspond, and has forbidden me to write to Roger. Of course, neither of us could live without each other's letters. This you will admit. I warn you, therefore, that I consider I owe my first duty to Roger, and shall continue to write to him. If you, my dear guardian, would forward Roger's letters to me under cover of yours, it would be the best thing I can think of. Miss Elderberry is also quite annoying about another matter—she thinks my maid, Hodgson, too flighty in her dress and manners, and too presuming. This last is a trifle—it is only Roger that I am really concerned about. Of course, Miss Elderberry does not know that I am writing this. I look forward with so much pleasure to seeing you in a few months. Dear papa had so much confidence in your goodness to me that I have always felt toward you as a second father.

"Your affectionate ward,

"HENRIETTA CLAVERING.

"Ivy Lodge, March 16."

The Admiral gnashed his teeth when he read this letter. Roger Fonblanque's noble and exalted qualities! Foh! A little curly headed sub-Lieutenant, who had been a regular pickle of a midshipman, and was little better than that now! Of course the fellow must have known who was Henrietta Clavering's guardian, and the ineffable impudence of the whole business—the Admiral rung his bell so furiously that the orderly fairly bounced into the cabin, thinking the Admiral must have smelt fire. He did really seem to exhale both fire and smoke as he bawled:

"Make my compliments to Lieutenant Fonblanque, and desire him to come to me immediately."

There was, of course, nothing for Lieutenant Fonblanque to do but to appear in the cabin and take the most awful wigging the Admiral could devise—and he was an accomplished man in that line. He commanded the young Lieutenant not only to cease from all correspondence with Henrietta Clavering, but to put her completely out of his mind, and not to dare to think of her, much less to speak her name. Young Fonblanque received all this very coolly, but declined to make any promises. This did not greatly disconcert Admiral Harford. If a flag officer could not secure obedience from a sub-Lieutenant and a nineteen-year-old girl, the sooner he hauled down his flag and retired to civil life the better, thought the Admiral. Naturally, the boy and girl would sulk over his commands—but that they would be actually disobeyed never entered Admiral Harford's head.

As might have been expected, during the remainder of the cruise the Imperious was made by Admiral Harford a floating purgatory for Lieutenant Fonblanque. Luckily for the youngster, the cruise was nearly up, and a few months after the young man's interview with the Admiral, on a beautiful August morning, the Imperious steamed into the harbor at Portsmouth, and her guns roared out "How d'ye do?" to the guns of the forts, which replied, "Quite well, thank you. How are you?"

Now, Ivy Lodge was only a few miles from Portsmouth, and the Admiral had promised himself an early interview with his ward, whom he really desired to see. But scarcely had the anchors kissed the ground when he received orders to report to the Admiralty, where a number of affairs awaited him, among others his promotion to the full grade of Admiral.

The Admiral set off for London in a very bad humor, determined to return in three days at most. The red tape of officialdom, however, detained him more than a week. In that time he wrote to Henrietta Clavering, asking her and Miss Elderberry to breakfast with him on the ship the following Sunday. Meeting at his club an old acquaintance, Captain Bosanquet, whose son, a young midshipman, had just been ordered to the Imperious, the Admiral sent an invitation to the young man to the same breakfast. Just as he had completed this arrangement, the card of Captain Laborde, an officer in the French Navy, was handed him, and the Admiral, finding the French Captain to be on his way to Portsmouth, asked him to be of the breakfast party.

The Admiral had fully counted on being at Portsmouth on the Saturday night, but what with unexpected delays and accidental interruptions, he did not reach the ship until the usual Sunday-morning inspection was in progress. As he stepped over the side he asked if Miss Elderberry and Miss Clavering had arrived, and was told they were at that moment in the great cabin.

This, however, was not an exact statement of the case. Miss Clavering was indeed below, but in place of Miss Elderberry, who found herself at the last moment too unwell to accompany her charge, was Hodgson, the maid. One look at this young woman was enough to justify all of Miss Elderberry's objections to her. Pretty in a common fashion, dressed above her station, inexpressibly pert and forward, Hodgson was a perfect type of the objectionable lady's-maid. A more undesirable attendant for a girl like Henrietta Clavering could not be imagined. For Henrietta was undoubtedly a little unruly, and her persistence in keeping Hodgson as maid showed it.

Miss Clavering was extremely pretty. She affected a mannish style of dress, with short curls all over her shapely head, and wore a man's collar and necktie with her dashing tailor-made jacket. She looked indeed more like a pretty boy than a pretty girl; and this likeness was increased when, picking up a midshipman's cap off the sofa in the Admiral's sleeping-cabin, she clapped it on her head, and turned, laughing, to her maid.

"La!" cried Hodgson, turning over some clothes that lay under the cap. "These ain't never the Admiral's clothes. They look more like they belonged to one of them little midshipmen boys I seen on deck just now." And Hodgson scampered out of the cabin, carrying the midshipman's trousers with her, to interview Stubbs, the Admiral's steward, with whom she had already established intimate relations.

"Them things on the Admiral's bed!" replied the steward, surprised; "'course they ain't his'n. That fool of a tailor as brought the Admiral's clothes home must 'a' left these 'ere by mistake. Well, they'll be called for soon, so just you put 'em back, young woman, and don't let nobody suspect you've been nosin' around the Admiral's room."

"All in good time," pertly replied Hodgson; and then, seeing two additional places laid at the table, she asked, "Who else is to breakfast besides my young lady?"

"A French Cap'n, and a young midshipman—jist jined—Mr. Bosanquet—was to breakfast, too, but a message come a while ago sayin' he couldn't be 'ere, havin' broke out with the measles. Howsomedever, the Admiral sent word there was to be five places put, and I'm goin' to put five places, s' help me, if nobody don't come."

Hodgson stood, considering this information. A scheme had entered her mischievous head, and she promptly proceeded to carry it out.

She returned to the inner cabin, and there, laughing at her own pretty reflection in the glass, stood Henrietta Clavering with the midshipman's cap on her curls and the natty jacket in place of her own.

"Oh, la!" screamed Hodgson, affecting an ecstasy of admiration, "how beautiful you do look!"

"I wish Roger could see me in this rig," replied Henrietta, smiling and pouting. "Of course he can't come near me to-day—the Admiral won't let him; but I wonder what the old codger would say" (this referred to Admiral Harford) "if he knew that Roger has seen me seven times this week! Poor Miss Elderberry! I believe that is what made her ill—the thought of having to tell my guardian about it."

Hodgson during this was fingering the trousers to the midshipman's suit, and holding them up.

"I'd love to see you in these, miss," she said insinuatingly. "Don't you remember the time you went to the Criterion Theatre, and saw all the ladies dressed as midshipmen in the opera—and came back and said you longed to see what sort of a midshipman you'd make?"

Henrietta looked dubiously at the trousers.

"Just for a minute—to see yourself in the glass," kept on Hodgson. "There's loads of time—the Admiral won't be

DRAWN BY C. E. HILLMAN

—"THE ADMIRAL WON'T BE 'ERE FOR 'ARF AN HOUR YET, MISS"

Digitized by Google

'ere for 'arf an hour yet, miss." And Henrietta Clavering, with the folly of youth, yielding to her own childish inclinations, slipped off her skirts and slipped on the trousers, and had the satisfaction of seeing herself in the glass as a full-fledged reefer.

She really meant to take the clothes off immediately, but Hodgson chattered so, and admired so extravagantly, that time passed. Sounds of cheering from the deck floated in at the porthole, and Henrietta paused to listen to that; and what was actually going on upon deck was this:

The whole ship's company was drawn up for inspection, but instead of the Captain being present he was represented by a Lieutenant, and not a First Lieutenant at that. Everything and everybody on the Imperious seemed to have gone awry during the Admiral's week in London. The Captain had met with an accident which obliged him to be removed ashore to a hospital. The First Lieutenant had, before this, got a short leave on account of urgent business, and was represented by the next in rank. To make things worse, by some occult means liquor had been smuggled aboard, and nearly everybody forward had got a taste of it. For the first time in all Admiral Harford's experience this state of affairs was evident at muster, and even the Master-at-Arms, one Billy Bowser, reputed to be the best "Jimmy legs" in the service, was a little unsteady on his pins—the first time in twenty years. Admiral Harford noted all this at a glance, and his wrath nearly choked him. Technically, an Admiral has nothing to do with the conduct of his flagship, his Captain being wholly responsible. However, very few Admirals have the transcendent virtue to remain a disinterested spectator when things don't go to please them—and least of all Admiral Harford, who was a chronic meddler, and of whom his Captain had said that rather than sail with him again he would cut the service.

The Admiral restrained his choler during the muster, while the senior Lieutenant present, with a worried face, went through with it; but when it was about to be dismissed, he cleared his throat portentously, while fire and slaughter breathed from his nostrils. Before he could speak a word, though, the half-tipsy "Jimmy legs" waved his cap over his head and bawled:

"Three cheers for Admiral Harford!"

They were given with a will.

The Admiral, standing first on one leg and then on the other, practicing the goose step in his rage, waited impatiently for the cheering to be over to speak his mind concerning the general demoralization on board. But three long, loud cheers by five hundred men are not over in a hurry, and just as he had blurted out:

"That's all very well, but——"

"Three times three! Huzza!" shouted the happy and irresponsible Bowser. Three times three were given while the Admiral fumed.

Four several times did the Admiral try to begin his general denunciation of everybody and everything on the Imperious, and each time a thundering cheer interrupted him, until at last, swelling like an enraged toad, the Admiral flounced down the companionway to his own quarters. As he passed along the gangway a strange scene was happening in his sleeping-cabin. Hodgson, suddenly seizing her young mistress by the shoulders, whisked her out, still wearing the reefer's suit, into the great cabin. Then planting herself before the door, she said coolly:

"You'll be Mr. Bosanquet at this breakfast, and I'll be Miss Clavering. Do you understand?"

"Understand!" repeated Henrietta stupidly, then adding with flashing eyes, "How dare you! Move, at once, that I may take these things off!"

"Not so fast," replied Hodgson. "It's the first chance I ever had to play lady, and I'm a-goin' to do it. 'Course I know I'll lose my place, but I don't want to stay anyhow. So just make up your mind to pass for a midshipman while I'll pass for Miss Clavering. And if you say a word I'll tell who you are—and then there'll be a pretty kettle of fish!"

Henrietta Clavering stood, stunned at the impudence of the girl, and appalled at her own folly—and before her presence of mind returned to her, there was Admiral Harford walking into the cabin. And this was the greeting he got from the bogus Miss Clavering:

"Welcome, my dear, dear guardian. Welcome to hold Hengland. I'm your ward, 'Enrietta Clavering!"

This was supplemented by 'Enrietta throwing her arms around the Admiral's neck and giving him a resounding smack on each cheek. Admiral Harford, like his unlucky ward, was staggered at the assurance of the young woman; and, being a man of quick perception, he took her in at a glance—her cheap good looks, her vulgar finery, her cockney accent—his ruddy, weather-beaten face turned a sickly green. However, he mumbled something about "Delighted to see her; hoped she was well; how was Miss Elderberry?"

"At 'ome, and I 'ope she'll stay there," promptly responded the supposed ward. "She fancied herself hailing, and couldn't come to-day."

"And did you come aboard ship alone?" asked the Admiral.

"I did that," replied 'Enrietta, as she called herself. "I pay no hattention to Miss Helderberry. Now, there's a good girl—'Odgson, my maid—quite the lady, but Miss Helderberry is down on her."

Admiral Harford had known storm and tempest, battle and shipwreck, but never in all his experience had he felt the horror and helplessness that now possessed him. He was so taken up with this dreadful young woman that he had scarcely noticed the young midshipman, as he supposed, who was cowering against the door, but 'Enrietta had no mind to let him be forgotten.

"This is young Mr. Bosanquet, as is to 'ave lunch with us," she said, dragging forward the hapless Henrietta. The Admiral shook hands mechanically with the youth, who was pallid and trembling to the most extraordinary degree. Much of this strange behavior, however, was lost on the Admiral, who was overcome with chagrin and uneasiness at the manners, language and appearance of his ward. He did observe something queer in the boy, but at that moment his eye happened to fall on Stubbs, the steward, who had just entered the cabin with a handful of plates.

On beholding the two guests, Stubbs, who was usually the most stolid creature alive, turned suddenly pale, his mouth came open as if it were on hinges, and the plates fell with a deafening crash from his helpless arms to the floor.

The Admiral could scarcely believe his eyes or his ears. Things were going so furiously wrong on the Imperious, forward and aft, and from keel to truck, that he scarcely knew what would happen next. The alleged ward was not disposed to remain long in the background, and she now announced, as she spread her skirts over a chair:

"I 'ear there's to be a French Cap'n to lunch with us. I 'ope he's young and 'andsome, and ain't married. I'm a-goin' to set my cap at him straight!"

The Admiral took a turn up and down the cabin in his perturbation. He glanced uneasily at Stubbs. Was it possible that Miss Clavering was so outlandish that even the steward was nonplussed by her? This seemed to be the fact, for Stubbs wore a grin that extended from ear to ear, but which disappeared like lightning as soon as he felt the Admiral's eye on him. And—horror of horrors—Admiral Harford, turning to his ward, distinctly saw her wink at the steward. Amazed and disgusted, the Admiral was about to give her a hint as to her behavior when Captain Laborde was announced.

The French officer was a perfect type of the gay, debonair, gallant French navy man. He greeted the Admiral with effusion, and bowed low when he was presented to "My ward, Miss Clavering," and "Mr. Bosanquet, who has just joined the ship."

Admiral Harford was conscious that his French friend knew something of English society, and of the manners and language of well-bred English girls, and it was, therefore, with a sickening of the soul that he realized in five minutes that the Frenchman was secretly surprised and undisguisedly amused at Miss Clavering. For she was so very loquacious, so distressingly familiar, and so aggressively flirtatious that a blind man would have seen it. Nor were her riotous demonstrations confined to Captain Laborde. She took a coquettish tone with Admiral Harford, and demanded to know when she and Elderberry, as she disrespectfully called her absent governess, would be asked to visit the Admiral's little place at Richmond.

"And it's so romantic," she continued, flirting her fan; "I've been to Richmond, and we've seen your place. There's a beautiful little lane at the end of the lawn—it's called Hugging Lane." Miss Clavering pronounced it 'Uggin'. "And we'll take such moonlight walks! We'll walk down the lawn until we get to Hugging—ha! ha!"

The Admiral scowled, and to his disgust Captain Laborde roared with laughter, which was increased when the supposed Miss Clavering remarked that guardians sometimes fell in love with their wards—for her part, she always had a notion to marry in the navy.

"And will you extend zat to zee French Navee?" asked Captain Laborde with a grin.

"That depends," replied Miss Clavering, giving the Frenchman a roguish nudge.

"Shall we go to the table?" said Admiral Harford in desperation, although the steward had not given the signal. It occurred for the first time to Admiral Harford that he had bestowed next to no attention upon the little midshipman; but, beginning some commonplaces of conversation with him, the boy turned red and white and white and red so fast that the Admiral privately concluded Bosanquet's boy was as queer as Clavering's girl. And what was still more strange, whenever the lad looked at Miss Clavering his eyes grew indignant, he bit his lip, and seemed to be struggling to command himself from some outbreak. The same, in a less degree, was obvious with the steward.

To add to his exasperation, he saw very plainly that Captain Laborde was leading Miss Clavering on—not that she required any leading—and that, with his assistance, she was getting more obstreperous every minute. This lasted until, absolutely cornered by her questionings, Captain Laborde admitted himself to be a married man. To this the Admiral's ward replied disgustedly:

"W'y, 'ow deceitful you are! 'Ere I thought you was a marryin' man, and you've got a wife already! Well, maybe I'll have better luck with the Hadmiral 'ere!"

If anything could have astonished Admiral Harford at that stage of the proceedings, young Bosanquet's behavior would. He was looking full at Miss Clavering, with blazing eyes of rage. Noticing this, she remarked superciliously, "What hails you, Mr. Bosanquet? You look as though you was

DRAWN BY C. D. WILLIAMS

"THIS IS YOUNG MR. BOSANQUET"

Digitized by Google

scared out of your life. Come, be a little more chipper. You're doin' fine."

"You are an imp——" Young Bosanquet got that far in a kind of paroxysm of indignation—and then suddenly halted.

The worst as well as the best of things have their ending, and this extraordinary luncheon came to an end after an hour of agony to two persons—Admiral Harford and the young midshipman. The Admiral proposed to Captain Laborde to go on deck for their cigars, while he recommended his ward, in a few forced words of civility, to make herself at home in the cabin until he returned.

Left alone together, the miserable Henrietta did not even wait to express her wrath to the outrageous Hodgson, but rushing to the writing-table, scratched off a note, and giving it to the steward, said in an agonized voice:

"Get that to Mr. Fonblanque and I will give you five pounds."

Honest Stubbs' reply to this was:

"I'll do it, miss; not for the five pounds, but to get a pore young lady out of a 'ole," and off he went. Meanwhile, the erstwhile Miss Clavering was making preparations to quit, and Henrietta was in no mood to stop her.

"Well," she cried, putting her hat on; "I can say I've breakfasted with a Hadmiral and a Cap'n in the cabin; and you, miss, can't peach on me, no matter what 'appens."

"No, I cannot," replied Henrietta bitterly. "I cannot. My own folly and wrong-doing have brought me to this pass. But at all events, I shall be rid of you, and I have learned a lesson that will last me the rest of my life."

"Ta-ta," cried Hodgson, picking up her skirts; "I don't want a character from you, and my wages is paid to date, so good-by to you." And she skipped out, pausing long enough to tickle the orderly's ears on her way through the gangway.

In a few minutes more Fonblanque appeared. Henrietta, who had then assumed her own garments in the sleeping-cabin, came out and rushed toward him, and amazed him very much by bursting into hysterical tears on his neck.

"Why, what is this?" he asked amazed.

"Only get me off the ship and I will tell you all," sobbed Henrietta; "but not a moment must be lost. I must go before the Admiral comes back."

"And so must I," ruefully replied Fonblanque. "I've no business here unless the Admiral sends for me—but I couldn't resist your note. There is some mystery——"

"Indeed there is," cried Henrietta, bursting into equally hysterical laughter. "Only, for Heaven's sake, take me off this ship unseen by the Admiral!"

Fonblanque thought a moment. "You can get away, unseen by the Admiral, by the forward gangway—the men's gangway. There are several bumboats about leaving now."

A few minutes later a young lady, closely veiled, stepped into a bumboat from the forward gangway, in which were already the carpenter's wife and two squalling babies, a couple of chicken-coops, and the bumboat woman herself. And in this company Henrietta Clavering made her way to the dock, took a cab, and in an hour was safe at Ivy Lodge. And having committed the greatest folly of her life, she did the best she could to repair it by falling on good Miss Elderberry's neck and confessing all.

The next step was to confess to Roger Fonblanque, who was far more severe on poor Henrietta than good Miss Elderberry; but the girl's distress was so keen that Roger was obliged to forgive her, and then surprised her very much by bursting into a roar of laughter.

"I'm thinking of the Admiral," he gurgled, and then haw-hawed steadily for an hour.

Nothing more was heard of the infamous Hodgson, but in time a letter came from Admiral Harford in reply to one from Miss Elderberry. That excellent woman, in the most ingenious manner, without actually telling a lie, conveyed the impression to the Admiral that Miss Clavering had never been near the Imperious on that fateful Sunday. In his reply the Admiral retailed feelingly the shameful hoax which had been worked on him, not only by the alleged Miss Clavering, but the bogus midshipman, who, he had found, was not young Bosanquet at all. No doubt he was a confederate of the young woman's, and their object was probably plunder. The Admiral also said he would be at Ivy Lodge next day to visit his ward and Miss Elderberry.

Henrietta put on her prettiest gown, her sweetest looks and most modest manner to please her guardian, and succeeded to perfection. Her gentleness, submissiveness and dignity charmed him, and it was with difficulty that he nerved himself to the task of admonishing her on the question of poor Fonblanque.

"It's out of the question—out of the question altogether. You are too young—only nineteen—and—and—it's time enough when you are of age."

"Just as you think," murmured Henrietta, "but mayn't I—just write a line to Roger occasionally—with Miss Elderberry's approval?"

The Admiral had meant to be very stern, but to his surprise he found himself agreeing to this arrangement, and before he left Ivy Lodge he had succumbed so completely to Henrietta's seductions that he was simply an object to be wrapped around his ward's little finger. So much so, that at the end of a year (ten months before she was of age) he found himself giving her away at her marriage to Roger Fonblanque. The match turned out beautifully, and the Admiral, to this day, boasts of the success he had in managing what is commonly considered a difficult subject, viz., a pretty and willful girl.

"But I did it—I did it as well as any man in the service," the Admiral was in the habit of triumphantly remarking; and very likely he was right.

Down the MIDWAY at the PARIS Exposition By Vance Thompson

IN BUILDING expositions—as in writing sonnets or founding empires—a touch of madness is not to be despised. There is always a time for the calm, critical attitude, when one begins to talk of the latest thing in machinery and the most impressive thing in commerce; but, after all, the success of an exposition depends largely upon its flighty ideas—its Eiffel Tower or its moving sidewalks. You must mount the hippogriff and ride a bit in the clouds. The successful exposition is essentially ephemeral. It is born with the budding leaves of April and dies when the leaves turn yellow. And when you walk away from it in the autumnal hours you remember, not the palace of art, not the grim hall of industries, but some visionary temple of Cochin-China.

One may level many an accusation against France in these days—it has even been said that she sympathizes with the Boers—but one cannot denounce her for lack of imagination. And this bright Gallic imagination, inventive, subtle and artistic, has wrecked itself on what may be called the odd features of the Exposition. For instance, it suspected that the world might be a trifle tired of the Eiffel Tower—this lean, arachnean monster that has spun his filaments some ten hundred feet in the air. It was not impossible to create three monsters like it, each to serve as the leg of a table; nor was it impossible to erect on this table another Eiffel Tower that should be impiously like the Tower of Babel. And then there was Monsieur Tropey-Bailley, who dreamed of transforming the Eiffel Tower into a hotel one hundred stories high—and thus insulting the highest "sky-scraper" in America. There were other dreams of Babylonian gardens, of holes deeper than any holes in the ground, of uncanny iron monsters that should tower in the air. Fortunately these have all been refused by the calm and critical commissioners.

In size, the Chicago Exposition was the biggest thing of the sort that has ever been seen. Here in Paris it would be impossible to compete with it. And then bigness, after all, is rather a small boy's ideal. The Exposition of 1900 aims at synthesizing the progress of the century, not only in art and letters, in mining and machinery, in commerce and exploration, in science, pedagogy and social economics, but as well in amusements. Do you remember the first exposition? It was held here in Paris in the seventh year of the Republic. The shopkeepers showed their goods and—by way of amusement—a stout fellow walked up and down playing the bugle. It is a far cry from that bugle to the amusements of the Exposition Universelle de 1900. You shall see.

FOUR CENTURIES OF OLD PARIS

Of all the amusement features of the Exposition the most conspicuous is the Giant Wheel. It has not the pretty attraction of novelty. We have seen the great wheels go around at Chicago, at London and at Vienna. But none of them was quite what this is. There are eight hundred tons of steel in it. The mere statement has an air of grandeur. And then the suspended cars are comfortably diversified into dining-rooms, concert-halls, "smokers," parlors, reading-rooms, so that one may make one's aerial journey at one's ease and enjoy the subtle sensation of dining, being sea-sick, and hearing music at three hundred feet above Paris. And Paris is a picturesque city. You will never know just how picturesque until you look at it from a moving car of the great wheel—seeing it now from one plane and then from another, until the Pantheon and the towers of Notre Dame, the Butte Montmartre and the Arc de Triomphe seem to be dancing a stately old-fashioned minuet over the shining city.

DRAWN BY C. D. WILLIAMS

—you will see as much of the moon as is good for you

In creating the Vieux Paris, also, novelty has not been neglected. Every one has seen an Old Antwerp, an Old London, an Old Brussels, or Prague. Yet this Old Paris, stretching along the Seine, is so well done that it is rather a historical reconstruction than a mere "side-show." It is an abridgment, a condensation of that old Paris of the long ago, when the ducal palace elbowed the little shop and the gallows stood over against the school. To have taken one definite period would have been, perhaps, too simple. Robida, the artist who devised this old city, had the happy thought of showing, in three divisions, the changes that have come over Paris from the fifteenth century to the beginning of the nineteenth; thus you may live—in one afternoon—through four centuries, visiting the old theatres, hearing the old songs, eating the old dinners, perhaps in the historic Pomme de Pin.

THE MOON AT ARM'S LENGTH

There was a learned little man, a Monsieur François Deloncle, who was elected by his neighbors in the Lower Alps to the Chamber of Deputies. He devised an enormous telescope which should bring the moon within three feet. When the good peasants of the French Alps heard of this extraordinary project they recalled M. Deloncle and elected another man in his place. They were convinced that their deputy had gone mad. However, M. Deloncle went his way. He built his telescope, larger than that of Mr. Yerkes, larger than the Grünewald telescope of Berlin. Of course it will not bring the moon within a yard, but the glass is five times stronger than any glass in existence, so doubtless you will see as much of the moon as is good for you. If M. Deloncle had found some way of abolishing the moon I should have had a better opinion of him. There is too much moonlight in the world, anyhow; too many things happen under the influence of that absurd calcium-light; had it not been for the moon I am quite sure Juliet would have died in her bed, a respectable old grandmother, and Hamlet would never have seen a ghost; and as for you and me—well, there is no use going back that far. Still, I think that when the moon is brought within three feet it would be no bad plan to have marriage licenses within, say, a foot and a half.

Just for a moment imagine that you were a smoker of opium or an eater of hasheesh, lying in a dim-lit room trying to conjure up visions of the Arabian Nights. Black slaves would pass, jostling one-eyed Calendars; Princes would ride abroad on flying horses; genii would rise—like the smoke from your pipe—from fantastic bottles; and palaces, yellow and red, would flower in the night like orchids. Now there is one palace that represents all fairyland. It is something white and wonderful, something visionary and bright.

A PALACE OF WATER, GLASS AND COLORED LIGHTS

Some such dream as this, I think, must have crossed the mind of M. Ponsin when he created his luminous palace. He made it of glass. Any brutal, unpoetic man may put up a palace of iron; and there is something commonplace in building palaces of stone—every one has done it; it is the obvious, stupid thing. But a palace of glass? Foundations built of solid blocks of glass, dense and milky; girders and pillars of green, striated glass; floors of glass cubes in all colors of the rainbow; glass that twists into arches and curves into staircases—it is Proteus of the fable. Now this building, it should be remembered, stands upon a mass of granite rock, over which foams and ripples a white cascade of water, falling at last into the lake at the left of the Eiffel Tower. You cross a little bridge of glass and enter, through capacious doors, the main hall. Heavy portières yield to your hand, a soft, dull Smyrna carpet rumples under your foot—and both are glass. About you are sixteen ruby pillars. You look up, and just underneath the great dome you see a globe on which there poises lightly the Daughter of the Sun. How this damsel should pose there in the middle of space you do not quite understand. But when you are cudgeling your brain you see that the great hall has spun itself out into five smaller galleries and that each gallery represents one of the five parts of the world. From where you sit you can see down a shining vista the sands of the Sahara, brown as a blanket, and the lean camels passing, the dust of the caravan, the white cloak of a sheik who spurs on ahead; you can see the gilded cities and patient fields of India; you glimpse a vision of Dakota wheatfields—sixteen sturdy steam reapers marching out abreast through the yellowing grain; and then a train of dogs, a white snow-field, men in furs shuddering together—all the useless tragedy of the North Pole.

Visions of Aladdin's Palace—I don't know how they are created. I asked M. Ponsin. I called him Vitruvius—not to shock him, but merely to show him that I knew Latin. He was pleased with my erudite compliment and said: "You see the main feature of our age is the triumph of light. I have taken the lamp-chimney and made it a palace; I have taken the little light that lit a room and lit up five parts of the world—it is not an original creation, but a development."

You will carry away from the Exposition a haunting memory of this palace of water, glass and colored lights.

A CHANCE TO WATCH THE WORLD MARCH BY

I have always said that the best of travel was not to travel. There is no real pleasure in being whirled from one part of the world to another. Ishmael, that first wayfarer, found no peculiar delight in being displaced. What he really enjoyed was the charm of the unknown—the new scenes, the new costumes, the alien people, the strange modes of life. That is why you travel, and I. There comes a time when we get too familiar with the Broadway cobble-stones—we can almost call them by name—and for the moment at least there is far more meaning in the asphalt of Paris or the new brick streets of Rome. We do not travel merely for the infantile joy of being moved about—of seeing the telegraph poles go by the car windows or hearing the sea-sick throb of the liner's engine. We journey to see new

Digitized by Google

—the married man who pays to get blown up is a good deal of a spendthrift things. After all, we are a little like the Athenians, whom St. Paul met and spoke unkindly of. Now, when you come to Paris next year you will be able to get fairly well around the world without journeying farther than across the Seine.

In the first place, there is the Tour du Monde; in the supplementary place is an exhibition of peoples and races, shockingly foreign, which explains it in detail.

A trifle theatrical, if you will, this clou, the tour of the world. It is not without reminiscences of a stage play that Dennery made out of a Jules Verne novel and in which we went around the world in eighty days. But here the illusion, undisturbed by the footlights, is complete. To be sure, the scenic environment is built up according to the old theatrical rules. A stretch of canvas will cheat you into believing you see the grayish sands of the Metidjia.

Still the Arabs who ride there in the twilight will be real Touaregs, men who have looked upon Al Khadidjia—that white peak, snow-covered, which is the mother of all those who travel the desert.

And when—as you make the tour of the world, comfortably seated in your easy-chair—the pink and white world of Japan comes into sight, you will see real tea-houses, real geishas out of Yeddo, or perhaps the Street of Flowers. India will pass with its brilliant soldiers in English red, its cowed little rajahs, its sad and visionary little peasants. Here is the blue sky of Attica lighting the Acropolis, the Parthenon, and other grandiose monuments of the past—lighting, too, the wondering tourists, cheap-trippers and "Cookies," modern Greeks and peasants who are in a way akin to the smoky shepherds who drowsed about the fire while Homer rigmaroled his verses—and who paid him with goat's milk. Around the world—Syria, Egypt—here is a village of fellahs, the camp of Menelek, who is the last of kingly Kings—Ceylon with her palms and snakes, Annam with her brown little dancing-girls and her curious pantomimic tragedies, the ruins of Khiner in Indo-China, rice merchants of Changhai——

But this is not a lesson in geography.

One word more, though, if you don't mind. You cross from San Francisco to New York, rapidly, of course, but it seems to me the artist—or shall I call him a stage-manager?—has gripped the essential points of American life. You see the great deserts, the crowded railway stations—Indians selling queer bric-à-brac—the mines and the mountains, the huge cities of the middle West, farmland and woodland, until you find yourself slipping down the Hudson River to New York City. It is a synthesis of American life, a trifle rough and more than a trifle crude, but that is all the traveler sees anyway, and when you enter the Tour du Monde you are a traveler, nothing more.

The Frenchman is a great believer in the second intention—that is, he believes that a thing should be not only what it is, but that it should express a general idea. In making the Exposition of 1900 a historical event—a summary of the century—he has made this idea practical. Will you pause for a moment (on our way to the livelier amusements) at his palace of costumes? It does not interest you, you intimate. Unfortunately, we can't all be dressmakers, theatrical managers or painters. It was for them this great hall was built; for them these scores of rooms were furnished—rooms through which wander Gauls and cavaliers, Princes of the dying Kingdom and Dukes of the new Empire, red-capped Republicans and little smiling women in all the dresses of all the ages. I fancy it would be no bad thing to take one's afternoon tea there now and then, were it merely to persuade one's wife that fashion is a passing thing and she really does not need that last new frock. It will only cost two francs, and that velvet gown costs three hundred.

AN EXCURSION INTO THE LONG-AGO

A little while ago I said that you would find the pictorial tour of the world pleasantly supplemented by the villages, dance-halls, tea-houses, and all that, grouped about the Trocadéro. Boer rough riders, bayadères from Indo-China, acrobats from Siam, Japanese wrestlers, flower venders from Hawaii—you may rub elbows with all these people and scores of others quite as un-American; all the French colonies are represented, and as well those odd parts of the world that have, as yet, not found a Republic to "protect" them. It is here that you will find the Midway—a plaisance that is not uninstructive, though joyously vulgar. A little farther down the river, in the Cour la Reine, is the Palais de la Danse, where the dancers of all the world will be brought together in a "review of the dance through the ages." This historic idea, which dominates the entire Exposition, will be prettily exemplified in these dances—the Ping-Von of the Chinese, the bee dance of Egypt, the Pyrrhic dances of antique Greece, Roman bacchanals, stately sarabands of the Renaissance, and the ultra-modern luminous dances of Loie Fuller and her followers.

A few yards farther and you are in the Andalusia of the time of the Moors—a not uninteresting world, wherein Moorish girls sing by the fountains and gay Spanish cavaliers ride by, strumming guitars. I have mentioned only a few of these excursions into the long-ago and the far-away. They have a certain look of kinship when dressed in black and white—that sober suit of the printed page—but as a matter of fact they differ as much in reality as one sweetheart from another. So you may wander for hours, quite content, because you are in a world which is not your own and are lightened by unusual thoughts.

TRIPS IN BALLOONS AND CANNON BALLS

The grotesqueries of the Exposition may be divided—like all Gaul—into three parts. They soar in the air, burrow in the earth, and splash in the water. A band of New Yorkers will loose in the air a flight of dirigible balloons—"aeroplanes," they are called. At nine in the morning two balloons will be loosed from the Champs de Mars; they will soar away northward to the channel and circle homeward so that they will descend upon Paris at midnight. Another service has been arranged to leave Paris at nine o'clock in the evening for a journey that will end with the dawn.

Not very far from the balloon station is the site of the Great Gun.

This amusement project is one of those things that has to be taken seriously. You inclose yourself in a steel shell, which is loaded into the gun. A doughty gunner fires the cannon. Through the roar of the explosion the shell flies out at the rate of two hundred and fifty miles an hour, and you—please remember—are in the shell. The duration of your journey, however, is only one second. What fraction of a mile you travel in that time I leave you to figure out for yourself. Absurd as this project appears at first sight, it has been worked out on sound and safe principles. The Great Gun is in reality a great catapult. The shell is attached to rings that slide along two cables, and an automatic brake brings the projectile to rest just at the right moment—when you have had your breathless second of speed. I have not tried it yet—the married man who pays to get blown up is a good deal of a spendthrift, I think—but the aerial toboggan should realize that last ideal of the century—speed. In the twentieth century it will be a mere commonplace to be shot about the world through pneumatic tubes. This journey at a good part of a mile the second is a theft from the future.

In this same neighborhood of the Eiffel Tower—where all the fantastic monsters are born—is the Balloon-Cinéorama, a not ignoble device. Here you may stand upon a platform in the centre of a balloon-like globe. The sides, the top, the bottom of the globe are cinematographic records of picturesque scenes in the world—flights of comets in the upper air, bull fights of Madrid, street scenes of New York, armies in battle, railway trains at full speed. And all these scenes race past you, around you, over you, as you stand there on your little platform, dazed.

So much for the clou—a good word, that, which should be English—of the air. For those of the earth I select the most typical: Switzerland. For the first time, I believe, the Alps will be exhibited in Paris. Of course they are not quite "natural size," but when you wander over these artificial mountains, with their snowy peaks, their gorges and mountain torrents, their real pines and firs, their châlets and grazing cattle, you wonder how the thing was ever done at all. But it has been done—in some way or other, here on the Champs de Mars. These blue lakes are Thun and Brienz, yonder towers the Jungfrau, and there—for this geographer is a magician—are châlets of Meyringen, Ormonts and Zermatt. Everywhere, too, the racing white streams and the green uplands—that marvelous "arsenic green" of Switzerland. Do you care to know that the rocks are made of plaster, that the mountains are built on wooden scaffolding, that the waters are pumped from the Seine? I trust you are not quite so materialistic. Let us leave that to the Zolas of life. The finest page in all literature is that wherein Don Quixote declares that he believes in the puppets—that they are not dolls, but Moors and Christians, suffering ladies and noble cavaliers. It is in that way I like to think of this Switzerland.

THE GLASS THEATRE UNDER THE SEINE

Under the water—first of all let us hail this indigent boatman at the Pont de l'Alma and row out into the middle of the Seine. Here, shielded by one of the arches of the bridge, is a huge iron funnel. You climb up a ladder, cross the rim and descend a circular staircase. You go down ten feet and the Seine is over your head ("Oh, to think of it! Lave in it, drink of it, then, if you can!"); ten feet more and you are on a level glass floor. Soft silken green curtains give way before you. You enter a room broad and long, dim-lighted, but curiously green. All is transparent glass; under your feet you see the waters coiling; around you and above you the dark tides slip by. Slim fish peer in at you. The noise of passing steamers sifts down to you. At the far end of the room the lights have brightened. You make out a stage. This is the theatre of the world of waters. And the play? Is this the Lorelei who combs her golden locks, singing? It may be. Some mermaid, certainly, with tragic sea-green eyes and a tragic knowledge of good and evil; and see, here drifts a drowned sailor, and there the sirens come singing. A strange little theatre, this; strange dramas they play here under the world-old, sin-weary waters of the Seine: come away, little girl, for here your edelweiss will wither.

Slim fish peer in at you

MOVING PICTURES OF DEEP-WATER LIFE

There are the two great aquariums, that of Paris and the Trocadéro. The former was devised by Guillaume, an artist whom it is a diploma of good taste to admire. He has shown the reality of the under world of waters as the phantasy is shown in the theatre in the Seine. A wrecked steamer, the descent of divers, the monstrous vegetation, and gross, blind fish of the deep-sea are all there—so real that they will haunt your dreams. Most of the fish are real.

They were, however, certain gigantic calmars, enormous cetaceans that could not live if dragged out of their submarine slime and carted away to make a Parisian holiday. Yet across the waters, jostling the real fish and divers, huge ghosts of them will glide—cinematographic projections.

THE AQUARIUM OF THE TROCADÉRO

From your glass platform you may see all this, wondering. The aquarium of the Trocadéro will surprise even old Parisians. Underneath the Trocadéro, stretching from the Avenue Kléber to the quarter of Passy, is a network of old mines and quarries, fifty feet underground. For two hundred years they have been abandoned. Above them a new coquettish city has been built. In 1878 a small portion of these catacombs was cut off and made into an aquarium. Perhaps you remember it. It is still a "feature" of Paris. Still it was insignificant, and to right and left—30,000 square yards—stretched galleries, caves and grottoes that are made to the aquarist's hand. In these dark, mysterious halls the "aquarium of the Trocadéro" is building fantastic grottoes, glass pools, rivers lighted with electricity and swarming with the strange life of the seven seas.

Shall I tell you of the theatres?

Of Guignol and his puppet friends, of Sylvestre's mimed rogueries, of mystery plays of the past and drolleries of the present?

After being shot from a cannon—after having hobnobbed with mermaids—that would be too simple.

Digitized by Google

His Word as Good as His Oath

By Octave Thanet

MATIE JAQUITH came to the Tabers one July afternoon to talk with Esther about the wedding. She found her chum under the willow trees that skirted the pasture, sitting by herself and musing. Esther was a slim, fair, small-featured girl, noticeable among the other pretty girls of the Jersey Ridge Road by her wealth of yellow hair and a particularly graceful carriage of the head. She was quite unconscious that she carried her head well; but she knew that she had a great deal of hair, and that it was as fine and shining as yellow silk.

"I was sure I'd find you here," said Matie, laughing, "though your father told me he thought you were upstairs. But I saw Oscar scooting across the pasture, and I came straight here."

"It's pleasanter out here than in the house this warm weather," said Esther with a fleeting blush. Matie, who was plump, and a little short of breath from her rapid walk, threw herself on a grassy knoll which the cows had cropped closer than a lawn-mower can shave. "I came on business," said she. "I heard you'd changed all your arrangements for the wedding, and I wanted to know, because if you're not going to have bridesmaids I don't want to begin on my dress."

Esther turned her face away, but the oval of cheek that Matie could see burned red and redder. "It's what you might expect, I guess," she said, "but that doesn't make it any easier. Father and Mrs. Riddle can't both go to the wedding. And they've both got all ready."

"I thought that Mrs. Riddle was going to visit Phil's folks all summer," said Matie.

"So she was, but little Phil has the scarlet fever and they're all upset; and you know how afraid she is of giving trouble."

"Yes—I think she's a real nice, sweet woman," said Matie, a little apprehension in her voice, as if she might arouse resentment.

"I know she is!" agreed Esther warmly, to Matie's surprise. She shifted back to the wedding. "But you were saying, about the wedding——?"

"Why, father heard that she couldn't go to Phil's, and he was expecting as much as anything to give me the wedding, and I"—Esther hesitated—"I know father was a little glad to be neighborly, and give the party, and show folks that he didn't bear malice—though he has reason to, after the way he's been treated," cried Esther with a flash of her blue eyes. "But he wanted to give a nice party, and I wanted to have him; and how would it look to have me married in my father's house without my father! But he was trying to concoct a scheme of being called off suddenly—so like a man; as if she'd come to his house, even if he wasn't there—and—and, Matie, he was going to take the picture with him in his trunk, so she could come——"

"The picture?" repeated Matie, a little bewildered, but instantly she colored with excitement. "Not Colonel Ingersoll's picture? Oh, my! Then it was true what folks said. Esther, did you hear about it? I never said a word——"

"I know you didn't, Matie, and it was kind; but father told me himself. I know he was to have married Mrs. Riddle when they were young, and they had a—a disagreement, it was said, about the picture; she didn't think it was right for him, a church member, to keep a big picture of Colonel Ingersoll hanging in his parlor. I don't think he'd told her how the Colonel lent money to his uncle, and when his uncle died made a Christmas gift of what was left on the note (more than half) to Aunt Melinda. And finally she told him that she would never go into the house while that picture hung there; and he said that in that case she never would go into it, for so long as he had a house Colonel Ingersoll's picture should hang there. And they parted."

"But was that why he said he never would speak to her again? He did say it?"

"Oh, yes; he said it. That was the next day—you know Elder Riddle?"

"Yes; my father said it was as much the Elder made the trouble as the picture; all the girls were running after him, going to evening meeting and having trouble with their souls, and all that——"

"It was the Elder, too," said Esther quietly; "father told me all about it. He said Mrs. Riddle didn't do a thing out of the way; it was all his fault, poor father. He said he heard that the Elder was going to take her to a revival meeting at the Creek, and you know father didn't believe much in revival meetings—that was one thing they brought up afterward—and he didn't think it was nice for the young folks to be driving eight miles by moonlight in buggies—and I don't either—and father didn't believe in eternal punishment—that was another charge against him, afterward—and so he went to her; and, Matie, I think he hoped that it would end in their making up, and he had bought such a pretty pin—he showed it to me—and he was carrying it in his pocket to give her when they were friends again. Poor father! But it didn't end that way. She told him that if he couldn't do a favor for her she oughtn't to do one for him. I think she expected him to give in; and she hated the talk there was about father's not being 'sound' in the doctrines, and thought it would be a great thing to win him over. I don't know what she thought, or what he thought, but he said he couldn't go back on a friend, and she said that was her case; and they both got angry, and finally father told her that if she went that evening to that 'religious circus'—he admitted he ought not to have used those words—that he never would speak to her again. Well, she did go. And father never breaks his word."

"I know," said Matie musingly; "my father says that your father's word is as good as any other man's oath."

"It is; and everybody knows how honest he is, and how many kind deeds he does, and he's the first man they come to with a subscription paper——"

"I know he is; and they say at the store that just to say berries come from Taber's is enough; nobody hauls over his boxes to see if they run even; they know. And my father says that he expects to meet your father in Heaven as much as he expects to go there himself!"

She had her arms about Esther, and Esther's graceful head was on her shoulder; she felt a tear sting through the thin muslin; but directly the head went up again proudly.

"Yet, all the same—and everybody knows how good he is—all the same, they put him out of the church—or at least they told him they were going to; and he said there was no need of putting him out, he could go himself; and he wrote them a letter—but it's no use going all over that. Father stays home Sundays and reads his Bible and good books. I wanted to stay home with him, but he wouldn't let me."

"It wasn't so much one thing, I think," said Matie, "as it was everything. They made a special point of his keeping the picture, and of his making a wicked vow not to speak to Ellen McIntyre. Deacon McIntyre was the bitterest about that; he said it cast a slur on his daughter's name, him acting that way. And—and you know that drummer who said at the store that there was something in it when a man wouldn't speak to a girl he'd expected to marry, and he guessed it wasn't the girl broke it off (you know he'd tried to go with her himself, and he couldn't; and he was mean!), and your father heard of it. Then he did speak! He went to the store and marched up to that fellow before a dozen men, and he says: 'Miss McIntyre and I have parted because we don't agree about religion; I respect her more than any woman in the world, for my mother's dead; and I'll thrash any living fool who dares to take her name in his mouth, and I'm going to begin with you!' He did. He gave him an awful beating. I heard that she wrote him after that; but I guess not, for only the next month it came out that she was to marry the Elder."

"Yes," said Esther; "she wrote him. It was a nice note, too; father said it was a beautiful note. It hurt him awfully that he couldn't answer."

"On account of what he had said?"

"Yes; it was his word."

There was a silence through which they could hear the twitter of the sparrows and the wind rustling the oatfield. Twice Esther parted her lips irresolutely to speak, and said nothing; her nature was not like her mother's, who had been a happy, prattling, confiding creature, although blind; but like her father's, and he always expressed his emotion in action; perhaps he had times of thinking that he had spoken once too often.

"I always wondered why she married the Elder," said Matie. "Mother said it was her parents' persuasions. They were very bitter about your father, and they liked the Elder. I guess he was a good, kind man, but always thinking he could do something else better than what he was doing, and always moving. They went away from here the year they were married. Two months after, your father went. Esther, didn't your father move away just to spare her feelings?"

"Yes. But he moved back after mother died. My father was very happy with my mother," said Esther with a little proud lift of her head. "But she died when I was only two; I don't remember anywhere but here."

Again the silence fell, and the birds twittered and the wind raced through the oatfield.

"You were telling me about the wedding, Esther," said Matie, "and your father going out of town."

"Yes, he's going; he has written to Aunt Melinda Hopkins to come. And—Matie, Oscar says she's going, too! They're both going! And I'm so ashamed! I know folks will laugh, but I don't mind that; it's their criticising father like they will. And so we have talked it over, Oscar and I, and we are going to take things in our own hands"—her voice broke with a little quiver between a laugh and a sob—"we're going out of town, too! We're going to Fairport quietly tomorrow morning, and we're going to stop all this fuss by just getting married by ourselves!"

"Oh, good gracious, Essie, don't do that!"

"Why not?"

"Why, how it looks! So funny!"

"Not so funny as being married with both our parents running away to avoid seeing us. You don't see, Matie, that it's as much to help them out of the fix as anything!"

"I'm sure they won't like it," persisted Matie; but her arguments were useless.

The more she thought about the plan the less she liked it; she tried to get over to see Esther again, but when she came Esther had gone downtown, the Swede girl who was a "helper" in the family told her. And Matie had only a few moments to stay. It was too far to come again that evening. Matie, at the end of her devices, sat down and wrote a few lines. "Give that to her when she comes back, please," she said. "Be sure she gets it; it's about something I want her to do to-morrow. Be sure, won't you, Elna?"

Elna said she would be sure, and she thought she was filling all injunctions when, having forgotten it until morning, she sought for Mr. Taber and handed him the note, saying: 'Matie Yaquith vas gif it to me, and it vas sometings she want you to do to-day sure, and Esther see vas gone; so you see."

Taber took the note and opened it and read:

> "Oh, dear Essie, don't go off and get married in Fairport as you said; I know your father will be grieved. You oughtn't to be married without him present, such a kind father as he's been and much as you love him; and Oscar ought not to put that slight on his mother! Stay home and be patient a little longer, and let us see if we can't persuade him to come and have her come, too; they needn't speak to each other a word. At least it's worth trying. Somehow a runaway marriage always puts things in a bad light; it looks as if the parents were cruel or the girl was rash and foolish; and you are not and they are not. Do, do please wait till I can see you again!
>
> "Your loving MATIE."

Taber was a tall man, more than six feet, with a fine gray, Roman head. This towering head with its silken mass of hair made people turn to look at him in a crowd.

He cast a keen gray eye on the Swede. "Esther got off all right to Fairport, didn't she?" said he. He made his voice careless. Whatever had happened, no need for that fool girl to get a tongue-load of gossip.

"She vent somevereres," said Elna peacefully. "I tout see go downtown, but see haf a bag."

"SAY, COULD YOU GO OVER AND KINDER EXPLAIN TO HER?"

Digitized by Google

"She'd ought to have waited for me. It's too warm for walking. You needn't git dinner; I'll be gone all day."

"In the whole world!" cried Elna to the landscape, as he walked away; "vat a funny man not to tell before."

A little later she beheld him driving out of the gate in his Sunday black (a warm suit for the day) and his white brocaded cravat. Matie Jaquith drove the team home. She did not reprove Elna for her oversight, but smiled on her in the friendliest way.

Elna's eyes grew round with wonder of the situation; they had grown rounder were she of psychic mould and able to see the interior of the last car on the train which shrieked at that instant through the hills, for she would have beheld, comfortably seated, a whole seat to herself in the middle of the car, the widow of Elder Riddle; and two seats behind her, Esau Taber himself.

He had driven straight to the Jaquiths', finding Matie in the strawberry patch culling some of the last fruitage.

He made for the heart of the question without delay.

"Well, I'm glad you got the note, I guess," said Matie. "I suppose you are going to—to the wedding?"

"I guess so. Only"—he fingered the reins in his hand—"only, seems like at such a time Essie'd like some—some woman. If you——"

Matie drew a deep sigh; the prospect had its charm; there is always a pleasure in being in the heart of exciting things. But Matie deserved Taber's praise—she had sense. "I don't want to refuse you, Mr. Taber, and I do want to go to Essie's wedding; but she didn't ask me, and there's another woman who ought to go much more than I."

He was looking away from Matie at a sky which he did not see. "You mean Mrs. Riddle?"

"Yes," said Matie sturdily, although she told her mother afterward she felt little quivers running down her spine, and wondered if he would forbid her ever entering his doors, as he had the worthy Mrs. McRae, who had tried to make peace in Israel in her time.

He did nothing of the kind: she could hardly believe her senses at the gentleness of his voice. "I guess you're right. Say, could you go over and kinder explain to her?"

"I'd be glad!"

"Make her understand Essie was doing it to help me out of the fix, and she ain't a flighty, silly piece that thinks it smart——"

"Oh, she knows that, Mr. Taber."

"And—and—of course I don't need to go."

Matie ran her eye over the careful toilet—the neatly brushed frock coat, the shining boots, the white brocaded scarf—and said it would be a shame for him not to go; and grown daring from her success, she added: "I don't see a mortal reason why you can't both go; you don't need to speak to each other!"

"Why, so we don't." Matie fancied that he caught at the suggestion. "You could explain that to her, too, Matie?"

"Oh, certainly. I'll go right away."

"I'll drive you over, Matie. I'll leave you at the gate."

"Won't folks be talking!" thought Matie grimly, for all the five years since the Widow Riddle's return the strange relations between the old lovers had been of interest to the gossips.

Taber was the richest man in the village. It was a Scotch colony settled in the prairie, clinging to its old faiths with a sterner fidelity than the easy-going West often can show. It had frowned on the upright heretic for twenty-two odd years, bought and sold and dickered with him, but never passed beyond the chill courtesy of business dealings. Only the Jaquiths ever "ran in" to the Tabers. Poor old Widow McRae used to go, but her fate was a warning. Plainly Esau Taber was a man of wrath—a stiff-necked transgressor, who had a chance to marry the sweetest woman in the Ridge and flung it away—flung it into her face, one may say, since it was suspected that she had made advances and been repulsed. The Ridge disapproved of Esau, but the children of the Ridge had grown up with Esther, and Esther went to church regularly, and the Ridge forgave her, and sent her wedding gifts—at least, they were beginning to send them. It was to be feared this unseemly conduct would check the stream of good will. Matie feared it herself.

She was successful in her errand; the widow would do anything. She was a gentle, pretty woman, who had repented (were the truth known) all her life her single burst of petulant self-assertion. She had been a good wife to the Elder, who was an exemplary but trying man—according to his several flocks where he had stayed any length of time. And she had been a most devoted mother to her two boys, Phil and Oscar. Uncomplainingly she had borne the rash investments of Jacob Riddle, who had frittered away her little patrimony early in their married life. She had never reproached him when she found that he had borrowed money on the life insurance, the payments for which she had kept up out of her own little driblets of earnings, and that he had sunk it all in a church paper which failed; and she was glad of her forbearance when he died, unwitting of the ruin of his hopes. A friend came forward and raised a subscription among the parishioners, past and present, so that the policy was redeemed, and she had a little besides the weak arms of her children and her own wits with which to begin life again. Oscar had been a son in a thousand. Now Oscar (very naturally and rightfully, and she was thankful in her heart for his happiness and his choice), Oscar was to be married and go away to live with his wife. And Oscar was all that she had. Phil was so far away; and Phil's wife was good and kind, but it was so evidently a trouble for her to have Mother Riddle visit them.

These things Ellen Riddle was turning over in her mind while she sat, a pretty little woman, whose hair had a streak of gray in its soft waves, but who needed no glasses for her quiet brown eyes. She sat, and Esau Taber looked at her. He had taken his seat that he might look at her. His eyes never turned from the graceful head and the white neck below. He thought her fairer than the girl that he had loved. The fields were slipping past, golden and ripening to the harvest. He did not see them; he was living through the vanished years. It was a peaceful, happy time with poor Esther, who had loved him and needed him so; he wondered why he hesitated so about marrying her, after he knew that the blind girl cared for him; he must have been a pretty mean young fellow! He knew, too, that he never could go back to Ellen. His own hands had digged a pit between them deep enough to last both their lives. No doubt she had forgotten him—in that way; she never could forgive him for not answering that note she wrote him. Such a kind note! No wonder she went off and married the preacher fellow in a sort of spite. But how many times had he cursed his fool temper for making him say that!

AND WHEN THE CONDUCTOR LOOKED IN AGAIN HE SIMPLY LOOKED AND WITHDREW HIS HEAD, SMILING

How still she sat! Did she feel much? Had she ever felt much? She would be lonely without her boy; and he—if he were to die he shouldn't mind it, now Essie was going. Yet it was he who gave the house of his own accord, because he knew Oscar's mother wouldn't be willing to come to his house. Never! And that house he had built, every room of it, for her. He never would sell it when he moved away, and he went back to it feeling a kind of sombre comfort. "She's going to be lonely, and so'm I; and if I hadn't been the worst fool on earth we could—— Oh, Lord!" He bit a groan back and forced his eyes away.

Then the rustle of skirts made him turn his head. She was coming to him. He gasped; his ruddy face turned a kind of bluish white. She was pale, but quite composed; her voice was the same low voice, with the same hesitation that was not a stammer, which he used to love; it had been years since he had heard her voice.

"Excuse me, Mr. Taber," she said, "but I have something which I must say to you. Will you please let me say it? You don't need to say a word—not a word."

Mechanically he made room for her on the seat.

"I have said a hundred times I would say it, and I haven't had the courage, but I am going to say it to-day," she said; "we must fix things so we can make our children happy."

"If you could bear it," she said, "to have me about sometimes; and if you would come to Esther's and Oscar's home just as often as if we were friends"—he made a hasty motion as if to interrupt her, then braced every muscle and turned his head away—"if you could, it would be easier for them. And if we find them, as I am sure we shall, for the minister will surely get your telegram to ask your daughter to wait for you, I know it will please them to have us with them. But, Mr. Taber, nothing would please them so much as to have us reconciled enough to be like other people."

He made no sign; his face was rigid.

"A wicked oath is better broken than kept; you don't think if you'd promised to kill a man you ought to do it."

The fine Roman profile, never wavering, appeared to think he ought.

"I know you don't feel unkindly to me. Esau Taber, there never was a man with a heart like yours! Nor a will. I've prayed for you every night, Esau, for years; and after that I prayed every night God would soften your heart and let you forgive me."

A little spasm of intense emotion twisted his face, but he never turned his head.

"Oh, you poor boy!" she cried, in a sudden comprehension and a passion of pity; "don't be so hard on yourself!" She rose and did not look at him as she spoke. "I will do any way you can think to make it easy. Won't you try to think of some way? So the children won't have to suffer as well as we?"

Then she went away. And he had not broken his word. But he looked after her and hid his face.

"And I'll never be alone again with her," he was thinking; "never on this earth."

The engine pounded the words in his ears, "Never be alone with her again."

But he had kept his word. His word was still as good as his oath. And how he had acted to her! Would it be any easier for her if he was to go back and kill himself in a nice accidental way? Or he could stay in town and blow out the gas—folks from the country were always expected to do that; then she and Essie would have the money. Never be alone with her again! A fool like him deserved killing. He sprang to his feet as, with a shriek from the engine, the whole train made a hideous lurch forward. He reeled across to her seat. He pulled her into the centre of the car, which was staggering forward in a grotesque, hobbling fashion, while the broken window-glass was raining about the car. He threw one arm about her, turning her head from the windows. She clung to him.

"Oh, Esau, what is it?"

He looked at her. He did not speak. On his face was a look of the strangest triumph.

"I am not afraid," she whispered; "tell me what to do and I will do it."

With a long, quivering sigh he held her head against his breast, shielding her face. His own face, his hand, were cut and bleeding.

The car's plunging gait grew feebler, stopped.

"Lady got a scare?" inquired the conductor. "I saw it coming and jumped for the rope—much good that does."

"What was it?" said Taber. Silently he handed Mrs. Riddle to a seat and gave her a fan; he was trembling so that he put his hands in his pockets.

"Collision. Nobody killed, though. Hullo! you caught the glass, didn't you, trying to save your wife? You are a sight! Lemme git you a towel!"

"Oh, no!" cried Mrs. Riddle. "Oh, you are hurt! Let me!"

"No, you don't, Nellie," cried Taber. "Set still; I'll get it myself."

He walked off for the towel, and let the conductor help him wash a few deep cuts; and it was while the latter was bathing him (Mrs. Riddle quietly supplementing his ministrations by holding the tumbler and giving her whole store of handkerchiefs in place of a towel—not provided in day cars) that he suddenly winced.

"Bad one?" said the conductor; "hurt you?"

"No," said Taber. For the first time he realized that he had spoken.

His eyes went to Mrs. Riddle's; they were sparkling; her cheek was flushed.

"Lady ain't hurt, anyhow," said the conductor gallantly; "she looks fresh as paint. Well, I guess I got to look out and see the others. I'm afraid you are in for a two-hours' wait, anyhow."

"We are thankful our lives are spared," said Mrs. Riddle with much propriety; but the second he was behind the door she turned to Taber. "Esau," she said timidly, "forgive me calling you that, but—you called me Nellie."

Taber drew a deep intake of breath and wiped his brow.

"You did speak to me," she said, "and—it was just an accident; but it's done, and——"

"And I'm going to speak," said Taber. "I'm beat! I don't care what the folks say. I've broken my word and now I'm going to smash it. Nellie, I thought we were sure gone; and I said I would die, keeping still; and then—I just spoke before I knew."

"Of course," she said, "it was an accident. Thank God! Now come and sit down and let's have a good talk."

And when the conductor looked in again he simply looked and withdrew his head, smiling.

"Well, I like to see an old gentleman and his wife fond of each other," said the conductor; "talking away as if they hadn't seen each other for a year, and he kissing her hand."

Digitized by Google

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

A New Committee and Two New Leaders in the House

A Committee on Insular Affairs is one of the new things in the House of Representatives. It is a practical announcement of the country that we have got new problems and new responsibilities, and the seriousness of it is shown in the fact that the committee has upon it seventeen of the strongest men of the House, including chairmen of five of the most important committees—the Committee on Appropriation, Committee on Ways and Means, Committee on Inter-State and Foreign Commerce, and the Committee on Post-offices and Post-roads. It has rarely happened in the history of Congress that any new committee is so strongly constituted.

After an interesting contest the Democrats selected as their leader James Daniel Richardson, of Murfreesboro, Tennessee, one of the ablest members of the House. He served in the Confederate Army, afterward read law, was in the Tennessee Legislature, is one of the highest Masons, and is now serving in his fifteenth year in Congress.

At the outset of Congress Robert Walker Tayler, of Lisbon, Ohio, where Senator Mark Hanna was born, and the representative of President McKinley's District, became the Republican leader in the Roberts case. He is still in the front ranks of his party in the House. Mr. Tayler is only forty-seven, but he is now serving his third term.

Some of the Work of the Present Session

In his message the President urgently recommended "that to support the existing gold standard, and to maintain 'the parity in value of the coins of the two metals (gold and silver) and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the market and in the payment of debts,' the Secretary of the Treasury be given additional power, and charged with the duty to sell United States bonds, and to employ such other effective means as may be necessary to these ends." Already a financial measure along these lines has been passed by the House of Representatives, and the Senate will doubtless agree to something similar to it, although, as usual, its bill will be slightly different from that of the House. It is fully understood that the legislation for the gold standard is for political purposes.

Growing out of the present situation, however, are interesting possibilities. On the one side we have a great concentration of the nation's wealth in a few big banks; and on the other a cry for a more liberal money issue by the Government. The present Administration seems to be going in the direction of an absolute gold standard, and the conviction of the men behind this is that the Government should get out of the banking business and intrust the finances to private corporations, as is the case in the leading European countries.

Little is expected in the way of tariff legislation, and the war taxes will undoubtedly go on. There will probably be no River and Harbor bill. The Nicaragua Canal bill will be pushed, but the usual result is expected for it. The pension list is rolling up again, and it will increase as the lists from the war with Spain and with the Filipinos come in. There are innumerable bills against trusts, but no one really expects any immediate legislation upon this point. This is rather peculiar, as the trust question will undoubtedly be a leading issue in Presidential politics. For this reason, the following extract from a recent report of Attorney-General Griggs is made:

"Such actions can be maintained only when the offense comes within the scope of the Federal statute. The only Federal legislation against combines in restraint of trade is contained in the so-called Sherman act of July 2, 1890. It will be observed that this statute is directed only at combinations or monopolies in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations. It does not pretend to go into other branches of business or commerce, or attempt in any way to interfere with those transactions which are carried on exclusively within the confines of the State, or which do not amount to what, under the decision of the United States Supreme Court, is understood by the term 'interstate commerce.' The Federal Government has no constitutional right to supervise, direct or interfere with the transactions of ordinary people of the several States, unless such business relates directly, and not incidentally, to interstate commerce, and such has been the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States."

The Increasing Flood of Bills in Congress

Although the Fifty-sixth Congress is not quite two months old, between five and ten thousand bills and resolutions are upon its files. Of course at best only the smallest fraction of these will ever become operative. In our elastic scheme of representative government our politicians, who are—when they can be—in the United States Senate or in the House of Representatives, do not hesitate to place on the records anything and everything reaching them from their constituents. In most cases they calmly announce that they offer certain resolutions, or introduce certain bills by request, thereby in a slight legislative fiction escaping all personal responsibility for fathering the idea which the papers contain. In several instances the proud representatives of the people carry the idea of free government to an interesting extremity. For instance, there is a certain United States Senator who, whenever he receives any communication of a public nature, even though it be a petition signed by thousands of citizens, reads, or has the clerk to read, each word and each name as though the fate of the nation were trembling upon its syllables. If he did not do this, the names would be treated in the ordinary way. But being announced with a due dignity of the human voice, they appear in splendid fullness to the delectation of every signer of the document, which will never be heard of in all probability outside of the abundant pages of the Congressional Record. In all the thousands of bills and resolutions and amendments, and the hundreds of thousands of names signed to petitions, there is every conceivable variety and degree of wisdom and folly from the sanest citizen to the craziest lunatic. Scarcely one out of a thousand is ever read by any Representative or Senator. There is pouring upon Congress a vast mass of sense and nonsense, and in the flood the self-conscious statesman in his frock-coat sits calmly at his desk, little caring what the passing tides are carrying. It took the clerks of the Senate and of the House of Representatives two and a half hours to read the annual message of the President, and if Congressmen had not the endurance to listen to that, how can they know all about the thousands of things that float upon the currents of legislation?

PHOTO BY C. M. BELL, WASHINGTON

HON. ROBERT W. TAYLER

Congress Always Behind with its Work

A famous English statesman once said that it took his people forty years to accomplish a reform after it was recognized as necessary. The House of Parliament is always many years behind its pressing duties. Just now its own papers are thundering against it because it was not able to recognize the wisdom of keeping its army up to the proper strength and equipped with modern guns.

Of all the great countries, our own Congress is nearer to its immediate duties than any other legislative body in the world. But at the very best it never reaches more than a fraction of the things that clamor for attention. If we take all the City Councils and all the Legislatures and the Congress of the United States we shall find that every year several hundred thousand new bills appear for legislation.

More than a Billion-Dollar Congress

Ex-Speaker Reed's famous retort is recalled by the figures from Washington. When some one taunted him that the body over which he presided was a billion-dollar Congress, he replied that the United States was a billion-dollar country. This Congress will go far beyond these figures, possibly several hundred millions beyond. It is an extraordinary sum of money, but it shows how vastly the nation has grown and how rapidly the expenses of conducting it have increased. One fact gives some alarm, and that is that the ratio of expense is growing more rapidly than the ratio of population. The century has changed since Thomas Jefferson was inaugurated with scarcely any cost to the people for the ceremony.

The amount of the entire national debt of Jefferson's time would not run the Government two months now, and the whole sum paid for the Louisiana territory would last only a few days over a week for ordinary expenses. But, then, today we have almost a hundred billion dollars of wealth.

Resolutions of Sympathy for the Boers

There have been introduced various resolutions of sympathy for the Boers, but it is generally recognized that they are more for effect than for any serious expectation that they will be passed. Even if they should be passed, however, there is small likelihood that they would lead to any immediate results. Twisting the lion's tail is a sport not altogether banished from our political arena. In this case, of course, there is more cause than usual on account of the very strong sentiment in many parts of the country in favor of the people of the South African Republic.

Of course, it is not to be expected that the orators would neglect such an opportunity, and possibly if we should be honest with ourselves we should confess that we rather enjoy their indiscretions. But at any rate, the American people, whatever their sympathies, are convinced that they should keep out of any troubles in the other hemisphere—except in the Philippines, where circumstances force them to take a leading part.

All international dealings must of necessity be conducted with the greatest patience and the most scrupulous regard for the proprieties. We exact all this from other Governments, and they have a perfect right to expect it from us. Suppose, for instance, that the national bodies of either France or Germany were to officially declare their sympathy with either the Britons or the Boers in the present unhappy conflict? The results would be in every way regrettable. The United States is in another hemisphere, but that hardly removes it from its responsibilities. Congress sometimes makes doubly hard the tasks of the President and the State Department.

Political Safety in Doing Little

Several weeks ago it was pointed out in these columns that in all Congresses preceding the Presidential campaign the effort was to make the record as innocuous as possible. Already this is evident in the present body. The fact that all branches of the Government—executive, legislative and judicial—are now controlled by the Republican party for the first time in many years, assures harmony. It also promises that the legislation shall be purely and plainly upon the lines laid down by the President in his annual message. It should be remembered that in the case of an executive like President McKinley, an annual message is not altogether a personal statement and proclamation, but an assemblage of party and departmental facts and claims which he signs as the representative of his party organization. There have been Presidents who have stood above and beyond party and impressed their own personalities upon the time. President McKinley does not pretend to belong to that class. He is avowedly a representative of the Republican party, preferring its sentiments as expressed in its various declarations to any positive and personal declarations. His party appreciates this attitude, and so the whole Administration is tuned to the campaign of the present year.

In politics, sins of omission are reckoned less than sins of commission, so it seems better to do too little than too much.

PHOTO BY C. M. BELL, WASHINGTON

HON. JAMES D. RICHARDSON

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN of the HOUR

Two Good Stories on a New Leader

R. W. Tayler, Congressman from President McKinley's old district, has recently come into the public eye by reason of his opposition to the seating of Mr. Roberts, the Utah polygamist. Mr. Tayler lives in Lisbon, Ohio, and in Washington. In both places he occupies rented houses, one of which is, or has been, a source of considerable trouble to him. It was his Lisbon residence that worried him. The landlord was a young man who was hard to please in the matter of buildings. This house had to be altered before the Congressman moved in, and the operation took weeks, and even months. Daily the owner surveyed the work with varying emotions, and usually he ordered done over what had been done. Meanwhile the Congressman's impatience grew daily, until the townsmen took an interest in the affair.

The County Clerk, a near neighbor, decided to have some sport with the Congressman, so he called him up one night on the telephone, simulating the voice and name of the landlord.

"Mr. Tayler," he called cheerily, "I think I'll tear down that porch to-morrow. I am not suited with it."

"What's that?" replied the Congressman.

"I'm going to tear down that porch and build it over again. Do you hear me?"

"Sure," replied Mr. Tayler with a calmness born of desperation. "But why stop with the porch? Don't you think you had better tear the whole house down? If you do, let me suggest that you have some one else build it for you. It will be Doomsday before you ever get a house put up that suits you."

The story spread around the town, and the house was finished within a week, much to Mr. Tayler's delight.

In most things Mr. Tayler is given to the minimizing of facts. He is conservative to a degree, especially in matters concerning himself. This is illustrated by his recent description of a bicycle trip in Washington. The Congressman told of a spin over country roads up to the edge of a steep hill. "When I reached that point," he said, "I dismounted rather hastily, I'll admit, and went the rest of the way on foot."

That is the Congressman's version.

An impartial eyewitness says that Mr. Tayler went half way down the hill before dismounting, and that when he did leave the saddle he plowed up a fair-sized kitchen garden in the soil before he recovered his balance. He is a native of Ohio and is of distinguished ancestry. His father was Comptroller of the Treasury for fifteen years.

Kindness that Found its Reward

The important discovery just made by General Roy Stone that there is a navigable channel for large vessels into the beautiful landlocked bay of Jobos, not far from Ponce, Puerto Rico, is in part the result of that officer's kindness of heart. When he landed, under General Miles, upon the island in 1898, he found a condition of affairs that was almost chaotic. The natives were divided, the Spaniards were demoralized, and the banditti and the White Sabre Society were active, and even destructive. The first thing was to establish law and order in the district he was assigned to. It was very hard at the beginning, not only with the natives, but more particularly the Jibaros and fishermen, who had suffered especially from official misrule and oppression. Among those who gave concern to the American commander was an old man and his sons, who lived somewhere between Ponce and Jobos. They had been robbed by the Spaniards and were active revolutionists. From their knowledge of the coast they soon proved themselves obnoxious to the Spanish forces. When the Americans landed they redoubled their efforts, and every day brought into camp one or more Spaniards, dead or alive, whom they had captured or killed. Numerous complaints were made, and finally the American commander interfered. He sent for the fishermen and appointed them to positions which required their presence near the headquarters. They were so proud of the honor that they forgot their old pastime of killing Castilians. General Stone was especially gracious to them. When it was found that the roadstead at Ponce was altogether too insecure for naval uses a survey was ordered to determine some more convenient harbor.

It was soon learned that the best bay was Jobos, which is landlocked, five miles long, a mile wide, and deep enough for all the navies of the world. But the entrance was barred by rocks, reefs and shoals. The Spaniards pronounced it unnavigable, as did many of the natives. The staff was disappointed, and none more so than General Stone. One day he had a call from one of the fighting fishermen.

"You have been trying to get into Jobos Bay, General, but the farmers told you you could not?"

The General nodded acquiescence.

"You mustn't blame them, sir. They do not know any better. They are not men of wisdom like ourselves. There is a passage through which you can take your biggest three-funnel steamers, and I shall be honored to show it to you or your people, as you may direct. It is a small return for the many honors you have conferred upon us."

The General thanked him, and not long afterward made the trip with the fisherman as guide and found the channel to be as the latter had described.

PHOTO BY MISER, NEW YORK

JAMES A. HEARNE

Hearne's Sag Harbor Critics

James A. Hearne, actor and playwright, has a very attractive home at Sag Harbor on the eastern end of Long Island. The place is old-fashioned, and so far from the lines of travel that it is more like a city of the last century than of the present day. It is beloved of artists and literary men, who find in its quiet atmosphere and romantic surroundings a place of rest and often inspiration. Richard Henry Stoddard lives there, and it was the home of Julian Hawthorne. Mr. Hearne's house is an ideal vacation home. It is invisible from the road. Here he spends his summer in study and is unknown to most of the natives. He, however, studies the people around him with the greatest care. He utilized these studies in his latest play, Sag Harbor, named after the town. There is always a thorn in the rose, though, and the sweets of adulation doled out by the critics were soon mixed with bitterness from some of the denizens of Sag Harbor. The old farmers and retired sea-dogs who inhabit the place read in mute consternation of the skillful picture the playwright had made. This deepened into wrath, and the wrath into a thunderstorm of abuse. One venerable Captain has issued a public pronunciamento in which he says with cold-blooded earnestness:

"I am seventy-five years old, but I am hale and hearty still, and I shall carry with me a certain heavy cane which years ago I carved out of the jawbone of a sperm whale that was killed in the South Seas. I shall be constrained to use it if I find that Hearne has allowed his pen too much freedom with the characteristics and personalities of certain estimable young and old ladies of Sag Harbor, Bridgehampton and East Side."

Inasmuch as none of the characters in the play are vicious or objectionable, it is probable that the old man's wrath will soon subside.

A Partially Obeyed Order

Former State Senator Harmon W. Brown, of Ohio, held a responsible place on the staff of General Rawlins during the Civil War. In contrasting the rigors of the present press censorship in the Transvaal with the lax methods pursued during the Rebellion the Senator recently said:

"One day before Vicksburg the correspondent of a Copperhead paper went to General Rawlins for news.

"The General pondered a moment and took me one side.

"'Take this young man,' he said, 'up to the top of those trenches within a stone's throw of the enemy. Take him up there and lose him. I don't care what happens. Understand?'

"I said I did, and we started through the lines. Both of us were mounted. I pointed out a crest overlooking the enemy and told him he could get a good view from that point.

"'Ain't you coming with me?' he asked.

"'No,' I replied. 'I know all I want to know.'

"So he started alone. As soon as the top of his hat and the tips of his mule's ears showed above the crest there came a volley of musketry ten yards wide that cut the air like a big knife-blade. The crown of his hat was sliced off as with shears; he managed to drop to the ground in safety, but the persevering mule was literally filled with lead. After the firing ceased the correspondent crawled to the spot where I was.

"'Did you learn what you wanted to know?' I asked.

"'Eh?' gasped the correspondent, wiping his face and looking at his hands to see whether they were bloody. 'What I wanted to know? Oh! yes, of course. The enemy are over that ridge all right.'

"When we returned to headquarters, General Rawlins saw us and hailed me. I went inside his tent.

"'I thought I told you to lose that Copperhead reporter somewhere,' he said testily.

"'I did the best I could, sir,' I answered. 'He came back, but I have the honor to report the mule a total loss.'"

Doctor Wilson's Troublesome Initials

The Rev. Dr. William White Wilson, a prominent Western clergyman, several years ago belonged to a learned society in which there were several disputatious members. Only once did they succeed in spoiling his argument. On this occasion they had made two or three interruptions. To the last one he gave a courteous answer, closing, "I hope that during the remainder of my address I will not be troubled again." Before he could take up the thread of the discourse his chief tormentor said slowly and solemnly:

"Oh, Doctor double-u, double-u, double-u,
We love to trouble you, trouble you, trouble you."

The speech was never ended.

The Two Parties

Not long ago, while Richard Croker was in London, he and an American friend passed the magnificent structure in Fleet Street known as the Inns of Court, which is a star attraction in the British metropolis.

"I wonder who they are—that endless crowd which pours out from the Inns?" asked the friend.

"Oh, they are the outs," replied the Tammany chief.

Miss Russell's Clock

A well-known collector of antiquities in New York had long been puzzled by meeting and frequently being outbid by a young, slight-figured, bright-eyed woman who was apparently as familiar with the second-hand shops of the metropolis as he was himself. Not long ago he learned that a precious "grandfather's clock" from a New Jersey Revolutionary homestead had been sold to some one connected with the Lyceum Theatre Company. Thinking that the treasure had been bought for stage purposes and was therefore purchasable, he hurried to the theatre. He bought a seat and prepared to wait until the performance was ended before beginning his dicker. The curtain had only risen when he saw his rival collector on the stage.

She was Miss Annie Russell, the star of the company. Then he realized that his precious clock was lost to him forever, for no collector ever gives up a treasure.

This wonderful clock, a Mayflower chair from New Bedford, some remarkable Chippendale furniture, a Marie Antoinette sconce, and a Spanish couch that dates back to the time of Columbus are among Miss Russell's treasures.

PHOTO BY SARONY & MAY BRIANT, NEW YORK

ANNIE RUSSELL

Digitized by Google

The SEA of FIRE

By Alvah Milton Kerr

POP BLAKE, the engineer, observed it first not long after midnight—a faint, bloody foam of color creeping up the northern sky. The fireman, busily feeding the furnace of the 1006, did not notice it until two or three o'clock. Then, stripping the perspiration from his hot, bare arms, he came into the gangway of the swaying engine and looked up. He at once pulled out his watch and turned the face of it against the light of a lantern that sat on the floor of the tank.

"Not time for day yet," he grunted; "besides, that's in the wrong spot. Must be Northern Lights. Say, Pop, them's fine, ain't they?" he shouted.

Blake glanced toward the north, nodded his grizzled head, then turned his eyes again to the great wedge of light rushing into the darkness along the rails ahead of the engine.

North and south spread infinite wastes of plain—vague, formless void; overhead hung a sky like a canopy of dark-blue velvet lifted on a million golden spear-points. Westward, eighty miles away, the tops of the Rockies notched the low-hanging fringe of stars with gaps of black.

A hot August wind was blowing, and as the big 1006 rushed along the rails, hurrying the Pacific Express toward the far distant sea, the warm air purred in Blake's ears like a tiger's breath. He looked back along the train, glanced at the strange and ever-changing lights and colors painted on the northern heaven, then pulled the throttle a notch wider.

"If that's the reflection of a prairie fire we may all be cinders before we reach the mountains," he muttered in his blowing beard.

The train was a sort of sleeping procession. In the three Pullmans all was curtained, dim and quiet. Even the black porters slept. Silence reigned in the emigrant cars, and in the seats of the day coach and the smoker, nodding, crumpled, and looking unlovely and deformed, passengers drooped, or lay breathing heavily. The brakemen and conductor sat down at every opportunity, keeping awake with difficulty; the "peanutter," ensconced among his trumpery in the forward end of the smoker, lay relaxed and dreaming.

Two men on the train, however, were wide awake. They sat exactly opposite each other in the smoking-car, one by a north window and the other by a south window. Their grim, pale faces were half turned toward each other. Without looking directly, each saw the other and narrowly noted his every movement, almost his every breath. One had brown eyes, the other gray; both were of middle life, and both looked forceful, nervous, and used to struggling with Nature and men. Each kept his right hand down by his side, holding fast the butt of a pistol. Almost the same thought was in each man's mind, and it was this:

"Shall I kill him here and now or wait until we get to the mountains? Why not now? I shouldn't care to escape—I'd face the result—death, or whatever else might come—he'd have got his just deserts, anyway!"

All the steps, secret and open, of their trouble rankled in each man's consciousness, a bitter hatred and anger that seemed eating into the heart of each like an acid.

"He had no right, moral or legal, to cut that ditch through the sag an' turn the whole creek down his valley, leavin' my ranch dry, an' ruinin' me," was the fierce thought in the brain of the brown-eyed man. "I took up my land first, an' the natural course of the stream was down my valley. I beat him in the lower court, an' now when I'm dead broke an' can't raise money to fight him, he's appealed the case to the Supreme Court! My wife an' babies are just as dear to me as his are to him. I'd never had to send mine East to mother's if he'd left the water run where it belongs. I got on this train to go out to the mines to see if I c'd raise some money by workin', an' here he is followin' me! I swore I'd shoot him on sight—an' I will before daylight comes."

In the bosom of the gray-eyed man sharp teeth seemed gnawing. The pain of it set a glittering light in his eyes. He moistened his dry lips, and his brown, toil-calloused fingers tightened about the butt of his pistol.

"Everythin' I've got in the world is in that ranch of mine," he brooded, "an' if he's goin' to turn the water back into the old channel I'm ruined, that's all. I'd never took up the land an' improved it if I hadn't seen that the creek used to run through the sag an' down my way a long time ago. The natural bed of the stream is down that way; besides, I'm not lookin' out for strangers over in another valley. How I'm goin' to carry the case through the Supreme Court I don't know; maybe I can raise some money workin' out in the mines. I wanted to get away so I wouldn't have to kill him, an' here he is followin' me! He's said enough an' done enough to me; the world ain't big enough for both of us; that's all. He's got to get out of it, an' he will before sunup."

Thus they sat nursing their poison, the flames of murder burning in each man's blood. The faces of both were haggard from worry and sleepless nights of secret cursing and hating. In natural composition they were much as other men, but many months of anger and mental turmoil had burned a hard, drawn, half-ferocious expression in the aspect of each.

They had boarded the train after midnight at a little station in the midst of that lifted zone of plain which sweeps along the base of the Rocky Mountains for hundreds of miles. About them men sprawled and snored, sodden and inert, unconscious of the wakeful horror that brooded in their midst.

Ahead in the cab window of the 1006 Pop Blake leaned out, swaying with the rock and roll of the huge machine. Every few moments he looked toward that growing conflagration of color in the northern sky, then turned his eyes hungrily toward the distant mountains. Back and forth between the coal-pile and the furnace door of the engine dipped Briggs, the fireman, grimy with dust and oil, and wet with sweat.

Now and then he glanced toward the north, and once he stood still through several seconds, earnestly regarding the marvelous lights and tangled ribbons of color shifting and beating up into the blue concave of the sky.

The world seemed on fire. He stripped the perspiration from his brow with a bent forefinger and looked toward Blake.

"Can we make it, Pop?" he shouted.

The old engineer did not turn his face. Like gray iron it was set straight ahead.

"I don't know, Jim. Keep hot hell under her," was all he said.

His lips shut tight and worked involuntarily in his beard, and he opened the throttle wider. Briggs began feverishly pounding coal and shoveling it into the firebox.

It was now nearly four in the morning, and a faint gray began to creep upon that open, lifted land. Northeast, north and northwest the heavens looked to be on fire. Straight overhead the sky turned faintly pink. A half-hour later the vast bulk of the rounded world came heaving upward out of the gloom like the yellowish back of some mighty monster lifting from the sea. Dawn was breaking in the east.

Blake did not need to turn to see it. Thin patches of rose on the mountain-tops far ahead told him the sun was peeping over the earth's rim eastward. The region was no more than wide-spreading solitude, a faintly undulating sea of gray sage-brush and lakes of matted grass, shoreless everywhere save for the vast ring of the horizon-line and the purpling bank of mountains in the west.

In that early day, for more than a hundred miles, only section houses, an occasional solitary depot, and water-tanks graced the track that threaded the arid region. Heavy winter snows and spring rains had brought an unusual growth of verdure, which, with the advent of the dry season, had fallen dead, making the world a table of luxury for fire.

Blake ran his eye out over the limitless reaches of tinder and his lips tightened. The division station, just within the mouth of the first mountain cañon, was nearly fifty miles away. It was all slightly up-grade. The train pulled like lead.

Back in the smoker the brown-eyed man and he of the gray still sat tense and pale.

Weary, nodding, dreaming, not a man on the train from the front mail car to the red hind-lights saw the crimson glare and rolling tousle of smoke-clots and flame-tips stretching across the north. Seventy miles wide, and burning over 28,000 square miles of prairie before it ceased, that ocean of flames came surging southward.

In the terrible glory and grandeur of it the dawn was swallowed up and lost.

"Stunty" Steele, the "peanutter," was the first person rearward from the engine who saw it. His freckled face whitened, a speck of something like fire swam suddenly into the centre of each of his eyes, and he leaped up and rushed through the smoker and into the day coach. The conductor was lolling by a south window, his cheek on his hand, his eyes half closed. A brakeman lay back in a seat near by, cap off, open-mouthed, snoring. "Stunty" lunged at the conductor.

"Bob! For Heaven's sake, look at that!" he panted.

Bob Loomis got to his feet in sudden wakefulness. "What is it, 'Stunty'?" he asked quickly.

The boy almost dragged him over to a north window. "There—look at that!" he half whispered.

Loomis fetched a gasp from the thrill that ran through him. "It's come!" he cried. "The fire-break burners are a hundred miles east of us—we're trapped!"

He wheeled around and started toward the rear of the train, then turned and hurried toward the front. As he passed the two rigid watchers in the smoker, the hard glitter of their stare did not waver nor relax.

Three minutes later Loomis came clambering over the rear end of the tender and stumbled down through the loose coal to the boiler head. "Stunty" was at his heels.

Briggs was working like a demon. Into the white disk of the furnace door he was plunging a long iron rod, stirring the seething mass within. He turned a pair of red eyes to Loomis' face for an instant, blew the dripping sweat from his mustache, and went on stoking with all his might.

"Can we get to the mountains, Pop?" cried Loomis through the clamor.

Blake's gray face came around with a jerk. "Hullo, Bob! No—well, no; we can't make it. The wind's from the north, an' that fire's comin' like a race-horse. I'm runnin' her wide open, an' Briggs is fairly meltin' her crown-sheet, but them cars pull back like a string of dead elephants. We're makin' 'bout forty miles an hour, but we'd have t' make a hundred t' run past the fire. D'ye see there in the northwest—it bends down to'ards the track; it'll strike the rails first 'bout twenty miles ahead, I judge."

Both men looked steadily for a moment at the distant billow of fire, a vast crescent of lashing flames stretching east and west from horizon to horizon. It was a sight to set quaking the coldest heart that ever beat. Awe was blent with a reflection of terrible trouble in their faces.

Briggs dashed half a pail of water on his reeking neck and breast and went on steadily dipping back and forth. Blake glanced at the water-gauge.

"We've got t' take water at the Shunt tank; that's 'bout six miles ahead," he shouted, his lips not two feet from Loomis' head. "If we didn't have t' make that stop there'd be one chance in a hundred, mebby, that we'd run past the fire. But we've got t' have water."

"Stunty" came out of the gangway and scrambled toward Blake's ear. His face was eager and flushed with light.

"Why don't you stop at Bald Head, Pop?" he yelled; "that hill of gravel an' alkali beyond Shunt's tank, you know. If the passengers c'd get on that they'd be all right."

Loomis' big blue eyes fell to "Stunty's" freckled face, and suddenly he caught the boy against him and hugged him.

THEN BURST THE SUPREME VISION

Drawn by J. C. Leyendecker

Digitized by Google

"Good boy!" said Blake with emphasis. "Mebby we can make the hill; it's just about eighteen miles from here. I've got a wedge in the engine-pop—I made up my mind t' take the train through or blow up the machine. Briggs don't know the safety-valve's wedged; keep mum."

He glanced toward the toiling fireman. "The passengers are on," he added, glancing back along the string of cars.

More than a hundred human heads dotted the north side of the long train. The features of the two ranchmen were not among them; they still kept to their watch.

Loomis looked at the steam-indicator. The blue steel needle trembled toward the danger point. "Keep 'er there, Jim!" he cried.

He went back over the tender into the coaches and began trying to abate the panic that raged among the passengers. "Stunty" planted himself in the gangway of the engine and watched the oncoming wall of flames.

Terrible beyond description, it came, the charge, as it might be, of a hundred thousand angels of death on shining horses, with tossing manes of flame and the gleam and leap of ten thousand swords in flashing tangle above them. Up in the air the smoke, as of battle, shot in wavering spires or streamed forward over the wallowing under-billow in gigantic puffs of darkness. Every substance and form of life fell and turned to flame and ashes before it.

The train was sweeping along the rails; every ounce of power that lay in the great 1006 was going into her whirling drivers. Blake held the throttle wide, and Briggs was working madly.

❦

At last they thundered up to Shunt's tank and stopped. Briggs was on the tender with the cover off the intake. When the nozzle was in the opening Briggs snatched the down-dangling lever rope and pulled. There was a quick gush of water, then something snapped in the tank, the lever at the top of the great tub flew up in the air and the flow ceased.

The perpendicular lever had pulled loose from the valve-lip in the tank! The valve was closed by the weight of fifteen feet of water! A cry went back through the train that no water could be got into the engine; that she was ready to explode for want of it.

Men came wildly swarming forward.

But almost instantly some one was going up the side of the tank like a wildcat. It was "peanutter" Steele, whose wiles and wares the passengers had vainly tried to escape and despise. When he reached the top he did not wait a moment, but threw the cover from the manhole, and, taking a full breath, plunged headlong into the black water below.

There was a thunder of fluid on his ear-drums, a sense of stifling pressure, then he was on the slimy bottom feeling for the valve. His clutching fingers fell first upon a pipe, and holding fast to that he found the valve-lip and lifted it.

The water drove in about his hands and sucked the lid down; he tore it open again and braced himself. If he could only break the lip from its hinges and let the water run! But the weight of fluid upon the valve, and the strength of the hinges defeated his efforts. He must hold it open—how long?

He was suffocating. Despite his will, the poisonous air burst out from his lungs and the water rushed in at his lips.

Still he clung to the valve and held it back. He was filled with pain and blackness and gurgling, but would not let go. Then suddenly he was dimly dreaming, the valve closed with a snap, his feet and body lifted upward, his clenched fingers slipped from the wood, and he shot to the surface.

Loomis was leaning down into the manhole and grabbed the limp boy and drew him up. A moment later the conductor came down the tank-ladder with "Stunty" hanging over his shoulder like a dripping rag.

❦

Many hushed their wild chatter and their screaming at sight of that senseless form. The two whose dominant intent was murder stood by, in the face of imminent death and the mad excitement of the hour, still watchful, malignant. But that vision on the ladder disturbed them. The hand of each man slowly unclasped from its pistol-butt, came out of pocket, and dropped nerveless.

"Get aboard, everybody!" roared Loomis.

The two ranchmen came last. They moved like men in a dream. With a double blast of her whistle the throttle of the 1006 came wide; she seemed to rise from the track and plunge, and in a moment the train was rushing toward the mountains.

"Stunty" lay on the floor of the baggage-car by the open door. Loomis, on his knees, was tenderly rolling and pressing the boy's thin body. The glare from the nearing billows of fire came in through the door and lit up the lad's swollen features and the conductor's pale face. The man did not look up; the boy was as one gone out of life. A brakeman came to Loomis' side.

"Get everybody and their traps out of the rear three cars, Bill; hustle them into the cars ahead, then cut off the empties," said the conductor as he worked. "Do as I say—let the cars burn!"

Five minutes later three empty coaches parted from the train, swung back, and the 1006 set a wilder pace.

Ten miles to go now; the wall of fire seemed not a half-mile distant when the train whirled around a long curve and stopped just south of Bald Head Hill.

Blake set the injectors working, and clambered out on the footboard of the engine and pulled the wedge from the safety-valve. Briggs jumped down and reeled toward the hill like a drunken man. Blake caught him by the arm and helped him forward. With feet spurred by terror, men, women and children hurried up the gravelly, ashen slope to the hill's white crest.

After them, the last man to quit the train, came Loomis, with "Stunty" in his arms.

Then burst the supreme vision. From out the northern region came animals running, wolves, coyotes, rabbits, deer, wild horses, a she-bear and her cubs, a bull bison and his female mates, all panting and as wild-eyed as the cluster of human beings on the hill. Harmless from terror, they crowded up the slope and stood gazing northward.

No creature thought of danger save for that which lay in the roaring sea of fire about them. Wolves pressed against the limbs of men, and antelope and bear stood cowering together.

❦

At length the monster passed; light broke over the hill; away toward the south the billow of fire swept on, tossing its banners of smoke and flame. Men looked at each other with something in their faces never seen there before; in the eyes of each wild beast lay a daunted, subdued look; for the hour, all savagery was dead.

A cry came up that the 1006 was "all right," and that Blake was going after help. Loomis stopped half way down the hill; "Stunty's" head turned on his shoulder. The boy's eyes opened, startled, strange.

"It's gone by; everybody's safe," said the big conductor assuringly.

"Stunty" gazed around at the blackened world a moment, looked down at the concourse of passengers, then suddenly hid his face against Loomis' neck and cried.

The two who would have killed, he of the gray eyes and he of the brown, looked at each other a little space; then, as if bidden by the same thought, flung their pistols far down among the ashes of the brush and struck their right hands together in a fervid clasp.

"There's water enough for both of us in the creek. I'm ready to dismiss the suit," said the gray-eyed man.

"Yes, there's plenty for us both. Let's go back and divide it," said the other, and talking together they passed down the hill.

DRAWN BY C. D. WILLIARD

—WE DROVE THEM BACK IN THE STREET

❦ ❦ ❦

Ballad of BEN MILAM

By Clinton Scollard

"Oh, who will follow old Ben Milam into San Antonio?"
Such was the thrilling word we heard in the chill December glow;
Such was the thrilling word we heard, and a ringing, answering cry
Went up from the dun adobe walls to the cloudless Texan sky.

He had won from the reek of a Mexique jail back without map or chart,
With his mother-wit and his hero-grit and his staunch Kentucky heart;
He had trudged by vale and by mountain trail, and by thorny and thirsty plain,
And now, with joy on his grizzled brow, he had come to his own again.

"They're the spawn of hell!" we heard him tell; "they will knife and lie and cheat;
At the board of none of the swarthy horde would I deign to sit at meat;
They hold it naught that I bled and fought when Spain was their ruthless foe;
Oh, who will follow old Ben Milam into San Antonio?"

It was four to one, not gun for gun, but never a curse cared we,
Three hundred faithful and fearless men who had sworn to make Texas free.
It was mighty odds, by all the gods, this brood of the Mexique dam,
But it was not much for heroes such as followed old Ben Milam!

With rifle-crack and sabre-hack we drove them back in the street;
From house to house in the red carouse we hastened their flying feet;
Behind the walls from the hurtling balls Cos cowered and swore in his beard,
While we slashed and slew from dawn till dew, and, Bexar, how we cheered!

But ere failed each ruse, and the white of truce on the failing day was thrown,
Our fearless soul had gone to the goal in the Land of the Great Unknown.

Death brought the darksome boon too soon to this truest one of the true,
Or, men of the fated Alamo, Milam had died with you!
So when their names that now are Fame's—the scorner of braggart Sham—
In song be praised, let a rouse be raised for the name of Ben Milam!

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
421 TO 427 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA

January 20, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription
5 Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

The Modern Man and Nature

MODERN man loves Nature—that is a point he feels pretty sure on. We hark back to Rousseau and Wordsworth; we study Manet minutely, and count the Nature references in a Shelley ode, and listen for a woodnote wild in Meredith's prose, and always give a sympathetic welcome to pastoralities from the orchestra. Yes, we love Nature as Nature was never loved before; that is certain.

But if modern man loves Nature, why does he not treat her with more respect, more consideration? Here is just such a paradox as we discover in the low-grade Englishman's treatment of his female relatives. He loves his wife, but he blacks her eye. The coster thinks everything of his mother, but he jumps on her all the same. And we, for the past fifty years, have been jumping on Nature with both feet. We have harried her, maltreated her, outraged her. Yet we think we love her. That is the view we take of ourselves. But what view will posterity take of us? Our successors will probably look upon the last half of the nineteenth century as a period uniquely scandalous in the history of the globe, and upon us of to-day as one of the most greedy and shameless packs of barbarians that ever encumbered it. We have completely forgotten that the earth is ours not in fee simple, but only in trust for future generations. What kind of an earth did we receive at the hands of 1850? A fair one, surely. And what kind of an earth shall we pass on to those of the opening century? A foul one, as surely—and one that becomes more foul, more defaced, more disfigured with every passing day. Scientific discoveries, mechanical processes, engineering ingenuities have brought us where we are. The railroad, the mine, the factory, the quarry, the lumber-camp have undone us. Nature, once worshiped as a goddess, and later cherished as a mistress, is to-day but a lone female at the mercy of that conscienceless footpad, Commercial Gain, whose one idea is to throttle her.

We love Nature, but we defile her streams. We love Nature, but we pollute her skies—because soft coal is a little cheaper than hard. We love her forests, but we hack them down, and then decamp to avoid the taxes. We love her fields, but we make them speak to us in letters a cubit high of liver-pads and lotions.

The "return to Nature," we are furthermore assured, is well under way. But if we leave the city for the country it is chiefly to flee the demon of our own devising; and if we are more than ever occupied with the details of natural history, animate and inanimate, that is only because this is the day of close and exact information.

The future will smile at our claim that we love Nature. Posterity will not care to summon our art and our literature as witnesses. It will have something better than our poetry or our painting to judge us by. It will have the earth as we leave it, and will judge us by that. —H. B. FULLER.

The world needs less art and more heart.

An Annual Stock-Taking

TWO persons who had spent many years living in reduced circumstances came into the possession of a considerable fortune, when they gave themselves the fitting-out that they thought suitable to people of means. As they rolled along the streets of their city on their first drive, one exclaimed, "Isn't this grand?" to which the other answered, "Yes, this is all very well; but how much better it would be if we could only stand at the curbstone and see ourselves go by."

At such a time as the present the conception of individual or institutional life is an inspiring thought. It is a noble thing to live, even though one only in a measure comes up to his responsibilities; but every life will have a truer meaning if the one who lives it takes a point of vantage and in the spirit of inquiry sees the passing of his years.

Introspection, the looking within, is the most subtle and illusive method of the most subtle science. Well might Immanuel Kant say that he marveled as much at the moral order of his mind as at the order of the physical universe. The parent science is the science of the stars; men seek on the other side of the world for what is at their doors. History studies so largely the lives, and analyzes the motives of those times remote, that the gossip and discredited information of one century often become the authentic history for all succeeding years. It is not alone old men's eyes and old men's memories that see most clearly what is at a distance. No special weakness led one of the most human characters in all literature to say: "I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done than be one of the twenty to follow mine own teaching." Rightly to divine one's own life is the most dangerous and difficult of tasks. Whoever looks with too great approval on his character or his action has in consequence less character and is disarmed for future action. To admire himself one is compelled to turn his back upon the world. Self-regard easily becomes self-love and self-adulation, and thus the most serious of ills. But the fact remains that each individual should understand his strength and his weakness, become better acquainted with himself.

Busy people can at best but consider their lives in the large, but this they ought to do. In January, business men make inventories of all they have; they balance their ledgers, collect outstanding obligations, and compare the condition of their business with its condition in the preceding January. No life can be computed with the precision of a set of books, but in every life there ought to be at least once a year a deliberate reckoning that will determine in some measure the intellectual, moral and spiritual assets; the profit and loss account should be closed. At the close of a year each person should ask himself, "How much in the past year have I invested in the business of right living; is my life a blessing to my fellowmen, and is it an honor to myself?" Seldom is it that men can be halted in the mad rush of intellectual, financial, social and religious activity to catch breath—to see the true trend of action and the outcome of the things being done. In every corporate life, in every individual life, the highest development and the greatest service are possible only with a judicious compliance with, "Know then thyself." —CHEESMAN A. HERRICK.

The man who makes money by tricks seldom has to spend much of it on a large funeral.

Educational Buttresses

IT SEEMS to have been taken for granted by parents, guardians and teachers that the main thing in training the young is to develop to its utmost the genius that is the natural superiority of each individual.

In other words, if a child evinces a strong aptitude for something, this gift is looked upon as the centre toward which every line of study must trend. Doubtless there is much to sustain such a course of reasoning as would lead to this conclusion; but we must not lose sight of the weaker parts of mind and character, to strengthen which is often even more desirable than to develop abnormally a part which is naturally superior. Indeed, common observation shows that very great excellence in a single direction is nearly always accompanied with eccentricities in other directions.

But not to genius alone does this rule of equipoise apply; every individual, no matter what his natural gifts, is most efficient in the work of life when all his forces act together harmoniously under the control of intelligence. Education, by which should be meant physical, mental and moral training in the broadest sense, may easily be stunted and warped by a narrow view of its purpose, and so may character suffer in its growth apace with the misapplication of what should fertilize and vitalize it. These are, perhaps, trite statements; but there is at least one application of their deepest meaning which has not been made clear to the popular mind. We all understand more or less intelligently the necessity of strengthening the weak parts of the body. If a child is lame of a leg we at once try to cure the lesion, and if an eye shows weakness we seek a remedy. Doubtless the same attention would be given to mental and moral lesions or lacks if we but recognized them as such. The trouble is, we are so busy with adding to the strong points that we never note the weak ones, or if we see them we are apt to treat them as predestined and incurable; hence a child of vigorous memory and flabby reasoning powers is crammed with what we call knowledge, while his uncertain ability to make practical application of what he remembers is left quite without the training which would round up an efficient intelligence.

It is true that here and there a person with but one organ of intelligence well developed has done a great thing—invented a machine, discovered a new application of natural force, developed a great line of industry—but for that one successful eccentric ten thousand failures are to be recorded, and it is at last the average that we must consider. In a word, the only safe education is the education which lifts the average of common efficiency. Every boy should be trained as if we expected him to be a strong average man, every girl as if she could not rightfully hope to escape the duties and responsibilities of the average woman. Where we observe a defective line of intellect or character there is the place for educational stays and braces. The old saying that a rope is as strong as its very weakest point and no stronger is applicable to the chain of education. The man will break at his least fortified link of intelligence or character.

The prime inquiry, then, should be, where can training buttress natural ability so as to prevent natural weakness from neutralizing its efficiency? If one possessed of splendid imagination and the gift of doing things which captivate the public is without the power to turn his genius to practical account he leaves but a glimmer behind him of what he might have been. Perhaps a little careful training of his defective lobe of intellect might have turned his wasted life into a career of great usefulness and happiness. Upon the whole, it is safe to formulate the maxim: Take care of the weak points of mind and body; the strong ones will take care of themselves. —MAURICE THOMPSON.

The young idea should shoot to hit.

The Silk Hat Seriously Considered

SOME close and industrious observers have reached the conclusion that the high silk hat is not so commonly seen upon the masculine head as it was, say, ten years ago. They may or may not be right—statistics are wanting.

The silk hat has long been assailed on esthetic grounds. To the more thoughtful this has seemed unjust. It is ugly, to be sure, but is it more ugly than the other things in which man in his blindness incases his head? The fact is that it is really less ugly than the omnipresent derby. The silk hat has had to bear the penalty of eminence. Where less conspicuous but greater offenders have escaped, it has been forced to endure criticism and abuse. It has never had the full confidence of the public; people have looked upon it as an aristocrat, as, indeed, it is. But this is no reason why it should be charged with not being pretty.

If the silk hat is really passing away it will remove an element of distinction from the urban landscape which cannot well be spared. The cobblestone effect of the crowds of derbies needs the relief afforded by the beaconlike high silk. On one ground only could the extinction of the silk hat be matter for congratulation. This is the ground of expense. Few men can afford to wear it. It is not the cost of the article itself, though this is not inconsiderable when we remember its peculiarity of changing its shape twice a year and the impossibility of any man other than a coachman wearing one a week behind the mode—it is not its cost, per se, but the large appropriations constantly needed to live up to it. How many young men have been ruined by weakly yielding to the temptation to buy the first silk hat can never be known. Shoes, suit, necktie, overcoat, everything must be renewed on a higher plane to bear the hat company.

It is estimated that it costs anywhere from one hundred to five hundred dollars a year to live up to an eight-dollar silk hat. A man ought to be required to take out a license before he is allowed to begin wearing silk hats. He should appear before the proper authorities and submit proof of his ability to support the dignity without pilfering from his employer or impoverishing his family. Perhaps he ought to be made to wear a tag conspicuously giving the number of his license. As for an author or a writer of any degree appearing with a silk hat, the thing should not be permitted. He should be arrested on sight. It should be taken as prima facie evidence that he has just robbed a publisher or other defenseless individual. —HAYDEN CARRUTH.

Fine minds do more to make good society than fine clothes.

Do We Need More Holidays?

A BILL in the present Congress provides that the twelfth day of February, the birthday of Lincoln, and the second day of April, the birthday of Jefferson, be made holidays.

Why? There are at present in this country twenty-nine holidays. Most of them are local. There is no national holiday; even the Fourth of July is not a day of rest by act of Congress. Although the President proclaims a day of Thanksgiving, it does not become a legal holiday in any State unless there is a law for it. But in spite of the complications of the question, there seem to be liberal cessations from toil. The Sundays yield fifty-two days of rest; the Saturday half-holidays twenty-six days more. This makes seventy-eight days. Then each State has its own legal holidays, and often each city has its special days of observance. For instance, Massachusetts observes April 19 as Patriots' Day. Utah has July 24 as Pioneers' Day. Vermont has August 16 as the Bennington Battle Day. California has September 9 as Admission Day. So it goes all over the country. When we take all these holidays and combine the statistics we find that they amount on an average to about ninety days or more—practically one-fourth of the year. This new bill would add a second holiday in February, the shortest month of the year. Twelve of the States already have holidays in April, so that the new bill would also place a second holiday in that month. We are in favor of holidays, of course, and wish we could crowd the calendar with them. But it may be well not to rush toward the conditions that exist in Russia and some other countries, where there are so many holidays that the people who want to work have scarcely the time or the opportunity to get up in the world. —LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

Digitized by Google

At the American Capital

Stories always relieve the monotony of Congressional life. They enliven debate and throw sunshine on the legislative pathway. Many a new Congressman has placed his foot upon the lower rung of the ladder of fame by telling a good story. He incidentally attracts attention, and if the anecdote is a new one he establishes a reputation that holds the House whenever he takes the floor.

John Allen, of Mississippi, still holds the supremacy in Congress as a story-teller. No rivals have as yet appeared, and it begins to look as though the House of Representatives might be short of humorous material in the present session. There have been some stirring scenes on the floor, but few new stories bubbled to the surface. The new members are evidently taking the gauge of the old ones, but are hardly backward in debate. They compose at least one-third of the House. It is a superabundance of raw material already being woven in the shuttle of legislation. A new story from a new member in illustration of a new argument is always greeted with applause. An old member may be excused for telling an old story, while a new member would be overwhelmed with derision if he ventured to do so. At times both the House and Senate run for weeks without the scintilla of a reminiscence. When a good story is told in discussion it seems to awaken a competition that lasts for several days. The applause showered upon the first story is productive of anecdotes, good, bad and indifferent, all enjoyable, even if not pat.

Always First on the Ground

One of the best of these stories told in the last Congress was related by a new member, the Honorable Robert Emmet Burke, of Dallas, Texas. He was discussing the Fortification Appropriation Bill, and paid his respects to Governor Dingley thus:

"His promptness at always being on his feet when either the word 'tariff' or 'prosperity' is heard on this floor reminds me of a character down in Texas. He was a man who was always first—first at every public meeting; first to make a motion; first to make a speech; first to move to adjourn. In other words, he was emphatically a 'sooner.' He was the first at the bar, the first to take a drink, and sometimes the last to retire from the bar. On one occasion he had tarried there too long, and on going home fell by the wayside. His friends dug a grave in the sand, rolled him into it, covered him with a sheet, and left him. In the gray dawn of the morn he awoke. He thought he was dead, but the ruling passion was still strong within him. Jumping to his feet he exclaimed:

"'Egad! Resurrection Day has come, and I am the first man on the grounds.'

"And now, Mr. Chairman," Mr. Burke continued, "if by any stretch of the imagination we could see the distinguished leader of the House in a similar position, no doubt he would rise to his feet and declare:

"'McKinley prosperity has come; the Dingley tariff is responsible for it; and, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.'"

The House was intensely amused; Governor Dingley himself, who rarely smiled, laughed outright. But the story gave Mr. Burke a great reputation. It was an apt illustration introducing an effective argument. From that day to the present, Judge Burke has never taken the floor without commanding the strictest attention of the House.

Repealing the Law of Supply and Demand

As good a story as was told in the recent gold debate came from the lips of William L. Jones, a new member from Washington. The logic of events, he said, had overcome free-silver logic, and the Democracy were now relying on the law of supply and demand. "In my last campaign," Mr. Jones continued, "I met an old fellow and we were talking about the price of wheat and meat. I told him that the price was regulated by the law of supply and demand.

"'Is there such a law as that?' he asked. 'I never heard of it.'

"'Why, certainly there is,' I said.

"'Well,' he thundered, thoroughly aroused, 'when we get into power again you can bet that we will repeal that law.'"

Uncertain as a Reversed Saddle

One of the features of the discussion over the gold bill in the present Congress was the speech of the Honorable Jonathan P. Dolliver, of Iowa. This gentleman has a fascinating personality. His eloquence has given him national fame. In his gold speech his rhetoric was so deftly interwoven with sarcasm that the House listened wrapped in admiration. A reply to Mr. Dolliver came from an unexpected source. Peter J. Otey, a modest and unassuming member from Virginia, took the floor. He has served two terms without attracting more than the average attention, but he made a very strong argument against the bill. He first paid his respects to Dolliver and Grosvenor. He said he might vote for the bill if it was amended so as to suppress the explosions of the gentleman from Ohio and curtail the expansion of the gentleman from Iowa. As to the latter, he found much to commend in his gestures. "He has expanded from the respectable white dollar," said he, "to a disreputable mulatto standard, to coin which is a penitentiary offense.

"My genial friend," he continued, "is not certain where he is at, has been, or whither he is going. He answers queries like a man who was once at county court in Virginia. As he was starting to leave he bridled his horse and inadvertently reversed the saddle. A bystander shouted, 'Say, mister, you have got that saddle wrong end foremost.' Looking at the meddler indignantly he replied, 'How do you know which way I'm going?'"

The Popularity of Poker Stories

Poker stories command attention in the House, and seem to be more enjoyable than other reminiscences. The number of members who appear to understand its peculiar phraseology almost surpasses belief. A rich scene occurred not long ago. It was during the controversy over the Philippine question. Mr. Handy, of Delaware, and Mr. Todd, of Michigan, both said they were in favor of the immediate withdrawal of the American Army and Navy from the islands. In alluding to this on the following day Joseph G. Cannon said:

"The gentleman from Delaware and the gentleman from Michigan constitute a pair, and I believe you might draw to every member of the House and not get three of a kind."

"Mr. Chairman," thundered General Grosvenor, "a point of order. I deny the right of a member to speak in a language not understood by the average American."

"The gentleman from Ohio is just about 'an average American,'" Mr. Cannon replied.

"The point of order comes too late," observed Sereno E. Payne, who was presiding in Committee of the Whole.

Here Handy placed the finishing touch on the scene: "With the gentleman from Michigan, the gentleman from Illinois and myself on the floor," he added, "I would say that there were three of a kind before the House, and that it would take exactly three queens to beat them."

This suggestion of three jacks paralyzed the House. It sobered for an instant, but finally drifted into uncontrollable merriment.

Mr. Settle's Story of the Dutch Judge

In the last Congress Evan E. Settle, of Kentucky, was a new member who ventured into the realm of reminiscence. His recent death was deplored by all his associates. His successor, bearing the euphonious name of June Gayle, has just been elected and sworn in. He represents the old Lexington district, which once boasted of Henry Clay and William C. P. Breckinridge. Settle came to the front in the contested election case of Aldrich vs. Plowman. He said that the situation was exactly summed up in the story of a Dutch magistrate. A poor fellow was brought before him on some petty charge. The Justice wanted to impress him with a due sense of the fairness of the trial he was about to receive at his hands.

"Mine frent," he said, "dis court she vill hear all the vitnesses mit you; she vill hear all the lawyers mit your side of the cases; und she vill dook it unter advisement for dree tays; but after that time she vill geef a chudgment against you."

Settle was as great a frequenter of the cloakroom as was Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, in days long gone by. He enjoyed a good story intensely, and was not backward in matching it.

The Story of the Royal Flush

James Hamilton Lewis made himself famous by an excoriation of General Grosvenor. He illustrated the ability displayed by the General when scotched in discussion. Lewis said that he always fell back on the Stars and Stripes, and held his own with redoubled energy. It reminded him of an incident in the life of a gambler on the Mississippi. After pursuing his vocation a long time he became converted, joined the Baptist church, and began to preach. It was his pleasant duty to immerse those whom he had converted to his creed. On one particular occasion the banks of the Mississippi were lined with people to see a baptism by this reformed gambler. He had a little grandson conversant with his grandfather's career who before the ceremony had slipped a pack of cards into the old man's pocket.

"The time came for the baptism," continued Mr. Lewis. "The old gentleman, amid the hosannas of the throng, went into the water. All at once there slipped from his pocket out on the stream an ace of diamonds, then a king, then a queen and a jack, following with a ten-spot. Frightened with dismay, the boy's mother turned to him and said:

"'Oh, Jacky, what have you done? Dear, dear, your poor old grandfather will never get out of there alive.'

"'Never get out of there alive?' repeated Jack. 'Well, if grandpap can't get out on that hand he ain't the man he used to be.'"

The whole House seemed to recognize that the hand was a royal flush, and the Southern members led off in the applause that followed. Lewis himself seemed to be conscious of the effect. It inspired him to new effort, and he fairly showered the House with intellectual scintillations.

A New Story of Abraham Lincoln

Senator Mason, of Illinois, recently told a new and characteristic story about Abraham Lincoln. It was while he was delivering his noted speech against absorbing the Philippines. He said that in the great joint debate between Lincoln and Douglas in front of the Court House in Chicago, an eyewitness told him that Judge Douglas forgot himself for a moment and charged Mr. Lincoln with being an Abolitionist, adding:

"Perhaps our candidate upon the abolition ticket wants a colored woman for a wife?"

Lincoln rose like the opening of a great jackknife. Without even addressing the chair, he stepped out in front of the audience facing the hotel and, looking down the street, said:

"No, I do not wish her for a wife; neither do I wish her for my slave."

A mighty cheer greeted the sentiment, and Judge Douglas made no further allusion to the Abolitionists.

"The McEnery resolution says," pursued Mr. Mason, "that we do not want the Filipinos for citizens, and we do not want them for slaves." —Amos J. Cummings.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

This field of helping young men, practically and plainly pointing out what to do, how to strive and how to win in the everyday battles, is one that has been closer to me in my church work than anything else. I have gathered around my wife and myself some thirty-five young fellows ranging from fifteen to twenty-five years old and have made them feel perfectly at home. We entertain them, or rather we all entertain each other once a week—Saturday nights—and when the weather permits we have outdoor sports at our place. One of our most enjoyable pastimes has been pitching quoits by electric light. I have rigged up sockets on the side of our house and run wires from these to uprights, across which extend pieces to support the wires and globes, so that over each peg, about six and a half feet above, there is a sixteen-candle-power lamp with an aluminum shade, which throws a brilliant light about six feet in diameter around the peg. We have three sets, six playing in each, so that eighteen can play at once. I built two tennis courts just beyond our house, and we have found them a source of enjoyment. Recently we had a ten-mile paper chase—Hare and Hounds—in which twenty-one of us entered. In these and other ways we have brought together these young men, and by our own pleasant home life we have been quietly teaching them that questionable places cannot give as much real pleasure to a young man as innocent, hearty amusements of our kind. We have never preached to the boys, but they all know what our lives mean to us, and the influence has been getting in some good work. Gradually we have won their confidence so that now more than half of them make one or the other—sometimes both—of us their confidant, and we have been able to pull many a one out of a tight place.

It seems to me that many other young married folks could find as keen enjoyment along these lines as we have, besides helping young fellows just at the time and at that age where the turning point comes which so often means the slipping away from a clean life, the coming out from under the influences of home life, and the ultimate wounds and scars of a dissipated life. Grant Arnold.

Baltimore, Maryland.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Humility is the great essential characteristic that is so sadly wanting in the general make-up of the man of the present time. We all think ourselves fitted for a higher position, and are not willing to bend ourselves to accept the opportunities that are within easy reach. We learn a trade or a particular branch of business, and if we cannot find employment at it are too proud to take a position "under instructions" at something else. We are not willing to accept a much smaller salary, and also to endure the petty tyranny of people we work with every day. No man can think of doing such a thing without some repugnance, particularly when he is naturally of a sensitive disposition. It usually requires a great effort to overcome this feeling, because the first round of the ladder in any business carries the weight of all the drudgery that must be done, not only for the firm itself, but for all the subordinate officers also. The great majority of the wrecks of humanity are men who could not, or perhaps would not, humble themselves; men who made a mistake and were too high-strung to acknowledge the fact, to begin over again on a new plan the construction of their fortunes. There is no more pitiable spectacle on earth than a man who is so weak as to acknowledge that he is unable to earn a living, provided, of course, that he is not a cripple. The successful men of to-day are men who are willing to "buckle down to it"; no obstacle is too great for them to overcome. They do not wait for anybody to do their work for them, no matter what it is; if it is to be done, they do it themselves. With these men there is no question of long hours or holidays; they are willing to deny themselves these when there is important work in hand. The poorest man in the town is sometimes the proudest when it comes to going to work. He is perfectly willing to let his wife or any of his relatives do the "providing," and he can always be on hand at meal time. John J. Fleming.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Digitized by Google

Three MEN on Four Wheels

By Jerome K. Jerome

Copyright, 1899, by Jerome K. Jerome. Copyright in Great Britain

The Bicycle Doctor of Folkestone

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS: The three men—HARRIS, GEORGE and the author—decide to spend a holiday awheel in Germany, working eastward from Berlin to Dresden. They broach the matter to their wives—who are to be left at home—and make preparations for the journey. They fix upon Thursday morning for the start.

ON MONDAY afternoon Harris came around. He had a cycling paper in his hand.

I said: "If you take my advice, you will leave it alone."

Harris said: "Leave what alone?"

I said: "That brand-new, patent revolution in cycling, record-breaking tomfoolishness, whatever it may be, the advertisement of which you have there in your hand."

He said: "Well, I don't know; there will be some steep hills for us to negotiate; I guess we shall want a good brake."

I said: "We shall want a brake, I agree; what we shall not want is a mechanical surprise that we don't understand, and that never acts when it is wanted."

"This thing," he said, "acts automatically."

"You needn't tell me," I said; "I know by instinct exactly what it will do. Going up hill it will jamb the wheel so effectively that we shall have to carry the machine bodily. The air at the top of the hill will do it good, and it will suddenly come right again. Going down hill it will start reflecting what a nuisance it has been. This will lead to remorse, and finally to despair. It will say to itself: 'I'm not fit to be a brake. I don't help these fellows; I only hinder them. I'm a curse, that's what I am.' And without a word of warning it will chuck the whole business. That is what that brake will do. Leave it alone. You are a good fellow," I continued, "but you have one fault."

"What?" he asked indignantly.

"You have too much faith," I answered. "If you read an advertisement you go away and believe it. Every experiment that every fool has thought of in connection with cycling you have tried. Your Guardian Angel appears to be a capable and conscientious spirit, and hitherto she has seen you through; take my advice and don't try her too far. She must have had a busy time since you started cycling. Don't go on till you make her mad."

He said: "If every man talked like that there would be no advancement made in any department of life. If nobody ever tried a new thing the world would come to a standstill. It is by——"

"I know all that can be said on that side of the argument," I interrupted. "I agree in trying new experiments up to thirty-five; after thirty-five I consider a man is entitled to think of himself. You and I have done our duty in this direction—you, especially. You have been blown up by a patent gas-lamp——"

We were still looking for the screws when Ethelbertha came out

He said: "I really think, you know, that was my fault; I think I must have screwed it up too tight."

I said: "I am quite willing to believe that if there was a wrong way of handling the thing that is the way you handled it. You should take that tendency of yours into consideration; it bears upon the argument. Myself, I did not notice what you did; I only know we were riding peacefully and pleasantly along the Whitby Road, discussing the Thirty-Years' War, when your lamp went off like a pistol shot. The start sent me into the ditch, and your wife's face when I told her there was nothing the matter and that she was not to worry, because the two men would carry you upstairs, and the doctor would be around in a minute, bringing the nurse with him, still lingers in my memory."

He said: "I wish you had thought to pick up the lamp. I should like to have found out what was the cause of its going off like that."

I said: "There was not time to pick up the lamp. I calculate it would have taken two hours to have collected it. As to its 'going off,' the mere fact of its being advertised as the safest lamp ever invented would of itself, to any one but you, have suggested accident.

"Then there was that electric lamp," I continued.

"Well, that really did give a fine light," he replied; "you said so yourself."

I said: "It gave a brilliant light in the King's Road, Brighton, and frightened a horse. The moment we got into the dark beyond Kemp Town it went out, and you were summoned for riding without a light. You may remember that on sunny afternoons you used to ride about with that lamp shining for all it was worth. When lighting-up time came it was naturally tired, and wanted a rest."

"It was a bit irritating, that lamp," he murmured; "I remember it."

I said: "It irritated me; it must have been worse for you.

"Then there are saddles," I went on. I wished to get this lesson home to him. "Can you think of any saddle ever advertised that you have not tried?"

He said: "It has always been an idea of mine that the right saddle is to be found."

I said: "You give up that idea; this is an imperfect world, a world of joy and sorrow mingled. There may be a Better Land where bicycle saddles are made out of rainbow, stuffed with cloud; in this world the simplest thing is to get used to something hard. There was that saddle you bought in Birmingham; it was divided in the middle, and looked like a pair of kidneys."

He said: "You mean that one constructed on anatomical principles?"

"Very likely," I replied. "The box you bought it in had a picture on the cover representing a sitting skeleton—or rather that part of a skeleton which does sit."

He said: "It was quite correct; it showed you the true position of the——"

I said: "We will not go into details; the picture always seemed to me indelicate."

He said: "Medically speaking, it was right."

"Possibly," I said, "for a man who rode in nothing but his bones. I only know that I tried it myself, and that to a man who wore flesh it was agony. Every time you went over a stone or rut it nipped you; it was like riding on an irritable lobster. You rode that for a month."

George

"I thought it only right to give it a fair trial," he answered.

I said: "You gave your family a fair trial, also, if you will allow me the use of slang. Your wife told me that never in the whole course of your married life had she known you so bad-tempered, so un-Christianlike as you were that month. Then you remember that other saddle, the one with a spring under it."

He said: "You mean the 'Spiral'?"

I said: "I mean the one that jerked you up and down like a Jack-in-the-box; sometimes you came down again in the right place, and sometimes you didn't. I am not referring to these past matters merely to recall painful memories, but I want to impress upon you the folly of trying experiments at your time of life."

He said: "I wish you wouldn't harp so much on my age. A man at thirty-four——"

"A man at what?"

He said: "If you don't want the thing, don't have it. If your machine runs away with you down a mountain, and you and George get flung through a church roof, don't blame me."

"I cannot promise for George," I said; "a little thing will sometimes annoy him, as you know. If such an accident as you suggest happen, he may be cross, but I will undertake to explain to him that it was not your fault."

"Is the thing all right?" he asked.

"The tandem," I replied, "is well."

He said: "Have you overhauled it?"

I said: "I have not, nor is anybody else going to overhaul it. The thing is now in working order, and it is going to remain in working order till we start."

I have had experience of this "overhauling." There was a man at Folkestone; I used to meet him on the Lees. He proposed one evening we should go for a long bicycle ride together on the following day, and I agreed. I got up early, for me; I made an effort, and was pleased with myself. He came half an hour late; I was waiting for him in the garden. It was a lovely day. He said:

"That's a good-looking machine. How does it run?"

"Oh, like most of them," I answered; "easily enough in the morning; goes a little stiffly after lunch."

He caught hold of it by the front wheel and the fork and shook it violently.

I said: "Don't do that; you'll hurt it."

I did not see why he should shake it; it had not done anything to him. Besides, if it wanted shaking, I was the

---

Editor's Note—Three Men on Four Wheels was begun in the Post of January 6. Each chapter is practically an independent story and may be read with enjoyment without reference to previous installments.

Digitized by Google

proper person to shake it. I felt much as I should if he had started whacking my dog.

He said: "This front wheel wobbles."

I said: "It doesn't if you don't wobble it." It didn't wobble, as a matter of fact—nothing worth calling a wobble.

He said: "This is dangerous; have you got a screw-hammer?"

I ought to have been firm, but I thought that perhaps he really did know something about the business. I went to the tool-shed to see what I could find. When I came back he was sitting on the ground with the front wheel between his legs. He was playing with it, twiddling it around between his fingers; the remnant of the machine was lying on the gravel path beside him.

He said: "Something has happened to this front wheel of yours."

"It looks like it, doesn't it?" I answered. But he was the sort of man that never understands satire.

He said: "It looks to me as if the bearings were all wrong."

I said: "Don't you trouble about it any more; you will make yourself tired. Let us put it back and get off."

He said: "We may as well see what is the matter with it, now it is out." He talked as though it had dropped out by accident.

Before I could stop him he had unscrewed something somewhere, and out rolled all over the path a lot of little balls.

"Catch 'em!" he shouted. "Catch 'em! We mustn't lose any of them!" He was quite excited about them.

We groveled around for half an hour and found sixteen. He said he hoped we had got them all, because if not it would make a serious difference in the machine. He said there was nothing you should be more careful about in taking a bicycle to pieces than seeing you did not lose any of the balls. He explained that you ought to count them as you took them out, and see that exactly the same number went back in each place. I promised, if ever I took a bicycle to pieces, I would remember his advice.

I put the balls for safety in my hat, and I put my hat upon the doorstep. It was not the sensible thing to do, I admit. As a matter of fact, it was a silly thing to do. I am not, as a rule, addle-headed; his influence must have affected me.

He then said that while he was about it he would see to the chain for me, and at once began taking off the gearcase. I did try to dissuade him from that. I told him what an experienced friend of mine once said to me, solemnly:

"If anything goes wrong with your gearcase, sell the machine and buy a new one. It comes cheaper."

He said: "People talk like that who understand nothing about machines. Nothing is easier than taking off a gear-case."

I had to confess he was right. In less than five minutes he had the gearcase in two pieces lying on the path, and was groveling for screws. He said it was always a mystery to him the way screws disappeared. We were still looking for the screws when Ethelbertha came out. She seemed surprised to find us there; she said she thought we had started hours ago.

He said: "We sha'n't be long now. I'm just helping your husband to overhaul this machine of his. It's a good machine, but they all want going over occasionally."

Ethelbertha said: "If you want to wash yourselves when you have done you might go into the back kitchen, if you don't mind; the girls have just finished the bedrooms."

She told me that if she met Kate they would probably go for a sail, but that in any case she would be back to lunch. I would have given a sovereign to be going with her. I was getting heartily sick of standing about watching this fool breaking up my bicycle.

Common sense continued to whisper to me, "Stop him before he does any more mischief; you have a right to protect your own property from the ravages of a lunatic; take him by the scruff of the neck and kick him out of the gate."

But I am weak when it comes to hurting other people's feelings, and I let him muddle on.

He gave up looking for the rest of the screws. He said screws had a knack of turning up when you least expected them, and that now he would see to the chain. He tightened it till it would not move; next he loosened it until it was twice as loose as it was before. Then he said we had better think about getting the front wheel back into its place again.

I held the fork open, and he worried with the wheel. At the end of ten minutes I suggested he should hold the forks and that I should handle the wheel, and we changed places. At the end of his first minute he dropped the machine and took a short walk around the croquet lawn with his hands pressed together between his thighs. He explained as he walked that the thing to be careful about was to avoid getting your fingers pinched between the forks and the spokes of the wheel. I replied I was convinced, from my own experience, that there was much truth in what he said. He wrapped himself up in a couple of dusters and we commenced again. At length we did get the thing into position and the moment it was in position he burst out laughing.

I said: "What's the joke?"

He said: "Well, I am an ass!"

It was the first thing he had said that made me respect him. I asked him what had led him to the discovery.

He said: "We've forgotten the balls!"

I looked for my hat; it was lying topsy-turvy in the middle of the path, and Ethelbertha's favorite hound was swallowing the balls as fast as he could pick them up.

"He will kill himself," said Ebbson—I have never met him since that day, thank the Lord, but I think his name was Ebbson—"they are solid steel."

I said: "I am not troubling about the dog. He has had a bootlace and a packet of needles already this week. Nature's the best guide; puppies seem to require this kind of stimulant. What I am thinking about is my bicycle."

He was of a cheerful disposition. He said: "Well, we must put back all we can find and trust to Providence."

THEN HE LOST HIS TEMPER AND TRIED BULLYING THE THING

We found eleven. We fixed six on one side and five on the other, and half an hour later the wheel was in its place again. It need hardly be added that it really did wobble now; a child might have noticed it. Ebbson said it would do for the present. He appeared to be getting a bit tired himself; if I had let him he would, I believe, at this point, have gone home. I was determined now, however, that he should stop and finish. I had abandoned all thoughts of a ride. My pride in the machine he had killed. My only interest lay now in seeing him scratch and bump and pinch himself. I revived his drooping spirits with a glass of beer and some judicious praise. I said:

"Watching you do this is of real use to me. It is not only your skill and dexterity that fascinates me; it is your cheery confidence in yourself, your inexplicable hopefulness, that does me good."

Thus encouraged, he set to work to refix the gearcase. He stood the bicycle up against the house and worked from the off side. Then he stood it against a tree and worked from the near side. Then I held it for him while he lay on the ground with his head between the wheels and worked at it from below, and dropped oil upon himself. Then he took it away from me and doubled himself across it, like a pack-saddle, till he lost his balance and slid over on to his head. Three times he said: "Thank Heaven, that's right at last!" And twice he said: "No, I'm blanked if it is, after all!" What he said the third time I try to forget.

Then he lost his temper and tried bullying the thing. The bicycle, I was glad to see, showed spirit; and the subsequent proceedings degenerated into little else than a rough-and-tumble fight between him and the machine. One moment the bicycle would be on the gravel path and he on top of it; the next the position would be reversed—he on the gravel path, the bicycle on him.

Now he would be standing flushed with victory, with the bicycle firmly fixed between his legs. But his triumph would be short-lived. By a sudden, quick movement it would free itself, and turning upon him, hit him sharply over the head with one of its handles.

At quarter to one, dirty and disheveled, cut and bleeding, he said:

"I think that will do," and rose and wiped his brow.

The bicycle looked as if it also had had enough of it. Which had received most punishment it would be difficult to say. I took him into the back kitchen—where, so far as was possible without soda and proper tools, he cleaned himself—and sent him home. The bicycle I put into a cab and took around to the nearest repairing shop. The foreman of the works came up and looked at it.

"What do you want me to do with that?" said he.

"I want you," I said, "so far as is possible, to restore it."

"It's a bit far gone," said he. "But I'll do my best."

He did his best, which came to two pounds ten. But it was never the same machine again, and at the end of the season I left it in an agent's hands to sell. I wished to deceive nobody; I instructed the man to advertise it as a last year's machine. The agent advised me not to mention any date. He said:

"In this business it isn't a question of what is true and what isn't; it's a question of what you can get people to believe. Now, between you and me, it doesn't look like a last year's machine; so far as looks are concerned, it might be a ten-year-old. We'll say nothing about date; we'll just get what we can."

I left the matter to him, and he got me five pounds, which, he said, was more than he had expected.

There are two ways you can get exercise out of a bicycle; you can "overhaul" it, or you can ride it. On the whole, I am not sure that the man who takes his pleasure overhauling does not have the best of the bargain. He is independent of the weather and the wind; the state of the roads troubles him not. Give him a screw-hammer, a bundle of rags, an oil can, and something to sit down upon, and he is happy for the day. He has to put up with certain disadvantages, of course; there is no joy without alloy. He himself always looks like a tinker, and his machine always suggests the idea that, having stolen it, he has tried to disguise it; but as he rarely gets beyond the first milestone with it, this, perhaps, does not much matter. The mistake some people make is in thinking they can get both forms of sport out of the same machine. This is impossible; no machine will stand the double strain. You must make up your mind whether you are going to be an "overhauler" or a rider. Personally, I prefer to ride; therefore I take care to have near me nothing that can tempt me to overhaul. When anything happens to my machine I wheel it to the nearest repairing shop. If I am too far from a town or village to walk, I sit by the roadside and wait till a cart comes along. My chief danger, I always find, is from the wandering overhauler. The sight of a broken-down machine is to the overhauler as a wayside corpse to a crow: he swoops down upon it with a friendly yell of triumph. At first I used to try politeness. I would say:

"It is nothing; don't you trouble. You ride on and enjoy yourself. I beg it of you as a favor; please go away."

Experience has taught me, however, that courtesy is of no use in such an extremity. Now I say:

"You go away and leave the thing alone or I will knock your silly head off."

And if you look determined and have a good stout cudgel in your hand, you can generally drive him off.

George came in later in the day. He said:

"Well, do you think everything will be ready?"

I said: "Everything will be ready by Wednesday, except, perhaps, you and Harris."

He said: "Does the tandem want overhauling?"

I replied: "Age and experience have taught me that there are few matters concerning which a man does well to be positive, consequently there remain to me now but a limited number of questions upon which I feel any certainty. Among such still unshaken beliefs, however, is that that the tandem does not want overhauling. I also feel a conviction that, provided my life is spared, no human being between now and Wednesday morning is going to overhaul it."

Digitized by Google

George said: "I should not show temper over the matter if I were you. There will come a day, perhaps not far distant, when that bicycle, with a couple of mountains between it and the nearest repairing shop, will, in spite of your chronic desire for rest, have to be overhauled. Then you will clamor for people to tell you where you put the oil can, and what you have done with the screw-hammer. Then, while you exert yourself holding the thing steady against a tree, you will suggest that somebody else should clean the chain and pump the back wheel."

I felt there was justice in George's rebuke—also a certain amount of prophetic wisdom. I said:

"Forgive me if I seemed unresponsive. The truth is, Harris was round here——"

George said: "Say no more; I understand. Besides, what I came to talk to you about was another matter. Look at that."

He handed me a small book bound in red cloth. It was a guide to English conversation for the use of German travelers. It commenced "On the Steamboat," and terminated "At the Doctor's," its longest chapter being devoted to conversation in a railway carriage among, apparently, a compartment load of quarrelsome and ill-mannered lunatics: "Can you not get farther away from me, sir?" "It is impossible, madam; my neighbor here is very stout." "Shall we not endeavor to arrange our legs?" "Please have the goodness to keep your elbows down." "Pray do not inconvenience yourself, madam; if my shoulder is of any accommodation to you"; whether intended to be said sarcastically or not there was nothing to indicate. "I really must request you to move a little, madam; I can hardly breathe," the author's idea being, presumably, that by this time the whole party were mixed up together on the floor. The chapter concluded with the phrase: "Here we are at our destination, God be thanked!" (Gott sei dank!) a pious exclamation which must have taken the form of a chorus.

"It is not a brilliant publication," I remarked, handing the book back to George; "it is not a book that personally I could recommend to any German about to visit England; I think it would get him disliked. But I have read books published in London for the use of English travelers abroad every whit as foolish. Some educated idiot, misunderstanding seven languages, would appear to go about writing these books for the false guidance of modern Europe."

"You cannot deny," said George, "that these books are in large request. In every town in Europe there must be people going about talking this sort of thing."

"Maybe," I replied; "but fortunately nobody understands them. I have noticed men standing on railway platforms and at street corners, reading aloud from such books. Nobody knows what language they are speaking; nobody has the slightest knowledge of what they are saying. This is perhaps as well; were they understood they would probably be assaulted."

George said: "Maybe you are right; my idea is to see what would happen if they were understood. My proposal is to get to London early on Wednesday morning and spend an hour or two going about and shopping with the aid of this book. I want to try this sort of talk; I want to see how the foreigner feels when he is talked to in this way."

It struck me as a sporting idea. I offered to accompany him, and wait outside the shop. I said I thought that Harris would like to be in it, too—or rather to be outside.

George said that was not quite his scheme. His proposal was that Harris and I should accompany him into the shop. With Harris, who looks formidable, to support him, and myself at the door to call for the police, he said he was willing to adventure the thing.

We walked around to Harris' and put the thing before him. He examined the book, especially the chapters dealing with the purchase of shoes and hats. He said:

"If George talks to any tradesman the things put down here, it is not support—it is carrying to the hospital that he will need."

"You talk," said George, "as though I were a boy without any sense. I shall select from the more polite and less irritating speeches. The grosser insults I shall avoid."

This being clearly understood, Harris gave in his adhesion, and our start was fixed for early Wednesday morning.

MORGAN ROBERTSON

Master Mariner and Writer of Tales

By Benjamin Northrop

THE same indomitable pluck that made Morgan Robertson the mate of a sailing vessel when he was twenty-one years old, and an expert diamond-setter three years after he had quit the sea, has put him in the foremost rank of short-story writers in this country, and all within the last three years.

The story was told to me by Mr. Robertson over his coffee, looking out of the club window down Fifth Avenue and up the cross street—the same cross street that he had often walked carrying manuscript written for food, for only a year or so ago writing was a venture fully as rash, equally as hard and certainly as hazardous as any he ever had chanced in his seafaring days.

This is the story.

"I was thirty-five years old when I began the trade of writing," said Mr. Robertson. "Before that I had been a sailor, jeweler, watchmaker, clock-mender, polisher and diamond-setter. I began to write for a living in 1896. Let me begin at the beginning. I left my home in Oswego, New York, when I was sixteen years old, and went to sea. I was the boy on a square-rigged ship that sailed around the world. It was on this voyage that I learned my first lesson in brutality—that I saw for the first time the abuses that the common sailor suffers, the wrongs I am now making it my business to expose in my sea stories. The ship was in the Trades, and the watches both night and day were monotonously quiet. During the night watch the men usually slept, and the boy kept awake to answer any call from the man at the wheel or the mate. One night I, the boy, fell asleep, and the mate, a great hulking German, got no answer to his summons. He waked me by a kick which landed me on the lee scuppers, and for a few minutes I was more dead than alive. As an additional punishment he bade me walk the main hatch for four hours. I should not say walk; it was a jog trot. Now on shipboard a sailorman does not have much opportunity to exercise his legs, therefore this task became exquisite torture long before the time elapsed. I crawled into my bunk almost fainting, and it was days before I recovered. Once I had a felon which swelled one of the fingers of my left hand to three times its normal size. One day, without any excuse, and merely to gratify his brutal instincts, the mate ordered me to climb a mast.

"'Get up, you young imp. Let me see you climb.'

"And I got up by using my knees, my right hand and my teeth. I got up and I got down again, but to this day I do not know how. I soon found that the only way to avoid individual abuse was to jump whenever an order was given—to do what I was called upon to do as quickly and intelligently as possible and never complain. Of course, when the crew were dressed down collectively I came in for my share. My last few seasons were on the lakes, where pay was better and treatment more civil. When I was twenty-one I was a mate and a pilot. Between the lakes in summer and the salt water in winter I spent my time until 1886. Then I changed my trade. I had learned that I could do almost anything that was to be done in the line of sailoring work. I could sew, mend, splice and caulk, but to stand on deck and make a lot of sailors carry out my orders was harder work than to do the task myself, therefore when I was advised to learn a mechanical trade I was disposed to do so.

"My adviser was a phrenologist in Chicago. He felt my bumps and told me that I had constructive and mechanical ingenuity, and said I could do anything from making a watch to building a bridge. I took up watchmaking because I could not get a chance to build bridges. I went back to Oswego and began the watchmaker's trade under a jeweler whom I had known all my life. The phrenologist was right. I took to my new trade readily, and before the year was out I was earning moderate wages. When summer came I went back to the lakes to make more money. In the fall I found that I had made little money, and, in addition, had lost my job. I belonged to a good family, and the young people of the town took me up. I was invited to dances, parties and sociables; my evenings were spent in society—but I earned my living during the day going from house to house knocking at the back door, asking if they had any clocks to mend. At first it floored me to have the door opened by one of the girls I had danced with the night before; but I soon got over that.

"The next spring I came to New York and wandered through the streets of Jersey City and Hoboken, mending clocks and repairing jewelry wherever I had the chance. At last I got a place at steady wages in a Maiden Lane optical company. I stayed there nine months and then went back to the sea. This time it was on a steam yacht, and I spent the summer of 1888 sailing into the pleasant harbors of Great South Bay, living on the best in the land, and taking orders from no one but the owner. The next winter found me at work again in New York, this time as a jewelry polisher. I was making ten dollars a week. It was a big factory that I worked in, and there were all sorts of workmen in the place. One day a girl polisher who sat next to me said:

"'Do you know how much Max made last week?'

"'No,' I said; 'how much?'

"'He made seventy dollars.'

"'How?'

"'Setting diamonds.'

"Now I reasoned it out to my satisfaction that, although Max was a clever workman and a good fellow, there could not be a difference, or, rather, there ought not to be a difference, of sixty dollars between his worth and mine, so I determined to become a diamond-setter. I practiced at night in my room setting imitation stones in copper cents. After I got the hang of the tools I answered an advertisement from a manufacturer who wanted a pearl setter. I had never set a pearl. However, I never went back to polishing jewelry.

"This was in the fall of 1889. Stone-setting is paid for by the stone. It is good work while it lasts, but the trade is only profitable in the fall. I used to make forty and fifty dollars a week while the work lasted. When summer came I generally tried to find other employment.

"Then came hard times in earnest. I never had been much of a reader. I had read two books by Dickens, one by Thackeray, one by Stevenson, and almost everything that Kipling had written, but somehow I thought that I could write, so I tried my hand on a poem and found that I could rhyme. Then I translated my poem into prose. The subject, however, was not exactly popular, and I was obliged to sell it to an obscure publication; but it gave me my start, and I made up my mind that rather than go back to the factory or the sea I would take up the trade of writing. My first story of any account was The Survival of the Fittest. I came to write it this way: I had been making my headquarters in the office of James C. Summers, who ran a yachting paper up on Fifth Avenue. He was an old friend of mine, and I used his office as if it were my own. One day Summers said to me:

"'Here's a book you ought to read. It's Kipling's The Devil and the Deep Sea.'

"I read it on my way home. I was living then on Washington Heights, and between the elevated road station and my house I mapped out my story. Kipling had written a story about rough sailormen confronted with difficulties, and there wasn't a woman in it. I knew all about that kind of life—the plot of The Survival had been in my mind for months—and in this walk it assumed tangible form. When I got to the house I sat down at the kitchen table. My wife was washing dishes at the other end of it. The only space I took was that required for my paper, and I never heard the rattle of the dishes or the clatter of the pans. I wrote and wrote until I had written eight thousand words. The next day I finished it. It takes me longer to write a story now, and I require more quiet, and a better desk, and lots of things that didn't seem to me essential that night.

MORGAN ROBERTSON

"That was my beginning. After that, and during the first year, I wrote at least twenty-five stories, some of which were published in magazines, but most of them sold to newspaper syndicates. It was hard work and unremunerative, but it was good practice. At last, in the spring of 1898, my first book, Spun Yarns, was brought out. During the next eighteen months only three of my stories were accepted. During the last five months of this time I wrote five more stories. I wrote because I couldn't see well enough to go back to the jeweler's bench and I didn't want to return to the sea. Last spring one of my stories was taken, and within the next two months all were sold and I had received in cash one thousand dollars. Then I collapsed.

"As to my method of work? I have none. I keep a notebook which I fill with phrases as I hear them or as they occur to me. I also jot down in this book studies of character and titles of stories. Take the story of The Nuisance. That title was written years ago. The central character, John Braisted, is, in a measure, a personal sketch of myself. I have been called a nuisance. I did not know how to wear my clothes when I was a sailor. I carried a pipe, and I was known afar off by the odor of tobacco. It took me three weeks to write the introduction to that story, and more than a month to finish it, but it took twenty years to collect the material for it. Take The Battle of the Monsters. It is the story of a fight between warring bacilli struggling in the veins of a hospital patient for his life. That idea was suggested to me by a newspaper clipping, and I got my facts from reading one of the late scientific works upon bacilli and all that the Encyclopedia Britannica contained upon the subject."

Digitized by Google

The CLERK who Reads

By William H. Maher

UNDER the more favorable conditions that prevail to-day boys are not compelled to commence a life of work at so early an age as were the boys of a generation ago, and so have more years of school behind them.

Whether our present-day system of education is an improvement upon that taught forty years ago in the little red schoolhouse is a debatable question. In my own business experience I find that the graduate of to-day has a little knowledge of a great many things, but is not strongly grounded in the common rules that are absolutely necessary to be well learned and thoroughly understood if he would succeed in a business career.

For instance: A boy of eighteen, during the last year of his course in the high school, applied for a position in a bank where he heard a vacancy existed. To test his knowledge of arithmetic he was given an ordinary example in reduction under cubic measure, but was utterly unable to do it. He was then tested in duodecimals, but he had to give that up. And failing in a third trial, he confessed that it was so long since he had studied arithmetic he had forgotten all the rules.

IMPORTANCE OF A GOOD FOUNDATION

The boy of forty years ago was not permitted to forget his rules. Such education as he got was not an end, but a means, and the work in mental and higher arithmetic was so drilled into him and made of such great importance, that when he began the battle of life, even at a tender age, he was provided with a foundation upon which he could build with confidence.

Yet the boy of to-day and we boys of a generation ago are alike in this: in having ample opportunities for self-education. He who considers that his days for education are ended when he passes out of school has already doomed himself to failure; what little he has learned will soon fly from him.

The great mass of boys count their release from school, at any age, as the end of their slavery, and thenceforward open a book only for relaxation and amusement. One boy in a thousand, leaving school to begin work, says to himself: "I will have to compete by and by with men who have had a college education; I must do all I can to fit myself for the battle." So he goes on with his study, aiming for a definite and distinct purpose, and as the years roll on he finds that the college of books has made him an educated man, abundantly able to meet all competition in his own chosen line.

HE WHO READS, RULES

I know a man who quite early in life adopted for his motto this legend: He who reads, rules. He probably found it in the back part of his dictionary, but it seemed to him as if the practical wisdom of all the ages was speaking to him through these words, and he made them his guiding star. He was taken out of the village school when but twelve years old, put to work in a shop, and such education as he had was confined to the Three R's, and was quite limited even in them.

Beginning to read without guide or plan, he continued in that rut for some years, but gradually he began to choose between the wheat and chaff of literature, until his reading was along lines that naurally led to an interest in what was helpful and solid, and formed a superstructure upon which to build better things.

At twenty-one he had worked his way out of the factory and was a successful salesman in a large wholesale store with a salary far exceeding his earlier dreams. No small part of his success was due to the fact that he was, in the broad sense, an educated man with a fund of knowledge that was practical because it had been well digested. The city library had been his college and the greatest minds of all the ages had been his teachers.

The same day that he went into the factory a schoolmate of the same age went to work in another shop. The two had been in the same classes, were of equal ability, and of about the same standing. The shop boy's family was in better standing than that of the factory lad, and in a position to bring influence to push him upward, so that his future was much brighter than that of the other boy.

But his idea was that when one had worked all day he should devote his evenings to recreation, and reading or study did not come under this head. A day came when a higher position was open to him if he was competent to fill it, but after a trial he had to confess that he was not equal to the demands; he settled down into a common workman and is working at a tinner's bench to-day.

Little things lead to advancement. They seem so trivial that they make no impression at the time, but when one looks back in after years he sees that his steps were turned by some trifling thing, just as a little pebble at the right spot decides the course of a river. A prosperous merchant told me of an incident, seemingly insignificant, that made him what he is.

ADVANCEMENT IN ARITHMETIC

The house he worked for received a direct importation of a large invoice of goods from England. The invoice was made out in pounds, shillings and pence. It contained more than twenty classes of goods, each being subject to a different rate of duty; freight on some was charged by space, and on others by weight. A New York house had paid the duty and freight charges, and had drawn for the amount in a lump sum, and the question was, what was the actual cost in dollars and cents of each item laid down in the store in a Western city.

I am aware that I have used considerable space in giving a proposition which will strike most readers as being very simple, but it so happened that neither of the two principals, nor any one then in the store, could figure out the costs and then prove he was right. 'My friend was making a trip for the house and the matter was left until his return. He was shown the invoice and draft and asked if he could make a bill, in American money, showing the cost of each item. He had kept up his arithmetic and was able to do what was wanted of him. He said that was the turning-point with him in that store, and from that day his advancement was rapid.

Probably most of the business men of to-day can point to some important change in their lives caused by some matter apparently as trifling as this.

I recall a remark that a business man made to me not long ago to the effect that a copy of the Altantic Monthly was the cause of his success. He said that one day, while having a copy of this magazine under his arm, he met the wife of his employer. She seemed a little surprised to see him with such literature and asked if it was a new number. Other questions brought out the fact that he read the magazine. She mentioned the matter to her husband, who took new interest in the clerk, invited him to make use of his library, and later selected him for advancement from among others who were sure they had better claims on the house. From this he went on, and in a few years had gained an interest in the business.

One of the best salesmen I ever met always carried a book with him, and utilized in study (for his books were solid—Darwin, Huxley, Spencer) the hours he had to wait after his day's work was done or when a train was late. He was a pleasant man to meet by reason of his intelligence, and was far more successful in making friends for himself and his house than were scores of salesmen who spent money upon their customers in order to be popular. I was quite prepared to receive last New Year's an announcement from his house that he had been taken into the firm.

A dry-goods dealer who does a business of a million dollars a year and watches every detail himself said to me as he pointed to a bright young man of twenty: "There is my future manager; he is the only one of all that crowd who cares to read our trade paper or who wants to know where things come from and how they're made. He spends half his evenings in the city library, and can tell you about the manufacture of every item in his department."

STUDYING STRIKES IN NOVELS

An English manufacturer was making a tour of this country, visiting houses that had been doing business with him for years, and at one place found the principal temporarily absent. A salesman undertook to entertain him during the few minutes he had to wait, and asked him about the way goods were sold in England and the conditions between employers and workmen there. His questions were so pertinent that the Englishman quite warmed up in conversation, and when the principal came in wanted to continue the subject, but the salesman withdrew as soon as he could do so.

A little later the principal came to him saying: "Our English friend is going to stay here over night and wants me to come around and spend the evening with him; he asked me especially to bring you, too." The salesman thought this was mere politeness, or that the visitor had misunderstood that he was simply a clerk, but the principal insisted that he should go with him. They had a pleasant evening, the salesman contributing his share in the conversation, and as he and his employer walked home together the latter asked, with decided interest in his voice: "Where did you pick up so much about English business and workmen?"

"I read about it some time ago, and have often thought about it since."

"Where did you read it? I don't remember ever seeing anything of that kind."

"In Trollope's Orley Farm there is a good deal about traveling salesmen, and in Mrs. Burnett's That Lass o' Lowrie's there's all about a strike with workmen."

"Oh!" The employer dropped the subject, but when he parted from his clerk he had more respect for him than ever before. Their personal relations were a little closer after that, and had much to do with the salesman's advancement.

HIS TRADE PAPER

I was in a hardware store the other day, and noticed several up-to-date innovations that were somewhat out of keeping with my previous knowledge of the proprietor. "How did you happen to think of that?" I asked, pointing to an attractive showcard.

"Oh," said he, laughing, "I didn't think of it at all; that's one of George's hobbies."

"That is an excellent hobby," I said; "where did George get the idea?"

"Oh, he got it out of his trade paper. Nothing would do but I must get that paper, and now it's George's Bible; he looks up all the new ideas and I let him go ahead."

"Well, they are good ideas; you find they help trade, don't you?"

"Yes, that's so; they're all right; George is a good boy."

I thought as I walked away that George would be a partner there before many years. A clerk who studies his trade paper and avails himself of every hint to gain business will not be a clerk forever.

A traveling salesman was telling me of his experience with a clerk who reads. He said: "I had just taken Mr. B.'s order for a nice line of my goods, and good quantities of each size, when his clerk came in. Mr. B. said: 'Tom, I am getting a line of ——; see if this is your idea of quantities.' I opened my book and showed Tom the order as I had written it down. He suggested one change which his employer at once ordered to have made, and then Tom asked what the discount was. I said sixty per cent. He left us without a word and went to the desk, turned over some papers for a minute or two, and then brought a trade journal to Mr. B. They looked it over together and Mr. B. said to me: 'See here, these goods are quoted at sixty-and-five per cent. discount; if you can't give me the bottom price I don't want them.' I had to come down as gracefully as I could, for I wanted the order. That's what we get from these trade journals that quote bottom prices to Tom, Dick and Harry!"

I fancied that I could also hear Mr. B. saying to his clerk: "That's right, Tom; post yourself up as to prices, and keep a sharp lookout for the extra five per cent."

WINNOWING THE WHEAT FROM THE CHAFF

But there are clerks who read too much because they read that which does them harm. The blood-and-thunder novel far outsells the brainy, healthful story. And young clerks seem to be strangely attracted to the poorer work. One will find well-thumbed books of the dime-novel standard in the desk of the shipping clerk, on the private box of the packer, and even in the office man's drawer. The stories are unreal in every respect, and they do harm in giving false pictures of life, and in destroying the reader's taste for better and helpful books. They are not bad in the sense that they lead to crime or uphold dishonesty, but they are bad in making their readers dissatisfied with honest, plodding work, and with the slow progress that is a part of their lives.

The clerk who desires to read intelligently can make no mistake in commencing with books that concern the branch of trade in which he is most interested. If a public library is not at his command he will find such books advertised in his trade paper, and he can better afford to go without some extra bit of clothing than to miss buying the best of these books.

After reading closely and thinking seriously and often upon what he has read, digesting it, as it were, and asking all manner of questions about what he has thought of, he should then take up the lines of trade that come into contact with his own line. By and by he will be ready to study about business as a whole, and this will coax him into the field of business biography.

When he has reached that step he has made distinct progress. Studying the lives of men who were strong forces in trade, either in recent times or days not too far removed, he will become more or less imbued with their spirit and principles, and while he is being entertained by the story of their steps to fortune he is also building up his own character.

As a young man stands at the bookstall and takes in his hand a volume upon business by a successful business man, let him say to himself: "If this man were to say to me that if I would call upon him for fifteen or twenty evenings, at my own convenience, he would tell me all the steps that led to his success in life, how gladly I would accept the invitation and how fortunate I would consider myself to be! But in this volume he does that very thing—gives me the ripe result of his experience and observation; permits me to study it at my leisure and to refer to it in the future as often as and whenever I wish." In this light he would quickly start his own little library of text-books upon business, and greet with pleasure every new book, providing only that it was the outgrowth of experience.

I am wholly convinced that such a reader and student would find the investment an excellent one in its effect upon his business career, but it would pay far better in the growth of his character, the broadening of his tastes, and the pleasure of associating with the world's best thinkers. In this aspect alone it would give return a million fold.

But my object in writing this is to show that it will pay in dollars and cents; a clerk is measured by his intelligence, and now, as in every year since the world began, Knowledge is Power.

Typical Dutch Industry

DUTCHMEN and South African Boers have proved good "copy" for those writers who have traveled in the Netherlands and the Land of Cecil Rhodes. South African books are becoming almost a drug on the market, and the same might also be said of books upon Holland. This is not true of a volume by David S. Meldrum, author of Holland and the Hollanders, in which he treats of the ancestral home of the Boers.

He is a literary adviser to a London publishing house by profession, but a traveler by choice. When he lived in Holland he had many odd experiences, and in one of them he learned to value the plodding industry which is, in part, exhibited by those natives who keep watch on the dikes and canals of the Low Country. He tells this little incident of the Haerlemmer-Meer and says it has official foundation:

"An area of many acres, with growing things on it, was detached by a river from its place in a lake and driven by winds and storm to the other side. After the tempest had abated, the land settled down as if it had been born there, and started in to grow its plants as had been its custom. The proprietor, however, found himself in a false position. His land had floated on to water which belonged to his neighbor and for which he would possibly have to pay rent, and it was too hard work to go so far to cultivate it. After much argument he succeeded in getting the Government to have the acres towed back to him, and the queerest part of it all was that the soil yielded a larger harvest than any other of his fields."

Digitized by Google

Within the LINES

By Clinton Ross

THE Captain woke that morning at first with a lazy contentment. And then he remembered that if he had distinguished himself—if in the cavalry charge he had been first—that two of his comrades would sit no more at his mess. But first, you must notice, a certain pleasurable vanity held him; he saw in his grasp a little bauble of present reputation and promotion.

There followed the reaction of regret. A man who has been in a dozen fights learns to regard, while in action, death as a matter of course, either for himself or his friends. The exhilaration seizes; the blood tingles; and the truth making the Red Badge of Courage accepted is that an ordinary man, after craven fear, suddenly forgets himself. Even gentlemen born to the habit of self-respect and self-control have known that verity, from the great Frederick to lesser men.

For Captain Leslie that exultation had not passed. But now, the next morning, as he lay still, regret led on to a sadder mood, to voices far away—beyond hearing; to faces forgotten in the brisk, imperative movement of life. As he lay there Leslie was back in an old sentimental moment, talking with a girl who had jilted him—a case of "calf love"; he could see her eyes, hear her voice. Five years of other faces—of the stir of events.

Even in more serious affairs we musn't linger a-pining; 'tis life for us. And I would add to Stevenson's lucid phrase, "that impure passion of remorse," that impure passion of regret. Then the John Leslie of the Seventieth, the yesterday, returned; he never should mess with Bill Darlington and Jim Forbes. And suddenly he was wide awake, on his feet—was dashing cold water over his face, dressing, and calling for breakfast. Another day had its claim on him.

"The General, sir, wishes you at once."

The General? A thought of the yesterday brought him the reason in a rush of a pleasurable glow.

"Be seated, Captain," said the General as he entered.

"You've been commended for coolness and firmness, and yesterday—the report runs —' great bravery on Captain Leslie's part.' "

"I couldn't very well help it," said Leslie; "I was keyed up to it, you know."

"A modest answer encourages praise," quoth the General with a smile. "But it will be in my own report. That's not why I have sent for you. I have—hum—a duty."

"Yes, sir," said Leslie, suddenly sobering.

"Success but leads to more effort—your capability is recognized; reliance is put on you."

The General sat reflecting, tapping the little map-laden table with his knuckles.

"We have pushed well into their lines," he said, after a moment. "They didn't expect us so far down. Ten miles from here the families are still in their houses. They'll be running fast enough, to be sure. Well, study this map. Follow that road, Captain, d'ye see, along the river—ten miles, isn't it? Yes, ten. Now, at the forks turn due west. You pass a village there, eh—what's its name? No matter, a blacksmith's at the next turn. Then—let me see—seventeen miles; 'tis the road to the left—there, twenty-one miles; and there you turn from the turnpike into private grounds—twenty-two miles to the house. Now there's another way," the General went on, explaining details. "One with twenty troopers might sweep into that quiet country; he suddenly might find himself in a mess; he might fall in with a detachment; he might come back—he and his twenty men—I think that's a sufficient number. To make the story short, I want to find the man who will go there and search that house, and bring away somebody whom a spy has reported to be there. It isn't an order, you understand, but a suggestion. I don't ask a man to risk his life, or his chance of further service, but—it would please me to catch that fox, who doesn't fancy we would dare venture there—if unexpectedly we have reached so far down into the heart of his country."

The Captain smiled.

"I don't overlook the suggestion," he said.

"Study the map. Choose your twenty men. Colonel Moore will help you. I am obliged, Captain."

"And we may or may not find him?" Leslie said.

"Well, if he's flown, you will have dared, that's all. He's there to get his family away."

"Well?" said the Captain.

The General hesitated, and then:

"The man who of all others has most interfered with this march—Dorston, man; Dorston."

Leslie paled, and a lump was in his throat.

"Dorston," he said faintly; "not that man!"

To the General, keen observer as he was, the exclamation was but one of surprise at the daring cleverness of his idea; Dorston who had harassed and bothered them; Dorston to be seized in his fancied security. The movement of the General's division had been so rapid that even yet the enemy failed to understand its significance: that the advance was in the very heart of their country.

But Leslie, standing there, understood that he had committed himself to arrest the brother of the girl he had been thinking of that morning. He had known Philip Dorston in those other days; as he stood there before the General he had a picture of the old friend whom he hardly associated with that daring cavalry leader who had harassed every rod of the advance. And it was easy to refuse, to say that he had changed his mind. But what would the General say to him then? He would fancy that John Leslie was a coward. But why not confess to the General at once that he knew those Dorstons? But that equally would be a confession of weakness. This was a struggle in which friend was put against friend. How many would avoid duty by the same excuse!

"Now, I suppose, sir?" he said at last.

"Yes, now, Captain."

"Very well," said Leslie; "now it shall be."

"Good luck to you, Captain."

A half-hour later Leslie and his twenty troopers swung out of camp. And as they covered the miles he said to himself, "What a beastly thing is this war!" and again, "What a beastly thing!" And yet he had been a man to whom his profession was all. He began to analyze his feelings. It was not, he was sure, any of the old sentiment about Nell Dorston. Why, he had forgotten her long ago. He really had been refused once since; and he had settled down to the philosophy that "the girls you want to marry you can't marry; the girls you can marry you don't want to," and then he thought he had found he didn't want to marry either very much, two months afterward. But oddly this morning he had wakened thinking of Nell Dorston. That was not queer when he was on this mission. The old sentiment, if it existed, hadn't kept him from regarding Philip Dorston as simply the bold cavalry leader—nothing more nor less. Well, it was rather bad to be sent to the very house of these old acquaintances on such an errand. Eh, in civil war how many fellows would refuse duties if such considerations should be paramount!

The march was dangerous for the little troop, but the luck of the daring helped them. They followed the road along the river in a deserted countryside. After they had turned due west at the forks, the people yet were only moving in their sudden scare. As they rattled through the village, blanched faces—women's and children's—stared after them. What were they after?—the foe! Was it not enough that men from that countryside were dead on many fields; should war reach by this sudden march even to their hearths? At the blacksmith's an old bent man came out and cursed them, and his senile oaths followed them down the long western slopes and faded into the woods. And then they came out in the open, and in the grounds they sought, with the white glimmer of the house between the green.

"Dismount!"

The order followed to separate and surround the house. Leslie walked up a gravel path. A woman came to the door and shaded her eyes with her hand, a frightened look on her face.

"I beg pardon," said Captain Leslie, following her inside.

"Oh!" she cried.

"I am sorry," said he.

"We heard the guns, but we didn't think that you would push on so far." She recognized him. "Why, it's Jack Leslie!"

"I'm awfully sorry," said he. "How d'ye do, Miss Dorston? We haven't met in five years——"

"No; not in five years. What do these men mean?"

"Hem—well—— Oh, you know—I want to apologize."

"You are on our land," she said.

"I know it; I know it. It's my order," he added.

"Well? Are you going to camp here? You may not stay very long," she added, with a fearless flash.

"What a spirit you have! How pretty you are! I almost wish I weren't on the other side."

"I see you haven't forgotten compliments," she said with a faint smile; but her eyes—and they were very bright—wandered restlessly.

"Oh, bother!" he said. "I almost hate myself. I do hate myself and this duty."

"Why, Captain Leslie? I see you are 'Captain.' "

His voice sank to a whisper.

"I am here, Miss Dorston, to arrest your brother."

For a moment he heard from the fields the hum of the midsummer afternoon.

"I should think," she began coldly, "that you could have let a stranger do this."

"It was my order," he said doggedly.

For a moment they stood there

The Best Part

THROWN AWAY

This has been scientifically proven to be true in the manufacture of the ordinary white flour. The theory that the whitest is the best flour is absolutely false. The gluten, or natural bone-building, nerve-strengthening property of the wheat kernel, is sacrificed to cater to the sentimentalist who must have "white" bread. Use

FRANKLIN MILLS FLOUR

A FINE FLOUR OF THE ENTIRE WHEAT

In color a rich golden brown, has a natural flavor, makes sweet, delicious bread, easy to digest, has four times the strengthening and nourishing power of ordinary white bread.

Buy only in original packages bearing our name and Trade-Mark. Grocers Keep It.

FRANKLIN MILLS CO.
Lockport, N. Y.

Makes Its Own GAS

$250 A Month AND EXPENSES MADE

MAGIC LAMP

Makes Its Own Gas

Gives 90 to 100 Candle power light at a cost of ONLY

1 cent for 10 hours

No danger, no risk, no trouble, no smell. The Magic Lamp is made a standard by Fire Insurance Underwriters.

AGENTS make $200 and up a week selling these Lamps. They sell on sight to stores and families. Write to-day for territory and sample lamp.

THE MAGIC LIGHT CO.
Factory, 7 River St.
CHICAGO, ILL.

Yerba Maté Tea

"Hebe herself could serve no daintier cup"

The finest health-giving beverage in the world, already used by over 20,000,000 people in South America and Europe, and now introduced into this country for the first time. Digestible, and does not injure the nervous system. Acts as a powerful invigorator for invalids. Has none of the deleterious effects of other drinks.

What is YERBA MATÉ

A tea-like beverage, considered very refreshing in fatigue.—Century Dictionary.

The infusion contains the same active principle (Theïn) as tea and coffee, but not their volatile aromatic oils.—Standard Dictionary.

The infusion has a pleasant odor with an agreeable bitter taste, and is much used for tea in South America.—Webster's International Dictionary.

In the Southeastern republics it is a much prized article of luxury, and is the first thing offered to visitors. Maté acts as a restorative after great fatigue.—Encyclopedia Britannica.

Send five 2-cent stamps for sample and illustrated booklet, containing opinions of leading scientists who have analyzed Maté; or, better yet, send one dollar and you will receive, postpaid, a month's supply for several persons.

THE YERBA MATÉ TEA CO., Sole Importers
257 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Learn to Draw

Classes in newspaper, magazine and book illustrating. Practical instruction by successful illustrators experienced as teachers. Send for illustrated catalogue, free.

N. Y. SCHOOL OF ILLUSTRATING
114 West 34th St., New York

WALL PAPER

Send for free sample book of beautiful designs direct from manufacturers and save 25 per cent.

AGENTS WANTED

KAYSER & ALLMAN
1214-1216 Market St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

She looked at him for a moment. Did he hold it against her that once she had jilted him? And then she put the thought away. She was an observant young woman. His face was too frank, too honest; and with a certain pique she thought she saw that she had been forgotten.

"He isn't here," she said.

"I must search the house," he said.

"You dare?" she cried; "you dare!"

"I must fulfill my order."

"You sha'n't pass this door," she said, "unless you're a brute. I won't stir. I tell you he isn't——"

"You have told me that he is," he said.

"My wrist was broken, and I left three men in the road by the river, but I have the prisoner"

"I haven't! I haven't!" she cried.

He turned back to the outer door and his men when her voice reached him:

"Your men are on every side."

"On every side, Miss Dorston."

"You must do this?" she said. "You must?"

And what's in a mood? What's in a forgotten sentiment? What's in duty? What's in love? If you were there you never would have been weak. You despise Leslie for this very weakness. And yet he had been ever the efficient officer; the strong man!

"You have but to give me your word, Miss Dorston."

He knew she would tell any lie to save Philip Dorston; he knew it was a case of unacceptable evidence; he knew that he courted disgrace, and deserved it.

The girl looked at him out of her tears. He looked down at the carpet.

"I give it," she said at last faintly; "he isn't here."

"I will withdraw my men. I am sorry to have bothered you."

"You have taken my word," she said. "Will that be sufficient for you when you report?"

"It will be sufficient for me," he said brusquely.

"You may need something to eat."

"We will eat later, thank you," he said. "I dare not risk my men any longer."

"You have taken a great risk in coming here. You may be caught——"

"I knew the risk," he said.

"I thank you so much," the girl went on; "so much."

"Why?" he asked. "Why?"

"For taking——"

But at the voice a tall, boyish figure was outlined in a doorway, and a voice said:

"Captain Leslie, my sister was mistaken."

"Phil," she cried, "Phil—how can you, how can you?"

"Do you suppose I could let him suffer, and you perjure yourself?" Dorston said quietly. "I heard it all. It was like breaking a parole—a word of honor. We can't afford to do this—whatever happens. Captain Leslie would be court-martialed for this."

"You must take him," said the girl, turning. She walked down to his side.

Turning to his prisoner, Leslie said:

"I shall be lucky if I get away with you at all. We must start at once."

"You will be lucky," Dorston acknowledged.

Leslie left the two together for a few moments while he went outside and gave the order to mount.

"Now, Colonel Dorston," he called.

Without a word Dorston turned from his sister, went outside, and down the path.

"One word to you, Captain Leslie," she called.

"Yes," Leslie answered, going up the path to her.

"I thank you so much," she said, "so much. What was my word—to his being made prisoner?" she added. "Can you forgive me?"

"Why, of course. I knew," he said.

"You knew, and you accepted it. And why?"

He came nearer, while the troop waited.

"I have been a fool," he said, "all these years. I have been deceiving myself." His voice rose fiercely, as if accusing her. But through tears a faint smile gathered on her lips.

"I love you—now, Jack Leslie."

"You mean that? You can't mean it," he said, taking her hand. "You can't mean it."

"I have said I love you," she said softly.

"Nor shall difference of opinion nor war keep us apart?" he said.

"Nor shall war nor difference of opinion keep us apart," she said in a low voice.

For a moment they stood there. Then he turned down the path.

"Mount," came the order.

To the General at midnight Captain Leslie entered.

"Your arm is tied up!"

"My wrist was broken, and I left three men in the road by the river, but I have the prisoner."

Mr. Hornung and the Maori Wizard

ERNEST WILLIAM HORNUNG, brother-in-law of Dr. Conan Doyle and the writer of burglar stories, has just enough superstition in his nature to make a mystery seem real to him. He was born in Middlesborough, England, in the late sixties, and was educated at Uppingham School. In 1884 he went to Australia, where he stayed two years and got plots for many of his most lively novels. While in the land of the Southern Cross he called upon an old Maori fortune-teller.

"What do you think I'm going to be?" he asked.

"You're going to be a millionaire miner and rancher," was the reply.

"Then I might as well give up," said Hornung, "for I'd made up my mind to be a story-writer."

But he didn't give up, and he heard so many stirring tales and saw so many exciting things that he took up the pen as a relief and by so doing won his spurs.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

The Midwinter

(DOUBLE NUMBER) Fiction Number

On All News-Stands January 25

No Increase in Price. Five Cents the Copy

The Midwinter Fiction Number of the Post will surpass all previous special issues in the excellence and variety of its short stories, the interest of its special articles, and the attractiveness of its make-up. It will have thirty-two pages of reading matter, a beautiful colored cover, after a painting by George Gibbs, and illustrations by the best artists in the country.

Post readers who are not subscribers should order the Midwinter Fiction Number at once. Even by running our presses twenty-two hours a day we were unable to supply the demand for the Christmas number, and it was impossible to fill orders for 25,000 copies.

RICHARD HARDING DAVIS

The leading story in the Midwinter Fiction Number—in title La Lettre d'Amour—is by Richard Harding Davis. It has been superbly illustrated by Howard Chandler Christy. The scene is laid in London—in the Savoy Restaurant—and the characters are a beautiful American girl and her two admirers: one, a wealthy young Harvard man—who has followed her across Europe; the other, a musician in the Hungarian Orchestra. This is one of the strongest stories Mr. Davis has yet written.

La Lettre d'Amour

A Bull Market
A tale of the street, with a not untimely moral.
By ROBERT HERRICK

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife
Glimpses of life and people in the more exclusive circles of Washington society—through the lorgnette of a statesman's wife.

How the Boy Won
An intimate personal sketch of General McArthur and his early days in the army.
By MAJ. WATROUS, U. S. A.

Three Men on Four Wheels
An exceptionally funny story, in which the author follows the further adventures of his bicyclists.
By JEROME K. JEROME

Bohemian Days in San Francisco
A paper on San Francisco as it was in the middle fifties.
By BRET HARTE

A Rub of the Green
A clever humorous story for golfers, in which the status of the bull-dog on the links is clearly explained.
By E. L. SABIN

Tales of Men of Many Trades
The first of a series of humorous stories about business misfits.
By CHARLES BATTELL LOOMIS

The Clerk Who Makes Friends
A practical talk about the value of acquaintances to business men.
By W. H. MAHER

Midwinter Features of the Post

S. R. CROCKETT

The author of The Raiders has written for the Post a dashing story of love and fighting on the Scottish border in the days of the Pretender. The tale is in four parts, the first of which will appear in the Post of February 3.

The Fitting of the Peats

MAJ. JAS. B. POND

The veteran lecture manager contributes to the Post two charming papers on the personal side of Henry Ward Beecher, who was long his intimate friend and traveling companion.

300,000 Miles with Henry Ward Beecher

5 Cents the Copy, $2.50 the Year, or sent by mail 5 months, on trial, for $1.00*

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Digitized by Google

WHAT to READ
The Books of the Week

On the Future of His People *

DOCTOR WASHINGTON may be considered, in relation to education, as the prophet of the practical. For instance, the volume before us indulges in no flights of fancy, no gilded speculations about the condition of the American negro generations hence; indeed, the author frankly dismisses the question as one that does not now much concern him. Though he is hopeful of his race, and believes in the ultimate triumph of the forces of progress which in the end make for justice, the future of the negro which he discusses is that of to-morrow, as growing out of the conditions of yesterday and to-day; and as he believes in getting the foundations of an argument, as well as of an education, properly laid, he gives to the present a large part of his attention.

This volume is chiefly devoted to Mr. Washington's theory of the industrial education of the negro, and is a logical and forceful presentation of the views he has so long endeavored to propagate, and has carried out with such marked success at Tuskegee. The magnitude and seriousness of the problem confronting the South—for it is chiefly in its Southern aspects that Mr. Washington discusses the future of the negro—are clearly perceived by the author. Being a diplomatist as well as a philosopher, he does not dwell unduly upon race prejudice, which is the most obvious and to some minds the most serious feature of the negro problem. The point he emphasizes is that the low esteem in which the colored race is held is largely due to the negro's poverty, his ignorance of the immediate means to overcome it, and his lack of thrift and enterprise. Making due allowance for discouraging conditions, he sees in the negro a great amount of undeveloped energy, which, if wisely directed along the lines of most obvious need and of least resistance, will vastly simplify the problem of his elevation. In industrial education, carried on side by side with mental training, and perhaps given for a time the greater emphasis, Mr. Washington finds the entering wedge by which his people can work their way into the body politic in a higher sense than they have hitherto been able to do.

A very casual perusal of this volume will convince the thoughtful reader that there is much in it that will apply, with almost equal force, to the white people of the South as well as to the black, and, in some measure, as well to the North as to the South. The overcrowding of the learned professions; the "stepping-stone" system of never learning to do anything thoroughly, because you are always expecting to have something better to do very soon; the lack of scientific agricultural training; the need of trades' schools to replace the old and moribund apprenticeship system and offset the tyranny of trades' unions—are not confined to the Afro-American people. If Mr. Washington, with his system of education, can get the masses of his race started in life on a broad industrial foundation, with ample room for the upward development of those who have ability and opportunity for yet higher things, he will do them a great service. If, in addition, his views, so clearly set forth in this well-written book, receive proper recognition as an important contribution to the general subject of popular education, Doctor Washington will have conferred a benefit upon the people of the entire country.

The book is in all respects worthy the attention of thoughtful minds, and is sure to be widely read. —Charles W. Chesnutt.

* The Future of the American Negro. By Dr. Booker T. Washington. Small, Maynard & Co., Incorporated.

The Black Wolf's Breed *

MR. DICKSON would write a capital story of adventure if he would strive a little harder after vraisemblance, and lay on his horrors with a lighter hand. Not that horrors are objectionable in themselves, but they should have a historical basis in historical fiction. The Revocation of the Edict of Nantes was an act of unjustifiable harshness as well as a grave political error; but it did not give free rein to cruelty and license. The Massacre of St. Bartholomew was terrible enough in sober truth without adding to it every appalling incident that an active fancy can conjure.

The hero of The Black Wolf's Breed is a young soldier of Louisiana, Captain de Mouret, whom Bienville sends on a secret mission to Versailles, and who enjoys, before he goes home again, as many encounters and hairbreadth escapes as ever fell to even a hero's lot. Conspiracies, duels, murders, treasonable dispatches which are lost or stolen and get everybody into hot water, adventures with ladies of royal blood who visit dangerous gambling-dens disguised as cavaliers, and then say composedly, "My lord, you must protect me; it would be the scandal of France were I discovered in such a place"—all these things, and many more, keep the reader going at a breakneck pace from the first page to the last.

De Mouret is a lad of mettle. He has an audience with Louis the Fourteenth the day after his arrival at Versailles, and, in nowise abashed by royalty, makes a speech two pages long, and of a distinctly reproachful character. "Hast thou forgotten," he asks the polite Monarch, "that wounded lad who lived to save the King in other fields? Dost thou remember his name? Let me remind you, sire, that lad was Bienville de la Chaise, your loyal Governor of Louisiana."

Was the great Louis really hectored in this way by young Captains of Colonial Guards? If so, he has been basely misjudged by those who called him proud.

* The Black Wolf's Breed. By Harris Dickson. The Bowen-Merrill Company.

A Romance of Old Venice †

THE Signors of the Night is an engaging title, pleasantly suggestive of mystery and deeds of darkness. Mr. Max Pemberton has given it to a fantastic medley of tales in which tragedy, comedy and melodrama meet and mingle, and which have for their common background a Venice strangely unlike the proud, sombre and deeply religious Republic known to historians.

In Mr. Pemberton's Venice life is amusing but insecure. Assassination is the leading industry, and gentlemen with daggers in their hearts are found lying around in the most unlikely places, to the infinite annoyance of their friends. There are also conspirators in great abundance who glide about in ghostly gondolas, and take mysterious papers out of tombs at midnight, and drink deep drafts of "the golden wine of Cyprus" in company with ladies of unearthly beauty but painfully irregular behavior. Then there is a bandit, known as the Wolf of Cismon, who throws Claude Duval and Jack Sheppard permanently into the shade; and a dancing girl who figures in most of the stories because it is her duty in life to overhear conspiracies and "save Venice," which she does on several occasions very modestly and sweetly, and in return for which benefit the grateful city sends her to day-school to learn her letters, and gives her her choice of the conspirators for a husband. Above all, there is a wonderful soldier-monk, called by the many Fra Giovanni, and by the few the Prince of Iseo, who combines within himself the qualities of Richelieu, Haroun-al-Raschid and Sherlock Holmes. This personage makes his way into splendid palaces at supper-time, and tells the guests they must be banished or beheaded by morning. He defeats all the conspiracies which Nina overhears, and some fresh ones besides. He has but to lift his cowl to see men fall trembling on their knees. He rules the rulers of Venice, and assigns life and death at his pleasure. Yet with all these pressing cares he finds time to plan huge practical jokes of the robust order common in boys' schools, in carrying out which jokes the Venetian officials—who seem to have been a jolly, mirth-loving set of men—lend him a helping hand.

Perhaps the illustrations of Mr. Pemberton's book are also intended as a jest. For why else should the bandit look like a Puritan apprentice, and the conspirators like Benjamin Franklin and William Penn?

—Agnes Repplier.

† The Signors of the Night. By Max Pemberton. Dodd, Mead & Co.

Some Recent Humor

OF MAKING funny books there is no end, and this season's crop of humor is satisfactory both in quality and quantity. Oliver Herford gives us two volumes which have greater pretensions to continuity than anything his butterfly genius has hitherto turned out. Perhaps the more attractive is the Alphabet of Celebrities,* and the funniest page of this is the one which shows

"Rubenstein playing that old thing at P.
To Rollo and Rembrandt, who wish they were deaf."

Another funny one is about

"Lafontaine, who finds he's unable
To interest Luther and Liszt at his table
While Lotz continues to dance on the table."

In his Child's Primer of Natural History† Mr. Herford says funny things with a straight face, which is, of course, the most taking form of wit. We quote Some Geese as being a true bit of humor and also a humorous bit of truth.

"Ev-er-y child who has the use
Of his sen-ses knows a goose.
See them un-der-neath the tree
Goth-er round the goos-ey's knee,
While she reads them by the hour
From the works of Scho-pen-hau-er.
How pa-tient-ly the geese at-tend!
But do they re-al-ly com-pre-hend
What Scho-pen-hau-er's driving at?
Oh, not at all; but what of that?
Neither do I; neither does she.
And for that mat-ter, nor does he."

Another of our younger humorists is Mr. Gelett Burgess, who also has had two new books appear recently. One of these is called The Lively City o' Ligg,‡ and is a series of stories previously printed in a periodical which describe the antics of a number of inanimate objects. Mr. Burgess' humor has a magic touch which invests everything with a personality, and even a humanity, and we resent, with the chairs and sofas, the indignities that are offered to them. Perhaps one of the Ligg inhabitants strayed into Mr. Burgess' other book, A Nonsense Almanack,§ for in this calendar of absurdities we find a

". . . . gaudy Pseudo-Chair
A most Upholsterific Blunder;
It doesn't Wonder Why it's There,
We don't Encourage it to Wonder."

—Carolyn Wells.

* An Alphabet of Celebrities. By Oliver Herford. Small, Maynard & Co., Incorporated.

† A Child's Primer of Natural History. By Oliver Herford. R. H. Russell.

‡ The Lively City o' Ligg. By Gelett Burgess.

§ A Nonsense Almanack. By Gelett Burgess. F. A. Stokes Company.

GLIMPSES OF NEW BOOKS

MR. T. JENKINS HAINS' latest sea yarn is the diary of a consumptive English baronet who goes to sea for his health. He ships in three cruises, meets with as much whiskey and adventure as the reader could decently expect, and finally founders in the Pharos with all hands. His papers, published under the title of The Wreck of the Cosmaugh, are picked up at sea. J. B. Lippincott Company.

Dishonesty and what it breeds is the story of Judge Ebridge. Not that Mr. Opie Read makes the Judge dishonest; on the contrary, he pardons and reinstates in his trust and affection the man who has wronged him most. Judge Ebridge is a book with a moral, and forgiveness even more than honesty is that moral. Rand, McNally & Co.

Can You Tell?

The Shortstory Publishing Company, 139-145 High Street, Boston, Mass., will pay $4200, in sums of $100 to $500, for clean, clever, original, unusual stories, of 1500 to 6000 words, for publication in THE BLACK CAT. Each story will be judged solely upon its merits, without regard to the name or reputation of its writer, and the

$4200 Rewards

Will be paid in cash. But no story will be considered at all unless it is sent strictly in accordance with the printed conditions, which will be mailed free, together with many of the names and addresses, as references, of the men and women in all parts of America who have received over $30,000 cash for BLACK CAT stories. If you or your friends can tell a clever story, write at once for particulars, as the contest closes in March.

Are You a Cog?

If you are a workman or a clerk, and feel as if you are like a cog in a wheel, going always but making no progress, write and learn how to prepare yourself for a really desirable position.

Change Your Occupation

We give complete courses by mail in Electrical, Mechanical or Steam Engineering, Architectural or Mechanical Drawing, Surveying, Civil Engineering, etc. We will advise you free.

The International Correspondence Schools
Box 1121, Scranton, Pa.

Book-Keeping Shorthand

Taught Entirely BY MAIL

Success of our students in business is based on training in accuracy and thoroughness. Business methods taught are modern, practical—exactly what is required by progressive business houses.

Only your spare time needed to complete a course. Write for free descriptive book, which is helpful to ambitious people. Easy moderate. Monthly payments if you desire.

NATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE INSTITUTE
19-30 Second National Bank Building, - Washington, D. C.

HOME STUDY

of BOOK-KEEPING SHORTHAND BUSINESS FORMS PENMANSHIP, &c.

with our Private Lessons BY MAIL qualify you to secure good paying positions. We give just the training needed for success in business. No failures among those who work with us. Tuition reasonable. The cheapest and best method of study. Highly indorsed. Established 1863. Over 40,000 students. We also teach English, Civil Service and other courses by mail. Trial lesson, 10c. A fine Catalogue free.

BRYANT & STRATTON, 155 College Bldg., Buffalo, N. Y.

Increase Your Salary

Send 10 cents for 3 months' trial subscription to

"The Book-Keeper"

A high-class monthly magazine for Bookkeepers, Stenographers and Business Men. It will teach you Book-Keeping, Shorthand, Penmanship, Law, Arithmetic, Commercial Arithmetic, Business Practice, Advertising, Arithmetic, Lightning Calculations, etc. $1.00 A YEAR.

The Book-Keeper Pub. Co., Ltd.
170 Buhl Block, Detroit, Mich.

E. H. HOUGHTON & CO.

Save Postage

by using our Envelope Cuts. Sample mailed free.

CHICAGO CLASP COMPANY, - Buchanan, Mich.

LAW

taught by mail. Prepares for the bar; reviews, text-books, or pupil. Helps students already in practice. Takes up the regular college course, with books. Write

University Extension Law School, 606 Opera Building, Chicago

Digitized by Google

"YOU CAN HARDLY MISS IT IF YOU GO VIA THE QUEEN & CRESCENT"

A Southern trip is an ideal trip when it's taken on fast, homerun trains. That's the kind they have on the Q. & C. and Southern Ry. And over a track that is absolutely SUPERB.

Charleston & Florida Limited runs solid to Jacksonville. Send 2-cent stamp for book on Cuba and Porto Rico. W. C. Rinearson, G. P. A., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Royal Stationery

Your Monogram or Initial engraved in any style shown or choice of three others, on two quires finest Writing Paper (white or tinted) with 50 envelopes.

Material	Initial	Monogram
In Flat Colors,	$ .75	$1.25
In Gold, Silver or Bronze,	.85	1.25
Illuminated in Two Colors,	1.00	1.50

Send 2c. for handsome sample book and sheet of monograms.

Royal Engraved Visiting Cards Including Plate—

Finest Quality—Correct Form—50 cards, 75c. 100 cards, $1.00 (sample free).

Royal Wedding Invitations and Announcements Engraved. Samples Free. All charges prepaid.

ROYAL ENGRAVING CO. 18 S. 9th St., Phila.

PATENTS GUARANTEED

Our fee returned if we fail. Any one sending sketch and description of any invention will promptly receive our opinion free concerning the patentability of same. "How to Obtain a Patent" sent upon request. Patents secured through us advertised for sale at our expense.

Patents taken out through us receive special notice, without charge, in THE PATENT RECORD, an illustrated and widely circulated journal, consulted by Manufacturers and Investors.

Send for sample copy FREE. Address

VICTOR J. EVANS & CO.
(Patent Attorneys.)
Evans Building, - WASHINGTON, D. C.

Letters Copied While Writing

Keep a copy of all letters; no press; no water; no brush; no work. Any ink; any pen; any paper. Our Pen-Carbon never smuts; our clip holds paper firm. Write with no extra pressure, and our Pen-Carbon Letter Book produces a perfect copy. Can be used anywhere. If your stationers do not keep it, write for free sample.

Department G
PEN-CARBON MANIFOLD CO.
221-227 Canal Street, - New York

BE AN ACTOR OR ACTRESS

Learn this noble profession at home, through the Desberger Method, also Elocution, Oratory and the Memory to retain volumes. "The Art of Acting," with fifty portraits of leading actors and actresses, sent free to all addressing

The Educational Institute of Drama
Dept. D, St. Louis, Mo.

EUROPE SPRING—To Naples, Rome and Northward to Norway. SUMMER—To Norway, Sweden, Russia and Southward to . . . PARIS

TWELFTH TOUR. FIRST-CLASS. CIRCULARS READY.
WM. T. SHEPHERD, - 378 Boylston St., Boston

POULTRY PAPER, illustrated, 32 pages; 25 cents per year, 4 months' trial 10 cents. Sample Free. 64-page practical poultry book free to yearly subscribers. Book alone 10 cents. Catalogue of poultry books free.

POULTRY ADVOCATE, Syracuse, N. Y.

The King's Colors seem to be winning favor in the fiction of to-day. Jennie Gould Lincoln swells the list with her last romance. The brilliance of Carolina in Colonial days lends an attractive background to figures, yet remembered, who fought for the hand of A Pretty Tory. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Mr. William Winter has given shape to an idea which possesses more than mere aptness. The relation between the great plays which gave Edwin Booth his opportunity and the genius which in turn touched and reacted upon them, left them recast and heightened, was not surface cohesion but internal dependence. Mr. Winter has had rare opportunity to give this relation careful study. It was under his care that—with Booth's sanction—the prompt-books of the sixteen plays to which Booth confined his repertoire were originally published. A careful revision of the earlier imprint, with prefaces and appended notes, historical, critical and explanatory, by the editor, is now issued in three volumes. The Penn Publishing Company.

Law and How to Keep Out of It, by Paschal H. Coggins, is the original title of one of a series of popular little handbooks. Others are, A Dictionary of Mythology, by John H. Bechtel; Dancing, by Marguerite Wilson; and Practical Palmistry, by Henry Frith. The aim of the editors is to afford ready reference in compact yet comprehensive form and agreeable presentment. The Penn Publishing Company.

Mr. Frank Stockton's whimsical humor will assert itself. In The Young Master of Hyson Hall, a story for boys, the tables are turned, and it is the guardian and uncle who runs away, and the boy who stays at home. Follows the narrative of the new responsibilities and adventures of dutiful Phil and his chum, Chap Webster, a youngster with what Mr. Stockton calls a "buckwheat-cake face." J. B. Lippincott Company.

Personally, we are not convinced of the soundness of the mongrel theory, but Bruno was an exception. In a short biography bearing his name, Byrd Whitman Dewey follows with loving care his endearing traits. He was amiable and intelligent, watchful and sympathetic, but like most generous natures, prone to the influence of evil company—and he would chew shoes in the house. Little, Brown & Co.

Literary Hearthstones is the happy designation of a series of attractive studies of the characters and home lives of certain persons, famous in the judgment of the people, which have to do with what they were rather than with what they did. The series is from the pen of Marion Harland, who has brought to the task a real liking and a sympathetic enthusiasm. William Cowper and Charlotte Brontë are the subjects of the first two sketches. Other volumes are in preparation. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

In Child Life in Colonial Days, Miss Alice Morse Earle throws a most interesting side-light on the formative influences of American history—by which let it not be understood that anything is detracted from the normal interest that always attaches to children as children. Miss Earle describes what they wore, what they studied, how they played, and what discipline was meted out to them. The Macmillan Company.

In The Martial Graves of Our Fallen Heroes in Santiago de Cuba, Dr. Henry C. McCook, Chaplain of the Second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, U. S. A., has fixed and described the graves of all who fell in the late Spanish War. It is Doctor McCook's belief, as worded in his preface, that to him who has died in her behalf, Liberty owes it "through the eternal age to bid his memory live." The book has been sent to the nearest kin of every one who fell near Santiago. George W. Jacobs & Co.

Any book bearing A Village Conquest for title is under a disadvantage these days—we have been so overburdened by the admirers and imitators of Miss Wilkins—but I. T. Thurston at least finds a different meaning in country life. The world is not quite crushed flat with hopelessness, nor wholly hardened by rigid, bare necessity; unselfishness and endeavor meet with their reward. A. L. Bradley & Co.

NEWS FROM BOOK-LAND

Chinese Credulity.—Arthur H. Smith, whose recently published book upon village life in China is a companion volume to his Chinese Characteristics, is an American missionary stationed at Pang Chwang, not far from Tien-Tsin in Shangtung. He is far removed from Western civilization, and in the course of his long career has become so familiar with Chinese life as to be regarded an authority equal even to Bishop Williams. He has a strong love for literary work, and has contributed frequently to the press. He has a quick eye for the dramatic and humorous side of life, which he utilizes in embellishing his writings as well as in spicing his conversation. He tells many stories of the confusion produced in the Chinese intellect by the increasing pressure of Occidental civilization. He once allowed some Chinese friends to run over some humorous illustrated papers. They did so with deep interest, but manifested surprise rather than amusement. The following week, when he was at a party given by the natives, he was entreated to give a full description of the Western barbarians who had wings and lived in trees. He denied the existence of such creatures, and after a long argument ascertained that the fantastic notion had been started by a political cartoon in which a number of leading statesmen had been depicted as birds sitting in the branches of an oak.

Doctor Jordan's New Departure.—When David Starr Jordan was professor of natural history in an Indiana college, early in the seventies, very few persons thought that he would reach the fame he has since attained. From Indianapolis he went to another Hoosier college, and thence into the Government service in the Fisheries Department. He soon became the foremost authority on fresh-water fish in America, and then he won the Presidency of the Leland Stanford, Junior, University. Now he appears as the author of a book for children entitled The Book of Knight and Barbara. The stories that make up the volume were first told by Doctor Jordan to his children. Afterward his own and other people's children illustrated them. Then the stories and the pictures were gathered together and published.

Mr. Swinburne's Latest Eccentricity.—The success of Mr. Swinburne's new dramatic poem, Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards, which has just been published in New York, brings that eccentric but talented poet prominently before the public eye. The present volume is his thirty-sixth, and the title is significantly like that of his first publication, The Queen Mother and Rosamond, brought out in 1861. More extraordinary tales are told of Mr. Swinburne than of any other modern author, nearly all being marked by an erratic genius of the first order. A recent one, however, throws new light upon his character.

A young gentlewoman in reduced circumstances came to London to better her fortune. She had considerable literary skill, and tried hard to market a poem of more than mediocre merit. Her endeavors were unsuccessful, and finally, in a spirit of desperation, she called upon Mr. Swinburne. He heard her patiently, took her name and address, and promised to write to her within a few days. When she had left he looked at her manuscript, and, finding it of some worth, took his pen and revised and embellished it with a master hand. When he had completed the task he carried it to a publisher, and did not leave the latter until the poem was accepted and a check dispatched to the struggling author.

The news of his kindness reached the ears of a friend, who congratulated him. He shrugged his shoulders and replied:

"Oh, don't speak about it. It's the only good action I've done in five years, and I'm already ashamed of it."

WHAT WILL THE HARVEST BE?

This need never be asked if you plant Peter Henderson & Co.'s seeds, as they are the acknowledged standard of excellence in both hemispheres. Our 1900 Catalogue of

Everything for the Garden

is a 190-page book, 9x11 inches, containing over 700 engravings and 6 superb colored plates of Seeds and Plants—a perfect mine of information on garden topics.

To trace advertising, and give our Catalogue the largest possible distribution, we make the following unusually liberal offer:

Every Empty Envelope Counts as Cash

To every one who will state where this advertisement was seen, and who incloses us 10 Cents (in stamps), we will mail the Catalogue, and also send, free of charge, our famous 50-cent "Harvest" Collection of seeds, containing one packet each of New Large-flowering Sweet Peas, New Giant Pansy, New Giant Comet Asters, White Plume Celery, French Breakfast Radish and New Freedom Tomato, in a red envelope, which when emptied and returned will be accepted as a 25-cent cash payment on any order of goods selected from Catalogue to the amount of $1.00 and upward.

PETER HENDERSON & CO
35 & 37 CORTLANDT ST NEW YORK

Automatic Go-Cart

Baby not compelled to sit up as in other Go-carts

Entirely new patented invention. A slight touch of the foot changes it from upright to reclining position; as comfortable as a cradle. Perfectly safe. $5 to $25.

This go-cart positively overcomes the following objections urged against other go-carts:

The child is forced to take an upright sitting position and cannot lie down in the ordinary fashion. Therefore during its resting hours is compelled to assume a fatiguing position, and to depend upon unskilled services for support at a time of life when the back easily becomes tired.

We are builders of Baby Carriages, Invalid and Reclining Chairs. Write for catalogue.

If your dealer won't supply our Automatic Go-Cart, we will ship directly from factory.

Philadelphia Baby Carriage Factory
713 and 715 Spring Garden St., Philadelphia

D AND C ROSES

The 31st edition of Our New Guide to Rose Culture, the leading Rose Catalogue of America, free on request. 150 pages, superbly illustrated. Describes nearly 900 strictly new roses and all old favorites. Makes success with D. & C. Roses sure. Describes all other desirable flowers. Also free sample of our magazine—"Success with Flowers."

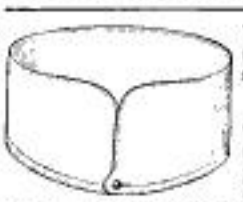
THE DINGEE & CONARD CO.
West Grove, Pa.

The Lloyd Muffler

Cotton, 25 cts.; Worsted, 50 cts.

Made in colors—White, Red, Black and Garnet. A perfect protection for the throat and chest against the wind and cold. For Men, Women, Boys or Girls. Easily put on and taken off; fastens in back with a clasp. Ask your dealer for them or mail us price—we will send on approval.



STRATFORD KNITTING MILLS
340 Cherry Street, - Philadelphia

The "CHID" A Crackless Cuff

They are new, possibly not yet in the hands of your dealer; if not, we will supply you direct on receipt of price, 25c. the Pair

CHID CUFF COMPANY, Lippincott Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

WHY not commence the new year right by handling our universal white and Fancy Rubber Collars and Cuffs, also Patented Rubber Neckties?

Goods in great demand. Sell on sight. Liberal commission. Exclusive territory and guaranteed goods. Mail orders solicited. Write for catalogue of 125 styles.

Dept. A. M. & M. Manufacturing Co., Springfield, Mass.

Digitized by Google

The Humor of the House of Commons

By JUSTIN McCARTHY

DURING the course of the American Civil War, John Bright, it will be recalled, was a thorough and unflinching champion of the Northern cause. Lord Palmerston, during one debate which had to do with the bearing of the English Government toward the Federal States, tried to turn off with light contempt the warnings uttered by some speakers about the possibility of a war between England and America. In the course of his speech he talked jauntily of the harm which might be done to the North by a British fleet on one of the Great Lakes. "The noble Lord," said Bright in his reply, "has been in such a hurry for naval invasion that he has forgotten to take into calculation the difficulty presented by the Falls of Niagara."

JOHN BRIGHT AND THE LITTLE CUR-DOG

Bright was very happy once in describing a certain small party of Liberal renegades who deserted Gladstone more than thirty years ago because of his first great effort to enfranchise the working classes. The party was very small, but exceedingly mischievous, for it included two or three men of great talent and great bitterness. Bright in his speech made allusion to this little group of apostates and to the fact that nobody seemed to be quite clear as to who was its actual leader, and he sent the House into shouts of laughter by likening the party to a Scotch terrier he once had, which was so small and so shaggy that it was almost impossible to tell which was its head and which was its tail.

"He is a self-made man," Bright once said of Disraeli, "and we must all admit that he worships his maker."

A MISAPPREHENSION OF GLADSTONE

Gladstone was not generally regarded as a master of sarcasm or as one who was always ready with a jocose repartee, but I think the truth is that the rush of his eloquence and the brilliant boldness of his statesmanship diverted public attention a good deal from some of his lighter gifts. Certain it is that there was in him a deep vein of ready Northern humor which occasionally amused and delighted the House of Commons. There was a member of the House of Commons who was very fond of making speeches, had great fluency, and a self-conceit so supreme that it would urge him into argument with the greatest financier, the greatest lawyer, or the greatest soldier in the House, challenging each on his own special subject. During an important debate many years ago this orator sprang to his feet several times, but was unable, as the parliamentary phrase goes, to catch the Speaker's eye, and had therefore each time to resume his seat.

A CASE OF INTELLECTUAL COLIC

The night wore on and at length Mr. Gladstone, who was then at the head of the Government, arose and proceeded to wind up the debate. The member of whom I have spoken saw that his chance of obtaining a hearing for that night had gone, and was beside himself with disappointment and anger. He began interrupting Gladstone with questions and interjected comments, and he kept on doing this in an unmannerly way. The House resounded with cries of "Order!" "Order!"

Gladstone paused for a moment in the course of his argument and, looking toward the author of the interruptions, blandly said: "I think we must make some allowance for the Honorable Member, because we cannot help knowing that he is suffering from the pangs of over-retention."

A RENEGADE BROUGHT TO THE MARK

The once famous Haliburton, author of Sam Slick, was for some years a member of the House of Commons. One night Haliburton made an elaborate attack upon the policy of the Government, and was especially severe on one of its younger members who, he said, had made a speech which contained not argument but caricature, and the House of Commons, he pompously declared, was not a place for the caricaturist.

When the time arrived for Gladstone to make his reply, he came, in the course of his speech, to deal very briefly with what Haliburton had said. "Wonders will never cease," he declared, "and this truth has been brought home once again to me, for here is the author of Sam Slick declaring that the House of Commons is no place for a caricaturist, although he himself has found a place here, and will not, we must all hope, renounce the gift that has brought him fame."

CLASSIC WIT AND CELTIC HUMOR

The late Sir Robert Peel—I do not mean the great Sir Robert Peel, but his son, who has been many years dead—used to make good jokes sometimes. During a debate on some of the earlier workings of the Volunteer movement in England, it suited his humor to throw ridicule on certain of those who were mainly instrumental in promoting the organization. One learned and eminent lawyer, who had become the chief officer in a regiment of volunteers, especially moved his mirth. There were dangers, he argued, in those field-days of volunteers, no one could tell what accidents might not happen, "and my advice to the honorable and learned gentleman would be in medio tutissimus ibis—you will get along much more safely in the Middle Temple," the recognized home of staid and steady-going lawyers in London.

One of the Irish law officers of a former Liberal Government, who was afterward raised to the bench of justice and became Baron Dowse, used to amuse the House very much by his rattling Irish humor. During a debate many years ago on one of the schemes for the admission of women to the learned professions, Dowse delivered a characteristic speech.

"I don't deny," he said in the course of it, "that there may be some truth in the assertion that some of our Judges are old women, but I do not think that is sufficient reason why every old woman should try to become a Judge."

AN UNFORTUNATE CHOICE OF PLATFORMS

A good deal of ready humor is sometimes displayed in the House of Commons when a member wishes to say something offensive and yet is anxious to escape being interrupted and called to order by the Speaker. An Irish member of a former day was once making an attack upon one of the ministers who had just delivered a somewhat provocative speech.

"The Right Honorable gentleman," said the Irish member, "is full of big words when he lectures us from the Treasury bench, as every cock crows loudest on his own—homestead, Mr. Speaker," he added quickly, when he saw that the eyes of the Speaker were turned menacingly toward him in anticipation of a less decorous expression.

I think with this anecdote I may bring to a close my illustrations of the humor occasionally displayed in the House of Commons.

Editor's Note—This is the second and last article on The Humor of the House of Commons, by Justin McCarthy.

A Thirty-Day
Tour of Mexico
By Special Train for $291.25

First Tour leaves ST. LOUIS
February 14, 1900—9.00 P. M.
Second Tour leaves TOLEDO
February 28, 1900—5.00 P. M.

You can leave St. Louis February 14, 1900, at 9.00 P. M., or Toledo February 28, at 5.00 P. M., with a select party (limited to fifty to insure each member the best service and attention) for a thirty-day tour of Old Mexico, see everything of interest in San Antonio, Monterey, Tampico, Mexico City, Puebla, Cuernavaca, Guadalajara, Chihuahua, Aguas Calientes, Las Vegas Hot Springs, Denver, and many other places, and return, at a total cost of $291.25 from St. Louis, or $310.00 from Toledo (from other points in proportion), including all expenses for the entire trip. The train, which will be the home of the party on either of the tours, will be a special wide, vestibuled train of Pullman Palace Cars, consisting of Baggage Car, Drawing-Room and Compartment Sleepers, Ladies' Library and Observation Car, and bountifully stocked Diner, affording every possible convenience to be found in the most superior up-to-date service. The tours will be under the management of the Wabash Railroad, and experienced representatives of that Company, assisted by native guides and interpreters, will personally escort the parties.

These tours of Old Mexico will be the most complete and extensive ones of the kind ever undertaken, and offer the opportunity for thirty days of recreation and sight-seeing through the most picturesque and enchanting scenery on our continent—from tidewater to snow line, and from the moss and pines of the mountain sides to the coffee and bananas of the tropics—with the usual annoying details of travel entirely eliminated. When you board our train you become the guest of the Wabash Railroad and every possible provision will have been made for your comfort and convenience.

Our souvenir itinerary describes the trip, the service, points of interest that will be visited, and other details, and handsomely illustrates them. It will be sent to you free upon request. If you are interested in such a trip, write at once, as the first one hundred desirable applications will constitute the parties. Address

Winter Tour Department, Wabash Railroad
1012 Lincoln Trust Building, St. Louis

No. 107—Extension Top Surrey, with double fenders. Complete with side curtains, aprons, lamps and pole or shafts. Price, $80. As good as sells for $40 more.

Elkhart Carriage and Harness Manufacturing Co., Elkhart, Ind.

Your Whole Family
Would Be Satisfied

with one of these Surreys. They are handsome, strong, stylish, easy riding and durable. Selling as our plan you can examine it thoroughly before you are required to buy it.

WE HAVE NO AGENTS

but sell all goods direct from our factory to the purchaser at wholesale prices. We are the largest manufacturers of vehicles and harness in the world selling to the consumer exclusively. We have pursued this plan successfully for 21 years. You assume no risk, as we ship our goods anywhere for examination and guarantee safe arrival. Largest selection in the country, as we make 378 styles of vehicles and 65 styles of harness. Catalogue Free.

No. 130—Double Buggy Harness, with nickel trimmings. Price, complete with collars and hitch straps, $35. As good as sells for $50.

Shuyler's
COCOA & CHOCOLATES
BEST FOR EATING DRINKING COOKING
PURE HEALTHFUL STRENGTHENING
SOLD AT OUR STORES & BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE — TAKE NO OTHER

Hendrickson Grip Machine

will strengthen your wrist, steady your nerves, develop enormous strength in your fingers; it cures insomnia, writers' cramp, bicycle cramp, cold hands and trembling hands. Use it while you talk or work or when lying wakeful—an infallible sleep producer, concentrating mind and nervous force and drawing surplus blood from the brain.

Invaluable to golfers, boxers, oarsmen, musicians and artisans of all kinds. Price 90 cents a pair. Nickeled metal cork grips, $1.00 a pair.

HENDRICKSON WRIST MACHINE CO.
Dept. L, 1123 Park Row Bldg., New York

AD SENSE

starts the new year with 40 per cent. more subscribers than it had a year ago—but we want more. AD SENSE is published monthly for business men. It's a dollar a year—or 50 cents for 6 months. Drop a dime in an envelope and send for sample copy, or ask your newsman.

THE AD SENSE COMPANY, — 70 Fifth Avenue, Chicago

A SMALL CAPITAL

brings good returns if invested in a MAGIC LANTERN or Stereopticon for exhibition purposes. Write for 256-page illustrated catalogue free.

McALLISTER, Mfg. Optician, 49 Nassau St., New York

Wanta Manicure File?

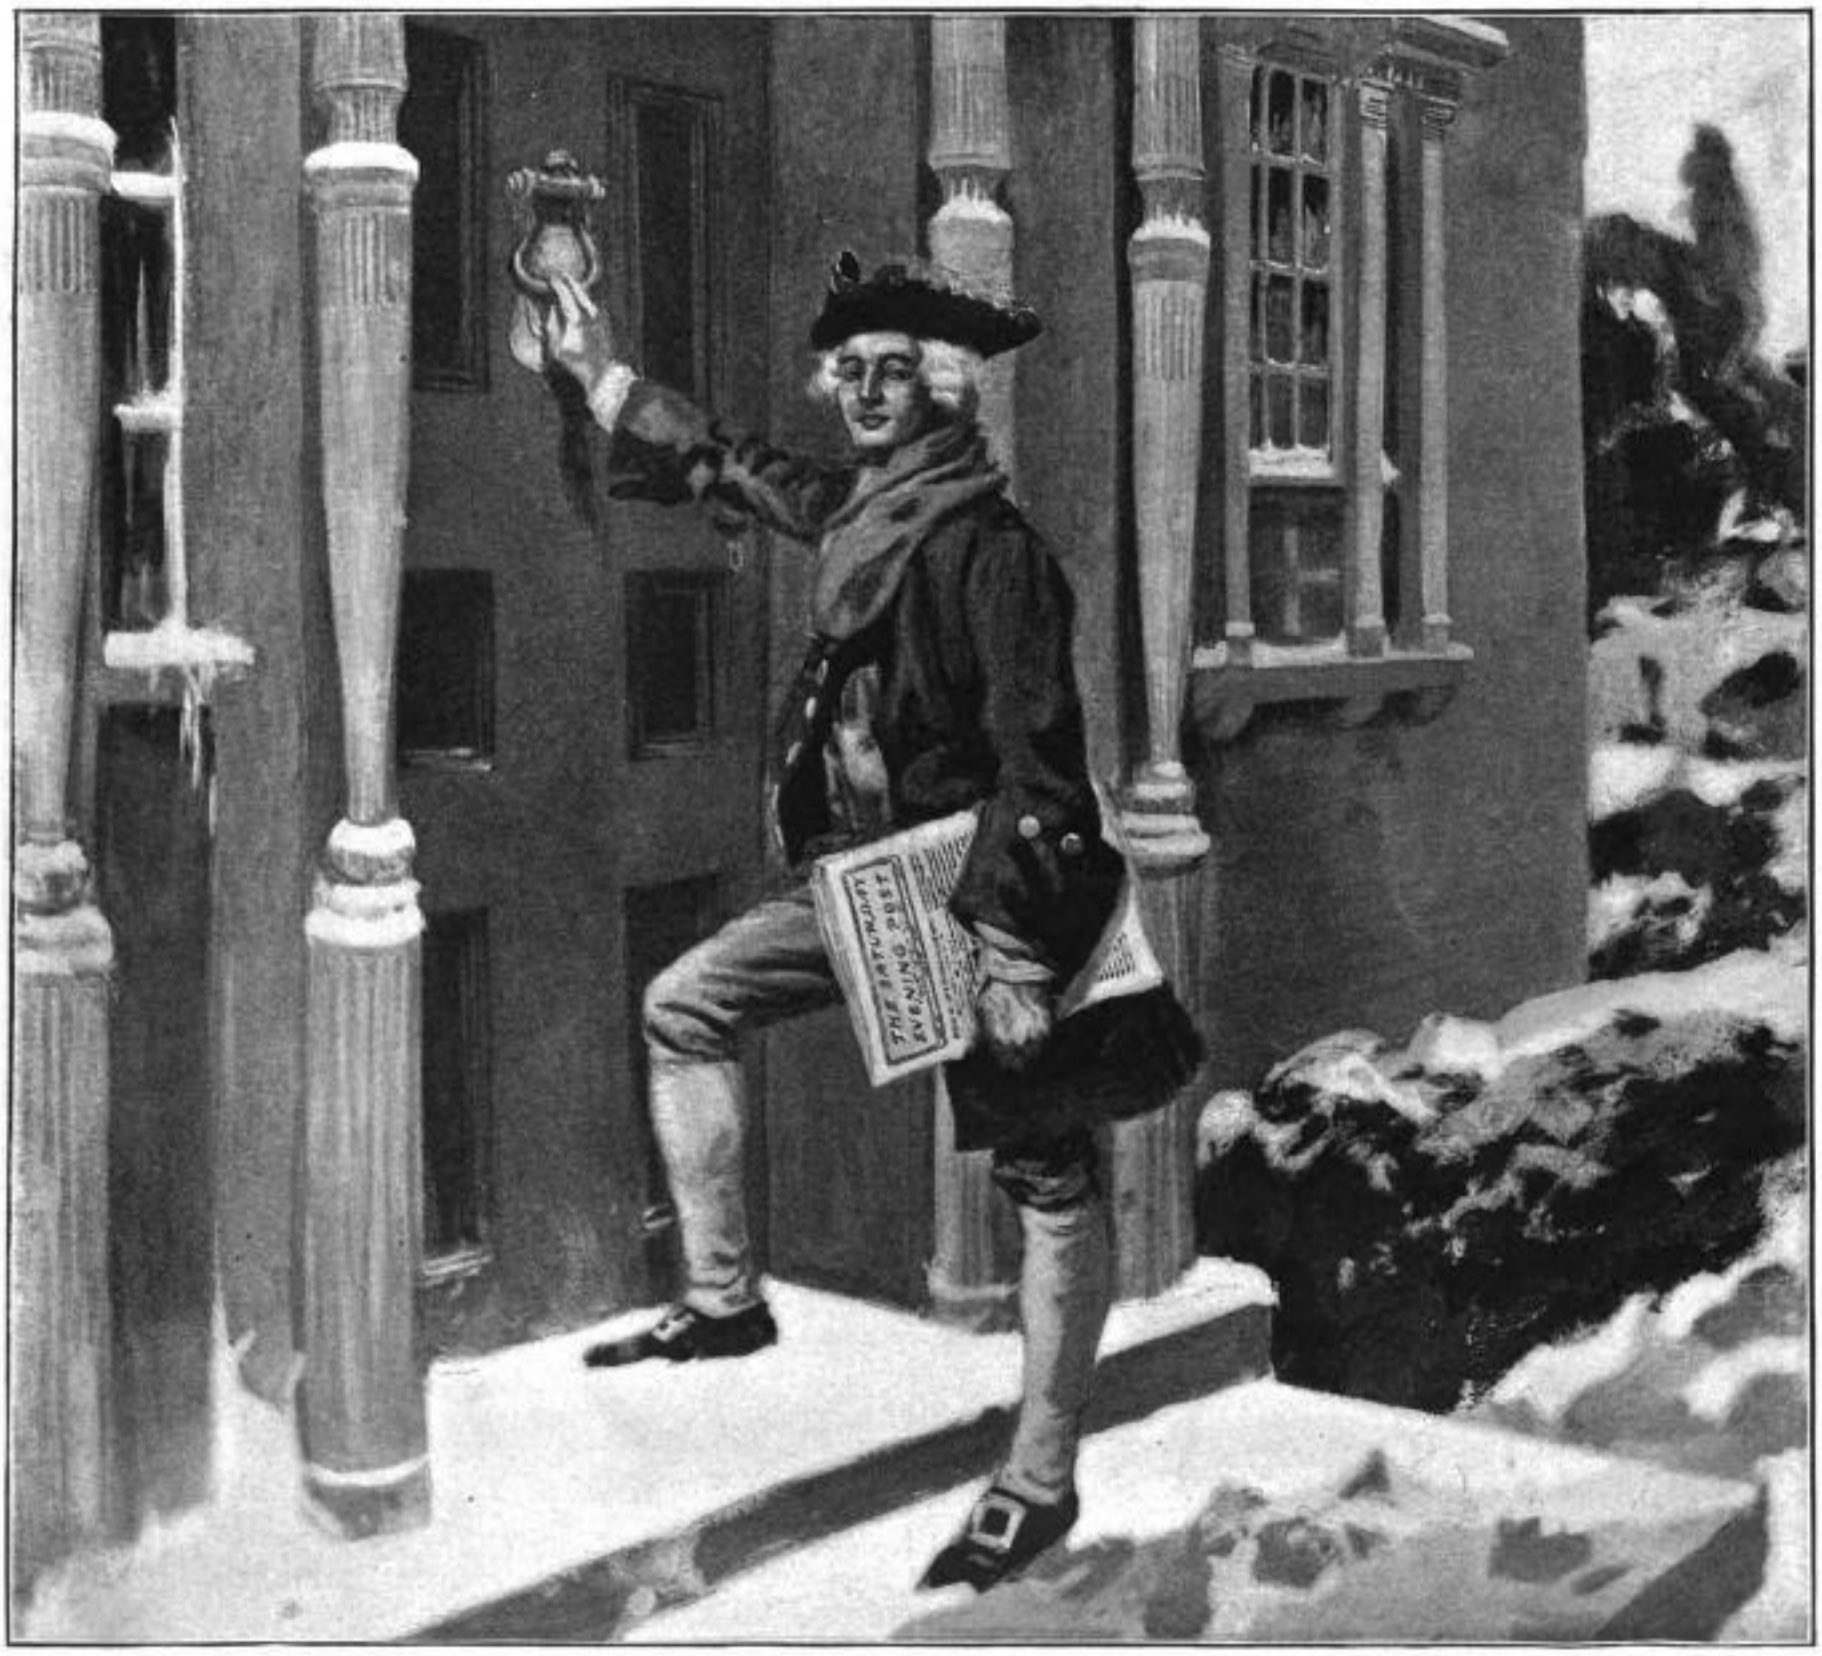
Real emery. Two dozen by mail, 25 cents.

WANTA FILE COMPANY, Downers Grove, Ill.

"Mizpah" Valve Nipples
WILL NOT COLLAPSE

and therefore prevent much colic. The valve prevents a vacuum being formed to collapse them. The ribs inside prevent collapsing when the child bites them. The rim is such that they cannot be pulled off the bottle. Sample Free by Mail.

WALTER F. WARE, 512 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.



Digitized by Google

MID-WINTER FICTION NUMBER ✦ With Short Story
By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded Aº Dⁱ 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Volume 172, No. 31 PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 27, 1900 5 Cents the Copy; $2.50 the Year

DRAWN BY GEORGE GIBBS

The Curtis Publishing Company

THE CENTRAL NEWS COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA, GENERAL AGENTS

Digitized by Google

THE

PHONOGRAPH

"Sustained by its reputation."

The only perfect reproductions of sound are obtained by using Edison Records on the Phonograph.

Prices from $7.50 to $100

Catalogues from All Phonograph Dealers.

NATIONAL PHONOGRAPH CO.
NEW YORK.

NONE GENUINE WITHOUT THIS TRADE MARK

Thomas A. Edison

A Thirty-Day Tour of Mexico

By Special Train for $291.25

Limited to 50 persons

First Tour leaves ST. LOUIS
February 14, 1900—9.00 P. M.

Second Tour leaves TOLEDO
February 28, 1900—5.00 P. M.

You can leave St. Louis February 14, 1900, at 9.00 P. M., or Toledo February 28, at 5.00 P. M., with a select party (limited to fifty to insure each member the best service and attention) for a thirty-day tour of Old Mexico, see everything of interest in San Antonio, Monterey, Tampico, Mexico City, Puebla, Cuernavaca, Guadalajara, Chihuahua, Aguas Calientes, Las Vegas Hot Springs, Denver, and many other places, and return, at a total cost of $291.25 from St. Louis, or $310.00 from Toledo (from other points in proportion), including all expenses for the entire trip. The train, which will be the home of the party on either of the tours, will be a special wide, vestibuled train of Pullman Palace Cars, consisting of Baggage Car, Drawing-Room and Compartment Sleepers, Ladies' Library and Observation Car, and bountifully stocked Diner, affording every possible convenience to be found in the most superior up-to-date service. The tours will be under the management of the Wabash Railroad, and experienced representatives of that Company, assisted by native guides and interpreters, will personally escort the parties.

These tours of Old Mexico will be the most complete and extensive ones of the kind ever undertaken, and offer the opportunity for thirty days of recreation and sight-seeing through the most picturesque and enchanting scenery on our continent—from tidewater to snow line, and from the moss and pines of the mountain sides to the coffee and bananas of the tropics—with the usual annoying details of travel entirely eliminated. When you board our train you become the guest of the Wabash Railroad and every possible provision will have been made for your comfort and convenience.

THIS OPPORTUNITY EXPIRES IN 10 DAYS (February 4). Act promptly if you would like to be one of the 50 privileged to enjoy this trip.

Our souvenir Itinerary describes the train, the service, points of interest that will be visited, and other details, and handsomely illustrates them. It will be sent to you free upon request. If you are interested in such a trip, write at once, as the first one hundred desirable applicants will constitute the parties. Address

Winter Tour Department, Wabash Railroad
1012 Lincoln Trust Building, St. Louis

ROYAL WORCESTER CORSETS

Are acknowledged to be the best designed, finest fitting, and most comfortable corsets ever manufactured.

THE DOWAGER CORSET

FOR STOUT FIGURES

Worn by thousands and indorsed by them as

The Best Corset

ever produced

MADE IN FOUR LENGTHS—
Extra Long, Long, Medium, Short.
Sizes, 22 to 43 inches.

STYLE 550, Heavy Coutil, Satteen strips. Sizes, 22 to 30, $2.00; 31 to 36, $2.25; 37 to 43, $2.50. White, Drab, Black.

STYLE 550, SUMMER NETTING. (White only.) Sizes and prices same as above.

ROYAL WORCESTER CORSETS AND THE DOWAGER CORSET

Are sold by leading dealers everywhere. Ask your dealer FIRST. If he can't supply you, a Money Order sent us, with size, length and color plainly marked, will bring corset to you free of expense.

LADIES ARE REQUESTED TO SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE

WORCESTER CORSET COMPANY

WORCESTER, MASS. CHICAGO, ILL.

THE

Singer Cabinet Table

Furnished only with Singer Sewing-Machines

(Copyright 1899)

"THE READER"

Sold on Instalments
Old Machines Taken in Exchange

The Singer Manufacturing Co.

"Sewing-Machine Makers for the World"

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Founded Aº Dⁱ 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 425 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

LA LETTRE D'AMOUR

By Richard Harding Davis

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

WHEN Bardini, who led the Hungarian Band at the Savoy Restaurant, was promoted to play at the Casino at Trouville, his place was taken by the second violin. The second violin was a boy, and when he greeted his brother Tziganes and the habitués of the restaurant with an apologetic and deprecatory bow, he showed that he was fully conscious of the inadequacy of his years. The maître d'hôtel glided from table to table, busying himself in explanations.

"The boy's name is Edouard; he comes from Budapest," he said. "The season is too late to make it worth the while of the management to engage a new chef d'orchestre. So this boy will play. He plays very good, but he is not like Bardini."

He was not in the least like Bardini. In appearance, Bardini suggested a Roumanian gipsy or a Portuguese sailor; his skin was deeply tanned, his hair was plastered on his low forehead in thick, oily curls, and his body, through much rich living on the scraps that fell from the tables of Girot's and the Casino des Fleurs, was stout and gross. He was the typical leader of an orchestra condemned to entertain a noisy restaurant. His school of music was the school of Maxim's. To his skill with the violin he had added the arts of the head waiter, and he and the cook ran a race for popularity, he pampering to one taste, and the cook, with his sauces, pampering to another. When so commanded, his pride as an artist did not prevent him from breaking off in the middle of Schubert's Serenade to play Daisy Bell, nor was he above breaking it off on his own accord to salute the American patron, as he entered, with the Belle of New York, or any one of the Gaiety Girls, hurrying in late for supper, with the Soldiers in the Park. When he walked slowly through the restaurant, pausing at each table, his eyes, even while they ogled the women to whom he played, followed the brother Tzigane—who was passing the plate—and noted which of the patrons gave silver and which gave gold.

Edouard, the second violin, was all that Bardini was not, consequently he was entirely unsuited to lead an orchestra in a restaurant. Indeed, so little did he understand of what was required of him that on the only occasion when Bardini sent him to pass the plate he was so unsophisticated as not to hide the sixpences and shillings under the napkin, and so leave only the half-crowns and gold pieces exposed. And, instead of smiling mockingly at those who gave the sixpences, and waiting for them to give more, he even looked grateful, and at the same time deeply ashamed. He differed from Bardini also in that he was very thin and tall, with the serious, smooth-shaven face of a priest. Except for his fantastic costume, there was nothing about him to recall the poses of the musician; his hair was neither long nor curly; it lay straight across his forehead and flat on either side, and when he played, his eyes neither sought out the admiring auditor nor invited his applause. On the contrary, they looked steadfastly ahead. It was as though they belonged to some one apart, who was listening intently to the music. But in the waits between the numbers the boy's eyes turned from table to table, observing the people in his audience. He knew nearly all of them by sight: the head waiters who brought him their "commands," and his brother musicians, had often discussed them in his hearing. They represented every city of the world, every part of the social edifice: there were those who came to look at the spectacle, and those who came to be looked at; those who gave a dinner for the sake of the diners, those who dined for the dinner alone. To some, the restaurant was a club; others ventured in flaunting the cost, taking it seriously, even considering that it conferred upon them some social distinction. There were pretty women in paint and spangles, with conscious, half-grown boys just up from Oxford; company promoters dining and wining possible subscribers or "guinea pigs" into an acquiescent state; Guardsmen giving a dinner of farewell to brother officers departing for the Soudan or the Cape; wide-eyed Americans just off the steamer in high dresses, great ladies in low dresses and lofty tiaras, and ladies of the stage, utterly unconscious of the boon they were conferring on the people about them, who, an hour before, had paid ten shillings to look at them from the stalls.

Edouard, as he sat with his violin on his knee, his fingers fretting the silent strings, observed them all without envy and without interest. Had he been able to choose, it would not have been to such a well-dressed mob as this that he would have given his music. For at times a burst of laughter killed a phrase that was sacred to him, and sometimes the murmur of the voices and the clatter of the waiters would drown him out altogether. But the artist in him forced him to play all things well, and for his own comfort he would assure himself that no doubt somewhere in the room some one was listening, some one who thought more of the strange, elusive melodies of the Hungarian folksongs than of the chef's entrées, and that for this unknown one he must be true to himself and true to his work. Covertly, he would seek out some face to which he could make the violin speak—not openly and impertinently, as did Bardini, but secretly and for sympathy, so that only one could understand. It pleased young Edouard to see such an one raise her head as though she had heard her name spoken, and hold it poised to listen, and turn slowly in her chair, so completely engaged that she forgot the man at her elbow, and the food before her was taken away untouched. It delighted him to think that she knew that the music was speaking to her alone. But he would not have had her think that the musician spoke, too—it was the soul of the music, not his soul, that was reaching out to the pretty stranger. When his soul spoke through the music it would not be, so he assured himself, to such chatterers as gathered on the terrace of the Savoy Restaurant.

Mrs. Warriner and her daughter were on their way home, or to one of their homes; this one was up the Hills of Lenox. They had been in Egypt and up the Nile, and for the last two months had been slowly working their way north through Greece and Italy. They were in London, at the Savoy, waiting for their sailing-day, and on the night of their arrival young Corbin was giving them a dinner. For three months Mrs. Warriner and himself had alternated in giving each other dinners in every part of Southern Europe, and the gloom which hung over this one was not due to the fact that the diners had become wearied of one another's society, but that the opportunities still left to them for this exchange of hospitality were almost at an end. That night, for the hundredth time, young Corbin had decided it would have been much better for him if they had come to an end many weeks previous, for the part he played in the trio was a difficult one. It was that of the lover who will not take "no" for an answer. The lover who will take no, and goes on his way disconsolate, may live to love another day, and every one is content; but the one who will not have no, who will not hear of it, nor consider it, has much to answer for in making life a burden to himself and all around him.

When Corbin joined the Warriners on their trip up the Nile it was considered by all of them, in their ignorance, a happy accident. Other mothers, more worldly than Mrs. Warriner, with daughters less attractive, gave her undeserved credit for having lured into her party one of the young men of Boston who was most to be desired as a son-in-law. But the mind of Mrs. Warriner, so far as Mr. Corbin was concerned, was quite free from any such consideration; so was the mind of the young bachelor; certainly Miss Warriner held no tender thoughts concerning him. The families of the Warriners and the Corbins had been friends ever since the cowpath crossed the Common. Before Corbin entered Harvard Miss Warriner and he had belonged to the same dancing-class. Later she had danced with him at four class-days, and many times between. When he graduated, she had gone abroad with her mother, and he had joined the Somerset Club, and played polo at Pride's Crossing, and talked vaguely of becoming a lawyer, and of reëntering Harvard by the door of the Law School, chiefly, it was supposed, that he might have another year of the football team. He was very young in spirit, very big and athletic, very rich, and without a care or serious thought. Miss Warriner was to him, then, no more than a friend; to her he was a boy, one of many nice, cultivated Harvard boys, who occasionally called upon her and talked football. On the face of things, she was not the sort of girl he should have loved. But for some saving clause in him, he should have loved and married one of the many other girls who had belonged to the same dancing-class, who would have been known as "Mrs. Tom" Corbin, who would have been sought after as a chaperon, and who would have stood up in her cart when he played polo and shouted at him across the field to "ride him off."

—BUT IT WAS EVIDENT TO ALL THAT SHE WAS THE ONE TO WHOM HIS EFFORT WAS DIRECTED

Digitized by Google

Miss Warriner, on the contrary, was much older than he in everything but years, and was conscious of the fact. She was a serious, self-centred young person, and satisfied with her own thoughts, unless her companion gave her better ones. She concerned herself with the character and ideas of her friends. If a young man lacked ideas, the fact that he possessed wealth and good manners could not save him. If these attributes had been pointed out to her as part of his assets she would have been surprised. She was not impressed with her own good looks and fortune—she took them for granted; so why should they count with her in other people?

Miss Warriner made an error of analysis in regard to Mr. Corbin in judging his brain by his topics of conversation. His conversation was limited to the A B C's of life, with which, up to the time of his meeting her, his brain had been fed. When, however, she began to cram it full with all the other letters of the alphabet, it showed itself just as capable of digesting the economic conditions of Egypt as it had previously succeeded in mastering the chesslike problems of the game of football.

She was a serious, self-centred young person

Howard Chandler Christy

Young Corbin had not considered the Home Beautiful, nor Municipal Government, nor How the Other Half Lives as topics that were worth his while; but when Miss Warriner showed her interest in them, her doing so made them worth his while, and he fell upon them greedily. He even went much further than she had gone, and was not content merely to theorize and to discuss social questions from the safe distance of the deck of a dahabiyeh on the Nile, but proposed to at once put her theories into practice. To this end he offered her a house in the slums of Boston, rent free, where she could start her College Settlement. He made out lists of the men he thought would like to teach there, and he volunteered to pay the expenses of the experiment until it failed or succeeded. When her interest changed to the Tombs of the Rameses, and the succession of the ancient dynasties, he spent hours studying his Baedeker that he might keep in step with her; and when she abandoned ancient for modern Egypt and became deeply charmed with the intricacies of the dual control and of the Mixed Courts, he interviewed subalterns, Pashas and missionaries in a gallant effort to comprehend the social and political difficulties of the white men who had occupied the land of the Sphinx, who had funded her debt, irrigated her deserts, and "made a mummy fight."

One night, as the dahabiyeh lay moored beneath a group of palms in the moonlight, Miss Warriner gave him praise for offering her the house in the slums for her experiment. He assured her that he was entirely selfish—that he did so because he believed her settlement would be a benefit to the neighborhood, in which he owned some property. When she then accused him of giving sordid reasons for what was his genuine philanthropy he told her flatly that he neither cared for the higher education of the slums nor the increased value of his rents, but for her, and to please her, and that he loved her and would love her always. In answer to this, Miss Warriner told him gently but firmly that she could not love him, but that she liked him and admired him even though she was disappointed to find that his sudden interest in matters more serious than polo had been assumed to please her. She added that she would always be his friend. This she thought ended the matter; it was unfortunate that they should be shipbound on the Nile; but she trusted to his tact and good sense to save them both from embarrassment. She was not prepared, however, to see him come on deck very late the next morning, after, apparently, a long sleep, as keen, as cheerful and as smiling as he had been before the blow had fallen. It piqued her a little, and partly because of that, and partly because she really was relieved to find him in such a humor, she congratulated him on his most evident happiness.

"Why not?" he asked, suddenly growing sober. "I love you. That is enough to make any man happy, isn't it? You needn't love me, but you can't prevent my going on loving you."

"Well, I am very sorry," she sighed in much perplexity.

"You needn't be," he answered reassuringly. "I'm more sorry for you than I am for myself. You are going to have a terrible time until you marry me."

They were at Thebes, and he went off that afternoon to the Temple of Luxor with her mother, and made violent use of the sacred altars, the beauty of Cleopatra, the eternity of the scarabea, and the indestructibility of the Pyramids to suggest faintly to Mrs. Warriner how much he loved her daughter. He shook his hand at the crouching sphinxes and said: "Mrs. Warriner, in forty centuries they have never looked down upon a man as proud as I am, and I am told they have seen Napoleon; but I need help; she won't help me, so you must. It's no use arguing against me. When this Nile dries up I shall have ceased loving your daughter!"

"Did you tell Helen what you have told me? Did you talk to her so?" asked Mrs. Warriner.

"No, not last night," said Corbin; "but I will, in time, after she gets more used to the idea."

Unfortunately for the peace of Mr. Corbin and all concerned, Miss Warriner did not become reconciled to the idea. On the contrary, she resented it greatly. She had looked at the possibility of something to be carried out later—much later, perhaps not at all. It did not seem possible that before she had really begun to enjoy life it should be subjected to such a change. She saw that it was obviously the thing that should happen. If the match had been arranged by the entire city of Boston it could not have been more obvious. But she argued with him that marriage was a mutual self-sacrifice, and that until she felt ready to make her share of the sacrifice it was impossible for her to consent.

He combatted her arguments, which he refused to consider as arguments, and demolished them one by one. But the objection which he destroyed before he went to sleep at night was replaced the next day by another, and his cause never advanced. Each day he found the citadel he was besieging girt in by new and intricate defenses. The reason was simple enough: the girl was not in love with him. Her objections, her arguments, her reasons were as absurd as he proved them to be. But they were insurmountable because they were really various disguises of the fact that she did not care for him. They were disguises to herself as well as to him. He was so altogether a good fellow, so earnest, honest and desperate a lover that the primary fact that she did not want his love did not present itself, and she kept casting about in her mind for excuses and reasons to explain her lack of feeling. He wooed her in every obvious way that would present itself to a boy of deep feeling, of quick mind, and an unlimited letter of credit. He created wants in order to gratify them later. He suggested her need of things which he had already ordered, which, before she had been enticed into expressing a wish for them, were then speeding across the Continent toward her. Every hour brought her some fresh and ingenuous sign of his thought and of his devotion. He treated these tributes as a matter of course; if she failed to observe them and to see his handiwork in them he let them fall to the ground unnoticed.

His love itself was his argument-in-chief; it was its own excuse; it needed no allies. "I love you" was his first and last word. It puzzled her to find that she could not care. When she was alone she asked herself what there was in him of which she disapproved, and she could only answer that there was nothing. She asked herself what other men there were who pleased her more, and she could think of none. On the contrary, she found him entirely charming as a friend—but his love distressed her greatly. It was a foreign language; she could not comprehend it. When he allowed it to appear it completely disguised him in her eyes; it annoyed her so much that at times she considered herself a much ill-used young person.

It was in this way that the matter stood between them when their long journey was ended and they reached London. He was miserable, desperate and hopeless; the girl was firm in that she would not marry him, and her mother, who respected both the depth of Corbin's feelings and her daughter's reticence, and who had watched the struggle with a troubled heart, was only thankful that they were to part and that it was at an end. Corbin had no idea where he would go nor what he would do. He recognized that to cross the ocean with them would only subject his love to fresh distress and humiliation, and he had determined to put as much space between him and Miss Warriner as the surface of the globe permitted. The Philippines seemed to offer a picturesque retreat for a broken life. He decided he would go there and enlist and have himself shot. He was uncertain whether he would follow in the steps of his Revolutionary ancestors and join the men who were struggling for their liberty and independence, or his fellow-Americans; but that he would get shot by one side or the other he was determined. And then in days to come she would think, perhaps, of the young man on the other side of the globe, buried in the wet ricefields, with the palms fanning him through his eternal sleep, and she might be sorry then that she had not listened to his troubled heart. The picture gave him some small comfort, and that night when he ordered dinner for them at the Savoy his manner showed the inspired resolve of one who is soon to mount the scaffold unafraid, and with a rose between his lips.

Edouard, the first violin, saw Miss Warriner when she entered and took her place facing him at one of the tables in the centre of the room. He was sitting with his violin on his knees, touching the strings with his finger-tips. When he saw her he choked the neck of the violin with his hand, as though it had been the hand of a friend which he had grasped in a sudden ecstasy of delight. The effect her appearance had made upon him was so remarkable that he glanced quickly over his shoulder to see if he had betrayed himself by some sign or gesture. But the other musicians were concerned with their own gossip, and he felt free to turn again and from under his half-closed eyelids to observe her covertly.

There was nothing to explain why Miss Warriner in particular should have so disturbed him; the English women seated about her were as fair; she showed no great sorrow in her face; her beauty was not of the type which carried observers by assault. And yet not one of the many beautiful women who on one night or another passed before Edouard in the soft light of the red shades had ever stirred him so strangely, had ever depressed him with such a tender melancholy, and filled his soul—the soul of a Hungarian and a musician—with such loneliness and unrest. He knew that, so far as he was concerned, she was as distant as the Venus in the Louvre; she was, for him, a beautiful, unapproachable statue, placed, by some social convention, upon a pedestal.

As he looked at her he felt hotly the degradation of his silly uniform, of the striped sash around his waist, the tawdry braids and the tasseled boots. He felt as he had often felt before, but now more keenly than ever, the prostitution of his art in this temple of the senses, this home of epicures, where people met to feast their eyes and charm their palates. He could not put his feelings into words, and he knew that if by some upheaval of the social world he should be thrown into her presence he would still be bound, he would not be able to speak or write what she inspired in him. But—and at the thought he breathed quickly, and raised his shoulders with a touch of pride—he could tell her in his own way; after his own fashion he could express what he felt better even than those other men could tell what they feel—these men for whose amusement he performed nightly, to whom it was granted to sit at her side, who spoke the language of her class and of her own people. Edouard was not given to analyzing his emotions; like the music of his Tzigane ancestors, they came to him sweeping every chord in his nature, beating rapidly to the time of the Schardash, or with the fitfulness of the gipsy folksongs sinking his spirits into melancholy. So he did not stop to question why this one face so suddenly inspired him; he only knew that he felt grateful, that he was impatient to pay his tribute of admiration, that he was glad he was an artist who could give his feelings voice.

In the long program of selected airs he remembered that there was one which would give him this chance to speak, in the playing of which he could put all his skill and all his soul, an air which carried with it infinite sadness and the touch of a caress. The other numbers on the program had been chosen to please the patrons of a restaurant; this one, La Lettre d'Amour, was included in the list for his own satisfaction. He had put it there to please himself; to-night he would play it to please her—to this unknown girl who had so suddenly awakened and inspired him.

As he waited for this chance to come he watched her, noting her every movement, her troubled smile, her air of being apart and above her surroundings. He noticed, too, the set face of the young man at her side and, with the discernment of one whose own interest is captive, saw the half-concealed longing in his eyes. He felt a quick antipathy to this young man. His assured position at the girl's side accentuated how far he himself was removed from her; he resented also the manner of the young man to the waiters, and he wondered hotly if, in the mind of this favored youth, the musician who played for his entertainment was regarded any more highly than the servant who received his orders. To this feeling of resentment was added one of contempt. For, as he read the tableau at the table below him, the young man was the devotee of the young girl at his side, and if one could judge from her averted eyes, from her silent assent to his questions, from the fact that she withdrew from the talk between him and the older woman, his devotion was not welcome.

This reading of the pantomime pleased Edouard greatly. Nothing could have so crowned the feeling which the beauty of the stranger stirred in him as the thought that another loved her as well as himself, and that the other, who started with all things in his favor, met with none from her.

Edouard assured himself that this was so because he had often heard his people boast that men not of their country could not feel as they could feel. If he had ever considered them at all it was as cold and conscious creatures who taught themselves to cover up what they felt, so that when their emotions strove to assert themselves they were found, through long disuse, to be dumb and inarticulate. Edouard rejoiced that to the men of his race it was given to feel and suffer much. He was sure that beneath the calmness of her beauty this woman before him could feel deeply; he read in her eyes the sympathy of a great soul; she made him think of a Madonna in the church of St. Sophia at Budapest. He saw in her a woman who could love greatly. When he considered how impossible it was for the young man at her side ever to experience the great emotions which alone could reach her, his contempt for him rose almost to pity. His violin, with his power to feel, and with his knowledge of technique added, could send his message as far as sound could carry. He could afford to be generous, and when he rose to play La Lettre d'Amour it was with the elation of a knight entering the lists, with the ardor of a lover singing beneath his lady's window. La Lettre d'Amour is a composition written to a slow measure and filled with chords of exquisite pathos. It comes hesitatingly, like the confession of a lover who loves so deeply that he halts to find words with which to express his feelings. It moves in broken phrases, each note rising in intensity and growing in beauty.

Digitized by Google

It is not a burst of passionate appeal, but a plea, tender, beseeching, and throbbing with melancholy. As he played, Edouard stepped down from the dais on which the musicians sat and advanced slowly between the tables. It was late, and the majority of those who had been dining had departed to the theatres. Those who remained were lingering over their coffee, and were smoking; their voices were lowered to a polite monotone; the rush of the waiters had ceased, and the previous chatter had sunk to a subdued murmur. Into this, the quivering sigh of Edouard's violin penetrated like a sunbeam feeling its way into a darkened room, and, at the sound, the voices one by one detached themselves from the general chorus, until, lacking support, it ceased altogether. Some were silent that they might hear the better; others, who preferred their own talk, were silent out of regard for those who desired to listen, and a waiter who was so indiscreet as to clatter a tray of glasses was hushed on the instant. The tribute of attention lent to Edouard an added power; his head lifted on his shoulders with pride; his bow cut deeper and firmer and with more delicate shading; the notes rose in thrilling, plaintive sadness and flooded the hot air with melody.

Edouard made his way to within a short distance of the table at which Miss Warriner was seated and halted there as though he had found his audience. He did not look at her, although she sat directly facing him, but it was evident to all that she was the one to whom his effort was directed, and Corbin, who was seated with his back to Edouard, recognized this and turned in his chair.

The body of the young musician was trembling with the feeling which found its outlet through the violin. He was in ecstasy over his power and its accomplishment. The strings of the violin pulsated to the beating of his heart, and he felt that surely by now the emotion which shook him must have reached the girl who had given it life—and for one swift second his eyes sought hers. What he saw was the same beautiful face which had inspired him, but unmoved, cold and unresponsive. As his eyes followed hers she raised her head and looked listlessly around the room, and then turned and glanced up at him with a careless and critical scrutiny. If his music had been the music of an organ in the street, and he the man who raised his hat for coppers, she could not have been less moved. The discovery struck Edouard like a cold blast from an open door. His fingers faltered on the neck of his violin, his bow wavered drunkenly across the strings, and he turned away his eyes to shut out the vision of his failure, seeking relief and sympathy. And in their swift passage they encountered those of Corbin looking up at him, his eyes aglow with wonder, feeling and sorrow. They seemed to hold him to account; they begged, they demanded of him not to break the spell, and in response the hot blood in the veins of the musician surged back, his pride flared up again, his eyes turned on Corbin's like those of a dog to his master's. Under their spell the music soared trembling, paused and soared again, thrilling those who heard it with its grief and tenderness.

Edouard's heart leaped with triumph. "The man knows," he whispered to the violin; "he understands us. He knows."

The people, leaning with their elbows on the tables before them, the waiters listening with tolerant smiles, the musicians following Edouard with anxious pride, saw only a young man with his arm thrown heavily across the back of his chair, who was looking up at Edouard with a steady, searching gaze. But Edouard saw in him both a disciple and a master. He saw that this man was lifted up and carried with him, that he understood the message of the music. The notes of the violin sank lower and lower until they melted into the silence of the room, and the people, freed of the spell the music had put upon them, applauded generously. Edouard placed his violin under his arm, and with his eyes, which had never left Corbin's face, still fastened upon his, bowed low to him, and Corbin raised his head and nodded gravely. It was as though they were the only people in the room. As Edouard retreated his face was shining with triumph, for he knew that the other had understood him, and that the other knew that he knew.

That night until he fell asleep, and all of the day following, the beautiful face of Miss Warriner troubled Edouard, and the thought of her alternately thrilled and depressed him. One moment he mocked at himself for presuming to think that his simple art could reach the depths of such a nature, and the next he stirred himself to hope that he should see her once again, and that he should succeed where he had failed.

The music had moved Corbin so deeply that when he awoke the day following the effect of it still hung upon him. It seemed to him as though all he had been trying to tell Miss Warriner of his love for her, and which he had failed to make her understand in the last three months, had been expressed in the one moment of this song. It was that in it which had so enchanted him. It was as though he had listened to his own deepest and most sacred thoughts, uttered for the first time convincingly, and by a stranger. Why was it, he asked himself, that this unknown youth could translate another's feelings into music, when he himself could not put them into words? He was walking in Piccadilly deep in this thought when a question came to him which caused him to turn rapidly into Green Park, where he could consider it undisturbed.

The doubt which had so suddenly presented itself was in some degree the same one which had stirred Edouard. Was it that he was really unable to express his feelings, or was it that Miss Warriner could not understand them? Was it really something lacking in him, or was it not something lacking in her? He flushed at the disloyalty of the thought and put it from him; but as his memory reached back over the past three months the question returned again and again with fresh force, and would not be denied. He called himself a fatuous, conceited fool. Because he could not make a woman love him other men could do so. That was really the answer; he was not the man. But the answer did not seem final. What, after all, was the thing his love sought—a woman only, or a woman capable of deep and great feeling? Even if he could not inspire such emotions, even if another could, he would still be content and proud to love a woman capable of such deep feelings. But if she were without them? At the thought Corbin stared blankly before him as though he had stumbled against a stone wall. What sign had she ever given him that she could care greatly? Was not any form of emotion always distasteful to her? Was not her mind always occupied with abstract questions? Was she not always engaged in her own self-improvement—with schemes, it is true, for bettering the world; but did her heart ever ache once for the individual?

DRAWN BY HOWARD CHANDLER CHRISTY

—SHE WAS, FOR HIM, A BEAUTIFUL, UNAPPROACHABLE STATUE

What was it, then, he loved? Something he imagined this girl to be, or was he in love with the fact that his own nature had been so mightily stirred? Was it not the joy of caring greatly which had carried him along? And if this was so, was he now to continue to proffer this devotion to one who could not feel, to a statue, to an idol? Were not the very things which rendered her beautiful the offerings which he himself had hung upon her altar? Did the qualities he really loved in her exist? Was he not on the brink of casting his love before one who could neither feel it for him nor for any other man? He stood up trembling and frightened. Even though the girl had rejected him again and again he felt a hateful sense of disloyalty. He was ashamed to confess it to himself, and he vowed hotly that he must be wrong, that he would not believe. He would still worship her, fight for her, and force her to care for him.

Mrs. Warriner and her daughter were to sail on the morrow, and that night they met Corbin at dinner for the last time. After many days—although self-accused—he felt deeply conscious of his recent lack of faith, and in the few hours still left him he determined to atone for the temporary halt in his allegiance. They had never found him more eager, tactful and considerate than he was that evening. The eyes of Mrs. Warriner softened as she watched him. As one day had succeeded another, her admiration and liking for him had increased, until now she felt as though his cause was hers—as though she was not parting from a friend, but from a son. But the calmness of her daughter was impenetrable; from her manner it was impossible to learn whether the approaching separation was a relief or a regret.

To Edouard the return of the beautiful girl to the restaurant appeared not as an accident, but as a marked favor vouchsafed to him by Fate. He had been given a second chance. He read it as a sign that he should take heart and hope. He felt that fortune was indeed kind. He determined that he would play to her again, and that this time he would not fail.

As the first notes of La Lettre d'Amour brought a pause of silence in the restaurant, Corbin, who was talking at the moment, interrupted himself abruptly and turned in his chair.

All through the evening he had been conscious of the near presence of the young musician. He had not forgotten how, on the night before, his own feelings had been interpreted in La Lettre d'Amour, and for some time he had been debating in his mind as to whether he would request Edouard to play the air again, or let the evening pass without again submitting himself to so supreme an assault upon his feelings. Now the question had been settled for him, and he found that it had been decided as he secretly desired. It was impossible to believe that Edouard was the same young man who had played the same air on the night previous, for Edouard no longer considered that he was present on sufferance—he invited and challenged the attention of the room; his music commanded it to silence. It dominated all who heard it.

As he again slowly approached the table where Miss Warriner was seated, the eyes of every one were turned upon him; the pathos, the tenderness of his message seemed to speak to each; the fact that he dared to offer such a wealth of deep feeling to such an audience was in itself enough to engage the attention of all. A group of Guardsmen, their faces flushed with Burgundy and pulling heavily on black cigars, stared at him sleepily, and then sat up, erect and alert, watching him with intent, wide-open eyes; and at tables which had been marked by the laughter of those seated about them there fell a sudden silence. Those who fully understood the value of the music withdrew into themselves, submitting thankfully to its spell; others, less susceptible, gathered from the bearing of those about them that something of moment was going forward; but it was recognized by each, from the most severe English matron present down to the youngest "omnibus boy" among the waiters, that it was a love story which was being told to them, and that in this public place the deepest, most sacred and most beautiful of emotions were finding noble utterance.

The music filled Corbin with desperate longing and regret. It was so truly the translation of his own feelings that he was alternately touched with self-pity and inspired to fresh resolve. It seemed to assure him that love such as his could not endure without some return. It emboldened him to make still another and a final appeal. Mrs. Warriner, with all the other people in the room, was watching Edouard, and so, unobserved, and hidden by the flowers upon the table, Corbin leaned toward Miss Warriner and bent his head close to hers. His eyes were burning with feeling; his voice thrilled in unison to the plaint of the violin.

He gave a toss of his head in the direction from whence the music came.

"That is what I have been trying to tell you," he whispered. His voice was hoarse and shaken. "That is how I care, but that man's genius is telling you for me. At last you must understand." In his eagerness his words followed each other brokenly and impetuously. "That is love," he whispered. "That is the real voice of love in all its tenderness and might, and—it is love itself. Don't you understand it now?" he demanded.

Miss Warriner raised her head and frowned. She stared at Edouard with a pained expression of perplexity and doubt.

"He shows no lack of feeling," she said critically, "but his technique is not equal to Ysais'."

"Good God!" Corbin gasped. He sank away from Miss Warriner and stared at her with incredulous eyes.

"His technique," he repeated, "is not equal to Ysais'?" He gave a laugh which might have been a sob, and sat up suddenly with his head erect and his shoulders squared. He had the shaken look of one who has recovered from a dangerous illness. But when he spoke again it was in the accents of every-day politeness.

At an early hour the following morning Mrs. Warriner and her daughter left Waterloo Station on the steamer train for

Digitized by Google

Southampton, and Corbin attended them up to the moment of the train's departure. He concerned himself for their comfort as conscientiously as he had always done throughout the last three months, when he had been their traveling companion; nothing could have been more friendly, more sympathetic, than his manner. This effort, which Mrs. Warriner was sure cost him much, touched her deeply. But when he shook Miss Warriner's hand and she said "Good-by, and write to us before you go to the Philippines," Corbin for the first time stammered in some embarrassment.

"Good-by," he said; "I—I am not sure that I shall go."

He dined at the Savoy again that night, in company with some Englishmen. They sat at a table in the corner where they could observe the whole extent of the room, and their talk was eager and their laughter constant and hearty. It was only when the boy who led the orchestra began to walk among the tables, playing an air of peculiar sadness, that Corbin's manner lost its vivacity, and he sank into a sudden silence with his eyes fixed on the table before him.

"That's odd," said one of his companions. "I say, Corbin, look at that chap! What's he doing?"

—"and to an empty chair"

Corbin raised his eyes. He saw Edouard standing at the same table at which for the last two nights Miss Warriner had been seated. "What is it?" he asked.

"Why, that violin chap," said the Englishman. "Don't you see? He's been playing to the only vacant table in the room, and to an empty chair."

THE OLD DAGUERREOTYPES

By Joe Lincoln

UP IN the attic I found them, locked in the cedar chest,
Where the flowered gowns lie folded, which once were brave as the best;
And, like the queer old jackets and the waistcoats gay with stripes,
They tell of a worn-out fashion—these old daguerreotypes.

Quaint little folding cases fastened with tiny hook,
Seemingly made to tempt one to lift up the latch and look,
Linings of purple velvet, odd little frames of gold,
Circling the faded faces brought from the days of old.

Grandpa and grandma, taken ever so long ago,
Grandma's bonnet a marvel, grandpa's collar a show;
Mother, a tiny toddler, with rings on her baby hands
Painted—lest none should notice—in glittering, gilded bands.

Aunts and uncles and cousins, a starchy and stiff array,
Lovers and brides, then blooming, but now so wrinkled and gray.
Out through the misty glasses they gaze at me, sitting here
Opening the quaint old cases with a smile that is half a tear.

I will smile no more, little pictures, for heartless it was, in truth,
To drag to the cruel daylight these ghosts of a vanished youth.
Go back to your cedar chamber, your gowns and your lavender,
And dream, 'mid their bygone graces, of the wonderful days that were.

The Strong Young Men of the Administration. By A. Maurice Low

USUALLY a National Administration brings into prominence one or two obscure men. Of recent years young men have made their mark in Washington. The present Administration is noteworthy as having more young men in its service than any other Administration heretofore; men occupying the highest positions, nearly all of whom, before they came to Washington three years ago, were nationally unknown. Six of these men—three of them under forty, three of them a trifle over—have been selected because their lives are interesting studies; because they show what can be done by men who are determined to do things; because they are intrusted with great power and even greater responsibilities; because, in the absence of their chiefs, they frequently become that intangible thing, "the Government." Let me introduce them to the readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST: Dr. David Jayne Hill, Assistant Secretary of State; Charles Herbert Allen, Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Frank Arthur Vanderlip, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; Charles Gates Dawes, Comptroller of the Currency; Perry Sandford Heath, First Assistant Postmaster-General; William Woodville Rockhill, Director of the Bureau of American Republics—a distinguished company.

SECRETARY HILL AS A SLEEPER AND EATER

When David Hill entered the Freshman class of the University of Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, nineteen years ago, he was thoroughly prepared in all branches except Greek. In that study he was nearly two years behind his class. The Greek professor was disposed to put him back a year. Young Hill's reply was characteristic of the man: "I realize my deficiency," he said, "but I am here upon serious business, and not for play." He was admitted, and at the close of the Freshman year his grade in Greek was ninety-five out of a possible hundred. This seriousness marked his whole college life.

"He was the most methodical boy I ever knew," said John B. Cooke, Clerk of the Supreme Court of the State of Colorado, who was a college mate. "At the time for study he was in his room ready for work, and he was never too early nor too late. He was never known to miss a recitation or a meal; I never knew this appetite to fail him. He went to bed about ten o'clock and arose about half-past six. Neither study nor frolic could induce him to violate the rules he had established for his self-control. He was the most perfect sleeper and the most delightful eater, without a trace of the epicure, I have ever known. While he rigidly held himself to his rules, he did so without ostentation or display. He was a lover of college sports of all kinds, but his principal exercise was a brief walk of thirty minutes, morning, noon and evening."

OLD CLOTHES AND AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

While at college Hill was full of fun, which was always breaking out in unexpected places. One day, walking with a companion, they passed some little children playing upon a lawn. Hill looked over the fence, and in a tone of voice intended to be harsh said: "Children, love one another; confound you, why don't you love one another?" Then the two students passed on and the conversation upon some serious matter was resumed.

He displayed a marked power of concentration and of mastery over himself, whether in the recitation-room, in conversation, or in debate. His determination to succeed showed itself characteristically on one occasion. He was forced to practice a good deal of economy. Coming into an unexpected windfall—sixty dollars, I believe—he debated long and earnestly whether he should cut a dash among his fellow-students by appearing in a garb more gorgeous than that of the lilies of the field, or whether he should invest the money in an encyclopædia which he needed in his studies. Literature finally won the day. Young Hill bought the cyclopædia, and the knowledge he was enabled to display on sundry occasions, thanks to these books, gave him a great reputation with his associates.

At an early stage in his college career he showed a natural literary tendency. His orations were models of classical diction, and one of his associates recalls numerous instances of his logic and emotional tenderness. He was a constant student of the best writers of classical and modern English. He read everything. That in later life he should have written text-books on rhetoric and compiled a series of biographies which have attained the dignity of classics is not surprising.

HOW SECRETARY HILL MET HIS WIFE

At college, Hill never seemed to think of love, consequently it was not surprising that he should fall in love in a romantic manner. At one commencement a member of the graduating class asked Hill to meet his sisters who were coming from Philadelphia. He explained that they would drive up in a carriage to their boarding-house, and, as he would be busy at that time, he asked Hill to do the honors. The carriage drove up, Hill ran out, opened the carriage door and, to use his own language, "there sat two of the prettiest girls that ever were." He was satisfied that they were too beautiful to be the sisters of his friend. He stood there holding the carriage door, looking at the lovely faces before him but not uttering a syllable. In his embarrassment, he pulled out his watch and gazed at it long and anxiously, then he suddenly came to himself, thrust the watch back into his pocket, hastily closed the carriage door and ran into the house, leaving the young ladies to get out of the carriage alone. They remained at the house during commencement week, sitting opposite to him at the dining-table. At the beginning of the next term he said: "Well, I did not go home during vacation. I am engaged to be married to the loveliest girl in the world, one of those girls in the carriage." Immediately upon graduating from college "the loveliest girl in the world" became his wife.

"I can recall," says Mr. Cooke, "but one instance where Hill took any special part in a college prank. We had written a burlesque upon one of the classes, and it became a serious matter to distribute copies, as expulsion would surely follow detection. The most dangerous part of this work was to put the skit in the hands of the young ladies of a seminary located about a third of a mile from the college building. None of us was willing to assume this dangerous duty. So we drew lots, and it fell to Hill. It was a cold, dark, wintry night. The young ladies were to march in procession to attend an entertainment in one of the halls of the town. At the head of this procession of young ladies a colored janitor marched with a lantern and a heavy cane. Hill thoroughly disguised himself for the task and hid in a dark corner till the colored guard had passed, when he hurriedly began to hand out the burlesques to the young ladies, who at once began to scream; David broke away, the janitor in hot pursuit. He afterward described the race as a beautiful one, with the chances in favor of the janitor, until the latter went head first over a convenient board fence, which enabled the culprit to find a haven of safety."

SECRETARY ALLEN'S COMIC PHOTOGRAPHS

"Allen," said a man who was intimate with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy when they were classmates at Amherst, "could flunk with more grace and charm than any other man I have known, and flunk he often did. I doubt, however, whether his teachers thought any the less of him for it."

This sentence perhaps best characterizes the man on whose shoulders rested so much of the work of the Navy during the Spanish war: a magnetism and personal charm which captivates every one with whom he comes in contact. "What I most vividly remember of him," this classmate added, "was his striking personal appearance. In those far-off days he had not only a good physique, but a fine presence; he was genial and fond of a story, but, unconventional as he was, he none the less had a marked dignity, which on occasion stood him in good stead. His capacity for conducting business was easily recognized, and we elected him President of the class, a distinction which was then, and I fancy is now, esteemed a high honor in college. We instinctively felt that he had the quality of leadership, and were glad on many occasions to follow him—a rather remarkable fact, considering that high scholarship has been immemorably attached to leadership in small colleges."

When Allen first went to college he was a fine sketcher, though without much technical training. His talents soon attracted general attention. He was an enthusiastic amateur photographer, and he was one of the first to attach the photographic heads of prominent persons to bodies of his own invention, and create comical environments for them. One of his first pictures, and one which his classmates remember to this day, was of a billiard-room attached to a bar. The venerable President of the college and the professor of Latin were playing billiards, while the professor of Greek lolled in a huge chair, drinking brandy and soda. Allen photographed this picture, and copies of it were handed about with great secrecy for fear the college authorities would get hold of them. The existence of this work of art leaked out, and the faculty finally obtained copies and enjoyed the good-natured caricature quite as much as did the students.

STUDENT DAYS OF SECRETARY ALLEN

Allen's readiness of wit was proverbial, and was always emphasizing itself at unexpected times. In Professor Snell's recitation-room navigation was being studied. Professor Snell, who prided himself on his draughtsmanship, had drawn on the blackboard an outline map of Chesapeake Bay, had triangulated it, and on the lines of triangulation had drawn a very creditable ship under full sail. Allen was called up to the board.

Digitized by Google

"Allen," said Professor Snell, "what would be the course of this ship under these circumstances?"

Allen stood up and put his glasses on his nose.

"What ship? I see no ship."

The Professor, a little nettled, took a pointer and laid it rather sharply on the blackboard and said, "That ship."

"Ah, yes," replied Allen; "you call that a ship, do you?"

"Certainly," replied the Professor, entirely taken back.

"Well," answered Allen, without moving a muscle, "if that is a ship, I don't know what her course would be."

That ended the recitation for the time being, so far as he was concerned.

Here is another instance of his agility in getting out of a tight place. The class was being examined in conic sections—perhaps! In some mysterious manner, and perhaps it is best that the mystery should not be solved at this late day, Allen had succeeded in covering the blackboard with the symbols of a problem worked out. Called on to explain, he began gravely:

"P′ = large arc; p′ = small arc. Then we have P′ x p′ into cosine A——"

"Stop, Allen," exclaimed Professor Esty; "explain as if I knew nothing about it."

"Certainly, sir," said Allen. "P′ = large arc; p′ = small arc. Then we have P′ multiplied — I suppose you know how to multiply, sir, don't you?" he broke off, turning to his instructor.

"When Allen came back to the class reunion in 1879," said Dr. E. Winchester Donald, the distinguished pastor of Trinity Church, Boston, "we discovered that he was an orator. It was a great surprise, as he had shown no oratorical ability whatever during college life. But a speech he made in 1879 showed unmistakable power as a speaker. And last summer at our thirtieth reunion he spoke in an informal way for half an hour of his experiences as Secretary of the Navy. Sitting near him, I was more interested in watching the unconscious artistic working of his mind than I was in the story he was telling. The literary turn he gave his sentences was very striking."

A FORTUNE IN LUMBER

When Mr. Allen left college he went into business in his native city of Lowell, Massachusetts, as a lumber merchant, from which he has amassed a comfortable fortune. Fond of public affairs, he served in both branches of the State Legislature, and for four years sat in Congress. On more than one occasion in the House he showed that oratorical ability mentioned by Doctor Donald. I remember especially one occasion when the State of Massachusetts presented to the House of Representatives paintings of former Speakers from that State. Mr. Allen was one of the orators selected to make the presentation, and his speech was a model of all that a speech should be on such an occasion. It was couched in excellent English, it was delivered with a grace that made a profound impression on the House, and it marked Mr. Allen as one of the few accomplished speakers in Congress. Like many men who want to do things and who become impatient at the procrastination of Congress, he tired of service in the House, and thought he had ended his public career.

Two years later, in 1891, the Republicans of Massachusetts demanded that he should be their candidate for Governor. It was a gallant fight that he made, his opponent being the late William E. Russell, that remarkable young man who was thrice elected Governor of Massachusetts. Night after night the two men met on the stump, both magnetic speakers, both appealing to the younger element in politics, and both arousing their followers to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. Mr. Allen was defeated, and that defeat he thought ended his political career. But when, in 1898, Theodore Roosevelt resigned his place as Assistant Secretary of the Navy to become Lieutenant-Colonel of the Rough Riders, Mr. Allen was appointed by the President to fill the vacancy.

His long business training, his capacity for affairs, and his quickness to grasp the salient point in any problem submitted to him, made him an ideal man for the executive head of a great business institution like the Navy Department. Mr. Allen was a member of Congress when President McKinley sat in the House as a Representative from Ohio. The two men soon became fast friends, and that friendship has never been broken to this day. He is a frequent companion of the President in his walks and drives, and is often consulted by him on matters outside of his own department. When Mr. Allen was in Congress he was an enthusiastic amateur photographer, but of late years he has forsaken the camera and now his particular fad is sailing. He would go a long distance out of his way to see a good yacht race.

And to quote once more from Doctor Donald, who, when asked to tell something about Allen's life in college, said: "I best sum it all up by saying that he was noted among us for his urbanity, courtesy, tact, quick judgment, integrity, and that indefinable power of leadership which is easily recognized and impossible to describe."

To the Chicagoan of affairs two events mark for him the passage of time—one is the great fire, the other the closing of the Stock Exchange. It was in 1896 that the failure of the Diamond Match Company threatened widespread ruin. The evening before the decision was reached to close the Exchange a meeting of the leading bankers and business men of Chicago was held at the residence of P. D. Armour. The gentlemen who represented millions of capital were pledged not to divulge a word of the proceedings, and reporters were rigidly excluded. One exception had been made.

PHOTO BY WESCOTT, LOWELL, MASS.

CHARLES H. ALLEN

PHOTO BY CHICKERING, BOSTON

DAVID J. HILL

PHOTO BY BOYCE, WASHINGTON

F. A. VANDERLIP

PHOTO BY PRINCE, WASHINGTON

CHARLES G. DAWES

WHEN SECRETARY VANDERLIP LED CHICAGO NEWSPAPERS

The financial editor of the Chicago Tribune, Frank A. Vanderlip, who had just passed his thirtieth birthday, was present by invitation. When the decision was reached and the conference adjourned Mr. Vanderlip was given carte blanche to print whatever he thought best and in his own way, and to give the news to the other papers. Going back to his office, he telephoned all the editors in town and offered them the news on the condition that they would print it as it was written, and without the change of a single letter, and permit him to edit the headlines. It was an absolutely unprecedented situation in the newspaper world, in Chicago or elsewhere. But the editors had as much faith in Mr. Vanderlip as had the financiers, and every paper, with a single exception, accepted his terms, and that one did not have the news. The account was, of course, robbed of all sensational features, and a dozen banks were probably saved from ruin. A few weeks later, when one of the national banks failed, a similar course of action was followed.

FROM MACHINE SHOP TO TREASURY DEPARTMENT

The man who had rendered his city such signal service commenced life in a machine shop in Aurora, Illinois, working ten hours a day for seventy-five cents. He was not the kind of man to remain long content with that. He became acquainted with the village postmaster, who was also the village editor, picked up a slight knowledge of typesetting, and, what was to be of more value to him later, the art of writing for a newspaper. He soon outgrew his field and went to Chicago, where he found work on the Tribune. Later he became its financial editor.

It was in this place that he won the esteem and confidence of the financial magnates to such a degree that they were willing to intrust him with their secrets and admit him into their councils. As financial editor of the Tribune he was in receipt of a good salary; he was also part owner of the Economist, a weekly financial paper. When Mr. Gage, whom he had known for years, was appointed Secretary of the Treasury, he proposed to become his private secretary, a post which paid $2400. Mr. Gage was astonished. "Why," he said, "you can't afford to take this place; it won't begin to pay what you are now earning." But Mr. Vanderlip replied that he would like to have the place for a few years for the experience. He was already fully conversant with finance as a writer; now he wanted to see it in practice. The matter ended in his appointment, and Secretary Gage paid him $1000 a year out of his own pocket.

A WISE INVESTMENT

It was a good investment for the Secretary, for Mr. Vanderlip at once took off his hands an immense amount of routine business, very distasteful to Mr. Gage, whose talents are for great affairs, and who has no taste for details.

In the course of a few months one of the assistant secretaries resigned, and Mr. Vanderlip was appointed as his successor. Since then he has been practically in charge of the finances of the Government, and Secretary Gage has formulated no financial policy without first discussing it with his assistant. The war bond issue and the financial legislation necessitated by the war was placed in Mr. Vanderlip's hands. How successfully he did his work the country knows. A New York financial institution recently offered him an executive position at a large salary. Asked, in connection with this, whether he would care to remain in office four years more, he replied: "No. Four years are good and helpful; eight would be destructive. If I should stay them out I'd be a fossil before I knew it, and would probably find myself applying for any Government job I could get—perhaps running an elevator—and quite probably not fit even for that." So the chances are that he will go to New York when the Administration closes.

The "baby" of this interesting official family is Charles G. Dawes—only thirty-four years old—who holds in his grasp the destinies of nearly 4000 national banks, with deposits of over $3,000,000,000, whose power in the financial world is so great that even a Rockefeller, or a combination of Rockefellers and Vanderbilts and the other great financial magnates, might well tremble if he should exercise it.

A FORTUNATE CHOICE OF A BIRTHPLACE

Next to selecting one's grandfather carefully there is nothing quite so sensible as carefully selecting the State of one's birth. Mr. Dawes had the good sense to be born in Ohio. Naturally he has prospered. When he was young he studied both law and civil engineering, and after serving as an engineer on a road whose name no longer exists he drifted to Lincoln, Nebraska, and boldly put out his shingle. Here he came in contact with William J. Bryan, and, fired with the enthusiasm of youth, tried to show him the error of his ways. His association with the future Democratic candidate was interesting but not satisfying, and the Lincolnites were so perverse that they refused to bring their lawsuits to Dawes' office. The bottom of his purse was distinctly visible. When the future Comptroller of the Currency found that law was likely to prove a long and tedious struggle, he looked around for something else. He became bookkeeper for a local gas company at a ridiculously small salary. But some men start in life with a shoestring and end by owning a tannery. It was not long before Dawes had a small share in the company. It was not much longer before he owned the plant and, instead of working as a bookkeeper, had a bookkeeper working for him.

Digitized by Google

HALF A MILLION IN TEN YEARS

A few years later and the man who had been waiting for the clients who hadn't the good sense to come was Director of a national bank and Vice-President of a packing company; he had also acquired interests in gas companies in Akron, Ohio, and La Crosse, Wisconsin. Then his fame spread. A gas company in one of the suburbs of Chicago wanted him as President, and they were able to offer him inducements to leave Lincoln. In ten years, by honest and hard work, he had made a fortune estimated at half a million dollars. He has added to it since.

No man can do what Mr. Dawes has done, and in the way he did it, who does not possess certain indispensable qualities. To the gift of being able to make friends and to hold them with a grip of steel, there must be added the power to see events just a little before they happen; to work silently, obscurely even, to attain the end. Mr. Dawes possesses these qualities. An illustration of his methods may be found in the McKinley campaign. Long before the St. Louis Convention it had been supposed that Illinois was solid for Senator Cullom, and so clearly did the McKinley managers realize this that rather than excite antagonism they decided to remain out of Illinois. Mr. Dawes was then absolutely unknown in politics. He dissented from the judgment of the McKinley managers, and without help set out to capture the Illinois delegation.

When the State Convention met it was found that instead of being unanimous for Cullom nearly half the delegates were in favor of McKinley. The delegation finally went to St. Louis uninstructed. The ordinary politician, after having made such a brilliant coup, would have exploited it and himself at length in the newspapers. It was fully a month after the convention before the general political world learned of Dawes, and then it was only because Mr. McKinley himself told a party of correspondents how Dawes had organized and practically carried Illinois for him.

AN INDEPENDENT BANKER AT FIFTEEN

Perry Heath is the commander-in-chief of an army of 40,000 strong, whose annual support costs $40,000,000. Rather staggering figures, these.

Mr. Heath has made a fortune from nothing. He started life as a printer's devil on the Muncie, Indiana, Times, and from that worked up to his present position. When he was thirteen he earned $1.50 a week and saved; when he was sixteen he got $3 a week and saved. When in later years he came to Washington and received the largest salary then paid, he still saved. In twelve years as a Washington correspondent he earned $75,000 and saved $50,000. Before he was fifteen he had saved $35 and lent it at interest. He says he never borrowed a cent or received a job through any one's influence but once in his life.

PHOTO BY RICE, WASHINGTON

W. W. ROCKHILL

In the early days Heath was a typesetter, and with his characteristic thoroughness he made himself one of the best in the country. In repeated contests with professionals he won the prize for speed and accuracy—in fact, old-timers say that when in his prime he could give points to the Mergenthaler. He still keeps himself in practice, and can do better work now than three-fourths of the compositors.

A NOVEL INSPIRATION TO SERENITY

Mr. Heath has been successful every time but once. When he had been in Washington two years he went out to Dakota and invested his savings in a newspaper. But things went wrong and he lost all. Refusing to be beaten, he took up Government land, and pretty soon had back all that he had lost. Then he returned to Washington.

When Mr. Heath was a Washington correspondent it was said of him that he was never known to be rattled. No matter how fast news piled up, or how many things had to be watched, he was always serene, and apparently never making much exertion. A memorable illustration of his self-possession is related by a friend. Mr. Heath was one of the first newspaper men from the outside to reach Charleston at the time of the earthquake. On one of the nights of inconceivable terror, when buildings were falling around him and terrified people were running into the streets in their night clothes, Heath sat in the middle of the street dictating to a telegraph operator—who had moved his instrument to that place of comparative safety—the only full and connected account of the catastrophe which almost brought about Charleston's undoing. People will show you to-day the empty seats of the pillars the earthquake toppled from the old colonial fronts, but to Mr. Heath the terror and confusion was an inspiration to serenity.

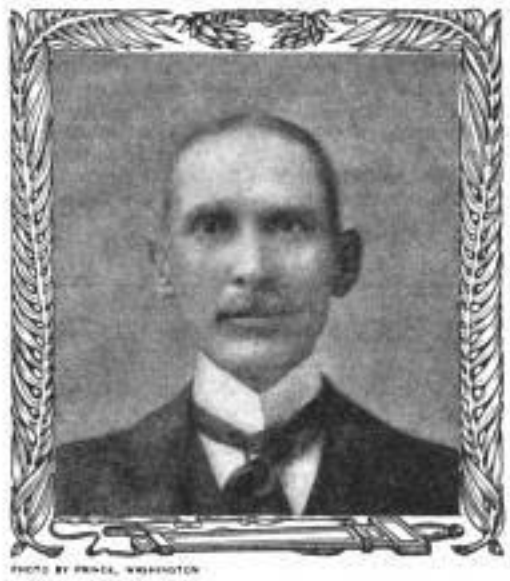

PHOTO BY PRICE, WASHINGTON

ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL HEATH

BEFORE MR. HEATH BECAME POSTMASTER

Heath left Washington to take charge of the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune, in which he had a proprietary interest. The paper was almost moribund. For many years a warm friendship had existed between Major McKinley and Perry Heath. When Mr. McKinley's name was mentioned in connection with the Presidency, Mr. Heath not only threw all his editorial weight in the scale, but he also took an active part in the ante-nomination politics. And an extremely shrewd, adroit and "smooth" politician is Mr. Heath. He never loses his temper, he never tires, he never seems to care; he is always on as good terms with his opponents as he is with his allies, and in the end his opponents become his allies. He had much to do with the nomination of Mr. McKinley.

After the nomination Mr. Heath sold the Tribune, which by that time he had made a paying property, to take charge of the Republican press bureau. The work he did exhibited his executive capacity. Millions upon millions of documents were sent out by him and his assistants during the campaign. These documents were written in every known language. The work of distribution was such that if it had been part of the system of a commercial establishment it would have taken years to complete. In a few weeks Mr. Heath had organized the literary bureau, and had it in full running order, and the documents were going to every State of the Union, and through the local agents, finding their way into the hands of the individual voters. Never before had such a work been done by a National Committee, and it must stand as a monument to the executive capacity of Postmaster Heath. When the campaign was over and Mr. McKinley was elected, Mr. Heath was asked whether he would like a Government office. Being a printer, he naturally wanted to go into the Agricultural Department, but the President, realizing the Post-Office Department needed the services of a man having his peculiar gifts for executive work, personally requested him to become First Assistant Postmaster-General.

A PROSY JOURNEY THROUGH THIBET

William Woodville Rockhill has seen more things and done more things than falls to the lot of the average man. Most men with his opportunities would have written a dozen startling books filled with adventure, but either because he is unduly modest or abnormally truthful he says he never had an adventure, and would not know an adventure if he should see one. And yet the man who talks in this matter-of-fact way, as if he had spent all his life in a village, is Philadelphia born, was educated in France, and a graduate from the École Militaire, a sub-Lieutenant in the Foreign Legation in Algeria, where he saw active service, and all this before he was twenty-four years old.

That would seem to be a pretty good foundation for something a little out of the ordinary, and on that foundation Mr. Rockhill has reared a very extraordinary structure of the unusual. He has a natural faculty for languages. While still a boy in Paris he studied Sanscrit, Chinese, and other Oriental tongues, and when Li Hung Chang visited the United States a few years ago Mr. Rockhill was the only native-born American able to converse fluently with the Viceroy in the vernacular. It was because of his knowledge of Chinese that President Arthur appointed him, on his return from Algeria, Second Secretary of Legation at Peking. Then he went traveling through unknown Mongolia and through Thibet the terrible. He was Chargé d'Affaires in Korea when that country was a hermit kingdom. And yet, adventures and he remained strangers.

"Some men," said Mr. Rockhill, "can have adventures in going from New York to Brooklyn, but I am not one of them. I have never had an adventure in my life. You are always hearing of men who have found trouble in China, but I have traveled 4000 miles through its interior and never had a cross word addressed to me. There was never an anti-European or anti-American riot while I was there. Adventures come to those who look for them. If a man minds his own business he doesn't have them."

While it is probable that a difference of opinion as to what constitutes an adventure largely explains Mr. Rockhill's apparent immunity, it is certain that peace has always seemed to accompany him. Whether this was purely accidental or the result of his excellent management of the tasks committed to him is a matter of some doubt.

He was in China just after one set of riots came to an end and just before another series began. He reached Greece—he was then our Minister to Greece, Roumania and Servia—in the closing days of the war with Turkey. He has received many foreign medals for his explorations.

The President Listened

A STORY about Congressman William Sulzer, of New York, concerns the passage of the bill in the Fifty-fourth Congress creating the Industrial Labor Commission. The author of this measure was T. W. Phillips, of Pennsylvania. It passed the Senate in the closing hours of the last session and was sent to President Cleveland for signature.

Mr. Cleveland was at the Capitol, as is customary at such times, and was ready to sign such bills as met his approval. Mr. Phillips, Mr. Sulzer and other gentlemen waited on him to explain any points on which he might be doubtful. When they reached the President's room they found the door locked and a grim custodian who declared that the President did not wish to be disturbed. Time was flying, the last moments of the Congress were slipping out of existence, and there was no telling what Mr. Cleveland was doing behind that locked door. Mr. Sulzer came to the rescue.

"Gentlemen," he announced, "we will get into that room if we have to break in the door." After a while it opened. Mr. Cleveland was eating a somewhat bounteous luncheon.

Mr. Sulzer struck an attitude. "Mr. President," he said, "we wish to call your attention to a bill in which every labor organization is vitally interested." He then went on, giving the title of the bill and expatiating on its merits. After a time Mr. Phillips nudged him and whispered that time was getting short, but Mr. Sulzer was making a fine speech and could not cut it short. At last he concluded with a most eloquent peroration, whereupon Mr. Cleveland, with conviction written upon every line of his countenance, picked up a pen and started to sign the bill. Suddenly he paused, looked at his watch and laid down the pen. "Gentlemen," he said, "I was familiar with the merits of this bill and fully intended to sign it. But I forgot myself in listening to the eloquent words of the gentleman from New York. It is now unfortunately after twelve, the Fifty-fourth Congress has expired, and I am no longer President of the United States. I have therefore no power to sign the bill."

But the next Congress passed the bill and the President signed it without further forensic interruptions.

A Naval Wonder-Worker

LIEUTENANT F. J. HAESELER, U. S. N., now attached to the Washington Navy Yard, has invented a breech-block mechanism which is considered by some of the officers of the Navy to be the best gun attachment of its kind ever created. It has two improvements to recommend it. One is a spiral conical plug which saves considerable time and labor, and the other is a safety lock which prevents a premature discharge. Lieutenant Haeseler made the invention soon after the gun explosion on a Russian warship which resulted in great loss of life, and after he himself had had a narrow escape from a similar accident on the Amphitrite. When the invention was tried at the proving grounds many of the spectators were astonished at the inventor's skill in marksmanship. This was not news to the men of the Navy, however, for the Lieutenant had made a record in the Spanish-American War when he was stationed on the Texas. On the night of July 4, when the Spaniards were endeavoring to sink the Reina Mercedes in Santiago harbor, he was at his post, and he fired from his twelve-inch gun three shots at more than four thousand yards' range. Two of these shots, his fellow-officers say, went through the ship and helped to sink her.

Lieutenant Haeseler was graduted from Annapolis in the class of '80, and won his first fame by instituting the changes in the Texas after the Grant celebration which made the battle-ship the model sea-fighter she now is. No one appreciated his work more than the jackies of the Texas. When they came back from the scene of action, and just before Lieutenant Haeseler was appointed to his new post, they presented him with a watch.

On the front was engraved a figure of the Texas stripped for action. On the back was his monogram, and inside the back was inscribed:

"To Lieutenant F. J. Haeseler, U. S. N., from the crew of the battle-ship Texas, in recognition of his services in changing the old hoodoo to the new hero."

Digitized by Google

A Bull Market

By Robert Herrick

They were too eager for that, too preoccupied, and even worried

DRAWN BY JOHN WOLCOTT ADAMS

THE unspoken ambition of her life since she was married had been distinctly this—her own carriage. She could remember the time when her father had presented her mother with a brougham; it was connected in her mind with the dawn of the affluent days of the family. That affluence had steadily increased, until when she married Barton McDonald the step had seemed an exhilarating adventure into comparative poverty. Of course the privations of their married life were sure to end soon—before middle age—and she had determined privately that their triumph should be marked in some such way as this—an establishment with a carriage and a smart footman.

The "establishment" had come after five years of marriage. Her father had given them the lot, a corner one, on Ritson Place, which seemed appropriate to their probable domestic expansion. What with their savings, a lucky investment, and a moderate mortgage, they had been able to build up a good deal of an establishment, rather more than they had planned and their previous way of living might warrant. Then had come the depressing times of the panic which had followed the great Fair. These hard times had especially affected McDonald's business—he was in railroad supplies; all the railroads were living lean since 1893. Still, it was comparatively easy to economize, when all one's neighbors, even the very wealthy ones, were complaining morosely of failing investments and cutting down their expenditures. There was no sense of shame or personal failure in explaining that you had to do without a fourth servant, and could entertain at dinner but once a week.

She had the greatest confidence in Barton. Every one spoke of his enterprise and wonderful success. He was but thirty, though he looked to be quite forty, judging from his mature face. Older, solid business men made much of him. As soon as trade revived she was sure that Barton would grasp the new business opportunities among the first, that plenty would begin to flow, and her ambition be realized. And so it was. McDonald's business awoke among the earliest; every week saw new advances. The railroads were hungry, thirsty, bare—and new business flowed in. All this she followed in general with the reasonable understanding that an intelligent American wife can give to her husband's business. But she realized it chiefly through the advent of the inside man; then through the revival of their talk about a summer place in the East, somewhere near New Bedford.

Not only did the railroad supply business look up, but certain investments, small affairs to be sure, began to advance. She heard much talk of the boom in the stock market. Somehow the stock market filled her with uneasiness, with a terror that she was forced to laugh at. She knew that this aversion was largely due to Uncle Arthur's deplorable fate. Her father's younger brother had come to smash on the New York Exchange. He had been fabulously wealthy long before the period of her father's affluence. Then there had been references about him in the papers as a plunger. When his fatal day had come a good deal of hard talk had been current about Uncle Arthur's speculation. Her mother had called it gambling, whereat her father had winced a little, guiltily, as if he had been concerned in the same kind of transaction. The affair made bad feeling, she knew. Her father had lost a neat sum through the daring of his younger brother, and Uncle Arthur never managed to retrieve his fortunes. He was now somewhere in the West, working over a mine that would not produce silver, or any other precious metal. The bad blood, the anxiety, the scandal of the stock market fiasco had told so on her mother that she, just old enough to note such matters, had received a vivid prejudice against everything connected with stocks.

Barton and she had discussed this prejudice at frequent intervals. She knew that he had been in stocks, a little, ever since their marriage. In fact, their house was built largely out of an advance in Mesabic Iron. But her husband had carefully explained to her the distinction between investment and speculation until she had half come to accept his theory of the legitimacy of the one and the folly of the other. To be sure, to her crude woman's perception the dividing line between the two was almost invisible—so tenuous, in fact, that she was not sure in what it consisted. She had settled down to the working hypothesis that if you didn't go in on margins, and bought to hold, that you were on the safe side—were an investor. Of late, since the revival of business, even this division between the legitimate and the illegitimate seemed to be disappearing; for so many good things came up on the market, which Barton knew about from the inside, that their little investments were made and remade with ever-increasing rapidity. Scarcely a week went by that McDonald did not casually make some such announcement as the following: "We made a good thing in C., B. & Q. last month. I guess it's reached the top notch. I think I'll try Steel and Wire."

She did not like the phrase, "I'll try." It suggested the gaming table. Another change she disapproved of was that McDonald no longer shunned common stocks or "industrials," as he had once done. She remembered her father's advice when the matter of investments had come up: "Stick to preferred stocks and dividend-bearing securities. The chances in all others are too great." But Barton had excused the common stocks and the industrial concerns by saying that of course no one would take them for a permanent thing, but that everything was on the boom just now, and would be for a year or two. Even a fool couldn't go wrong in this market. So the time-limit criterion had gone; the investment criterion, also. For in spite of Barton's silence on the point, she knew very well that he wasn't buying stocks like National Steel or Radiator common for dividends. He didn't hold them long enough, and, in fact, most of them were not in the dividend-paying class. They were merely promising risks.

Two facts reassured her in her doubting moments. First, there was her great belief in Barton's judgment and success. She had such a faith in him! and everything he turned to seemed to come out ahead. Then she knew that almost all their friends were doing the same thing more or less openly, were "in the market" to a greater or less extent. A dinner party in their little set was likely to bring out a good deal of stock-brokers' talk. Even when other gossip took the place of references to the market, she knew that, as the women left, the men were apt to pull up their chairs about Barton and plunge into a discussion of specialties. She did not exactly like it. Yet, after all, it was not her business; she would not like to have Barton criticise how she managed the house, especially when everything was going well. Perhaps they were destined by means of Barton's shrewdness to be prosperous, wealthy, immensely rich.

Yet the carriage had come so rapidly that it bewildered her. The tenth of September, their wedding-day, she had found an envelope at her plate instead of the usual trinket. It contained a check for two thousand dollars. "We'll select the brougham this afternoon if you'll meet me at Walker's at four," McDonald said in answer to her startled look. She had been so bewildered that she had not kissed him so rapturously as usual.

They selected the brougham, a distinctly smart little affair, and then had had their usual anniversary dinner at the Auditorium and gone to the theatre. Two weeks later, on her birthday, two magnificent iron-gray horses had been driven up to the house for inspection. Meantime they had rented a neighboring stable. Her establishment was completed by engaging a coachman and a nimble young fellow who would look well on the box or at the door.

She had the carriage out for the first time one lovely October morning. As it stood in front of the house she eyed it shyly from the drawing-room window. Somehow it seemed very unreal—the furniture of a dream, that would whisk around the corner some day, never to return. When the footman asked her for her orders, she was in a flutter, and almost at random gave the address of Isabelle Pond, at Buena Park. The Ponds lived so far out of town that it would give her a good drive. And Isabelle would be interested in the new possession.

The Ponds were the only young people in their set who were distinctly poor and who were not "in the market." It had irritated her a little to feel that Belle's sharp tongue made merry with the "operators," as she dubbed Barton McDonald and their friends. Willie Pond had been pretty wild before Belle married him and kept him in leash; that explained it. They had struggled for years to build their ridiculous little villa at Buena Park. Even now the third floor was unfinished, and Belle had no nurse. On the whole, the McDonalds rather patronized the Ponds, but Mrs. McDonald really admired Belle's pluck and character.

It occurred to her when she had driven half the way that it might not be quite nice to flaunt her carriage in Isabelle's face the first day. Yet she did not know what excuse to make, how to avoid appearing ridiculous before her new servants. She did not feel at home in the carriage—not quite the owner of it yet—and so she was driven on to Buena Park.

Mrs. Pond took the matter charmingly, consented at once to drive back to luncheon; admired, discussed and applauded. Finally she relaxed comfortably into the cushioned back and sighed: "May, you are so lucky; you get just what you want in time. And you don't have to fight for it so hard! The man who said that blessings you strive for are the sweetest was a fool."

Mrs. McDonald patted her friend's hand consolingly.

"Belle! This was such a surprise—I can hardly believe it is mine! And it doesn't make you any happier to have your own carriage. Sheridan's was nearly as comfortable, and all we had to do was to telephone for it."

"Of course!" Mrs. Pond smiled a little cynically. "But to know that you can have it; that's the thing. It means that your income is over—well, a certain comfortable sum, not three thousand a year."

"I don't know what Barton's income is," Mrs. McDonald replied, slightly annoyed. "He has been very successful lately."

"Stocks have been going up," Mrs. Pond observed with an uncomfortable quickness.

"Have they?" Mrs. McDonald replied a little snubbingly. "I don't follow Barton's investments closely." She dwelt on the broad, respectable term "investments" with due emphasis. Then to make the point clearer she continued: "One has to invest one's earnings somewhere, and Barton says real estate is so uncertain, and the return on bonds and mortgages nothing—positively nothing!"

Mrs. Pond smiled and shifted the subject to other topics. After luncheon Mrs. McDonald sent her friend home in the brougham alone. Isabelle Pond had woven an unpleasant association about the new toy.

As the days went by the carriage became a commonplace, yet Mrs. McDonald never entered it without a curious feeling

SHE HAD THE CARRIAGE OUT FOR THE FIRST TIME ONE LOVELY OCTOBER MORNING

DRAWN BY JOHN WOLCOTT ADAMS

Digitized by Google

of unreality. In some way it did not seem to be hers or any one's. It was perfect, but inexplicable. She had never had this feeling about any other possession. This one had come so unexpectedly that she had not acquired any rights in it beforehand from sacrifices or steady progression toward an object of desire. It was merely thrust into her hands. Who could say that it would not pop out in the same manner?

She still depended quite as much on Sheridan's livery as on her own carriage, for what with sick horses, or excessive distances, or taking the coachman out too often in the day, she was forced to rely on the public stable quite half the time. Thus, perhaps, the feeling of unreality was encouraged by the sense of fragility in the toy.

At last she ventured to mention this matter to her husband. They were driving home from a theatre party, and he was smoking, holding his cigar near the partly lowered window.

"Do you feel as if you owned the carriage?" she began abruptly.

"But I don't," McDonald answered with a laugh. "It's yours, and the horses, too. I merely own the bills for it."

"I mean—does it seem quite real to you, like the house and the children?"

"I never thought of comparing them," he answered banteringly. "Why not?"

"It was dropped into our hands—a kind of fairy trick. It always seems to me as though it might disappear some day."

"So were the children, for that matter, weren't they?"

His smile was reassuring if his logic was frivolous. His smile—so broad, so calm, so perfectly assured—always calmed her. It was representative to her of his character. While he smiled indulgently like that, he seemed firm, judicious, quite completely a man.

"Yes, dearie," her husband continued, stroking her hand, "don't bother yourself about it—the money. There is plenty of that to be had——" he waved his cigar complacently toward the heavy warehouses that flanked the street. "This carriage is but a trifle. Stocks—business—are on a boom——"

"I wish you were out of stocks," she interrupted irritably, withdrawing her hand from his.

The man's mouth drew in stiffly, giving him an unpleasant, almost arrogant expression.

"We have talked that matter out pretty thoroughly. I think it is for me to decide."

She acquiesced, and his face softened into its usual complacency. Presently he suggested insinuatingly:

"I've been thinking of late that it would be nice to have a year or two abroad before we get the summer place in shape."

Her face lit up eagerly. This was a hope scarcely admitted to herself. "But how could you leave your business?"

He smiled delphically.

"There's Charlie"—Charlie was his younger brother, who had graduated from Yale two years before—"he's taking hold of the business well. If we got together a little capital, say fifty thousand, we might go off and leave him to manage the office. Just think! One, perhaps two years, over there?"

She snuggled closer to him, her heart leaping joyously at the vision.

"How can we ever get all that together!" she exclaimed doubtfully. She remembered the mortgage on the Ritson Place house.

"We'll see," McDonald replied in a tone that said, "Leave that to me."

She made no more remarks until they reached home, when she said irrelevantly:

"Poor Isabelle! It doesn't seem just that all the good things should come to us. That is what I mean, Barton, by saying that everything is unreal. Things come to us almost by wishing for them. They have to struggle for them so hard—it seems unfair."

"Life is a gamble," her husband answered sententiously. "Besides, Pond always was a fool."

These two remarks gave her much food for thought in the weeks to come. They were never quite obliterated from her mind. Sometimes she thought them profoundly wise. Then they seemed paradoxical, for if life were all a gamble Pond could not be blamed for being a fool. Again the paradox made her uneasy—it seemed to indicate a softening of her husband's morality. But, however she pondered the sayings, she came back finally to the bed-rock of her marriage covenant—her husband was the wise and the good man.

Chapter II

THE unreality of it all did not diminish as the days wore on, but she thought less about it. She became accustomed to living in a busy, affluent kind of dream. Barton and she went out a good deal. The city was very gay this winter, and she found herself to be of a certain importance socially. Every one wore a prosperous air, not the least the McDonalds. The activity, business and social, gave her almost no chance to talk things over with Barton. And she felt that her feminine feelings about their life would merely irritate the determined husband.

One day she was obliged to go to his office to remind him of an engagement they had for the evening. After she had completed some errands she was driven to the Marquette Building. It was nearly twelve, and she might get him for luncheon. Of late he had given up coming home for luncheon, although Ritson Place was conveniently near Dearborn Street.

The footman disappeared into the tall hive, and in a few minutes returned with the message that Mr. McDonald had stepped out an hour before and had probably gone over to Knight & Turner, the brokers on LaSalle Street, who had called him up by telephone. Mrs. McDonald debated for a moment; then, as the message was an important one, she gave the order to drive to Knight & Turner's. The brokers' offices were only two blocks away, on the ground floor of an old, blackened building, which was pierced in many spots by telegraph and telephone cables. The first-floor windows bore the simple legend in white letters: "Stocks and Bonds Bought and Sold."

She noticed while she waited that few people entered the brokers' door, but around the corner, downstairs, where a lengthier legend in gilt letters showed that another firm of brokers had their offices, a constant stream of men poured in and out of the swinging doors. She could see from her position in the carriage the top lines of an immense blackboard where a boy was writing rapidly a lengthening line of figures. Through the window that was dropped at the top came a perpetual clatter of ticking machines, but there did not seem to be much talk. The people who went in interested her; they were heterogeneous, but uniformly respectable. Young lawyers, doctors, and smart clerks in wholesale houses—most of them; now and then a grizzled, rather flashily dressed man that might be a habitué—might get a living by the ticker or the race-course. It was the noon hour, and the throng steadily increased.

Suddenly she recognized a face, and quickly withdrew into her carriage, feeling instinctively that the man would be annoyed to be known, feeling also that she might not have done right in driving over to the brokers' in this way. Several times again she perceived faces of people known to her, and each time she withdrew guiltily until the crowd of indifferent men filled up the space between the curb and the basement steps. The stream of men fascinated her. Just what they were doing behind the swinging doors she could not tell, but evidently something in stocks, and not in investment securities, either. They were too eager for that, too preoccupied, and even worried. Almost every one was smoking. One man whom she had seen enter came out in a few minutes, looked aimlessly up and down the street for a moment as if discontented with either prospect, and then set off, his head slightly bent, chewing at his unlighted cigar. He was not shaved, and his sallow flesh, pocked here and there, was seamed, as if from loss of sleep. Not a nice person at all, she thought, and then she reproved herself for her narrow judgment. He was merely a person that she would not be likely to meet, or if she did, he would be shaved and freshened—made presentable.

The footman came back and said that Mr. McDonald would be out presently.

She waited patiently, although it was growing late for luncheon. The stream of attendants at the brokers' office in the basement fascinated her. The noon crowd of clerks, lawyers, doctors were coming out, and to take their places older men were dropping in by twos and threes, business men who could get away from their offices for the afternoon. The exchange was open for the afternoon session. The younger men had evidently come to look over the situation as a whole, to watch the New York market that was already running its afternoon course. Now they were obliged to return to their desks.

"THAT IS GAMBLING"

At last McDonald came down the steps and crossed to the carriage window. His face was set in a sombre, rather preoccupied expression, as if he had been suffering some slightly annoying experience. He looked like this when the servants acted badly, or they missed their connections in traveling. He greeted her in a hurried manner that forced her to state her business at once in justification of disturbing him.

"Well, well," he replied impatiently, and she thought that he had not heard half what she had told him, or considered it altogether too trivial to warrant this interruption, "I must go back now."

"Why, I thought we'd lunch together!" she panted. "Let me take you back to your office, at least."

McDonald shook his head shortly.

"No, I must go back to Knight's for a moment and then get a bite of lunch. Yes, I'll be home in time to dress. Good-by."

"Barton," she called almost involuntarily, "what's the matter?"

"Nothing—a mere flurry; the bull market has had a setback. It's nothing of importance." He wheeled about to be detained no longer.

The carriage threaded its way carefully down the length of the busy street. It passed a number of other groups of men running in and out of offices, which bore the little signs: "Stocks and Bonds, Grain and Provisions Bought and Sold."

She was glad when they had crossed to the busy wholesale streets. There the animation and bustle was another matter. Tangible things, like barrels of potatoes, bales of cotton, huge boxes of merchandise blocked the sidewalks. The prudent, shopkeeping blood in her veins seemed to respond to these manifestations of commerce. The other—LaSalle Street—terrified her. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," it has been writ. And that law had not been abrogated.

To-day, more than ever before, her possessions seemed vague, unsubstantial—phantoms of material desires that had borrowed tenuity for the moment, merely to escape on the morrow in elfish scorn. The one thing which saved her from taking this view of her life completely, instead of having a normal, sane enjoyment of her wealth, was that obstinate belief in her husband. But she had to admit that many admirable husbands had failed, had betrayed shocking judgments in "investments." And if life were nothing but a gamble, why might not to-morrow's throw be disastrous?

She tried to school herself to the idea of loss. To lose one's carriage, one's servants, one's house, nay, one's dreams—but she stopped. That was a step too far, and it was an idle thought. Perhaps the deprivation would not mean much, but the confession of mistake, of defeat would be galling. She must save. Mechanically, she opened her purse and emptied its contents into her lap—two ten-dollar bills and some silver. She picked up the bills and stared at them. They had no particular meaning for her, for she knew when they had disappeared that all she had to do was to write her name in a little red-covered book and present the paper at Field's, or anywhere, to get some more. And she could remember the time in her father's house when a ten-dollar bill had much significance; indeed, it had never quite lost its importance during her maiden days. Now it meant nothing more than an electric bell, or a tray, or any other convenient way of getting your desires fulfilled.

It irritated her, this appearance of a Tantalus meal to which she was forced to give her attention, and with her customary energy she sought to find the cause. Earlier she and Barton had appropriated his income to different accounts; now they spent what had to be spent without much reference to the particular account to which the money should be set down. She must insist on their returning to the old method.

McDonald came in rather earlier than usual, with the same set look of annoyance that his face had worn at noon. She forbore to probe the matter there and then, but some hours later, when they were alone before going upstairs for the night, she could contain herself no longer. All the evening she had kept an eye upon her husband's face, trying to supply the causes for its lines, trying also to settle the uneasiness of her morning's reflection. She knew no particular finesse—Barton and she had not been in the habit of managing each other—and so she began awkwardly:

"What did you mean by a flurry?"

"That the market was irregular in prices," he replied sententiously; "some things up; more down."

"What difference does that make?" she persisted. "You didn't lose anything, did you?"

"No," he answered slowly, "not exactly." Then he added in a burst of confidence, "but if the market doesn't recover soon I shall have to lose."

"Why?" she asked bluntly. "If the investments are good, what difference does it make what people think about them just now?"

"You don't understand," he began pettishly, with a sense of the hopelessness of making her understand it all.

"But I want to," she pressed; "I must——"

"I have a lot of stock that I have bought on account."

"What's that?"

"The brokers have bought it for me," he explained with increasing irritation, "but it is more than I care to pay for outright, and they are holding it for me."

"Oh!" after a pause she continued. "But they can sell it for you, can't they?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes, Goody! But I don't want them to sell it at a loss. See?"

"You can buy it, then, can't you?"

"Well, no, not all; it is a good round lot."

"What is it?"

"Sugar, six hundred shares," he blurted out irritably.

She gazed into space for a few minutes and then asked:

"How much was it?"

"One sixty-five," McDonald answered wearily.

"Why! six hundred shares; that's most a hundred thousand dollars! How can you buy all that?"

"I can't. The brokers do"—and he went into further explanations. Suddenly she interrupted him fearfully, "But isn't that margining?"

He hesitated. He knew what a fated word that was in the Blake household.

"Buying on account is what I said," he answered briefly.

"But isn't it the same thing as margins?" she persisted relentlessly.

After a moment he replied doggedly, "Yes, you can call it that."

The book she had been fingering slipped from her hands. When McDonald glanced at her he was startled by the horrified, tense expression of her face. He got up and put his hand on her shoulder and smiled reassuringly.

"That is gambling," she whispered at last, "gambling."

"Nonsense," McDonald retorted.

And they spent a long while over the matter, he trying to explain, to make her understand; she recurring to the dreaded term that had such potency over her imagination. Finally he gave it up in despair and had to take refuge in the authority of his judgment, in the propriety of his will. Even that seemed to have got a shock in her mind. She ventured to plead with him, to urge him to sell the Sugar certificates on the morrow. At last he exclaimed brutally: "I can't. If I sold to-morrow it would wipe out almost everything we have, house and all."

At that she said never a word, but got up and walked nervously about the room, examining this thing, then that; handling the bric-à-brac and ornaments until the atmosphere became intolerable to her husband. At last she went upstairs. To all appearances she had accepted the situation.

Chapter III

THE famous bull market of '98 and '99! Whoever is interested in the psychological manifestation of a nation as reflected in the stock market will long remember the vagaries of that season. The picture of an insatiable public, greedy for stock certificates, fed for weeks on the emptiest rumors that floated up from Wall Street like the cloud swirls from a factory chimney! More remarkable were the occasional periods of distrust, when the ignorant multitude, for no apparent reason, was temporarily glutted with its paper trumpery and refused more. For weeks a steady, upward wave, then a halt, then irregular spurts of strength, then a general sag—such was the course of the public pulse as read by the ticker.

These conditions were not reflected openly in the Ritson Place house. Mrs. McDonald asked no more questions after that evening when she had tried to master the distinction between "buying on account" and "margins" and had totally failed. But the market was reflected as by a sixth sense; the atmosphere of the house was the atmosphere of the market, now optimistic, upward, careless; now feverish and fretful, underwrought by scarcely defined fears. She divined that after an anxious two weeks Barton had got rid of his Sugar certificates, even, or at a slight loss. She found herself wishing that it had been a crushing loss, a kind of catastrophe that would deter him from hazardous ventures of a similar nature. When he began to talk once more of Europe, she felt that "something had gone well" besides the regular business, some stock had been "put up," and he had "realized." When he was talkative, full of plans, imaginative, the market was on the rise. When he was gloomy, conservative, inclined to cynicism, he was being pushed. Barton had never been moody—his solid intelligence had hitherto kept a sane note—but now she read him by his moods.

She found herself chiming in note with these moods—now lulled to quiet and fain to trust in her old faith; now suspicious, puritanic and fearful. No matter what the mood might be, however, the same transparent mist of unreality hung over the world and its goods. Should he come home to-morrow and announce that he had taken passage for Europe, she should accept it as a curious bit of the fretwork of dreams that might vanish over night. The horses and the carriage were toys, the house was a home under the sea, the dinners were Persian feasts—a messenger would come some bright day and strike the table. Presto! she would awake.

The measure of reality seemed the Ponds and their sordid struggles. Isabelle and she carefully avoided the subject of stocks—both veiling their eyes before the growing affluency of the Ritson Place house—and sought the safe ruts of old companionship, the insubstantial realities of women's commerce. So for a three months. Then a careless remark let slip by Isabelle awoke her unhappy imagination in all its old vividness.

"We may not always be poor. There is more in this world than slaving from nine to five for daily bread and a roof."

The resentful tone, she thought, might be in sarcasm at her own easy circumstances. But she thought not—it went deeper; it went so deep as to show a new side of Isabelle's nature. She had no ready reply. In pondering this later, a fear came over her; Isabelle was untying the leash that she had so cleverly and affectionately tied about poor Willie Pond. Was she pointing the finger of comparison to her husband—a married woman's deadliest, last weapon? The Ponds had a nurse now, and nothing was said about the mortgage on the Buena Park house. Instead, Mrs. Pond spoke of taking the children East for the summer. Decidedly the Ponds must have discovered some new springs of ease!

She was minded to ask Barton about it. She suspected with misgivings that Barton might know more of Willie Pond's affairs than she cared to have him. He seemed to see a good deal of Pond in the city, lunched with him three or four times a week. But they had been going so gayly and easily the past month that her idle, suspicious, questioning mind had been almost at peace. She had taken a great deal of interest in the discussion at the Monday Club over the question of foreign education for American children. It was generally known that the lucky McDonalds "were contemplating an extended residence abroad." So she refrained from asking troublesome questions. Instead, she changed Margaret's kindergarten and joined a class in French conversation.

DRAWN BY JOHN WOLCOTT ADAMS

"TO THE BULL MARKET"

Then, out of all the clear sunshine there came a bolt. Some big man overate or overdrank himself in New York and died—an innocent enough event. She read it in the paper, but scarcely noted it. That evening, however, Barton came home with a heavy face, all the lines of maturity sunk in his brow. The next morning they were not wiped away, nor the next, nor the next. Clearly this was no ordinary "flurry," to which she had grown accustomed. The McDonalds began to decline invitations! Barton was not well—too tired to run about until twelve every night. These days of perturbation there were only two of her possessions that seemed really hers—the children and Barton. As for the carriage, the house and the servants, she clean forgot about them. They were packing themselves up in her mind and soon would be off for good. In more hopeful moments she comforted herself with thinking that her husband, whether right or wrong in his actions, was no weakling. He would bring things out right, give him time. She gave it, drilling herself to be lenient.

Willie Pond was drinking again, so she heard from the Eustises, who lived at Buena Park. She avoided meeting Isabelle, for something might come out which she shrank from facing. She kept up her round of duties from church to kitchen. Margaret had a governess now, and she was watching the governess. At last she met Isabelle Pond accidentally at the Armitages' reception. Mrs. Pond seemed to elude her, willfully, in the press of people. She pursued Isabelle, edging her way in by the corners, until she overtook her friend.

"Drive back in my carriage, Belle."

Mrs. Pond answered coolly: "No, thanks. The electric is good enough for me. It's got to be good enough."

The two women looked at one another silently, while the ripples of talk went over their heads. Every minute some one from the struggling sea grasped one of them by hand, and their faces would relax from the tragic mask—for a moment.

"Come, Isabelle!" Mrs. McDonald plead. And when she pushed into the crowd again the other woman followed her. Once in the carriage, Mrs. McDonald lowered the silk shades.

"What is it, Belle?"

Mrs. Pond's lips quivered proudly, and then she cried, defiantly, openly: "It is all over. We struggled so hard. The house must go, and we owe——"

"But how?"

Mrs. Pond drew herself up proudly——

"You ask?"

"Isabelle, I know nothing!"

The other woman looked at her critically.

"I have felt so much," Mrs. McDonald explained apologetically, "so much—everything is so queer. It's like opium."

Mrs. Pond wiped her eyes.

"May, do you pretend to tell me that you don't know what has happened this week—that Will has lost every cent we have and more—over fifteen thousand? He went into something with your husband, and some horrid man died, and everything slumped, and Will's——" but she could not finish. A new sob overtook her.

"No, I did not know that," Mrs. McDonald replied calmly. She was thinking. Suddenly the world flamed up, red and vivid and tragic. The vision burned her, and it was refreshing to feel even pain.

"No, I did not know that," she repeated monotonously. "Where have I been living? I have been asleep." She stroked Isabelle's hands, trying to comfort her.

"Hush; don't tell me anything more, just yet. Thomas will take you home. I will see you soon—to-morrow, perhaps."

The groom held open the door, and Mrs. McDonald heard the click of the lock for the last time, she thought.

Barton was at home, although it was early, and to her annoyance her father was with him. They were sitting in the little den, or rather standing, as if their conversation had been animated. While she crossed the hall and came toward them they suspended their talk and waited for her.

Her dear old father! she thought, with a little gasp; they must keep this sickening mess from his sight. But after one glance she knew that was no longer possible.

"May," her father spoke gently, as was his manner when he had a family rebuke to administer. "May, did you know about this—about what Barton has been doing?"

She looked at her husband to make the denial for her, but to her amazement he turned away as if to avoid the question.

"No," she began, but moved by the thought that this was not the truth exactly, and not courageous to the covenant of marriage, she retracted: "I should say yes, in part."

Her father looked at her keenly, rather sorrowfully, as he replied: "I thought my children had been brought up—well—it's useless to go into that. You should know that your husband has been speculating in stocks, has been speculating wildly, and stands responsible to-day for nearly a hundred thousand dollars more than he can possibly pay. So he has come to me——" he added wearily, as if it were not the first time that he had had to bear heavy burdens of others' folly.

"Did Barton go to you?" she flashed out scornfully.

"What else was there for him to do?" her father answered, as Barton did not take the chance to reply. "Your husband cannot be disgraced."

She had it on her lips to say "But he is disgraced." It would be well later, however, not to have said that.

"I am disappointed," the old man continued reproachfully. "I was so proud of you."

She was glad to see that Barton winced at the tense of the verb. "Now, is this all?"

Barton nodded. The old man took his leave with a final order: "Come to my office to-morrow morning."

Her first words, when they were alone, were: "How could you say all? Where is Willie Pond's money?"

"I haven't it," Barton replied morosely. "I am not responsible for all the idiots and the unfortunates, am I?"

"What will they do?"

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Dear," she went on more tenderly, "why did you go to father? Couldn't we have managed it?"

"A hundred thousand—little you know!"

She saw that it would be useless to enter upon the deeper

(Continued on Page 678)

Digitized by Google

MEN AND WOMEN
Close-Range Studies

Seumas MacManus, Schoolmaster

Until two years ago Seumas MacManus, the Irish story-teller, taught a little parish school—the same at which he had himself gathered his knowledge—among the Donegal Mountains. Another young schoolmaster, and a schoolmate, James Sweeney, tells of Mr. MacManus' eventful step when he decided to forsake his school and turn to literature.

"I believe he locked the school door for the last time with a sigh of regret," writes Mr. Sweeney. "There were many ties to attach him to the place. It was the school where many of his careless, happy boyhood hours were spent, where his youthful companionships had been formed and cemented by pleasant remembrances, and mayhap where his youthful ambitions first sprung into existence. There were boys whose jacket sleeves were rubbed stealthily across their eyes that day when he announced his intention of leaving them. Seumas MacManus gained his appointment to this school as he forced his way into the ranks of literature—by open competition. I think there were upward of eight candidates for the position. I was one myself, and 'Mac,' though the youngest, I believe, left us far behind. He has left us farther behind since.

"When he resigned this appointment about two years ago the parish and surrounding districts were thrown into such a state of alarm as would prevail in London if Joe Chamberlain should relinquish his office at the present juncture. People could not believe that any man in his proper senses would thus commit professional suicide. It was incomprehensible that any man of mature judgment should throw away the fabulous salary of sixty pounds a year!

"Quite easy was the transition to the explanation that he was asked by his employers to resign because he persisted in writing lying stories for the papers, and poetry. It then got into the county paper and thence into everybody's mouth that, owing to the part he had taken in the commemoration of the Irish Rebellion of '98, the Education Department had called upon him to retire from office. So the people were loud and vehement in their indignation when they discovered 'the Masther was broke.' With all the force and energy of their honest, kindly hearts they sympathized with him in his misfortune, just as they had deplored his rashness when he had announced that he was going to publish a book.

"There were a few who maintained that 'Mac's' resignation was in no way forced—that it was a voluntary act of his own. Jemmy Friel, the roadmaker, was one of this minority.

"'It's my opinion,' said Jemmy, leaning on the shovel and addressing himself to Ned Simm and Mick Curley, 'it's my opinion that the masther's not the soart iv a boy to do sich a thing as design if he didn't take himself. If he wanted to houl' on to the taichin' he wudn't design for all the boords in Dublin. He'd hev it thried in Parliamint beyant first.'"

WILLIAM MACMANUS

Edwin Emerson's Expensive Correspondence

When a New York lyceum manager recently talked to Edwin Emerson, Jr., about his war experiences as a correspondent, Rough Rider, and member of General Wheeler's staff, he said, "Emerson, I'd like to have you give a course of lectures for me, but I suppose you have made so much out of the war that you cannot be touched by an ordinary offer."

"Yes," said Emerson, "I made one dollar out of the war, and I did it on one hundred cents. I started out for a newspaper with an artist, and we had $100 between us. We joined Sampson's fleet at Key West, and it was so long waiting for orders that we used all our money up and finally we had only one dollar left. My friend had a hat I liked, and I bought it from him and gave him the dollar. Just then orders came for the fleet to move and we had to be on board the transports at once. We owed the landlord a large bill, and we tossed pennies to see who should converse with him about the non-payment of it. It came to me, and I talked with him. He said he was a patriot and believed we were also, and we could pay when we came back. Meanwhile our cables for money were not answered. We left about five dollars' worth of laundry with our host and joined the fleet. We stopped to coal at Cape Haytian, and I got off and sent forty dollars' worth of cablegrams and gave my name as security. Then I went on to Puerto Rico, where I raised some money on a draft. I did Puerto Rico as a German peasant, and worked my way to San Juan and back to the coast. There I sailed out in a small boat which I lifted. I was picked up by a passing steamer from Santa Cruz, and at that time I had forty cents left. The passengers, who were mostly Americans, made up a purse and fairly hauled me from the steerage into the first cabin. I arrived in Brooklyn penniless, and I had to slip past the ferryman to get over to New York. I made at once for the office of my paper, expecting to be met like a conquering hero and to be feted and given several dinners, not to say a life position by the editor. Nobody noticed me, and I said to the old door-boy:

"'Say, that's a nice way they have here of treating a war correspondent, isn't it?'

"'Didn't you know,' he said, 'that the paper has failed?'

"'Failed!' said I, and wandered, or rather groped, out into the street. 'Yes,' he explained, 'and they cabled you to Key West fifteen minutes after you left not to go to the front.'

"I rushed uptown and I met a friend who said: 'Say, Emerson, where has your wife moved to? She was to bring us a poem last week, and she neither wrote nor called. We sent to her house and they said there that she had moved.'

"I replied not a word, but finally found out where my father-in-law was and walked to his place. There I saw my wife. After I told her what straits I was in she said: 'I have been very thrifty, and I have saved all your salary checks for months back—ever since you left. Here they are, a present for you.'

"Of course the checks were worthless. I had to write for months afterward and give every cent I earned to the cable people, who had taken up my drafts, but, still, perhaps it's worth while to have done the war on a dollar."

PHOTO BY BRADFORD & VAN BRUNT, NEW YORK

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX

A Change of Bliss

The Rev. Dr. William Bliss, of Pasadena, California, is the head of a new school of political science, of which the chief features are direct legislation, and the initiative and referendum. His leading followers are college men and pedagogues. One of them said lately to a Los Angeles woman:

"I do not understand why Doctor Bliss' friends should be exclusively learned men, especially scientists."

"Why, Tom Moore explained that long ago," was her quick answer. "'They have turned from the bliss of science to take up the science of Bliss.'"

Lord Wolseley in America

It is not generally known that Lord Wolseley, Commander-in-Chief of the British Army, visited the ranks of both the Union and Confederate Armies of this country during the Civil War. It was in 1863. He was then a Lieutenant-Colonel and was serving with his regiment in Canada. He received permission to come to the States and made a personal inspection of the warring American troops. After visiting Washington, he was allowed to cross the lines, and he entered the territory occupied by General Lee. It was there that he met Colonel John J. Garnett, of New York, one of the best-known survivors of the Civil War.

"I had been out on picket duty," said Colonel Garnett the other day, "when Colonel Wolseley made his appearance. My troops were not in the best of condition, but we were proud and glad to see him, and we made him feel as much at home as our circumstances would permit. The next day I saw him at General Lee's headquarters and was detailed to accompany him through the ranks. The following day we had an inspection of all the troops available, and Colonel Wolseley was among Lee's staff as the men marched by. He was a tall, soldierly man in the early prime of life, vigorous, strong and pleasant-mannered. He took in everything that there was to be seen, and his comments were marked with rare common sense and military judgment. Our men, as I said, were not in the best of condition, but the Colonel did not humiliate us by calling our attention to the fact. After he had seen all that he cared about, he returned North and rejoined his command. Meantime the Colonel and I had struck up a more than ordinary intimacy, and after the war, and even during the struggle, we began a correspondence which lasts to this day.

"The next time I saw him was in London, in 1887, on the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee. We had renewed our old acquaintanceship, and I rode with him as a member of his staff. When we had ridden past Her Majesty and had taken our stand to watch the review of that part of the British Army on duty in the capital, Lord Wolseley turned to me and said:

"'Colonel, there isn't much resemblance between these soldiers and those we reviewed together down in Virginia.'

"'No,' I answered; 'but I don't think they can fight any harder than our boys could and did.'

"'I hope to Heaven,' answered His Lordship piously, 'that they never will have any need to.'"

President Steyn's Cyrano Courtship

President Steyn, of the Orange Free State, took for a wife Miss Fraser, who was the belle of Bloemfontein. This was many years ago, when the great Africander was a poor, struggling law student and clerk. Miss Fraser's parents were very proud and well-to-do, and did not favor the match. Steyn made love and wrote love letters by proxy, choosing a prominent young farmer as the go-between. Every day, sometimes twice a day, Miss Fraser and the farmer would take long walks and rides together. Bloemfontein made up its mind that Steyn had been cut out, when the law student returned from Europe where he had taken his degree. Gossip rose to fever heat when the news came that Steyn had called upon the farmer. Everybody was certain that a duel was about to come off. A short time passed in which every one was on the qui vive. Disappointment was nothing to the feeling which was created when, instead of a duel, there was the wedding of Steyn and Miss Fraser, with the farmer as the first groomsman.

COPYRIGHT BY ELLIOTT & FRY, LONDON

GENERAL LORD WOLSELEY

Digitized by Google

OF THE HOUR of Contemporaries

The New Japanese Minister

Jutaro Komura, the Japanese Minister, has made a most agreeable impression in Washington, not only on his colleagues in the Diplomatic Corps, but on every one who has had the pleasure of meeting him. He is especially popular with newspaper men, to whom he is invariably cordial and frank, appreciating their position, their point of view and their mission better than the majority of diplomatists from the Orient, who are either too confidential or too reserved, and who are constantly getting themselves into hot water, and making themselves unpopular by loud complaints that they have been willfully misrepresented.

Mr. Komura is small in figure, even for a Japanese, slender, frail almost, but wiry, and quick in his movements. He is about forty-five years old. He began his diplomatic career before he had hardly reached his majority, and since that time has been constantly in the service of the State. His early education was received at the Kaisei-Gakko and at the Imperial University at Tokyo. Subsequently he took a degree at Harvard, and remained for a number of years in the United States, fitting himself for an official career in his own country.

As Secretary of Legation at Peking at the time it was known that war between the two great Oriental nations, China and Japan, was inevitable, as Civil Governor of the captured province of Antung, following the war, and as Minister resident in Korea, Mr. Komura made a record which made him a potent factor in the politics of the Flowery Kingdom. He resigned the position of Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs to accept the appointment at Washington.

Japan will follow the example of other nations who have raised their representatives to the rank of Ambassador, and ultimately the Japanese Minister will be promoted to the highest diplomatic rank.

Hambourg and the Conductor

All great pianists are more or less eccentric as to their hair, and the latest prodigy, Mark Hambourg, a protégé of Paderewski who came to this country in October last, is no exception to the rule. He is of medium height, muscular, smooth-shaven, and has a football growth of hair that enables him to wear a hat several sizes too large for him. During his brief but brilliant experience in Europe and Australia the young player was successful, artistically, professionally and pecuniarily, to a high degree; therefore when he came to America he was led to believe that his name was one to conjure with. And his first experience on an American railroad did much to secure him in this belief. It was on a sleeping car over a rough stretch of road full of curves and windings, and the car's unsteady motion made walking a hazardous task. After being thrown from one side of the aisle to the other he sought out the porter.

"Say," said he in his broken English, "tell your conductor that he must go slower around these corners or I shall not be able to appear to my audience to-morrow."

"What's the matter with the car?" asked the porter.

"It goes too fast around the corners. It jolts me all to pieces. I am Mark Hambourg, pianist, and I must play to-morrow. Tell him all I say and waste no time."

Then the player crept back to his section, and the porter returned to his boots, whistling meantime an unclassical, rag-time air, and the incident, so far as he was concerned, was dropped. But it so happened that within five minutes the train slowed up at a junction where it waited two hours for a Southern connection, and in the stillness of the night the pianist composed himself to slumber, a pleasant smile resting on his face. His command had been obeyed.

COPYRIGHT BY GEBBARD & VAN BRUNT, NEW YORK

MARK HAMBOURG

COPYRIGHT BY ARNÉ DUPONT, NEW YORK

MADAME LILLI LEHMANN

It was after Hambourg's first concert in New York that a friend said to him: "Didn't I tell you so? What a fine audience you had. I told you you could just pick up money in the streets here. New York is full of it."

The musician smiled and agreed with him. The next day he took a street-car ride and paid his fare with a crisp new dollar bill, one of those he had picked up in the concert hall. He was handed in change a lead fifty-cent piece, a defaced quarter, a crooked ten-cent piece, and a freshly minted dime. On his way home he endeavored to pass some of the money, but without success. When he met his friend in the evening he showed him the change and said:

"What do you think of it?"

"Where did you get it?" was the reply.

"In a street car."

"Well, I told you you could pick up money in the streets, but I didn't say anything about street cars."

Madame Lehmann's Two Fads

The interest which Madame Lilli Lehmann, the grand opera prima donna, has taken in saving the song birds of America has given a special significance to her appearance in society. Not long ago a committee of ladies called upon her in New York and asked her to sing for their pet charity.

"I will do so upon one condition," was the reply.

"What is that?"

"It is that you promise me never again to wear 'song-birds' feathers upon your hats."

The promise was given and Madame Lehmann sang.

A member of one of the companies in which Madame Lehmann traveled last year says that the singer's sentimentality for animals often caused the stage hands much annoyance. She is an ardent vegetarian, and will partake of no animal food. She does not believe in stimulants, and at dinner always turns down her glass. It is customary for refreshments of some sort to be passed around behind the scenes before and during an operatic performance. One evening an old stage hand asked Madame Lehmann if she would have some wine.

"Madame Patti sang Lucia on roast chicken and this wine," said he.

"Indeed?" replied Madame Lehmann; "well, I sing Brunhilde on a plate of rice and water."

Mr. Bryant's Venturesome Slide

Henry G. Bryant, one of the two American Vice-Presidents of the Geographical Association which met in Berlin last summer, has returned to this country. Mr. Bryant has not only been in the Arctic regions with one of the Peary Auxiliary Expeditions, but he has done considerable exploring on his own account. He discovered the great falls of Labrador, and climbed almost to the top of Mount St. Elias. His most recent experience was in the Canadian Rockies. He had two men with him and a pack-train. Taking one of his comrades, he climbed for several days above the clouds toward the peak of the highest mountain in the range. They were fully ten thousand feet above sea-level when they were driven back by a storm. At their feet lay a névé basin, which is the beginning of a glacier, and in plain English is a hole in the frozen snow, with almost perpendicular sides, extending downward hundreds of feet. The two men were tied together with a rope. Bryant, being the heavier, brought up the procession. After they had struggled down for several hours with the utmost care, digging steps in the wall with their picks, his companion lost his foothold, and they started on a wild slide for the bottom. Just as each man had given up all hope, the foremost one caught his ice ax in a protruding rock and they were brought up with a short jerk. It seemed almost miraculous. After they had got their breath Mr. Bryant remarked coolly:

"Well, no bones are broken, fortunately. Let's go on."

And they toiled for another two hours until every particle of strength was exhausted. There were still four hundred feet of space to cover before the bottom was reached.

"Suppose we slide: it can't any more than kill us."

Making extemporized sleds of their superfluous clothing, they let loose all hold and darted into space. In a few seconds they brought up at the bottom in a soft snow-bank.

"Why didn't we think of that before?" said Bryant. "It wasn't much trouble getting down here."

"It isn't the getting down here I'm thinking about," returned his companion. "It's the getting back."

The Man Who Would Not Meet the Prince

Probably the only American of distinction who was in New York at the time and declined to meet the Prince of Wales when he visited America before the Civil War, did meet him afterward, and has not been forgotten by England's future King since. It is an odd story. The American is Colonel Ethan Allen, author, financier, diplomat and club man. Allen was about the Prince's age, a law student at the New York University. He refused to attend any of the functions.

"If the Prince wants to see me let him call on me," he said.

His friends laughed. But the Prince did call upon Allen the first week he was here. It was in the old University building in Washington Square, where young Allen had shut himself up for study. That same day the Chancellor was to receive the Prince in another part of the building.

The reception hour came, and Allen sat in his solitude. Before long, he heard a loud knocking and a voice:

"Open this door. Who's in here?"

He opened the door and there stood Chancellor Ferris, and on his arm was the Prince. They evidently felt it a relief to be out of the jam. The members of the party were advanced in years, except Mr. Allen and the Prince, and the two boys soon came together.

"I'm glad to know you, sir," the Prince said.

"Thank you, sir," replied Mr. Allen.

The two then took seats together, and talked for more than an hour. When they parted the Prince said:

"I don't know when I have had such a good time. Will you call upon me at my hotel?"

"No," was the prompt reply; "I haven't the time."

The Prince looked astonished but went on: "Well, if you haven't time now, Mr. Allen, perhaps you may have time when you visit England. At any rate, don't forget me."

Though Colonel Allen has visited England many times, he has never availed himself of this invitation, but last year when the Prince received a representative of the Sons of the American Revolution he said: "I was looking over an old diary, and I came across the strangest incident that happened to me during my American visit. It was about a man named Allen who refused to meet me. Do you know him? I'd like to meet that man again."

But they haven't met yet.

PHOTO BY FREDRICKS, NEW YORK

ETHAN ALLEN

Digitized by Google

Bohemian Days in San Francisco

By Bret Harte

Copyright, 1900, by Bret Harte. Copyright in Great Britain

AT THE time of these earlier impressions the Chinese had not yet become the recognized factors in the domestic and business economy of the city which they had come to be when I returned from the mines three years later. Yet they were even then a more remarkable and picturesque contrast to the bustling, breathless and brand-new life of San Francisco than the Spaniard. The latter seldom flaunted his faded dignity in the principal thoroughfares. "John" was to be met everywhere. It was a common thing to see a long file of sampan coolies carrying their baskets slung between them, on poles, jostling a modern, well-dressed crowd in Montgomery Street, or to get a whiff of their burned punk in the side streets; while the road leading to their temporary burial-ground at Lone Mountain was littered with slips of colored paper scattered from their funerals. They brought an atmosphere of the Arabian Nights into the hard, modern civilization; their shops—not always confined at that time to a Chinese Quarter—were replicas of the bazaars of Canton and Peking, with their quaint display of little dishes on which tit-bits of food delicacies were exposed for sale, all of the dimensions and unreality of a doll's kitchen or a child's housekeeping.

They were a revelation to the Eastern immigrant, whose preconceived ideas of them were borrowed from the ballet or pantomime; they did not wear scalloped drawers, and hats with jingling bells on their points, nor did I ever see them dance with their forefingers vertically extended. They were always neatly dressed, even the commonest of coolies, and their festive dresses were marvels. As traders they were grave and patient; as servants they were sad and civil, and all were singularly infantine in their natural simplicity. The living representatives of the oldest civilization in the world, they seemed like children. Yet they kept their beliefs and sympathies to themselves, never fraternizing with the fanqui, or foreign devil, or losing their singular racial qualities. They indulged in their own peculiar habits; of their social and inner life San Francisco knew but little and cared less. Even at this early period, and before I came to know them more intimately, I remember an incident of their daring fidelity to their own customs that was accidentally revealed to me. I had become acquainted with a Chinese youth of about my own age, as I imagined—although from mere outward appearance it was generally impossible to judge of a Chinaman's age between the limits of seventeen and forty years—and he had, in a burst of confidence, taken me to see some characteristic sights in a Chinese warehouse within a stone's throw of the Plaza. I was struck by the singular circumstance that while the warehouse was an erection of wood in the ordinary hasty Californian style, there were certain brick and stone divisions in its interior, like small rooms or closets, evidently added by the Chinamen tenants. My companion stopped before a long, very narrow entrance, a mere longitudinal slit in the brick wall, and with a wink of infantine deviltry motioned me to look inside. I did so and saw a room, really a cell, of fair height but scarcely six feet square, and barely able to contain a rude, slanting couch of stone covered with matting, on which lay, at a painful angle, a richly dressed Chinaman. A single glance at his dull, staring, abstracted eyes and half-open mouth showed me he was in an opium trance. This was not in itself a novel sight, and I was moving away when I was suddenly startled by the appearance of his hands, which were stretched helplessly before him on his body and at first sight seemed to be in a kind of wicker cage.

I then saw that his finger-nails were seven or eight inches long and were supported by bamboo splints. Indeed, they were no longer human nails, but twisted and distorted quills, giving him the appearance of having gigantic claws. "Velly big Chinaman," whispered my cheerful friend; "first-chop man—high classee—no can washee—no can eat—no dlinke, no catchee him own glub allee same nothee man—China boy must catchee glub for him, allee time! Oh! him first-chopman—you bettee!"

I had heard of this singular custom of indicating caste before, and was amazed and disgusted, but I was not prepared for what followed. My companion, evidently thinking he had impressed me, grew more reckless as showman and, saying to me, "Now me showee you one funny thing—heap makee you laugh," led me hurriedly across a little courtyard swarming with chickens and rabbits, when he stopped before another inclosure. Suddenly brushing past an astonished Chinaman who seemed to be standing guard, he thrust me into the inclosure in front of a most extraordinary object. It was a Chinaman wearing a huge, square, wooden frame fastened around his neck like a collar, and fitting so tightly and rigidly that the flesh rose in puffy weals around his cheeks. He was chained to a post, although it was as impossible for him to have escaped with his wooden cage through the narrow doorway as it was for him to lie down and rest in it. Yet I am bound to say that his eyes and face expressed nothing but apathy, and there was no appeal to the sympathy of the stranger. My companion said hurriedly:

"Velly bad man; steelee heap from Chinamen," and then, apparently alarmed at his own indiscreet intrusion, hustled me away as quickly as possible amid a shrill cackling of protestation from a few of his own countrymen who had joined the one who was keeping guard. In another moment we were in the street again—scarce a step from the Plaza, in the full light of Western civilization—not a stone's throw from the Courts of Justice.

My companion took to his heels and left me standing there bewildered and indignant. I could not rest until I had told my story, but without betraying my companion, to an elder acquaintance, who laid the facts before the police authorities. I had expected to be closely cross-examined—to be doubted—to be disbelieved. To my surprise, I was told that the police had already cognizance of similar cases of illegal and barbarous punishments, but that the victims themselves refused to testify against their countrymen—and it was impossible to convict or even to identify them. "A white man can't tell one Chinese from another, and there are always a dozen of 'em to swear that the man you've got isn't the one." I was startled to reflect that I, too, could not have conscientiously sworn to either jailer or the tortured prisoner—or perhaps even to my cheerful companion. The police on some pretext made a raid upon the premises a day or two afterward, but without result. I wondered if they had caught sight of the high-class first-chop individual with the helplessly outstretched fingers, as that story I had kept to myself.

DRAWN BY GUSTAVE VERBEEK

—AN ACCIDENT WHICH WAS FOLLOWED BY THE PROMPT BREAKING OF ANOTHER BY THE NEOPHYTE

But these barbaric vestiges in John Chinaman's habits did not affect his relations with the San Franciscans. He was singularly peaceful, docile and harmless as a servant, and, with rare exceptions, honest and temperate. If he sometimes matched cunning with cunning it was the flattery of imitation. He did most of the menial work of San Francisco and did it cleanly. Except that he exhaled a peculiar druglike odor, he was not personally offensive in domestic contact, and by virtue of being the recognized laundryman of the whole community his own blouses were always freshly washed and ironed. His conversational reserve arose, not from his having to deal with an unfamiliar language—for he had picked up a picturesque and varied vocabulary with ease—but from his natural temperament. He was devoid of curiosity, and utterly unimpressed by anything but the purely business concerns of those he served. Domestic secrets were safe with him: his indifference to your thoughts, actions and feelings had all the contempt which his three thousand years of history and his innate belief in your inferiority seemed to justify. He was blind and deaf in your household because you didn't interest him in the least. It was said that a gentleman who wished to test his impassiveness arranged with his wife to come home one day and, in the hearing of his Chinese waiter—who was more than usually intelligent—to disclose with well-simulated emotion the details of a murder he had just committed. He did so. The Chinaman heard it without a sign of horror or attention even to the lifting of an eyelid, but continued his duties unconcerned. Unfortunately, the gentleman, in order to increase the horror of the situation, added that now there was nothing left for him but to cut his throat. At this John quietly left the room. The gentleman was delighted at the success of his ruse until the door reopened and John reappeared with his master's razor, which he quietly slipped—as if it had been a forgotten fork—beside his master's plate and calmly resumed his serving. I have always considered this story to be quite as improbable as it was inartistic, from its tacit admission of a certain interest on the part of the Chinaman. I never knew one who would have been sufficiently concerned to go for the razor.

His taciturnity and reticence may have been confounded with rudeness of address—although he was always civil enough. "I see you have listened to me and done exactly what I told you," said a lady commending some performance of her servant after a previous lengthy lecture; "that's very nice." "Yes," said John calmly, "you talkee allee time; talkee allee too much." "I always find Ling very polite," said another lady, speaking of her cook, "but I wish he did not always say to me, 'Good night, John,' in a high falsetto voice." She had not recognized the fact that he was simply repeating her own salutation with his marvelous instinct of relentless imitation, even as to voice. I hesitate to record the endless stories of his misapplication of that faculty which were then current, from the one of the laundryman who removed the buttons from the shirts that were sent to him to wash that they might agree with the condition of the one offered him as a pattern for "doing up," to that of the unfortunate employer who, while showing John how to handle valuable china carefully, had the misfortune to drop a plate himself—an accident which was followed by the prompt breaking of another by the neophyte, with the addition of "Oh, hellee!" in humble imitation of his master. I have spoken of his general cleanliness; I am reminded of one or two exceptions which I think, however, were errors of zeal. His manner of sprinkling clothes in preparing them for ironing was peculiar. He would fill his mouth with perfectly pure water from a glass beside him, and then by one dexterous movement of his lips in a prolonged expiration squirt the water in an almost invisible misty shower on the article before him. Shocking as this was at first to the sensibilities of many American employers, it was finally accepted, and even commended. It was some time after this that the mistress of a household, admiring the deft way in which her cook had spread a white sauce on certain dishes, was cheerfully informed that the method was "allee same."

His recreations at that time were chiefly gambling, for the Chinese theatre wherein he later produced his plays (which lasted for several months and comprised the events of a whole dynasty) was not yet built. But he had one or two companies of jugglers who occasionally performed also at American theatres. I remember a singular incident which attended the début of a newly arrived company. It seemed that the company had been taken on their Chinese reputation solely, and there had been no previous rehearsal before the American stage manager. The theatre was filled with an audience of decorous and respectable San Franciscans of both sexes. It was suddenly emptied in the middle of the performance; the curtain came down with an alarmed and blushing manager apologizing to deserted benches, and the show abruptly terminated. Exactly what had 'sappened never appeared in the public papers nor in the published apology of the manager. It afforded a few days' mirth for wicked San Francisco, and it was epigrammatically summed up in the remark that "the next morning no woman could be found in San Francisco who was at that performance, and no man who was not." Yet it was alleged even by John's worst detractors that he was innocent of any intended offense. Equally innocent but perhaps more morally instructive was an incident that brought his career as a singularly successful

---

Editor's Note—This is the second of two papers on Bohemian Days in San Francisco.

Digitized by Google

physician to a disastrous close. An ordinary native Chinese doctor, practicing entirely among his own countrymen, was reputed to have made extraordinary cures with two or three American patients. With no other advertising than this, and apparently no other inducement offered to the public than what their curiosity suggested, he was presently besieged by hopeful and eager sufferers. Hundreds of patients were turned away from his crowded doors. Two interpreters sat, day and night, translating the ills of ailing San Francisco to this medical oracle and dispensing his prescriptions—usually small powders—in exchange for current coin. In vain the regular practitioners pointed out that the Chinese possessed no superior medical knowledge, and that their religion, which proscribed dissection and autopsies, naturally limited their understanding of the body into which they put their drugs. Finally they prevailed upon an eminent Chinese authority to give them a list of the remedies generally used in the Chinese pharmacopœia, and this was privately circulated. For obvious reasons I may not repeat it here. But it was summed up—again after the usual Californian epigrammatic style—by the remark that "whatever were the comparative merits of Chinese and American practice, a simple perusal of the list would prove that the Chinese were capable of producing the most powerful emetic known." The craze subsided in a single day; the interpreters and their oracle vanished; the Chinese doctors' signs, which had multiplied, disappeared, and San Francisco awoke cured of its madness, at the cost of some thousand dollars.

My Bohemian wanderings were confined to the limits of the city for the very good reason that there was little elsewhere to go. San Francisco was then bounded on one side by the monotonously restless waters of the bay and on the other by a stretch of equally restless and monotonously shifting sand dunes as far as the Pacific shore. Two roads penetrated this waste: one to Lone Mountain—the cemetery; the other to the Cliff House—happily described as "an eight-mile drive with a cocktail at the end of it." Nor was the humor entirely confined to this felicitous description. The Cliff House itself, half restaurant, half drinking saloon, fronting the ocean and the Seal Rock where disporting seals were the chief object of interest, had its own peculiar symbol. The decanters, wine-glasses and tumblers at the bar were all engraved in the old English script, with the legal initials "L. S." (Locus Sigilli)—"the place of the seal."

On the other hand, Lone Mountain, a dreary promontory giving upon the Golden Gate and its striking sunsets, had little to soften its weird suggestiveness. As the common goal of the successful and unsuccessful, the carved and lettered shaft of the man who had made a name, and the staring blank headboard of the man who had none, climbed the sandy slopes together. I have seen the funerals of the respectable citizen who had died peacefully in his bed, and the notorious desperado who had died "with his boots on," followed by an equally impressive cortège of sorrowing friends, and often the selfsame priest. But more awful than its barren loneliness was the utter absence of peacefulness and rest in this dismal promontory. By some wicked irony of its situation and climate it was the personification of unrest and change. The incessant trade winds carried its loose sands hither and thither, uncovering the decaying coffins of early pioneers, to bury the wreaths and flowers, laid on a grave of to-day, under their obliterating waves. No tree to shade them from the glaring sky above could live in those winds, no turf would lie there to resist the encroaching sand below. The dead were harried and hustled even in their graves by the persistent sun, the unremitting wind and the unceasing sea. The departing mourner saw the contour of the very mountain itself change with the shifting dunes as he passed, and his last look beyond rested on the hurrying, eager waves forever hastening to the Golden Gate.

If I were asked to say what one thing impressed me as the dominant and characteristic note of San Francisco, I should say it was this untiring presence of sun and wind and sea. They typified, even if they were not, as I sometimes fancied, the actual incentive to the fierce, restless life of the city. I could not think of San Francisco without the trade winds; I could not imagine its strange, incongruous multigenerous procession marching to any other music. They were always there in my youthful recollections; they were there in my more youthful dreams of the past as the mysterious vientes generales that blew the Philippine galleons home.

For six months they blew from the northwest, for six months from the southwest with unvarying persistency. They were there every morning, glittering in the equally persistent sunlight to chase the San Franciscan from his slumber; they were there at midday to stir his pulses with their beat; they were there again at night to hurry him through the bleak and flaring gas-lit streets to bed. They left their mark on every windward street or fence or gable, on the outlying sand dunes; they lashed the slow coasters home, and hurried them to sea again; they whipped the bay into turbulence on their way to Contra Costa, whose level shoreland oaks they had trimmed to windward as cleanly and sharply as with a pruning-shears. Untiring themselves, they allowed no laggards; they drove the San Franciscan from the wall against which he would have leaned, from the scant shade in which at noontide he might have rested. They turned his smallest fires into conflagrations, and kept him ever alert, watchful and eager. In return, they scavenged his city and held it clean and wholesome; in summer they brought him the soft sea fog for a few hours to soothe his abraded surfaces; in winter they brought the rains and dashed the whole coast-line with flowers, and the staring sky above it with soft, unwonted clouds. They were always there—strong, vigilant, relentless, material, unyielding, triumphant.

The FIRESHIP

By George Gibbs

AMONG the young officers of Commodore Preble's squadron before Tripoli there was a tall, dark, melancholy looking fellow of about twenty-five. His name was Richard Somers, and his command was the Nautilus, a little schooner of twelve guns and a hundred men. He had been, with Decatur and Stewart, a junior officer on Commodore Barry's United States in one of the wars in the last century, and the friendship formed in those early days had been cemented by a score of thrilling adventures.

The difference in their temperaments was marked. Decatur was bold, domineering and impetuous. Somers was quiet, mild, and ever avoided the quarrel which Decatur too often sought. But under the quiet exterior men had found a will like iron and the willingness to dare and do anything that came within the province of his profession.

In the old days on the United States there happened an affair which immediately established his reputation as an officer and a man. At first he was not understood. His brother midshipmen, mistaking the reserve of his manner for weakness, did not hesitate, before they had been aboard with him a month, to take advantage of him in the steerage and on deck in every possible way. Somers stood it for a while in silence. As the weeks went by and the bantering continued, Somers became more and more quiet and self-contained.

—SOMERS SAID QUIETLY: "I ASK FOR NO FUSE AT ALL"

Decatur, ever humorous and mischief-making, had himself been one of the worst to chaff his comrade, but he knew what Somers' silence meant, and he desisted.

Somers went about his duties quietly, never giving a sign that there was anything upon his mind until the day before coming into port. Then he went to Decatur and said:

"Stephen, to-morrow I want you to go ashore with me, for I am going to meet three men."

The next afternoon a cutter containing Somers, Decatur and three midshipmen with their seconds went ashore and found a secluded spot upon the beach where they would be free from interference. Somers had challenged all three to fight, and was to take them in succession.

In the first two duels Somers received two shots in the body. The latter caused him to sink upon the sand, as though dangerously hurt; but he rallied quickly and, seeing that the third midshipman was standing waiting to see if the battle could be continued, tried to struggle to his feet. He found he could not get up, and Decatur offered to take his place and receive the fire of the third midshipman. But Somers, though suffering greatly, was not to be deterred, and bade Decatur prop him up in a sitting posture, in which position he exchanged shots with the third man. Fortunately none of the injuries resulted fatally, and in a few weeks Somers was on deck again. He went about his duties as before, but never after that did they call him a milksop.

It was Somers who led one division of the gunboats to attack the Tripolitan fleet while Decatur was leading the other. Finding that he could not reach them by the eastern entrance, he sailed into the northern entrance of the harbor, and, single-handed, boldly sent his little vessel into the midst of five of the enemy. His gunboat was smaller than any one of those of his adversaries, but so well was his long gun served and so true was the fire of his musketry that not one of them succeeded in getting alongside of him to board.

They were all bearing straight down upon the rocks, and Somers could not spare enough men from the guns to man his sweeps. But Preble, on the Constitution, saw his danger and, coming up in time, sent a broadside of grape among the pirates, who got out their sweeps and retreated when one united attack would have made the victory theirs.

As they drew off, instead of returning to the Constitution, as Preble wished, Somers pursued them until within less than a cable's length of a twelve-gun battery, which had not fired before for fear of damaging the fleeing Tripolitans. When she opened fire at this close range the destruction of Somers' valiant little vessel seemed inevitable; but by a lucky chance a bombard exploded in the battery, blew up the platform, and drove the Tripolitans to cover.

While these many attacks were being made upon the gunboats and batteries, the Intrepid, in which Decatur had recaptured and destroyed the Philadelphia, was being rapidly prepared as a fireship. The plan was to load her with a hundred barrels of powder in bulk, with bags of grape and solid shot, and, under cover of the night, explode her in the midst of the Tripolitan war vessels. Somers, who had been frequently in the harbor of Tripoli, and knew its reefs and rocks so well that he could readily thread his way through the narrow channels, asked for the command.

It was an honor that half a dozen other men sought, and not until the old Commodore had weighed the chances fully did he at last agree to let Somers go. Before consenting, Preble repeatedly warned the young officer of the desperate character of the work, and told him that on account of the Napoleonic wars the Tripolitans were short of ammunition, and that so much powder must not fall into the hands of the enemy. But Somers needed no warning. A day or two afterward, when the preparations were nearly completed, Preble and some other officers were trying a fuse in the cabin of the Constitution; one of the officers, watch in hand, ventured the opinion that it burned too long, and might enable the enemy to put it out before it exploded the magazine. Hearing this, Somers said quietly:

"I ask for no fuse at all."

When volunteers were called for, the desperateness of the enterprise was fully explained, but the crew of the Nautilus, Somers' own vessel, stepped forward to a man. Midshipman Henry Wadsworth (an uncle of the poet Longfellow) was chosen as second in command. Midshipman Joseph Israel, having vainly pleaded with Somers to be allowed to go, at the last moment smuggled himself aboard the Intrepid, and, when discovered, Somers had not the heart to send him back.

As soon as the night fell the Intrepid cast off her lines and went slowly up toward the harbor. The Argus, Vixen and the Nautilus followed her, and shortly afterward Stewart, on the Siren, became so anxious that he followed, too. A haze that had come up when the sun went down hung heavily over the water, and soon the lines of the fireship became a mere gray blur against the dark coast-line beyond.

Midshipman Ridgley, on the Nautilus, by the aid of a powerful night-glass aloft, managed to follow her until she got well within the harbor, and then she vanished. The suspense soon became almost unbearable, for not a shot had been fired, and not a sound came from the direction in which she had gone. About nine o'clock a half-dozen cannon shots could be plainly heard, and even the knowledge that she had been discovered and was being fired on was a relief from the awful silence. About ten o'clock Stewart was standing at the gangway of the Siren with Lieutenant Carrol, when the latter, craning his neck out into the night, suddenly exclaimed, "Look! See the light!"

Away up the harbor Stewart saw a speck of light, as if from a lantern which moved rapidly as though it were being carried by some one running along a deck. Then it paused and disappeared from view. In a second a tremendous flame shot up hundreds of feet into the air, and the glare of it was so intense that it seemed close aboard. The flash and shock were so stupendous that the guardships, though far out to sea, trembled and shivered.

That was all. The officers and the men looked at one another in mute horror. Could anything have lived in the area of that dreadful explosion? The tension upon the men of the little fleet was almost at the breaking point.

The vessels beat to and fro between the harbor entrances, firing rockets and guns for the guidance of possible fugitives. All night the fleet kept vigil, but not a shot, a voice or even a splash came out from the harbor.

With the first streaks of dawn the Americans were aloft with their glasses. On the rocks at the northern entrance through which the Intrepid had passed they saw a mast and fragments of vessels. One of the enemy's largest gunboats had disappeared, and two others were so badly shattered that they lay upon the shore for repairs.

The details of the occurrence were never actually known, but it is thought that Somers, being laid aboard by three gunboats before actually in the midst of the shipping, and feeling himself overpowered, fired his magazine and destroyed himself and his own men in his avowed purpose not to be taken by the enemy.

Thus died Richard Somers, Henry Wadsworth, the Midshipman, Joseph Israel, and ten American seamen, whose names have been inscribed on the Navy's roll of fame.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

421 TO 427 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA

January 27, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription

5 Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

Judging a Flock by the Black Sheep

WE ARE all prone to judge of a movement by the character of certain individuals identified with it. If we believe in the person, the movement is good; if we distrust him, it is bad. The church is good or bad as we esteem or distrust one of its members. A Sunday-school Superintendent falls. At once the church is held responsible and suffers a loss of respect and confidence. A walking delegate makes a mistake or selfishly uses his power for his own ends; and the labor organization stands condemned in the eyes of the critic. A handful of selfish and corrupt politicians secure control of the party machinery, and at once the whole party is regarded as corrupt and selfish. How often do we find a family enjoying an unpleasant notoriety and reputation because of one black sheep in its fold?

We must not forget that "to err is human"; that there are exceptions to all rules; that the same bush which brings forth the rose brings forth the thorn. It is unfair and unjust to judge a body by a single member. It is the same as arguing from a particular premise to a general conclusion. It is false logic. Is the Revolutionary Army to be judged by Benedict Arnold, or by the hundreds of thousands of brave men unnamed and unsung who patiently and heroically fought and suffered at Lexington, at Valley Forge, at Yorktown? Are we to know the Christian Church by the weak, fallen elder and Sunday-school Superintendent, or by the millions of sincere and faithful adherents who love God and strive to obey His commandments? These questions answer themselves.

There is, however, a reciprocal view: the greater includes the less. We are able to know the greater through the lesser, and it is but natural to judge of a movement or an organization by the individuals composing it. This fact lays a heavy responsibility upon every person identified with a movement. Are you a Christian? Then remember that some, in fact many, will judge Christianity by you. Are you a partisan? Then remember that your party will be in all likelihood judged by you. You are a representative, and the body you are identified with gains or suffers as you act wisely or unwisely. "By their fruits ye shall know them." By their members we know and judge organizations.

—CLINTON ROGERS WOODRUFF.

No really good politician is absolutely sure of any election until the votes are counted.

The Poet and the Poet Laureate

AS A RULE, the English demand the worth of their money, and they are very unhappy until they get it. There is no more impressive spectacle in the world than the Britisher who has arrived at a realization of robbery. The fall of the Roman Empire or the eruption of Vesuvius is a dime show in comparison with it. When this Britisher suspects extortion he can rise to a point of grandeur; he storms like a brigade of heroes, and the neighborhood quakes; but when he has to admit defeat he is as a monarch dethroned.

In many respects he is the biggest national figure, and he naturally wants big things—big dinners, big functions, big navies, big armies, big victories, big poems, for after all is said and done a really great poem that celebrates a historical event is about the greatest thing that mankind can offer to immortality; it is the greatest greatness built on a great deed. How many to-day would recall the charge of the Light Brigade—magnificently heroic as it was—if Tennyson had not written his undying lines? The British nation has not retrograded; the British people are not less brave or less noble; they have done some wonderful things since the Six Hundred stormed the hills at Balaklava.

In the line of leadership, England instituted the office of Poet Laureate. It was an evolution of the court singer. At first this gentleman received the munificent sum of twenty-five dollars a year. Then Chaucer held the post for an allowance of wine—judging from his spelling he must have written his poems after absorbing his income—and then, as the office went on, the pay was increased to five hundred dollars a year and an annual tierce of Canary wine from the Royal cellars. However large or small this may be, it is quite certain that Mr. Alfred Austin, who was put into the place because he was a good Tory, is not earning his salary. It may be because it is not the same kind of wine that Tennyson drank. They may have changed the cask on him, giving him an inferior article. At any rate, the British taxpayers do not appear to be getting the worth of their money. It does not seem to be exactly right that a young gentleman from India—one Kipling—has to do all the heroic versifying for the nation without a salary, or even a glass of the stimulant. Yet that is the fact. He is writing more than his share of the English poetry that gains the world's attention. It is true his verses do not always wear Court dress, but as songs that delight the people's souls and exalt the people's pride they have undoubtedly succeeded.

This is not all. Not only does Mr. Kipling get no pay for this service, but where money is given for his patriotic work he turns it over to patriotic uses. For instance, when he wrote those swinging verses about the private soldiers, calling on the people to support their families while they were fighting for the flag, the thousand and odd dollars which the papers paid him were at once turned over to those for whom he plead, and then other dollars followed swiftly from the public until they have passed the hundred thousand mark.

It does not seem exactly right for Poet Austin to be failing in his efforts and drawing the wine and the stipend while Poet Kipling is doing the real work. Still, the people do not complain, and as Poet Kipling is not in want of the necessities of life, and as his copyrights are yielding more than a Prime Minister's salary, it is quite certain that he will not complain either. Of course there are those who would like to see him the Poet Laureate—but fancy Mulvaney drinking Canary wine!

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

Luck is when a man wins a two-dollar prize and spends ten dollars celebrating it.

A Plan to Abolish the Kitchen

THERE are few finer sights in Philadelphia than a great stretch of two-story houses erected by building associations for working-people. But there are also few more striking evidences of poor economy than the erection of a kitchen in the rear of each of these small houses wherein the mistress spoils her good looks, her health and her temper; nor is this the only bad economy about the arrangement. Through our unscientific methods of obtaining heat from coal much more than half the heat is wasted, and by the method of buying supplies in the small fragments needed for each family, the cost is made necessarily very high.

In the two chief cities of Norway, Christiana and Bergen, these difficulties have been entirely overcome. Cooperative kitchens furnish food so good and so cheap that no workman can afford to have cooking done at home. He could as well afford to have his clothes spun and woven at home. At the same time the Norwegians have devised a plan for carrying food to any required distance without loss of heat. Even in Paris the workman has what is called a "Norwegian kitchen," consisting of two thicknesses of tin with felt between. In the inner one his soup is brought to the boiling point in the morning, and it goes on cooking until he takes it out at dinner-time.

Not only the economy of cooking, but the method as well, is capable of great improvement. Science has busied itself with many matters of far less importance to the race than this of converting the ordinary substances of our food into food at once palatable and wholesome. And science is not likely to do much for us so long as the matter is in the hands of women cooks, who naturally look at the problem from the personal side, seeking to please our palates much more than is good for our stomachs.

Bishop Spaulding says he meets every demand for woman suffrage with the retort that women are responsible for the prevalence of dyspepsia among mankind, and thus prove their lack of practical intelligence. But may not this be because we have set them to an employment for which they have no natural fitness? Nor is the tradition that cooks shall be women a venerable or well-established one. On the Egyptian monuments all the cooks are men. In Biblical times women made bread, but did no cooking, that being reserved to the men (Genesis xviii, 6, 7). Even the dish-washing seems to have been claimed as man's prerogative, for a prophet, quoted in the book of Kings, says: "I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish, wiping it, and turning it upside down." And the perfect woman of the book of Proverbs is not described as a cook.

The best modern usage confirms this view of unfitness of women for the kitchen. When a great undertaking in cookery is on hand, as for an army, or a palace, or a big hotel, nobody thinks of calling upon a woman to do it. A man is always taken. For one woman who has made a name for cooking there have been ten men, from Apicius to Soyer. It is only because we have not given the subject thought that we think of cook as a feminine noun.

Cookery must leave the house, as other trades have left it, that the home-maker and house-mistress may be free to do her proper work in it. Once it was crowded with spinning, weaving, chandlering, laundering, and what not, all of which is of the past, or is becoming so. Cookery is the last to go, but go it must, that woman may have the chance to set herself to finer tasks, which call for her tact, her sympathy, her appreciation of the finer shades of existence. She must cease to be cook or boss of the cook, that she may be wife and mother to better purpose.

—ROBERT ELLIS THOMPSON.

To have a good servant there must be a good mistress.

The Cross-Cut Path to Riches

THAT a "rolling stone gathers no moss" has been clearly exemplified by the great majority of those who, within the past year, have returned from the Klondike gold-fields. The tales of riches gained in one day by a few fortunate prospectors and circulated far and wide by the industrious agents of transportation companies fired thousands with the feverish desire to win sudden wealth in the rigorous clime.

Of the fearful hardships and sufferings endured by these brave seekers for gold the reading world is perfectly familiar, yet little publicity has been given the hundreds who have come back almost penniless, nearly all broken in health, and many of them physical wrecks. The clerk who resigned a good position and joined in the mad race for riches discovered that indoor occupation was preferable to frozen limbs and starvation, that his soft muscles were unable to withstand the strain of unremitting toil in search of hidden treasure, and worn and crestfallen he returned to civilization to beg for work. The man who mortgaged his little farm that he might go to the region of wealth found instead of shining millions only privation and misery awaiting him, and he, too, came home to his disappointed family with an empty purse and a faltering step. To one who achieved success thousands failed, and of this one alone the world heard. All that remained to the many was to acknowledge defeat and begin anew.

There is a certain fascination to every energetic young man in perilous journeys through unknown lands where a single stroke of the pick may reveal a great heap of yellow nuggets. With dreams of sudden fortune his imagination is stirred, and to withstand the temptation of risking all he has hitherto gained and joining the mighty army of prospectors requires no small degree of will-power. He considers the few dollars he manages to lay aside each month from his salary of slight consequence when compared with those barrels of gold of which he has read. Thus he is often lured into the short road to wealth only to be deceived.

Though all admire the ambitious spirit and the high courage that prompt him to brave the dangers of the far North—that realm of buried hopes—the chance of success is so slight and the probability of losing his health, or even his life, is so great that it seems by far the surest and safest way to wealth lies in close application to legitimate business pursuits and rational economy. Little is to be gained by seeking fairer fields. To remain at home and be content with one's lot may not in every instance prove the profitable course, yet it nearly always brings the most happiness.

The poor young man of fixed purpose, of good habits, content to bide his time, who endeavors to please his employer and who is fairly economical, almost invariably finds himself at the prime of life in a prosperous condition. He has, it is true, followed the long way around, a way devoid of all the allurements of sensation, yet which at last proves the surest and nearest highway to prosperity. What seems the short road to riches usually ends in poverty, and the one who has the courage to remain steadfast and rely upon thrift and industry is almost sure to achieve financial success.

—HERBERT BASHFORD.

Sham courtesy is the most transparent of all humbugs.

The Age of the Fighters

ALL the British Generals now in South Africa are over fifty years of age, with the possible exception of General Kitchener, who is near the half-century mark. General Roberts is sixty-seven, General Buller is sixty-one, General Gatacre is fifty-seven, and General Methuen is fifty-five. Though nothing can be said against the brilliant records of these fighters, their age is being mentioned as a handicap, especially in the way of the vigor and the science of the war.

Therefore parallels are being drawn—George Washington Commander-in-Chief at forty-three; Grant forty-three when the war closed; Sheridan successful at thirty-four; Lee only fifty-eight at Appomattox; Longstreet only forty-four; Stewart only thirty-one when killed; Napoleon forty at the height of his power; Cæsar victorious at forty-eight; Hannibal at the zenith of his success at thirty-one; and Alexander the Great dead at thirty-two.

But it could just as easily be shown that some of the best work on the battle-field has been done by men beyond fifty. For instance, what is the matter with General Joseph Wheeler, who climbed the tree at Santiago, and who is spending a part of his sixty-fourth year fighting in the Philippines?

—WEBSTER WALLACE.

Digitized by Google

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

The War Correspondent of the Century

One day more than thirty years ago, when the German and French armies were drawn up for battle and the nearer troops were popping away, a young man strolled between the firing lines and stood there gazing through his field glass as calmly as though he were sitting in an opera box. He did this sort of thing regularly.

When Paris was in the hands of the Commune he was there mingling with the excitement. One day, hearing firing, he hurried forward. Suddenly he found himself inside a most extraordinary triangle of barricades. The officer noticed the young Englishman and commanded him to pick up the musket of a man who had just been killed. He replied that he was a foreigner and a neutral and would not do it. The officer gave him the alternative of taking the gun or being shot. The young man laughed. But a firing party was told off, and he was stood up against a church wall, and they were cheerfully proceeding to end his life when the forces from another barricade rushed upon them. He was condemned to be shot by his new captors, and again he laughed and again he escaped.

A couple of years later he was in the midst of the fever and famine of India, and after that he was in the Carlist War in Spain, first with one army and then with another. In a few months he was in Servia, and in the battles of that war he was a conspicuous observer. Then attached to the Russian Army, he crossed the Danube, followed the campaign, saw the fighting at Shipka Pass, and was at Plevna.

COPYRIGHT BY ELLIOTT & FRY, LONDON

ARCHIBALD FORBES

He realized the Russians could hold their position, and his next thought was the telegraph office. The nearest one was one hundred and eighty miles away, at Bucharest. One bite of black bread was all he ate in twenty-four hours. He wore out horse after horse. This ride ended in the greatest newspaper special known in the history of journalism. The great White Czar of Russia afterward sent for him, and said: "I have had reported to me the example which you showed with our forces on the day before Plevna by succoring wounded men under heavy fire. As the head of the State, I desire to testify how Russia honors your conduct, offering you the Order of the Stanislaus 'with the crossed swords'—a decoration never conferred except for personal bravery."

In all parts of the world where there was war or promise of war this placid, cheerful and gifted young man was generally found. He went with the British force to Jelalabad, and under a close and heavy fire he saved a wounded soldier's life and the official dispatches gave him special mention for his services. In Zululand he was the first to see the certain result of the battle of Ulundi, and although it was dark he started through the trackless forest and made his way through one hundred and twenty miles of that unmarked wilderness to a telegraph wire at Landsmann's Drift, and from there he wired to the world the result of the fight days ahead of the official intelligence, his dispatches being read in both Houses of Parliament amidst enthusiastic acclamation. This was Archibald Forbes, the war correspondent.

Men Who Risked Life for the News

Dr. William Howard Russell, the great correspondent of the London Times, went through a half-dozen wars, and fought in the first rank of the party that drove out the Sepoys from the front at Lucknow. His pictures of the Crimea carried Florence Nightingale and her heroines to that place.

A few years ago the State of Ohio, by vote of its Legislature, brought the remains of J. B. MacGahan from their foreign resting-place to his native soil. He became a correspondent while completing his collegiate studies in Europe. His ride of six hundred miles pursued by a band of Cossacks across Russia was one of the most noted incidents of the century. He reached Khiva and told the story of Russia's first step toward India. His accounts of the atrocities in Bulgaria upset Disraeli's ministry.

Fred Burnaby rode through Asia Minor and Afghanistan with his life in his hands; was the first man to mount the parapet at El Teb; and killed two of his assailants after receiving his death wound in the Soudan, where three other correspondents lost their lives.

The man who stood by Dewey in the battle of Manila was Mr. Joseph L. Stickney, of the New York Herald. Close to Schley in the destruction of Cervera's fleet was Mr. Graham, of the Associated Press. On the road to Santiago Mr. Creelman and Mr. Marshall were wounded, and Colonel Roosevelt publicly expressed his obligations for assistance received from Richard Harding Davis on the firing line.

Methods of Communication in War Times

The censorship in South Africa is very annoying. In the first place, for every correspondent who was sent there were hundreds who wanted to go. In the second place, the few who did go bound themselves to the most rigid adherence to the War Department's rules. Leading from South Africa are several cables, but over these the Government exercises absolute control. As soon as the Boers began to hold their own the British, as a war measure, instituted a censorship of dispatches which is the strictest in the history of journalism. Their fear was that the news of the Boer victories would lead the Dutch in other colonies to rise in favor of their kinsmen. Thus it made little difference even if the correspondent had in his possession the most vital facts; he could not get it to the world. For instance, Mr. Julian Ralph, well known to the readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, is with the army, traveling with the privileges and appurtenances of a Lieutenant, and probably enjoying life as much as a man can under the circumstances, but when he marches to the cable office with his batch of facts he is as coolly repulsed as if he were the humblest private. So with slight exceptions our news from South Africa is from the official sources of both sides.

One interesting thing in that section of the country is a variety of methods in communication. The carrier pigeon is the most useful. Had it not been for these fleet messengers of the air we should not know the news from Ladysmith. Back of these services are years of training. While the Boers control everything leading out of that city, they cannot reach the birds that sail in the air and make their way straight to Durban, from which place news is cabled to the world.

Another method employed is the heliograph. The working of this is very familiar; it is simply the use of the telegraph code in flashes of sunlight over miles of country. There is a third method which is almost as mysterious as it is interesting. In Africa they have the native runners, and the way they communicate is by shouting from hill to hill. An extraordinary statement is made that in this manner they can send information hundreds of miles a day. It is further asserted that in the battle of Glencoe this shouting and running by the natives beat the telegraph several hours.

France has in training almost three hundred thousand pigeons, and other Governments have tens and hundreds of thousands. In the United States we have posts at different points, and Great Britain has pigeons both for the Army and the Navy. In this war the pigeons have been of far more service than any other of the old-time methods of communication. The balloon was a failure at Santiago, and it has not done very much in South Africa.

The cost of reporting the war can be estimated from the fact that in our war with Spain one of the biggest news associations ended the conflict more than a quarter million dollars in debt. It would not be a great exaggeration to say that upon the war the newspapers spent for their special services and special dispatches several millions of dollars, and in many instances the most elaborate plans costing thousands of dollars yielded nothing whatever. The English papers are spending fortunes in South Africa and are getting scarcely anything for their money. At the same time, their expenditures are nothing like as prodigal as were those of the American newspapers in the recent war. It has been stated with some show of pride that one of the English newspapers paid $2000 for a single dispatch, but a certain single dispatch to an American newspaper cost over $18,000.

Winston Spencer Churchill's Brilliant Work

The one correspondent in South Africa who has interested the world and made a distinguished reputation is Winston Spencer Churchill, whose mother is Lady Randolph Churchill, formerly Miss Jerome, of New York. Although a Lieutenant in the British Army, Churchill went to South Africa as correspondent of the London Morning Post, which is one of the aristocratic newspapers. He accompanied two detachments of troops on an armored train in an attempt to get from Estcourt to Ladysmith, but four miles south of Colenso the train was derailed and the Englishmen were captured. The war correspondent is supposed to be a noncombatant, but Churchill took full part in the scrimmage, and one correspondent—a rival, by the way—wrote this sentence: "Churchill behaved magnificently during the train disaster and deserves the V. C."

His capture by the Boers, his imprisonment and his dramatic escape are familiar history to all the readers of recent dispatches. With the push of the American and with the persistency of the English mingling in his blood he seems to be somewhat of a model for an end-of-the-century hero. And admiration for his courage and gratitude for his work probably led the press censor to be merciful for a few hours, and to allow his dispatches to go to his London newspaper, even if they did attend a sarcastic reference to the Queen's Christmas gift of chocolate for the troops who are fighting for her Kingdom.

COPYRIGHT BY MESSRS. BASSANO, LONDON

WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL

An Interesting Bit of History

There are some entertaining parallels of the history of journalism. For instance, the first newspaper in France was published in 1631 by Théophraste Renaudot under the patronage of Richelieu, and his best contributor was Louis XIII. Even when on tours the King sent his contributions to the Gazette—truly a royal correspondent. This Gazette appears to this day, and there are over three hundred volumes of it in the Paris Library. Just one hundred years later the Pennsylvania Gazette, now THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, began its existence, and the difference between that paper and its namesake in France represents largely the difference between French and American journalism, for Franklin absolutely declined to circulate through his pages any attacks, personal paragraphs, or scandals anonymously for any one, while Renaudot made a specialty of that class of matter supplied by his distinguished contributors. Julius Cæsar would have made an admirable war correspondent, so clear and informing are his descriptions of movements and battles. It is generally forgotten that George Washington was the first great commander to suggest that newspapers send regular correspondents to the armies. His view was that the news of the work of the troops would do much to satisfy the natural curiosity and encourage the loyalty of the people, but when the modern correspondents grew to legions the convictions of some other commanders did not coincide with that of the father of the country, and General Sherman used to declare that every one of them ought to be shot. Still, when peace came and he sat with them at the banquet board he expressed his feeling of satisfaction that he had never carried his war-time sentiments to their extreme.

The war correspondent deserves well of his age and of the world. He is the servitor of the public, without the excitement of fighting which helps the heroism of the soldier in the midst of danger. His importance was recognized by the Peace Conference at The Hague, and in the Nineteenth Article of the Regulations it is declared that correspondents and reporters "who fall into the enemy's hands, and whom the latter think fit to detain, have a right to be treated as prisoners of war, provided they can produce a certificate from the military authorities they were accompanying."

Digitized by Google

The door is being held ajar, and four solemn faces, piled one on top of the other, are peering at you

The Awakening at Beggarbush

Three MEN on Four Wheels

By Jerome K. Jerome

Copyright, 1899, by Jerome K. Jerome. Copyright in Great Britain

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS: The three men—George, Harris and the author—have planned a tour awheel through the Black Forest. The mounts are a tandem and a safety, and the start is to be bright and early Wednesday morning.

GEORGE came down on Tuesday evening and slept at Harris' place. We thought this a better arrangement than his own suggestion, which was that we should call for him on our way and "pick him up." Picking George up in the morning means picking him out of bed to begin with, and shaking him awake—in itself an exhausting effort with which to commence the day; helping him find his things and finish his packing, and then waiting for him while he eats his breakfast, a tedious entertainment from the spectator's point of view, full of wearisome repetition.

I knew that if he slept at "Beggarbush" he would be up in time. I have slept there myself, and I know what happens. About the middle of the night, as you judge, though in reality it may be somewhat later, you are startled out of your first sleep by what sounds like a rush of cavalry along the passage just outside the door. Your half-awakened intelligence fluctuates between burglars, the Day of Judgment and a gas explosion. You sit up in bed and listen intently. You are not kept waiting long; the next moment a door is violently slammed, and somebody or something is evidently coming downstairs on a tea-tray.

"I told you so," says a voice, and immediately some hard substance, a head one would say from the ring of it, rebounds against the panel of your door.

❧

By this time you are charging madly around the room for your clothes. Nothing is where you put it overnight; the articles most essential have disappeared entirely; and meanwhile the murder, or revolution, or whatever it is, continues unchecked. You pause for a moment with your head under the wardrobe, where you think you can see your slippers, to listen to a steady, monotonous thumping upon a distant door. The victim, you presume, has taken refuge there. They mean to have him out and finish him. Will you be in time? The knocking ceases, and a voice, sweetly reassuring in its gentle plaintiveness, asks meekly:

"Pa, may I get up?"

You do not hear the other voice, but the responses are:

"No, it was only the bath. No, she ain't really hurt, only wet, you know. Yes, ma, I'll tell 'em what you say. No, it was a pure accident. Yes; good-night, papa."

Then the same voice, exerting itself so as to be heard afar, remarks:

"We've all got to go upstairs again. Pa says it isn't time yet to get up."

You return to bed and lie listening to somebody's being dragged upstairs, evidently against their will. By a thoughtful arrangement, the spare rooms at "Beggarbush" are exactly underneath the nurseries. The same somebody, you conclude, still offering strenuous opposition, is being put back into bed. You can follow the contest with much exactitude, because every time the body is flung down upon the spring mattress, the bedstead, just above your head, makes a sort of jump; while every time the body succeeds in struggling out again you are made aware by the thud upon the floor. After a time the struggle wanes, or maybe the bed collapses, and you drift back into sleep. But the next moment, or what seems to be the next moment, you again open your eyes under the consciousness of a presence. The door is being held ajar, and four solemn faces, piled one on top of the other, are peering at you, as though you were some natural curiosity kept in this particular room. Seeing you awake, the top face, walking calmly over the other three, comes in and sits on the bed in a friendly attitude.

"Oh," it says, "we didn't know you were awake. I've been awake some time."

"So I gather," you reply shortly.

"Pa doesn't like us to get up too early," it continues; "he says everybody else in the house is liable to be disturbed if we get up. So of course we mustn't."

The tone is that of gentle resignation. It is instinct with the spirit of virtuous pride, arising from the consciousness of self-sacrifice.

"Don't you call this being up?" you suggest.

"Oh, no; we're not really up, you know, because we're not properly dressed." The fact is self-evident. "Pa's always very tired in the morning," the voice continues; "of course, that's because he works hard all day. Are you ever tired in the morning?"

❧

At this point he turns and notices for the first time that the three other children have also entered, and are sitting in a semicircle on the floor. From their attitude it is clear they have mistaken the whole thing for one of the slower forms of entertainment, some comic lecture or conjuring exhibition, and are waiting patiently for you to get out of bed and do something. It shocks him, the idea of their being in the guest's bedchamber. He peremptorily orders them out. They do not answer him; they do not argue; in dead silence and with one accord they fall upon him. All you can see from the bed is a confused tangle of waving arms and legs suggestive of an intoxicated octopus trying to find bottom. Not a word is spoken; that seems to be the etiquette of the thing. If you are sleeping in your pajamas you spring from the bed and only add to the confusion; if you are wearing a less dignified garment you stay where you are and shout commands, which are utterly unheeded. The simplest plan is to leave it to the eldest boy. He does get them out after a while and closes the door upon them. It reopens immediately, and one, generally Muriel, is shot back into the room. She enters as from a catapult. She is handicapped by having long hair, which can be used as a convenient handle. Evidently aware of this natural disadvantage, she clutches it herself tightly in one hand and punches with the other. He opens the door again and cleverly uses her as a battering-ram against the wall of those without. You can hear the dull crash as her head enters among them and scatters them. When the victory is complete he comes back and resumes his seat on the bed. There is no bitterness about him; he has forgotten the whole incident.

"I like the mornings," he says; "don't you?"

"Some mornings," you agree, "are all right; others are not so peaceful."

He takes no notice of your exception; a far-away look steals over his somewhat ethereal face.

"I should like to die in the morning," he says; "everything is so beautiful then."

"Well," you answer, "perhaps you will, if your father ever invites an irritable man to come and sleep here, and doesn't warn him beforehand."

He descends from his contemplative mood and becomes himself. "It's jolly in the garden," he suggests; "you wouldn't like to get up and have a game of cricket, would you?"

It was not the idea with which you went to bed, but now, as things have turned out, it seems as good a plan as lying there hopelessly awake, and you agree.

❧

You learn later in the day that the explanation of the proceeding is that you, unable to sleep, woke up early in the morning and thought you would like a game of cricket. The children, taught to be ever courteous to guests, felt it their duty to humor you. Mrs. Harris remarks at breakfast that at least you might have seen to it that the children were properly dressed before you took them out; while Harris points out to you pathetically how, by your one morning's example and encouragement, you have undone his labor of months.

On this Wednesday morning, George, it seems, clamored to get up at quarter past five, and persuaded them to let him teach them cycling tricks around the cucumber frames on Harris' new wheel. Even Mrs. Harris, however, did not blame George on this occasion; she felt intuitively the idea could not have been entirely his.

It is not that the Harris children have the faintest notion of avoiding blame at the expense of a friend and comrade. One and all, they are honesty itself in accepting responsibility for their own misdeeds. It simply is, that is how the thing presents itself to their understanding. When you explain to them that you had no original intention of getting up at five o'clock in the morning to play cricket on the croquet lawn, or to mimic the history of the early church by shooting with a cross-bow at dolls tied to a tree; that as a matter of fact, left to your own initiative, you would have slept peacefully till roused in Christian fashion with a cup of tea at eight, they are firstly astonished, secondly apologetic, and thirdly sincerely contrite. In the present instance, waiving the purely academic question whether the awakening of George at a little before five was due to natural instinct on his part or to the accidental passing of a home-made boomerang through his bedroom window, the dear children frankly admitted that the blame for his uprising was their own. As the eldest boy said:

"We ought to have remembered Uncle George had a long day before him, and we ought to have dissuaded him from getting up. I blame myself entirely."

But an occasional change of habit does nobody any harm; and besides, as Harris and I agreed, it was good training for George. In the Black Forest we would be up at five every morning; that we had determined on. Indeed, George himself had suggested half-past four, but Harris and I had argued that five would be early enough as an average; that would enable us to be on our machines by six, and to break the back of our journey before the heat of the day set in. Occasionally we might start a little earlier, but not as a habit.

I myself was up that morning at five. This was earlier than I had intended. I had said to myself on going to sleep: "Six o'clock, sharp!"

There are men, I know, who can waken themselves at any time to the minute. They say to themselves, literally, as they lay their heads upon the pillow: "Four thirty," "Four forty-five," or "Five fifteen," as the case may be, and as the clock strikes they open their eyes. It is very wonderful, this; the more one dwells upon it the greater the mystery grows. Some Ego within us, acting independently of our conscious self, must be capable of counting the hours while we sleep. Unaided by clock or sun, or any other medium known to our five senses, it keeps watch through the darkness. At the exact moment it whispers "Time!" and we awake. The work of an old riverside fellow I once talked with called him to be out of bed each morning half an hour before high tide. He told me that never once had he overslept himself by a minute. Latterly he never even troubled to work out the time for himself. He would lie down tired and sleep a dreamless sleep, and each morning at a different hour this ghostly watchman, true as the tide itself, would silently call him. Did the man's spirit haunt through the darkness the muddy stairs, or had it knowledge of the ways of Nature? Whatever the process, the man himself was unconscious of it. And yet, to satisfy our craving for mystery, we must needs dress up ghosts in night-shirts, and listen around a three-legged table to spirits spelling nonsense!

In my own case, my inward watchman is, perhaps, somewhat out of practice. He does his best, but he is over-anxious; he worries himself, and loses count. I say to him, maybe: "Five thirty, please," and he wakes me with a start at half-past two. I look at my watch; he suggests that perhaps I forgot to wind it up. I put it to my ear; it is still

At every stroke I made the bleated: "C-o-o-d, g-o-o-o-d, ind-e-e-e-d!"

Editor's Note—Three Men on Four Wheels was begun in the Post of January 6. Each chapter is practically an independent story and may be read with enjoyment without reference to preceding installments.

Digitized by Google

going. He thinks maybe something has happened to it; he is confident himself it is half-past five, if not a little later. To satisfy him, I put on a pair of slippers and go downstairs to inspect the dining-room clock. What happens to a man when he wanders about the house in the middle of the night, clad in a dressing-gown and a pair of slippers, there is no need to recount; most men know by experience. Everything, especially everything with a sharp corner, takes a cowardly delight in hitting him. When you are wearing a pair of stout boots things get out of your way; when you venture among furniture in woolwork slippers and no socks it comes at you and kicks you. I return to bed bad-tempered, and refusing to listen to his further absurd suggestion that all the clocks in the house have entered into a conspiracy against me, take half an hour to get to sleep again. From four to five he wakes me every ten minutes. I wish I had never said a word to him about the thing. At five o'clock he goes to sleep himself, worn out, and leaves it to the girl, who does it half an hour later than usual.

On this particular Wednesday he worried me to such an extent that I got up at five simply to be rid of him. I did not know what to do with myself. Our train did not leave till ten minutes past eight. All our luggage had been packed and sent on the night before, together with the bicycles, to Fenchurch Street Station. I went into my study; I thought I would put in an hour's writing. The early morning, before one has breakfasted, is not, I take it, a good season for literary effort. I wrote three paragraphs of a story, and then read them over to myself. Some unkind things have been said about my work, but nothing has yet been written which would have done justice to those three paragraphs. I threw them into the waste-paper basket, and sat trying to remember what, if any, charitable institutions provided pensions for decayed authors.

To escape from this train of reflection, I put a golf ball in my pocket, and, selecting a driver, strolled out into the paddock. A couple of sheep were browsing there, and they followed, and took a keen interest in my practice. The one was a kindly, sympathetic old party. I do not think she understood the game; I think it was my doing this innocent thing so early in the morning that appealed to her. At every stroke I made she bleated:

"G-o-o-d, g-o-o-o-d, ind-e-e-e-d!"

She seemed as pleased as if she had done it herself.

As for the other one, she was a cantankerous, disagreeable old thing, as discouraging to me as her friend was helpful.

"Ba-a-a-d, da-a-a-m ba-a-a-d!" was her comment on almost every stroke. As a matter of fact, some were really excellent strokes; but she did it just to be contradictory and for the sake of irritating. I could see that.

By a most regrettable accident, one of my swiftest balls struck the good sheep on the nose. And at that the bad sheep laughed—laughed distinctly and undoubtedly; a husky, vulgar laugh; and while her friend stood glued to the ground too astonished to move, she changed her note for the first time and bleated:

"Go-o-o-d, ve-ery go-o-o-d! Be-e-e-est sho-o-ot he-e-e's ma-a-a-de!"

I would have given half a crown had it been her I had hit instead of the other one. It is ever the good and amiable who suffer in this world.

I had wasted more time than I had intended in the paddock, and when Ethelbertha came to tell me it was half-past seven, and that breakfast was on the table, I remembered that I had not shaved. It vexes Ethelbertha, my shaving quickly. She fears that to outsiders it may suggest a poor-spirited attempt at suicide, and that in consequence it may get about the neighborhood that we are not happy together. As a further argument, she has also hinted that my appearance cannot be trifled with.

On the whole, I was just as glad not to be able to take a long farewell of Ethelbertha. I did not want to risk her breaking down. But I should have liked more opportunity to say a few farewell words of advice to the children, especially as regards my fishing-rod, which they will persist in using for cricket stumps; and I hate having to run for a train. Quarter of a mile from the station I overtook George and Harris; they were also running. In their case—so Harris informed me jerkily, while we trotted side by side—it was the new kitchen stove that was to blame. This was the first morning they had tried it, and from some cause or other it had blown up the kidneys and scalded the cook. He said he hoped that by the time we returned they would have gotten more used to it.

We caught the train by the skin of our teeth, as the saying is; and, reflecting upon the events of the morning as we sat gasping in the carriage, there passed vividly before my mind the panorama of my Uncle Podger, as on two hundred and fifty days in the year he would start from Ealing Common by the nine thirteen train to Moorgate Street.

From my Uncle Podger's house to the railway station was eight minutes' walk. What my uncle always said was:

"Allow yourself a quarter of an hour and take it easily."

What he always did was to start five minutes before the time and run. I do not know why, but this was the custom of the suburb. Many stout city gentlemen lived at Ealing in those days—I believe some live there still—and caught early trains to the city. They all started late; they all carried a black bag and a newspaper in one hand and an umbrella in the other; and for the last quarter of a mile to the station, wet or fine, they all ran.

Folks with nothing else to do, nursemaids, chiefly, and errand boys, with now and then a perambulating costermonger added, would gather on the Common of a fine morning to watch them pass and cheer the most deserving. It was not a showy spectacle. They did not run well; they did not even run fast; but they were earnest, and they did their best. The exhibition appealed less to one's sense of art than to one's admiration for conscientious effort. Occasionally a little harmless betting would take place among the crowd.

—WE WALKED UP TO A HANSOM, RAISED OUR HATS, AND WISHED THE DRIVER "GOOD-MORNING!"

DRAWN BY HARRISON FISHER

"Two to one ag'in the old gent in the white weskit!"

"Ten to one on old Blowpipes, bar he don't roll over hisself 'fore 'e gets there."

"Even money on the Purple Hemperor!"—a nickname bestowed by a youth of entomological tastes upon a certain retired military neighbor of my uncle's, a gentleman of imposing appearance when stationary, but apt to color highly under exercise.

My uncle and the others would write to the Ealing Press, complaining bitterly concerning the supineness of the local police; and the editor would add spirited leaders upon the Decay of Courtesy Among the Lower Orders, especially throughout the Western suburbs. But no good ever resulted.

It was not that my uncle did not rise early enough; it was that troubles came to him at the last moment. The first thing he would do after breakfast would be to lose his newspaper. We always knew when Uncle Podger had lost anything by the expression of astonished indignation with which on such occasions he would regard the world in general. It never occurred to my Uncle Podger to say to himself:

"I am a careless old man. I lose everything. I never know where I have put anything. I am quite incapable of finding it again for myself. In this respect I must be a perfect nuisance to everybody about me. I must set to work and reform myself."

On the contrary, by some peculiar course of reasoning he had convinced himself that whenever he lost a thing it was everybody's fault in the house but his own.

"I had it in my hand here not a minute ago!" he would exclaim.

From his tone you might have thought he was living surrounded by conjurors, who spirited things away from him merely to irritate him.

"Could you have left it in the garden?" my aunt would suggest.

"What should I want to leave it in the garden for? I don't want a paper in the garden. I want the paper in the train with me."

"You haven't put it in your pocket?"

"Bless the woman! Do you think I should be standing here at five minutes to nine looking for it if I had it in my pocket all the while? Do you think I'm a fool?"

Here somebody would exclaim: "What's this?" and hand him from somewhere a paper neatly folded.

"I do wish people would leave my things alone," he would growl, snatching at it savagely.

He would open his bag to put it in, and then, glancing at it, he would pause, speechless with sense of injury.

"What's the matter?" aunt would ask.

"The day before yesterday's!" he would answer, too hurt even to shout, throwing the paper down upon the table.

If only sometimes it had been yesterday's it would have been a change. But it was always the day before yesterday's, except on Tuesdays; then it would be Saturday's.

We would find it for him eventually—as often as not he had been sitting on it. And then he would smile, not genially, but with the weariness that comes to a man who feels that Fate has cast his lot among a band of hopeless idiots.

"All the time right in front of your noses——!" He would not finish the sentence; he prided himself upon his self-control.

This settled, he would start for the hall, where it was the custom of my Aunt Maria to have the children gathered, ready to say good-by to him.

My aunt never left the house herself, if only to make a call next door, without taking a tender farewell of every inmate. One never knew, she would say, what might happen.

One of them, of course, was sure to be missing, and the moment this was noticed all the other six, without an instant's hesitation, would scatter with a whoop to find it.

Immediately they were gone it would turn up by itself from somewhere quite near, always with the most reasonable explanations for its absence, and would at once start off after the others to explain to them that it was found. In this way five minutes at least would be taken up in everybody's looking for everybody else, which was just sufficient time to allow my uncle to find his umbrella and lose his hat. Then, at last, the group reassembled in the hall, the drawing-room clock would commence to strike nine. It possessed a cold, penetrating chime that always had the effect of confusing my uncle. In his excitement he would kiss some of the children twice over, pass by others, forget whom he had kissed and whom he hadn't, and have to begin all over again. He used to say he believed they mixed themselves up on purpose, and I am not prepared to maintain that the charge was altogether false. To add to his troubles, one child always had a sticky face, and that child would always be the most affectionate.

If things were going too smoothly, the eldest boy would come out with some tale about all the clocks in the house being five minutes slow, and of his having been late for school the previous day in consequence. This would send my uncle rushing impetuously down to the gate, where he would recollect that he had with him neither his bag nor his umbrella. All the children that my aunt could not stop would charge after him, two of them struggling for the umbrella, the others surging around the bag. And when they returned we would discover on the hall table the most important thing of all that he had fogotten, and wonder what he would say about it when he came home.

We arrived at Waterloo a little after nine and at once proceeded to put George's experiment into operation. Opening the book at the chapter entitled "At the Cab Rank," we walked up to a hansom, raised our hats, and wished the driver "Good-morning."

This man was not to be outdone in politeness by any foreigner, real or imitation. Calling to a friend named "Charles" to "hold the steed," he sprang from his box and returned to us a bow that would have done credit to Mr. Turveydrop himself. Speaking apparently in the name of the nation, he welcomed us to England, adding a regret that Her Majesty was not at the moment in London.

Digitized by Google

We could not reply to him in kind; nothing of this sort had been anticipated by the book. We called him "coachman," at which he again bowed to the pavement, and asked him if he would have the goodness to drive us to the Westminster Bridge Road.

He laid his hand upon his heart and said the pleasure would be his.

Taking the third sentence in the chapter, George asked him what his fare would be.

The question, as introducing a sordid element into the conversation, seemed to hurt his feelings. He said he never took money from distinguished strangers; he suggested a souvenir—a diamond scarfpin, a gold snuff-box, some little trifle of that sort by which he could remember us.

As a small crowd had collected, and as the joke was drifting rather too far in the cabman's direction, we climbed in without further parley and were driven away amid cheers. We stopped the cab at a boot-shop, a little beyond Astley's Theatre, that looked the sort of place we wanted. It was one of those overfed shops that the moment their shutters are taken down in the morning disgorge their goods all around them. Boxes of boots stood piled on the pavement or in the gutter opposite. Boots hung in festoons about its doors and windows. Its sun-blind was as some grimy vine, bearing bunches of black and brown boots. Inside, the shop was a bower of boots. The man, when we entered, was busy with a chisel and hammer opening a new crateful of boots.

George raised his hat and said "Good-morning."

The man did not even turn around. He struck me from the first as a disagreeable man. He grunted something which might have been "Good-morning" or might not, and went on with his work.

George said: "I have been recommended to your shop by my friend, Mr. X."

In response the man should have said: "Mr. X. is a most worthy gentleman. It will give me the greatest pleasure to serve any friend of his."

What he did say was: "Don't know him; never heard of him."

This was disconcerting. The book gave three or four methods of buying boots. George had carefully selected the one centred around "Mr. X." as being of all the most courtly. You talked a good deal with the shopkeeper about this "Mr. X.," and then, when by this means friendship and understanding had been established, you slid naturally and gracefully into the immediate object of your coming, namely, your desire for boots, "cheap but good." This gross, material man cared apparently nothing for the niceties of retail dealing. It was necessary with such a one to come to business with brutal directness. George abandoned "Mr. X." and, turning back to a previous page, took a sentence at random. It was not a happy selection: it was a speech that would have been superfluous made to any bootmaker. Under the present circumstances, threatened and stifled as we were on every side by boots, it possessed the dignity of positive imbecility. It ran:

"One has told me that you have here boots for sale."

For the first time the man put down his hammer and chisel and looked at us. He spoke slowly, in a thick and husky voice. He said:

"What d'ye think I keep boots for—to smell 'em?"

He was one of those men that begin quietly and grow more angry as they proceed, their wrongs apparently working within them, yeastlike.

"What d'ye think I am," he continued, "a boot collector? What d'ye think I'm running this shop for—my health? D'ye think I love the boots, and can't bear to part with a pair? D'ye think I hang them about here to look at 'em? Ain't there enough of 'em? Where d'ye think you are—in an international exhibition of boots? What d'ye think these boots are—a historical collection? Did you ever hear of a man keeping a bootshop and not selling boots? D'ye think I decorate the shop with 'em to make it look pretty? What d'ye take me for—a prize idiot?"

I have always maintained that these conversation books are never of any real use. What we wanted was some English equivalent for the well-known German idiom: "Behalten sie ihr Haar auf." Nothing of the sort was to be found in the book from beginning to end. However, I will do George the credit to admit he chose the very best sentence that was to be found therein and applied it. He said:

"I will come again, when, perhaps, you will have some more boots to show me. Till then, adieu!"

With that we returned to our cab and drove away, leaving the man standing in the centre of his boot-decked doorway addressing remarks to us. What he said I did not hear, but the passers-by appeared to find it interesting.

George was for stopping at another boot-shop and trying the experiment afresh. He said he really did want a pair of bedroom slippers. But we persuaded him to postpone their purchase until our arrival in some foreign city, where the tradespeople are no doubt more inured to this sort of talk, or else more naturally amiable. On the subject of the hat, however, he was adamant. He maintained that without that he could not travel, and accordingly we pulled up at a small shop in the Blackfriar's Road.

George explained to him that he wished to purchase a cap

The proprietor of this shop was a cheery, bright-eyed little man, and he helped us rather than hindered us. When George asked him in the words of the book, "Have you any hats?" he did not get angry; he just stopped and thoughtfully scratched his chin.

"Hats," said he, "let me think. Yes"—here a smile of positive pleasure broke over his genial countenance—"yes, now I come to think of it, I believe I have a hat. But, tell me, why do you ask me?"

George explained to him that he wished to purchase a cap, a traveling cap, but the essence of the transaction was that it was to be "a good cap."

The man's face fell. "Ah," he remarked, "there I am afraid you have me. Now, if you had wanted a bad cap, not worth the price asked for it; a cap good for nothing but to clean windows with, I could have found you the very thing. But a good cap—no, we don't keep them.

"But wait a minute," he continued on seeing the disappointment that spread over George's expressive countenance; "don't be in a hurry. I have a cap here"—he went to a drawer and opened it. "It is not a good cap, but it is not so bad as most of the caps I sell." He brought it forward extended on his palm. "What do you think of that?" he asked; "could you put up with that?"

George fitted it on before the glass, and choosing another remark from the book, said:

"This hat fits me sufficiently well, but tell me, do you consider that it becomes me?"

The man stepped back and took a bird's-eye view.

"Candidly," he replied, "I can't say that it does." He turned from George and addressed himself to Harris and myself. "Your friend's beauty," said he, "I should describe as elusive. It is there, but you can easily miss it. Now, in that cap, to my thinking, you do miss it."

At this point it occurred to George that he had had sufficient fun with this particular man. He said:

"That is all right. We don't want to lose the train. How much?"

Answered the man: "The price of that cap, sir, which in my opinion is twice as much as it is worth, is four and six. Would you like it wrapped up in brown paper, sir, or in white?"

George said he would take it as it was, paid the man four and sixpence in silver and went out. Harris and I followed.

At Fenchurch Street we compromised with our cabman for five shillings. He made us another courtly bow, and begged us to remember him to the Emperor of Austria.

Comparing views in the train, we agreed that we had lost the game by two points to one, and George, who was evidently disappointed, threw the book out of the window. We found our luggage and bicycles safe on the boat, and with the tide at twelve dropped down the river.

HIS PROPOSAL

By Kate Masterson

SHE knew he loved her by each glance,
Though he'd not spoken;
His hand's quick pressure in the dance,
Each flower and token.
She waited for the story old
As she had read it,
But though his eyes the legend told
He never said it!

He sang to her in verses sweet,
His accents sued her;
He played the banjo at her feet,
In rag-time wooed her;
On smooth yacht decks all golden glow,
Where starlight blended,
'Till she began to think him slow
As well as splendid!

She led him into quiet nooks
On stairs, demurely,
Where lights were low and tender looks
Might pass securely,
And when the band throbbed some sleep
Or old song story, [hymn
She steered him gently for the dim
Conservatory!

But in a crowded cable car
One rainy morning,
They rode with many a jolt and jar,
The weather scorning,
Till swerving round a curve she leaned
Against his shoulder,
And safely by her big hat screened
'Twas then he told her!

THE CALL OF THE COUNTRY

By Charles M. Skinner

SOCIETY'S every move toward a distribution of its material gains is hailed as a step toward the millennium. That society squeezes together tighter than ever when it hears a rumor of a dividend, to make sure that the other man does not get more than his share, appears to be a matter of course, and in nowise to be deplored. But are not the physical and moral mischiefs of this centralizing tendency more than an offset to the practical advantages it is supposed to give? We are rushing to the city, and it wrings us dry of talents and strength of blood and brain and muscle. Of the millions who are born in the cities how seldom does one succeed in anything beyond the gathering of dollars! The country gives us statesmen, the city politicians; the country Generals, the city soldiers; the country athletes, the city spectators. The city hardens, unifies, levels, grinds off the edges of character, and makes men alike.

The appalling thing in all socialistic schemes is that the man is overlooked. Everything is for the mass. Anarchy is kinder than communism because it allows the right of the human being to be himself. No doubt that as a modus vivendi socialism is the fairest yet devised; but why always consider the crowd? Why so persistently overlook the members of the crowd? Why this stress on government? The object of government is to train men to do without it.

The material success that laws encourage is not the be-all and end-all. If you want wisdom, your success is in getting that. Glory or office may invite you—and you may even care for happiness. If the latter is attained, neither money, power nor glory will buy your success from you. To make the most of ourselves is merely to be ourselves, and to be ourselves is to be profitable to our neighbor, since we are able to give to him a larger and more personal product than if we tried to be imitations of him. For, in the end, we judge men by their work, not by their lives; by their best, not their worst. Homer did not know our ethics, therefore avoid him! Raphael was peccable in his love affairs, wherefore do not look at his madonnas! Wagner was vain, so stay away from Lohengrin! No: we must accept ourselves with our frailties; and know our worth by the mark we leave—not by the noise we make.

The breath of the universal life that has come to me, still warm from the sun fires, cannot last long for me. So let me use it in work and play that give a return, not alone to me, but to you. And it is in the open, where neither my thoughts nor my elbows are confined, that I can and must secure my fullest enlargement.

It is the country, then, that asks its wandering and forgetting populations back. We take the countryman's life as a luxury, nibbling at it for two weeks in the year, and looking forward to it through the other fifty. Open the town gates and show that cities are not all: men are not all: art is not all. The universe stands for what dwarfs them into nothingness. Let man freshen his soul at the fount of being. Let him learn, in occasional hours of solitude on the hills, what resources he has. In town he is a constant borrower. Alone, he gathers to give.

There are sanitary, no less than mental and moral advantages in country living. The hours are normal; night is not turned into day; eyes are not strained; lungs are not filled with gas and dust; false appetites are not teased into being in drug and candy shops, tobacco stores and saloons; nerves are not edged by the din of factories and drays. That some people on farms live as artificially as if they were in town tenements is nothing to the prejudice of the country. The villager who digs his well beside his stable, who is afraid to let sunlight into his house, who shuts his windows against "night air," who eats pork, who has never bought a bathtub, is not a representative countryman in these days.

And, as to city advantages that so many urge as a reason for enduring to be a part of the mob, the country is acquiring them. In the older States public libraries are found in hundreds of villages; the schools are fair; there is much ability in the rural pulpit; transportation has become swift and cheap; entertainments are frequent in town halls; the ponds and rivers offer better facilities for swims than we find in the city baths.

Digitized by Google

At the English Capital

AN ORDER has reached a firm of famous Piccadilly hat makers for the best "top" hat of a special size that they can make. The hat has a history. An officer in the Gordon Highlanders lost it to an officer in the Gloucester regiment, but it is seldom that a man experiences such a victorious loss. Before the sortie from Ladysmith which resulted in the disaster of Nicholson's Nek, the two officers, knowing their respective regiments were to take part in the expected battle, were keenly discussing the coming operation, and the Gloucester man chaffingly remarked that General White knew a good regiment when he saw it, for the General had given orders that the Gloucestershires were to march out first. The Highlander at this insinuated that the Gloucestershires would also have precedence in getting back to Ladysmith. So the two bet the usual hat on the event. The officer who first brought his regiment into Ladysmith, and therefore soonest away from the face of the foe, was of course to lose. As all the world knows, the Gloucesters never got back at all, and the officer, with his brother officers and men, are kicking their heels in Pretoria—prisoners of war. The kilted Highlander swung into Ladysmith, and when he found he had lost the bet he was furious. But later, when the news reached him that his friendly antagonist had been captured, a broad grin took possession of his face, and he gleefully wrote off to England, giving his friend's hat size, and is anxious to pay the bet.

PLUCK AND WIT FROM THE FRONT

The Boer war is producing the usual crop of epigrams. Here are a few to hand:

"Heavy firing; casualties, one cooking pot injured."—Excerpt from a Kimberley bombardment report.

"A time-expired man."—A Gordon Highlander's dying words at Elandslaagte.

"Those who sup with me will require a devil of a long spoon."—The motto the Blue Jackets have fastened upon their naval gun, of which the range is five miles.

"Come along, boys! This is the hottest business I have ever been in."—General French to his cavalry at Elandslaagte.

"Retire be d——d."—Comment of a Gordon Highlander bugle-boy when the fight at Elandslaagte was at its crucial point and the Boer bugles treacherously blew the British call to "Cease Fire" and "Retire." The boy immediately blew the call "Charge" at his own initiative.

"Surrender to avoid bloodshed."—Cronje to Baden-Powell at Mafeking. "When is the bloodshed to begin?"—Baden-Powell to Cronje.

"The English must pay a price that will stagger humanity."—Kruger.

"All well. Enemy shelling us."—Baden-Powell's report.

"Go on. This is your show."—General White to General French, cavalry leader at Elandslaagte.

"Will be with you to-morrow."—A Boer heliograph message to the British at Colenso.

THE POLITEST MAN LIVING

This is a new story of the Height of Politeness. It is told by Angus Evan Abbott, the author, and it is, I believe, absolutely true. Mr. Abbott is a Canadian by birth and education, and on first coming to England he was, as most Americans and Canadians are, eager to catch a glimpse of the Queen; but as Her Majesty did not live in his suburbs Mr. Abbott's wish remained ungratified for some time. However, one day he found himself in Portsmouth and learned that the Royal yacht, with the Queen and Princess Beatrice aboard, was to cross from the Isle of Wight to Portsmouth. Hastening down to the landing-place, he discovered that there was not the ghost of a chance of catching sight of Her Majesty on land, so he went to the waterside, hired a small boat, and rowed out into the great harbor. Pushing out from the inner port, wherein rode a mighty fleet of battle-ships and cruisers all a-flutter with bunting in honor of the Queen, the writer found himself on the broad outer bay, alone except for a dotted line of men-of-war's boats indicating the route to be taken by the Queen's yacht. Pulling in his oars and allowing the boat to float at will, Mr. Abbott got his glasses focussed ready for the Queen's yacht and put in his time reading a book. All at once he heard a voice sounding as though it came from the clouds. It was gentle, aristocratic of accent, and apologetic in diction. It said, "I beg your pardon, but would you mind letting us pass?" Glancing quickly up, Mr. Abbott beheld the bow of the mighty battle-ship Minotaur towering over his little rowboat like a precipice; and peering over the brow of the cliff of iron was the calm face of a naval officer. The ship was swinging slowly into harbor, and was but a few yards away, coming directly toward the tiny rowboat. In the words of the novel, "To seize the oars and pull for his life was the work of an instant." When Mr. Abbott was clear of the battle-ship the naval officer, not a ghost of a smile on his face, said "Thank you very much," and the ship crept past. Mr. Abbott claims that naval officer to be the politest man living.

A HERITAGE OF BRAVERY

An Englishman is always glad to run across a proof that heredity tells. The pleasing theory that there is everything in heredity is the foundation of the mild monarchical and aristocratic form of government that obtains over here, and isolated instances of inherited virtues are rapidly seized upon and held up to public view. The war now raging has furnished one such object-lesson. At Elandslaagte the Lancers found themselves in a very tight corner. The Boers swarmed around the cavalrymen and shot straight. Along with the foremost of the Lancers rode John James Shurlock, a sixteen-year-old trumpeter. This young blood deserted the bugle for the revolver, and was seen by officers and men to shoot down three Boers as he rode forward. Now, this boy's mother was the daughter of a man who served thirty-one years in the old Eighty-second Foot (now the second battalion of the South Lancashire Regiment), and his father served twenty-two years in the Fourteenth Hussars and the Fifth Lancers. Two cousins of young Shurlock are also at the front.

HOW MISS RHODES WON THE TUG-OF-WAR

Mr. Cecil Rhodes has a sister who is quite as striking a character in South Africa as her distinguished brother. In figure she is an Amazon. Her appearance is eminently masculine, her face florid, her voice powerful, and as for her mind, her wits are as sharp as "they make 'em." She accompanies her brother everywhere and is altogether a striking character. On the last occasion when the two went from England to Cape Town, Miss Alice Rhodes superintended the athletic games on shipboard. One of the items in the program was a tug-of-war between twelve brawny Cornishmen and an equal number of weather-stained sailors. Slowly, steadily the sailors were hauling the Cornishmen near the mark, when Miss Rhodes, whose sympathies were with the miners, leaped to her feet and cried, "My faith, Cornishmen! Off with your shoes and pull on your bare feet like the sailors." The game was stopped, the Cornishmen took off their shoes, and Miss Alice's delight was unbounded when the miners simply walked away with the sailors.

BUCCANEER DAYS OF BENNETT BURLEIGH

To return to the war again: apropos of contraband of war and recent seizures in Southern waters, I wonder how many remember an exploit of Bennett Burleigh, the war correspondent, in the days of the Civil War? Just how young he must have been in those days, seeing that he is as active as the best of them and in Natal to-day, I'm sure I cannot guess, but the deed he did there on the broad Detroit River proves that in the sixties he had not cut his wisdom teeth. Burleigh, like many another Englishman, violently sympathized with the South in the grand struggle, and after seeing active service at the front evolved an elaborate scheme. The fact that the scheme was quite unworkable did not occur to him until later. He hastened to Canada, gathered together a handful of fiery, erratic characters of his own kidney, and crossed the river to Detroit. He knew that on certain islands in Lake Erie were thousands of Southern prisoners of war, and his grand, elaborate scheme was to set these men free, form them into an army, and march for the South, taking the Northern forces in the rear. Of course, could he have armed these prisoners, and if he had had at his call in Lake Erie the present fleet of British transports, he might have caused some serious inconvenience. But he had neither arms nor transports. Running down the river at that day was a small steamer—the Philo Parsons, I believe she was named. This Burleigh and his swashbucklers boarded as passengers, and when the steamer was fairly under way, fully armed, they invited the unarmed Captain and crew to, as it were, send in their resignations. Burleigh then headed for Lake Erie and the island prisons, but I believe was brought to by a revenue cutter, and ended up in prison. Such is the story as told in England. Just how much of it is true the gods and the Americans and Bennett Burleigh probably alone know. Since that day Burleigh has become more level-headed, and is one of the most successfully daring of the many picturesque characters that play a roving part on the Imperial outskirts.

THE QUEEN'S GARDEN-PARTY AT WINDSOR

The German Emperor is like Mr. Thomas Atkins: we must take him as we find him. For some years past he has been in a bit of a huff with his grandmother at Windsor, owing to the resentment shown by England on the published account of a certain memorable telegram sent to his sometime friend Kruger. William was greatly offended by England's show of force on that occasion, for if there is one nation more than another that wholly depends upon force for its existence it is Germany, and quite naturally Germany cannot well afford to have another nation make manifest to the world that she is not a bit frightened of the Emperor's army. So William let his English relatives clearly understand that if they wanted to see him they must call at the front door at Potsdam and ring the bell twice. However, the Queen is too old to pay many visits, and her rebellious grandson relented and stepped across to get a piece of the old lady's cake and a glass of lemonade, and make it up like a good boy. Of course, the reporters flocked to Windsor to write as many columns as they could scrape together. At the castle they were well received; important officials were told off to keep them informed and to see that things were made comfortable for them. But one day the Emperor decided to pay a visit to the Duke of Marlborough's place near Oxford. Over here press men work together, English papers report matters soberly, and as "scoops" count for almost nothing reporters do not try to get ahead of one another in a small way. So when William II sped off to Woodstock the journalists elected three of their number to follow—those three to supply the lot with all information.

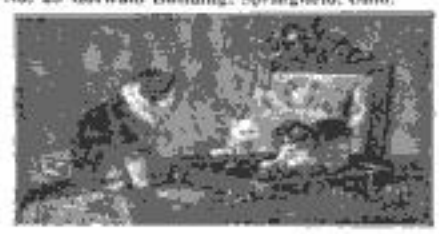
THE MOST EXCLUSIVE IN THE REALM

After receiving all consideration from the Queen of England the reporters had no fear of finding matters different in a mere Duke's establishment. But the husband of the one-time Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt is a most superior person, and the deputation from the press found themselves confronted at the lodge gate with strict orders that they were neither to be given access to the estate nor furnished with any information. One of the press men then sent a letter in to the castle explaining that they were held up and asking to be given liberty to pursue their calling. No answer came. Then the three put their heads together and wrote a second letter, explaining that Her Majesty had countenanced them, and that, up to date, she had been unable to discover the loss of any of her silver spoons.

They hoped, they said, that although the Queen was notoriously less exclusive in the selection of her guests than the Lord of Woodstock, still it might be that Her Majesty's patronage would not be taken as a disability. They asked that His Grace would please remember that the doings of his Royal guest were of great interest to the public, and that he, the Duke, in his august graciousness, might humor the world in this small particular. In answer to this came a steward of the fifteenth degree with all the important news, as he said, direct from the Duke. When the envelope was opened it was found that it contained a long list of the names of nonentities who had attended the dinner-party. The reporters returned to Windsor.

—E. W. Sabell.

PETS AND ANIMALS



This splendid journal interests the whole family, especially the children, including those "of larger growth"—all "whose hearts are young." It is issued monthly; each number contains sixteen large pages, printed on fine paper and beautifully illustrated. There are clever stories of animal life; of sagacity and faithfulness little less than human, displayed by dumb creatures. Instructive articles tell of quaint and rare animals. Valuable hints about the care and keeping of pets appear each month. PETS AND ANIMALS is like no other publication. Its columns combine unique literary features, good and wholesome fiction, scientific and instructive articles, interesting anecdotes, practical suggestions. It teaches that kindness, thoughtfulness and mercy extended to dumb creatures ennobles and broadens the mind of the person who performs the service.

These Two Pictures Free

To introduce PETS AND ANIMALS into new homes, we will send it one year for only 30 cents, and give absolutely free two animal pictures, those here in miniature, or get one of your friends to subscribe, send us their names and $1.60, and you will receive our journal one year and the pictures without cost.

These are reproductions of the drama paintings, "Stealing the Game" and "A Disgrace to the Family." Each picture is 16x20 inches in size, and reproduces all the colors of the original painting. Both mounted and framed for sale from 50 cents to $2.00 each. Remember, PETS AND ANIMALS one year for only 30 cents, with both these pictures—16x20 inches, in colors—absolutely free. This offer is good for thirty days only.

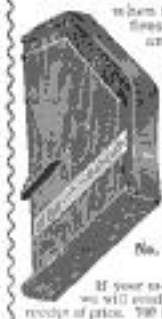
Address The Home City Publishing Company, No. 23 Gotwald Building, Springfield, Ohio.

Something New in Pictures

The famous Modern Paintings exhibited at the World's Fair, Chicago, are now reproduced for the first time in the

THORNTON PRINTS

at prices within the reach of all.



A handsomely illustrated catalogue sent on request.

New Amsterdam Book Company
156 Fifth Avenue, New York

Trade Orders supplied by our Wholesale Agents The Helman-Taylor Co., Cleveland, Ohio

LONG WINTER EVENINGS

when the family is gathered 'round the fireside, the exquisite quality of tone and the delightful music of the charms them all. It is the most perfect instrument ever offered for the money. Very durable. Beautifully finished. Inexpensive and instructive. Anybody can play it without a teacher from the start fitting under the strings.

Columbia Zither

No. 3 (here illustrated), $6.00
Others from $4.00 to $5.00

If your music dealer hasn't the Columbia Zither, we will send your choice C. O. D. to express paid on receipt of price. 700 Extra Tunes at 50 cents each. Catalogue free.

THE PHONOHARP CO.
Dept. F. 152 Liverpool St., East Boston, Mass.

Four Children, a Dog and a Wagon

Are the main features of an artistic picture we will mail free to any one interested enough to ask for it.

NEW YORK, 252 Pearl Street
BOSTON, 520 Atlantic Avenue
PHILADELPHIA, 26 and 28 North Fourth Street
BALTIMORE, 22 East Lombard Street
CHICAGO, 15 and 17 Lake Street
CINCINNATI, 304 Main Street
ST. LOUIS, 204 North Fourth Street
SAN FRANCISCO, 117 and 119 Market Street

BERRY BROTHERS, Limited
Varnish Manufacturers, - Detroit, Mich.

Digitized by Google

A Rub of the Green

By Edwin L. Sabin

THE first annual tournament of the Homeville Golf Club was progressing smoothly. The day had dawned clear and bracing, and these favorable conditions endured. Only wind enough was blowing to set a premium on the best judgment of the different players, and to keep in a flutter the gay garments of the fair spectators.

Although the club had been in existence scarcely three months, Society had set upon it the seal of her approval. The names of the foremost people of the town were on its membership list. Such was the rapid spread of the golf epidemic when once it had been introduced by young Will de Pont, that the club, necessarily limited in number, had no difficulty in shaping its personnel to suit itself.

Since this was the first tournament, only a few members had been bold enough to enter the matches, and before the morning was past it was seen without doubt that De Pont and Herbert Radcliffe were by all odds the best players competing. Therefore, it was likely that they would be matched in the finals for the championship.

As happens on many a golf course, the rivals in play were rivals in love. Nancy Heath in her golf costume is a sight to turn the head of even a cool-blooded creature who sneers at golf as "shinny." How, then, must she affect a golfer?

The answer is to be found in the attitude of all the unmarried and some of the married members of the club. The single men were openly in love with her; a few of the married men secretly wished they had waited longer. The unmarried women, and those married ones either young or aspiring to be so, avowedly admired her and effusively hated her.

Even Stub, Radcliffe's ugly little bull terrier, was her slave. The bane of stockinged calves and the terror of cats, to Nan Heath he was lavish, honeyed puppyhood. His wicked small eyes blinked fondness, and his curt tail wagged amity. Nancy Heath was one of those marvelous persons who at once subtly win the devotion of child and brute. And, as is notable, adult humanity is not exempt.

It was an established belief in the town that De Pont and Radcliffe were the advance-guard in the battle for the affections of the girl. No other man felt in his heart that really he stood a show with these two as his antagonists. Which of them was winning no outsider presumed to say. The two themselves had had no means of ascertaining. And if Nancy was clear on the matter she had not signified her knowledge. Had Stub been a decent kind of a dog, with a passable disposition, he might have informed her that in his language the old saw ran, "Love me, love my master." However, Stub was a canine with a villainous temper. So he took the goods the gods provided him and selfishly kept the young lady to himself.

Sometimes he growled at Radcliffe, but never at Nan. He preferred his master at meal times, but Nan at all other times.

Now it was noon, and De Pont and Radcliffe were the only contestants left. The two men never had gone the rounds together. This situation may have been due to chance, or it may have been allowed by mutual consent. Their scores, of course, were known. De Pont's best was 99; Radcliffe's 98. These records were quite good for the links, which had a rather poor and very tantalizing fair green.

The crowd which assembled after lunch to watch the final match was large, animated and interested. All the golf celebrities of Homeville were present. There was old Jim Duncan, who had played on St. Andrew's—the original St. Andrew's—before coming to this country, and who even yet, despite his rheumatism, could make as pretty an approach shot as one could wish to see. There was Lem Sawyer, whose every-day clothes were golf clothes, and who used any club that was handy—employing a cleek, for instance, when the ball was crying for the niblick—violating the most cherished canon of golf ethics; still Lem had by no means the worst record in the club. And there was Francis van Rensselaer Stuyvesant, whose golf clothes and golf clubs were made to order, who debated long and earnestly with his caddie regarding the club to be used at each stroke, and who as yet had not covered the course in less than 122. And there was Nan Heath, the blue of her skirt and hat akin to her eyes, her crimson sweater reflected in her cheeks, and the sun imprisoned in her hair.

The spectators saw a battle royal. First De Pont was up; then Radcliffe. Fickle victory perched now on this banner, now on that. It was a struggle irritating to the players, but highly exciting to the throng. Both men were in fine form. The course out was taken by Radcliffe, one up; but the course in at once cut down his slight lead, and after seven consecutive holes had been halved, the second last hole—next to home—was attained with appearances promising that the match itself would be halved. Things looked like a drawn game.

At this crisis De Pont made a superb drive. The ball seemed to be headed too far to the right, but caught by the wind it settled to a true line for the hole, and when it dropped its flight had covered fully 190 yards. Then an embarrassing incident occurred.

"STUB, DO DROP IT; THAT'S A NICE DOGGIE"

Stub—who had followed his master to the grounds, and, having been summarily rebuked when, mischief-bent, he had set out after a scampering caddie, had consoled himself with Nancy Heath—having become tired of attending the footsteps of a deity who since lunch had waxed singularly forgetful of his presence, had apathetically strayed on to the course. Here, just as he, suffering from ennui, had about determined to lie down, he was pleased to behold a white ball plump at his side and roll merrily onward.

What a challenge! Now for a frolic! He was aroused. He had chased balls before. It was a sport productive of much hilarity. With a bound he was upon the lively sphere, and had grabbed it in the midst of its career.

On his ears smote a great shout from the distant crowd. This he interpreted as a sign of approval. Another shout, more shrill, distinctly had in it a tone of enmity. It came from the caddie whom Stub saw running toward him in a hostile manner, brandishing a bundle of sticks. With tail cocked defiantly and head high Stub darted off, firmly convinced that no offensive small boy should catch him—not much.

With that satisfaction which thrills every golf player when he has felt his club strike clean and sweet, De Pont, from the teeing ground, had watched the flight of his ball. But when he saw the dash and ensuing cavorting of Stub his satisfaction died instantly.

"Why—I say, Radcliffe, your confounded dog has my ball!" he exclaimed, starting forward. "Make him drop it! Catch him, caddie! Call him, Radcliffe!"

"Hi, there! Drop it! Hit him with a club! Go it, caddie!" yelled the crowd.

"Here, Stub! Stub, come here!" called Radcliffe. The dog, at the command, remembering the program of previous games of ball, retriever-like trotted to his master and laid the ball at his feet.

"Dash the cur!" remarked De Pont, not lowering his voice the least bit, although the terrier really had a pedigree.

"I suppose, considering that he's your dog, you'll have no objection to my driving over again?" asked De Pont.

Radcliffe hesitated a moment and reddened.

"Well——," he replied, and hemmed to clear his voice; "Well, De Pont, to tell the truth, I have. This is a match, you know, or I wouldn't care. But according to the rules, you ought to play the ball from where it lies, you see."

De Pont also flushed.

"I didn't know the rules made provision for worthless curs running at large all over the course," he said. "I wish you'd kindly show me the rule you have in mind."

Radcliffe drew from the right hip pocket of his short trousers a book of rules and opened it. After having glanced through several pages he said:

"Here it is. Rule 22: 'Whatever happens by accident to a ball in motion, such as its being deflected or stopped by any agency ouside of the match, or by the forecaddie, is a rub of the green, and the ball shall be played from where it lies.' Now that covers this case exactly. The ball was deflected by an agency outside the match. Isn't that so?"

"What a shame!" spoke a voice that sounded like Nan Heath's.

"Let me see the book," demanded De Pont. The book was handed to him. "But this rule says also," he continued, "that 'should the ball lodge in anything moving, such ball, or if it cannot be recovered, another ball, shall be dropped as nearly as possible at the spot where the object was when the ball lodged in it.' Your dog was a moving object, wasn't he? The ball should be played from where he picked it up."

"But he isn't moving now," objected Radcliffe stubbornly, indicating Stub, who, panting, was sitting on guard over the ball.

"And he'd never move again, either, if I had my way about it," observed De Pont energetically. "Now look here. I suppose if my ball lodged in a wagon, and that wagon went off a mile or two and into a barn, you'd

RUBIFOAM

BRIGHT AND SPARKLING

RUBIFOAM

Healthful and clear as a winter morning. Every drop cleanses the teeth and preserves the gums. Perfect in action, gratifying in its use.

25 CENTS A BOTTLE

At all druggists'. Sample Vial Free for two cents in stamps.

E. W. HOYT & CO. LOWELL, MASS.

TYRIAN···· Rubber Goods

THE STANDARD

Our successful record of 40 years is due, we believe, to the quality of our goods. You can buy lower-priced goods, but they are not "Tyrian" quality.

"Tyrian" Combination Fountain Syringe and Hot-Water Bottle

Our latest addition to this well-known specialty is the addition of the "Globe Spray" pipe, which doubles its value. In hardwood box.

Sold by all druggists; if you fail to find it, we will mail a 2-quart size direct for $2.00.

A special circular, "Advantages and Use of the 'Globe Spray' Pipe," free for the asking.

Other Specialties: Syringes, Atomizers, Nipples, Air Cushions, Rubber Gloves, Sheeting, Letter Bands, Plant Sprinklers, etc.

Ask your Druggist for "Tyrian" Rubber Goods.

TYER RUBBER CO., Andover, Mass.

Reception and Tea Cards

Correct Styles
Finest Workmanship

WEDDING INVITATIONS
ANNOUNCEMENTS

DEMPSEY & CARROLL

The Society Stationers

Mail orders receive special attention

26 West 23d Street
New York

Digitized by Google

claim that I must play my ball from there. Is that so?"

"It would be a lost ball," replied the other. "And it's not a parallel case; it's unreasonable. According to the rules, you must play from here or lose the hole. I'm sorry, but it's golf," and he set his lips.

"Yes—and that's all," replied De Pont. "Why did you call your dog back here?"

"You told me to," was the cool answer.

This was very true. He had.

Now De Pont did what a golf player ought never to do, but what, nevertheless, the most good-natured of golf players do do—he let his temper wriggle a little.

"I'll be dashed if I play from here!" he exclaimed; and he viciously kicked at the ball, knocking it ten or more feet. At the same instant a sharp whistle sounded. Both he and Radcliffe knew this whistle, for, saying, "If Radcliffe is to furnish the dog I'll furnish the whistle," he had taught Nan Heath to put her two forefingers in her mouth—so, and to send forth the air between them piercingly. Stub also knew the whistle.

With a leap he seized his ball and went tearing off along the course to where, half way to the home hole, a flash of crimson was expecting him.

"Stub! Here, sir," called Radcliffe. De Pont said nothing. The crowd laughed. Then all proceeded in the wake of the terrier.

After she had seen the dog well on his way to her the girl turned and ran toward the flag, tempting Stub to a pursuit in which he was nothing loth to indulge. Within a few moments she was standing close to the standard, Stub at her side, waiting for the players and the spectators to reach her.

"Stub! Here, sir!" again ordered Radcliffe, when he was near enough.

"Don't you do it, Stub. You stay right by me," said Nan clearly. Everybody heard the words. Stub stayed.

"Good for you, Miss Heath!" gleefully shouted De Pont.

"I say, Radcliffe, this is fine. Thanks for the use of your dog. I'll just play the ball from where it is. I lose a stroke, according to rule, by moving the ball as I did, but to make the hole in three will be enough for me. Bogey is five."

When the party arrived on the green Nan called sweetly:

"Oh, Mr. Radcliffe, please make Stub drop the ball. He won't do it for me."

"No, thank you; I'm not in the business at present," responded Radcliffe rudely. "Anyway, De Pont can't play from here, you know. The ball must go back to where Stub was when you whistled for him."

"How do you make that out?" inquired De Pont furiously.

"Same rule, old man," replied Radcliffe suavely. "If you'll read on to the next page you'll find that if a ball at rest is displaced—here it is: 'If a ball at rest be displaced by any agency outside of the match, the player shall drop it, or another ball, as nearly as possible at the spot where it lay.' See? So the ball goes back there where we were when Miss Heath so charmingly interfered."

The girl looked blank, unheeding the withering sarcasm of her angry suitor. Chagrin manifested itself on her face.

"But the ball wasn't at rest," objected De Pont eagerly. "It was on the roll. I kicked it, you remember, and this cur grabbed it. So I play it from where it lies. Isn't that so, Miss Heath?" appealing to his ally, whose countenance had brightened up, and whose cheeks were flaming the danger signal for somebody.

"According to Mr. Radcliffe's own ruling," she said, smiling disdainfully. "Will you please try to make him drop the ball, Mr. Radcliffe?" she a second time asked, stooping to pat Stub.

"I can't make him drop it—he has one of his mean fits," answered Radcliffe.

"Quite a difference where the dog is," laughed a person in the crowd.

"Where the two dogs are, rather," bitingly observed De Pont. "Drop it, you mongrel!"

"Stub, do drop it; that's a nice doggie," coaxed Nan.

But Stub, carried away by his notoriety, simply sat on his tail and leered suspiciously with his red little eyes at whoever approached him. The ball remained tightly clinched between his set jaws.

"Maybe if we walk around he'll drop it," volunteered Radcliffe with sudden urbanity. "Come on, Stub," and he started back toward the teeing ground.

"Stub, stay here," commanded Nan. Stub, flattered, stayed.

Radcliffe colored high and gnawed his lip.

"Why not let me have my drive over again, Radcliffe?" remarked De Pont, winking at the spectators.

"All right. I agree. That's the best way to settle the whole matter. You can have a new ball, of course," responded Radcliffe.

"Why——" began Nan; but De Pont interrupted her.

"Excuse me, Miss Heath," he broke in, "but I have no intention of going back. I merely suggested it to see just how detestable this fellow can be. I shall play the ball from where it lies, and no more monkeying. Look out, please," and drawing his putter from the bag he stepped forward briskly.

"Say; hold on! What do you mean?" exclaimed Radcliffe excitedly.

"Oh, never you mind," retorted the other, taking his stand beside Stub and menacingly swinging aloft the stout iron. "I'm only going to follow the rules. This is a rub of the green. Better be farther away, Nan, or you'll get spattered. Say good-by to your cur, Radcliffe."

"No, you don't!" cried Radcliffe, in dismay. "I won't allow it," and he sprang in front of De Pont so as to shield the dog.

"It's your own ruling, Mr. Radcliffe," said Nan, interposing. "But you will not let Mr. De Pont play the ball from where it lies?"

"Certainly I sha'n't see him kill my dog," snapped the man, brought to bay.

"Or make Stub drop the ball?"

"I can't."

"Then, according to your favorite rule, you lose the hole and the match. The penalty for breach of rule is loss of hole, you know," declared Nan triumphantly.

The crowd applauded. Radcliffe reflected. If Stub dropped the ball De Pont surely would hole out in one putt. The hole was not a foot away. It was ridiculous—but the match was lost, in any event. Playing the ball with Stub's head as a hazard was not to be thought of seriously.

"Take the match," he ejaculated desperately. "I can't beat the two of you. Come on, Stub," and he marched off, full of wrath.

"Go on, Stub," said Nan. Stub, who had hesitated, ran after his master.

"Mr. Radcliffe lost the match, didn't he?" asked Ann Lawrence of her escort, as the crowd was stringing homeward.

"He lost two on 'em, Miss Ann," observed Jim Duncan, then passing, jerking his thumb over his shoulder.

His idea was plain. Behind, to the left, silhouetted against the western sky, was Radcliffe, moodily taking the short cut across the fields for home. At his heels was Stub, presumably with the ball still in his possession.

Also behind, also silhouetted on the sunset, but striking off at a tangent with Radcliffe, were Nan Heath and Will de Pont, headed for the river road—the longest way home.

—the longest way home

ON THE HYGIENIC VALUE OF CIGARS

With reference to cigars, as is well known, they contain more or less nicotine, which is poison; however, if the tobacco is of proper grade and correctly cured and cleanly manufactured, there will be found in such properly made cigars just enough nicotine to be of hygienic value in preventing the smoker from catching contagious diseases, and also frequently cure membranous mucous disease germs. Therefore the United States Health Reports go on record as declaring that cigars can be made (and in this instance have been found made) so as to be healthful, sanitary and of hygienic value.

Inasmuch as we are looked to for unbiased reports on such matters, solely for the public welfare, as an instituted and dependable authority on matters of health for the benefit of the American public—and inasmuch as we have received many inquiries on this subject—and have instituted an examination into this matter and have investigated a great number of the various brands of cigars offered the public, we have found that the "Lucke's Rolls" and "Lucke's Rolled Cigars," made by J. H. Lucke & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, were perfect and came up to every exacting qualification. They are made of finest tropical tobacco, hygienically handled from the very start, and manufactured according to the best methods known to science. Extreme cleanliness is required in every handling, and they reach the consumer with the absolute guarantee that they combine the very best qualities possible to be contained in a cigar.

Knowing the wholesomeness of this product, we advise the use of these goods by all who wish a healthful smoke. Upon the highly favorable report of our Hygienic Experts and Medical Staff we cordially extend to the Lucke Cigars and Rolls our editorial and official indorsement.

A. N. TALLEY, M. D.,
For United States Health Reports.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 2, 1900.

Digitized by Google

The Clerk who makes Friends

By William H. Maher

THE young man who is making his way through the world, depending upon his energy, industry and intelligence to lift him higher, must not neglect to cultivate the study of mankind. No matter how efficient he may be in other qualities, if he is not a judge of men he is doomed to failure.

A man must possess the faculty of winning the confidence of other men and of making them his friends if he would be successful in any walk of life. This faculty, or gift, is born with some. They touch a sympathetic chord in every one they meet, are given a hearing when more worthy men are turned away, and succeed along their chosen lines when men of immensely greater ability plod along at the foot.

If we say they possess tact, we only half express it. Tact is saying and doing the right thing at the right time to the right person. Tact prevents blunders that would make enemies, but does not necessarily make friends. Tact is the form, but the feeling lies deeper down. To make friends, tact must be present, but the heart only can tie the knot of friendship.

The strength of youth is its unlimited hopefulness. Success is just around the corner; in a few years, at most, she will be overtaken; then come ease and luxury! The great majority of those in the race never catch a glimpse of her robes, and the ones who lag farthest in the rear are those whose manners were so unsympathetic or forbidding that the men who could and would have helped them refrained, perhaps at the critical moment, from saying the word or doing the thing that would have advanced them.

THE SAVING GRACE OF TACT

I am at this moment interested in a man who is out of work and who is struggling bravely to find a position. When he is not near me I study how I can help him, and I canvass friends who may need a man and who would give my recommendation some weight. But when he comes to see me he has not talked five minutes before I begin to think that I wouldn't want him near me all the time; and, feeling so, I wonder if it is right that I should commend him to others. He has no tact. He does not permit me to get half way through a sentence before he interrupts me to agree with me, while he proceeds to finish my sentence in an entirely different way from what I had intended. I conclude that it is not worth while to go back and finish in the way I started out to do, so let it go as he left it, but I do not volunteer any further remarks. When he goes away I still wish, as much as ever, that he was at work, but I am hoping that he will find a place without my having to make a special recommendation.

Every young man, with the competition of life around him, should probe deep down into his own soul and learn for himself just what is the measure of his capacity to win the good will of other men. He should be absolutely honest with himself, listening to no flattering tale, but facing the truth fearlessly.

THE VALUE OF INTEREST IN OTHERS

If he finds that, on the whole, he does make friends of those with whom he comes in contact, so that they seem to take a kindly interest in him, he may well rejoice, for he has a basis upon which to build toward better results. His danger will be in thinking that he is naturally so shrewd and magnetic that he need give the matter no further study, but may safely trust to these powers to carry him through any and every thing that will come in his course.

A young man in whom I am interested was told by his employers to make his preparations for a trip over a certain railroad as a salesman. He had been working in the office and had never sold a bill of goods in his life. He had been expecting to be appointed a house salesman, and while there would have had experienced men to refer to, if it were necessary, so that he could not have made any serious blunder. But to go out of the city and be obliged to depend entirely upon his own knowledge and judgment—that seemed a tremendous risk both for himself and his house. But he started on his journey.

When he finished the trip he told me: "I studied it out like this: no man will buy of a man if he dislikes him; as a stranger he will have no interest in him, one way or the other; he must approach the merchant so as not to arouse any aversion, and then do his best to create some little interest in himself. I worked on that plan. I appeared to be interested in every merchant and clerk whom I met. I had to work long and hard many times—in fact, most of the time—to get beneath the crust of their indifference, but eventually I succeeded in getting them to do a little talking about themselves. I showed such interest in this that by and by they wanted to know a little something about me. We grew friendly, and I succeeded in working up a good trade."

SINCERITY AND COURTESY ALWAYS TELL

One of the most successful men I meet first learned that he might be a good salesman by an incident that happened on the cars between Albany and Buffalo. The seats in his car were pretty well taken, so he offered half of his to a gentleman who came in late. The two engaged in conversation, and it came about naturally that the youth told of what he had been working at and where, and that he was going to a Western city on a rather slim chance of bettering his position. As the older man neared his station he gave the youth his card, saying: "This is my address; I have a factory there. I like your grit and the way you talk; if you don't find the place you are looking for, drop me a line and I'll make a place for you in my office."

The young man secured a place and one day told his employer of this incident. The latter said: "That is the kind of work that makes a man a successful salesman; I have been wondering if you wouldn't do well on the road, and I think you may try it." He made a profitable trip, and was a noted salesman until he was compelled to leave the road and take up the management of the house.

How could he do this? His heart was in his voice and touched the right chord in the hearts of his listeners.

THE VITAL NATURE OF FRIENDSHIP

I recall another young man who was visiting in a city for a few days and was taken by his host to call upon the head of a wholesale house that he might see how business was done in that busy place. The young man and the merchant talked together for an hour, and the latter drew from the youth the story of his life thus far and his aspirations for the future. That evening the merchant called upon the host, and as he took his leave particularly requested the young man to call upon him in the morning. He then said:

"Some remarks you made yesterday kept repeating themselves to me after you went away. I think you are possessed of the spirit that succeeds. I want a man in my office; if you wish to take hold you may."

The offer was promptly accepted and neither man ever had cause to regret it.

As any man studies his relations with other men, and analyzes the position in which he holds those whom he meets in either a social or business way, he must confess that he divides these into two classes: those who attract and those who repel him. There is a small percentage to whom he is indifferent, but the great majority are in the two classes I have named.

If he were free to follow his first inclinations he would avoid one class the moment he detected the coldness between them, and would seek his associates and friends entirely from the ranks of those toward whom he was attracted. Experience proves that to do this would be a grievous mistake, and in the due course of business he must not draw a line between men and men, but must endeavor by every means at his command to hold as customers all men, regardless of any antipathy he may have conceived against them.

A man who intends to succeed must have friends. These are not to be bought or borrowed ready made; they must be evolved out of the men and women whom he meets both in social life and in business.

How shall he do this?

I know of no better rule than that given in Proverbs:

"A man that hath friends must show himself friendly."

If this was given as the rule by which a man shall keep his friends, much more is it the law to be adopted by which one shall create friends for himself.

The result of the efforts to make friends is no less important to the clerk in the smallest grocery store than to the salesman in the largest wholesale concern. Both rise or fall by their power to please their employers and customers.

THE CHILL OF AN INDIFFERENT BEARING

A manufacturer told me recently: "The personal equation enters far more into the success of a salesman than was the case thirty years ago, when I was on the road. Our men must make their customers their friends or they fail to build up a paying trade."

Go into a large store where the clerks employed number among the hundreds; watch one after another as you pass their counters and observe their attitude to their customers. While all are intent upon making a sale, for thereby hangs their continuance in their places, nine out of ten have no interest whatever in the buyers. Their manner to the customer is as cold as an icicle; and though they put on what they think will pass as an air of interest, this is so palpably artificial that the customer is never deceived by it.

The tenth clerk approaches his customer with an air of kindly anticipation, shows a decided interest in the goods called for, is probably a little more desirous of exactly matching what is wanted or in finding an exact fit than is the buyer, and seems so sincerely desirous of pleasing and so thankful for the purchase that the customer remembers him, and not only seeks him again, perhaps even at some little discomfort, but is not stingy with a word of praise where it will do the clerk some good.

THE FATAL ERROR OF GUARDING "RIGHTS"

The clerk who is pushing his way has every reason to congratulate himself because so many of his associates and competitors "stand up for their rights." This is an attitude that is very dear to the shallow majority. They may not refuse to do something that their employers ask of them, but they show by their manner that they think they are being imposed upon, and they perform the task unwillingly and ungraciously.

It is not the price

Alone that sells the Ostermoor Patent Elastic Felt Mattress. If that were all, every one would buy the imitation so-called "felt" stuff offered by mail and at stores complete at $5, $6.50, $8.50—almost its price. Do you want to sleep on ordinary cotton wadding which may give comfort for a week and then misery till you throw it out the window? Do you want to buy paste diamonds—even if they are cheap?

The Ostermoor Patent Elastic Felt Mattress, $15.

Is not only inexpensive but good. Will those bold imitators dare to offer such a binding guarantee as this:

SLEEP ON IT 30 NIGHTS

and if it is not even all you have hoped for, if you don't believe it to be the equal in elasticity, durability and comfort of any $50 hair mattress ever made, you can get your money back by return mail—"no questions asked." There will be no unpleasantness about it at all.

Express Charges Prepaid to Any Point

Our handsome book, "The Test of Time," is sent for the asking. Send your name on a postal, whether you need a mattress now or not. It will interest you, anyway, to know about a hand-tufted mattress as soft as the best hair, but which will not pack or lose its shape, and costs only one-quarter as much.

2 feet 6 inches wide, 25 lbs.	$ 8.35	All 6 feet 3 inches Long
3 feet wide, 30 lbs.	10.00
3 feet 6 inches wide, 35 lbs.	11.70
4 feet wide, 40 lbs.	13.35
4 feet 6 inches wide, 45 lbs.	15.00

Made in two parts, 50 cents extra.

"Sent on Suspicion"

Take care! Don't be deceived! There is not a single store in the country that carries our mattress [illegible] every store now has an imitation so-called "felt" which is kept in stock to sell on our advertising. Our name and guarantee on every mattress. Patent Elastic Felt Mattresses can be bought only direct from us.

Send to-day for our book, "The Test of Time."

OSTERMOOR & CO., 101 Elizabeth St., New York

We have Cushioned 25,000 Churches. Send for our book, "Church Cushions."

Artistic Brick Houses

reflect individuality. If you contemplate building, let us talk with you about the superiority of

Hydraulic Front Bricks

Our Old Reds, Grays, Golds and Mottled Effects make beautiful homes at about the cost of all wood, with better style and durability.

Sample Bricks and Booklet free

NEW YORK HYDRAULIC-PRESS BRICK CO.
Chamber of Commerce, Rochester, N.Y.

An Open Fireplace and a hardwood mantelpiece add [illegible] to any home. Write for illustrated catalogue.
ALCOTT, ROSS & SORLY CO.
2926 North Broad Street, Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

They are quick to teach a customer who may have unwittingly offended their sense of their own importance that they have their "rights," and know their business too well to be taught anything about it. They resent any request from an associate unless the task was one distinctly agreed upon in their engagement.

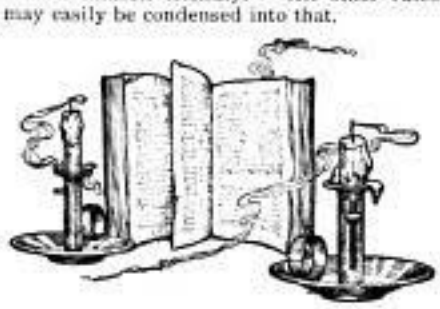
Clerks of this class are so numerous they act upon each other, and always to their own harm. Their employers keep them only because better help is not to be had, and customers go to their counters simply because they must. They make no friends and no progress, and are of very little more importance to their stores than are the horses that pull the drays.

The business man who says friendship cuts no figure in business does not even know himself and the motives that govern many of his own actions. He entirely overlooks the part it plays in the treatment of those in his own store, or from whom he buys his stock. Friendly feelings must have influence so long as human nature is what it is. They will not tempt a shrewd merchant to pay a fraction of one per cent. more to a man he likes than to one who is less likable, but where prices and quality are the same they will throw the order to the salesman who is most popular.

WHAT STARTS THE SALESMAN IN TRADE

When I miss my favorite clerk at the grocery I am quite prepared to hear that he has started in business for himself. All who dealt with him liked him; many have promised that if he started for himself they would give him their trade, and have followed him. His capital in friendship is of far more value to him than his dollars.

The salesman who has been calling upon me for years, and who has won my regard, now tells me he is traveling for himself, having started in business with a partner, and he is certain of my trade to as great an extent as I can give it to him.



There is a class of people who make friends easily but who do not hold them. If they are traveling salesmen their first trip is usually a good one, but each succeeding trip grows poorer till they are dropped. It does not seem to be because they are insincere, but because they do not wear well. All that there is in them is on the surface; they are shallow, and in the first interview they tell all they know.

There are others who are much too friendly in appearance upon short acquaintance. They greet you with fervor, and inquire anxiously about your health, as if their happiness depended upon your answer. They ask about trade with such gravity of tone as if they had come these hundreds of miles to get the answer to that one question. Their manner lacks the ring of sincerity and they are wearisome. You feel that they are acting a part, and you are not complimented that they should think that you are deceived by it.

THE DOLT WHO NEVER GETS ON

By far the larger portion of mankind can think only of themselves; the I, with them, is so extremely large that they spend most of their thought and time in efforts to impress the rest of the world with a proper sense of their fancied importance. A person belonging to this class can never forget himself long enough to take an interest in his auditor. He not only lacks tact, but he is wanting in common shrewdness.

The interest that makes friends must be both kindly and honest. The clerk and salesman must forget himself; must think only of the one purpose, to make the person his friend. This is not accomplished by fawning upon men, nor by echoing their opinions, but by an intelligent acquaintance with human nature that pushes one's self into the background and sees and brings out the best in others. He must follow out the injunction laid down for keeping friends and "show himself friendly." All other rules may easily be condensed into that.

GENERAL W. A. BANCROFT STREET RAILWAY EXPERT

NOT a few of the successful men of America were farmer boys. It was on a farm in Groton, Massachusetts, where he was born, that General William A. Bancroft, President of the Boston Elevated Railway Company, spent his boyhood days. General Bancroft is not yet forty-five years old, but into the past twenty-two years of his eventful career he has crowded more triumphs and successes than fall to the lot of most men in a full lifetime. General Bancroft is popularly supposed to be one of the highest-salaried street railway officials in the country. So well has he impressed the great street railway interests of the country that there recently came to him from Chicago a very flattering offer to leave Boston and manage the surface lines of the former city.

Yet there is not a victory to the credit of General Bancroft that has not been won by hard, persistent work. He has been a wonderfully successful man, whether he be considered as a newspaper correspondent, as a struggling student at college, as the stroke of the Harvard crew or later as its coach, as a lawyer, as a military officer, as a representative of the people, as Mayor of Cambridge, or as the head of a great railway company employing thousands of men and transporting millions of passengers annually. Being a successful man, he has naturally been a leader, and has again justified the old saying that "nothing succeeds like success." In thought, General Bancroft is independent. He is a man of ideas, not afraid to state them, and his executive abilities are recognized by the public generally. General Bancroft's title came to him originally through his command of one of the brigades of the Massachusetts militia. When war broke out between the United States and Spain he volunteered his services, and was made a brigadier and assigned to General Lee's corps. When peace was declared General Bancroft tendered his resignation, and on its acceptance he returned home to resume his duties with the elevated road.

General Bancroft was graduated from Harvard in 1878, and was admitted to the bar in 1881. His rise in the militia was from the bottom. He joined the organization as an enlisted man in 1875, and has served continuously since. As Captain of the famous Harvard crews of 1877, 1878 and 1879 he became known far and wide, winning three of the most notable victories ever achieved over Yale. Every Harvard man knows "Foxy" Bancroft, the famous stroke and coach.

In 1885 he entered the street railway business, and was a most successful manager of the interests over which he was placed. General Bancroft was one of the prime movers in the organization of the present Boston Elevated Street Railway, which leased the West End system, giving them the control of most of the street railway lines in and about Boston, including twelve cities and towns.

Here is what General Bancroft says: "To industry and loyalty to the interests that I served I attribute in a great measure my success in life. I mean by industry, strict attention to business. I came out of college a poor man, and made several attempts to secure work. I finally hit on a scheme of doing a certain kind of newspaper work, and submitted it to the editor of a Boston paper. He accepted it, and I got my first start in life. It was a success, and I felt encouraged. I continued my newspaper work while I studied law, and have always found it helpful to me. I suppose I may say that the position that led up to my present place was my connection with the Cambridge Street Railway, but the fact that I had been successful in most of my undertakings, the reputation I had made out of athletics, military service and municipal administration, largely assisted in placing me where I am to-day.

"A young man starting out in life would do well to remember that in the first place he should be honest—deal with everybody fairly. There's a deal of satisfaction in doing so. Be industrious. Try to be intelligent, and try also to be able to seize the opportunity to better your condition. A young man shouldn't be fastidious about what he does. No matter what kind of work it is, take it and do it well, so long as it is honest labor. It may lead to something better. As a parting word, I would say, in working for somebody else, be loyal to that person."

THE "Macey" SECTIONAL BOOKCASES
(Patented—other Patents pending.)

$1.00 per Section

and upward, according to style and finish. Shipped "On Approval," subject to return at our expense if not better value than is offered elsewhere at the prices we ask.

Absolutely Non-Binding Doors

—dust proof—moisture proof—will not stick or bind in any climate. This is only one of several features that make the "Macey" Sectional Bookcase positively the best bookcase in point of Construction—Convenience—Style—Finish and Price ever made.

Write for Sectional Bookcase Catalogue No. "R-L."

THE FRED MACEY CO., Grand Rapids Mich.
(Makers of Office and Library Furniture)
Boston. New York. Grand Rapids

Card Indexes and Letter Files

We make a complete line, and our Quality and Prices are such that it will pay, and pay well, to write for our Catalogue No. "R-5" before you order.

NO SMOKE NO SMELL

THE ANGLE LAMP
"The light that never fails"

Should not be confused with the ordinary oil lamp, which is really a thing of the past—or should be. There is no point of resemblance except that they both burn oil. The ordinary lamp burns it imperfectly—The Angle Lamp burns it as it should be burned. The result is a light more brilliant than gas or electricity, very little heat, no smoke, no smell, no trouble, and a cost to burn of but a month. In addition to these advantages it has the distinction of being absolutely non-explosive in for all circumstances, which places it in strong contrast with acetylene, gasolene and some other new methods that are highly explosive and have many other unsatisfactory features. The unique advantage, features all the light falling directly downward and outward. Every month scores of these lamps are sold than during the month previous, and thousands are in use in homes, stores, churches, offices, halls, factories—every place where good light and economy are desirable. You can learn all about this really wonderful lamp by sending for our Catalogue "K," which shows all styles from $1.80 up.

EIGHTEEN CENTS

"NO-UNDER-SHADOW"

THE ANGLE LAMP COMPANY
76 Park Place, New York

NO FUSS NO DANGER

GOODFORM CLOSET SETS

Keep clothes shapely, closets orderly and take only half the room you now use for the same garments. Money back if you want it.

MEN'S SETS—$3.00 each, express paid—12 garment yokes, 6 trousers hangers, 2 shelf bars, 1 loop.

WOMEN'S SETS—same price. Two sets one shipment, $5.50.

If your dealer hasn't them, remit to us. Booklet free.

SELLING AGENTS

Boston—R. H. White & Co.
Hartford—Brown, Thomson & Co.
Providence—Callender McAuslan & Troup Co.
Brooklyn—Frederick Loeser & Co.
Buffalo—Wm. Hengerer Co.
Washington, D.C.—E. H. Morsell.
Pittsburg—James Phelps.
Detroit—Hunter & Hunter.
Chicago—Marshall Field & Co. Browning, King & Co.
Omaha—Hayden Bros.
New Orleans—A. Shwartz & Son.
Denver—Daniels & Fisher.
San Francisco—Palace Hardware Co.
Los Angeles—The Hub.
Butte, Mon.—D. J. Hennessy Merc. Co.

CHICAGO FORM CO., 96-125 La Salle Street, Chicago, U. S. A.

"THINK ON THIS!"

You can leave New York by the New York Central at 5.30 o'clock every afternoon, and dine in San Francisco the fourth evening following.

3100 miles in four days.

No other line than the New York Central can do this.

A booklet on the "Lake Shore Limited," containing also a neat and unique descriptive timetable of this wonderful train, will be sent free by addressing George H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

Are You Deaf?

We have 25 kinds of Instruments to Assist Hearing. Sent on approval. Write for catalogue.

WM. V. WILLIS & CO., 134 South 11th Street, Philadelphia

HOPPER'S CAN OPENER

Does perfect work
Easy to operate
No jagged edges
Turns edge of can down
Price, postpaid, 25 cents
Money refunded if not satisfactory

CHAS. G. HOPPER, Manufacturer, - Germantown, Pa.

Dunlop Detachable Tires

Are Hand-made. The strength of the fabric is fully preserved.

THE REPAIR OUTFIT.

Get our Booklet of any Dealer, or of us.

* * *

THE AMERICAN DUNLOP TIRE COMPANY
Belleville, N. J.
Chicago, Ill.

Digitized by Google

Tales of Men of Many Trades

The Belated Wedding

By Charles Battell Loomis

HAVEN'T you got your McDonald Street bills made out yet, Handsome?" said Ed Barnett, of the Breslau Gas Company, as he stopped at the desk of George Doolittle on his way to the locker.

"No," said George sullenly. He was slow and he was ashamed of it. But he was not steadfast, and he was not ashamed of that. A man is apt to be ashamed of the wrong thing.

Barnett hung up his hat and coat. He had been out to lunch. Then he came up to the desk again and saw the big pile of blanks that were to be converted into bills that would astonish people on McDonald Street as gas bills have astonished people since the first bill was made out.

He paused a moment on his way to his own desk. "Say, Handsome, the Secretary wants those bills to go out to-night dead sure. There are a lot of bad bills on that street, and he wants to give 'Bulldog' a bunch of the worst to collect. He'll give you rats when he finds you're behind again."

George stuck his pen into the inkwell viciously.

"Well, I can't write any faster than I can write, and I can't figure fast and get them correct. I don't want to have any sixteen-dollar mistake to pay out of my own pocket as I did last year."

"Somers spoke about that. You tried to get old Heinemann to pay up, didn't you?"

"Yes," said George sadly, for the recollection was painful even a year later. "You weren't here then, were you? I went to his place and told him I'd made a mistake in his gas bill and he still owed sixteen dollars on his November bill."

"And what did he say?"

"He said the gas company had been skinning him for three years and he was glad of a chance to get square."

"Didn't you tell him it was coming out of you?"

"I did, but—"

Just then the Secretary passed Doolittle's desk.

"Ed, I guess George will work faster if you don't talk to him," he said pleasantly.

"All right," said Ed, and went to his desk.

"Handsome," or "Old Handsome," was the name that George went by in the Breslau Gas Office, varied sometimes by "Gargoyle." Each was appropriate in its own way. He had a long, thin face, lobster eyes, thick, round ears set in his head like those of a bat, and a lantern jaw. When he had first come to the office he looked so solemn that the other clerks, who had been in the habit of varying their work with more or less horse-play in the absence of the President and Secretary, said, "Oh, there'll be no more fun now." "He's a funeral and the corpse and the chief mourners all in one," said Walter Hixon, the application clerk, who had a somewhat large way of speaking.

Such did not prove to be the case. Doolittle was not quick at figures but he was quick at devilment. And in an office whose clerical force is made up of young men there is always more or less devilment. It was Doolittle who engineered the famous series of jokes on "Mrs." Watkins, the collector. John Watkins was a mild, ladylike man with sparse Dundrearies and a face like a greyhound's. He was the most guileless, innocent soul that was ever party to a gas bill. As a collector he was a success because women liked his gentle ways, but he had a baby's knowledge of human nature, and did not know how to take the rather wild young men who made up the corps of clerks in the Breslau Company.

There were six collectors in all, and the rest were men's men. They had been let into the practical joke at Watkins' expense. When the collectors returned from their labors they were in the habit of counting their money and making out their lists at a table; and Watkins always sat at one end of it to be nearer the light, as his sight was not good. The leaf at his end was supported by a hinged leg. Doolittle, at a time when he should have been at work on his six-months' statement, tied a string to the lower end of the leg and hung the other end in the washroom.

Watkins came in, blandly smiling, and said "Good-evening" in his soft, maidenly voice. Then he seated himself at the table where the other collectors were already seated; bluff old David Thompson, who had collected for twenty-five years; Joe Madden, the "bulldog" collector, who went after bad bills, and who had a genius for wheedling reluctant coin from hardened debt-shirkers; and the others.

Doolittle was in the washroom, but he came out with soapy hands and bade "Mrs." Watkins a solemn good-afternoon.

"Good-afternoon," said Watkins asininely, and stroked his impossible whiskers with maternal pride. Then he arranged his bills and his money on the table in front of him and began to make out his list.

Just then Doolittle pulled the string; the leaf came down with a crash, and bills, money and list went on the floor.

"What's the matter, Watkins?" said Thompson with mock interest.

"I think the leg gave way," said Watkins in his high treble. And Doolittle, his hands still soapy, came out again and said sympathetically, "Had an accident, Mr. Watkins?"

The office enjoyed the joke hugely, and Watkins never suspected that he had not kicked the leg himself. If he had examined the table he would have seen that such an accident could not have been accidental. Doolittle whisked the string out of sight, and when his hands were dried he helped the collector pick up his scattered papers and money.

It may not be believed, but it is a fact that for three days running Watkins had the same catastrophe, and he might never have found out how it happened if Doolittle, rendered bold by long-continued immunity from detection, had not pulled the string in plain sight of the unfortunate collector. And then Mr. Watkins understood and laughed a mirthless laugh that made Doolittle sorry that he had bothered the old soul.

But though George endeared himself to his fellow-clerks by these and similar pranks, he did not show any especial aptitude for even so simple a calling as the making out of gas bills and the keeping of gas accounts. It is such men as he who on a salary of eight hundred a year become engaged and—marry on a fifty-dollar raise.

Doolittle was not only engaged, but he contemplated matrimony that very evening.

He had not breathed a word of his intention to a soul in the office; the very existence of the young woman was unknown to his fellow-clerks. Young men in offices are sometimes a trifle free in their remarks, and Doolittle respected and loved Miss Esther Woodford too much to wish to hear her name bandied about among men.

He was twenty-four, and he had no family to oppose his wishes; she was twenty-one, and an orphan. She was as pretty as health and regular features could make her; that she was plucky as well may be argued from the fact that she knew what George's salary was. But she believed in his future, being ignorant of the skylarking that was popular at the office. At twenty-one a woman will take risks that would make a woman of thirty-one pause.

Doolittle was a queer mixture of boldness and diffidence. If a practical joke was under way, he stopped at nothing, but he would have as soon cut off his hand as go into the Secretary's room and say, "Mr. Dunham, I want a day off to go and get married." In the first place, Mr. Dunham was opposed to early marriages on insufficient salaries; in the second place, four of the clerks had gotten married within a year, and Doolittle knew that he would never tolerate a fifth wedding without much friendly argument and advice—two things that George hated.

He had arranged it all with Esther the evening before. She was to go to the house of the Rev. Aaron Pettingale, the pastor of the Baptist Church which she had attended since she was a child, and wait there until George arrived at six or as soon after as was possible. Then Mr. Pettingale was to unite

DRAWN BY F. R. GRUGER

"HAD AN ACCIDENT, MR. WATKINS?"

25c. SECURES IT

This is one Magazine you want

Handsomely Illustrated, Original Drawings

SEND 25cts.

Right Now!

Exceptionally Interesting Features for 1900

We want you to subscribe at once

SPECIAL CONTRIBUTORS FOR 1900

Edward Everett Hale, Anna Farquhar, Senator J. C. Spooner, Eben E. Rexford, Hayden Carruth, Octave Thanet, Hezekiah Butterworth, Winthrop C. Packard, Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Nathan Haskell Dole, Peter MacQueen, and many of the brighter young American authors.

SEND NAME AND ADDRESS AT ONCE

We want you to become one of the 100,000 new subscribers to which we confidently expect to add to the subscription list of "The National Magazine."

SPECIAL OFFER FOR 10 DAYS! 25c. pays for subscription to "The National Magazine" until June 1, 1900. Cut a hole in a piece of pasteboard, insert a quarter, wrap in paper, and send with your address. This includes February, March, April and May issues for the year 1900. 25c.

THE W. W. POTTER CO.

Joe Mitchell Chapple, Editor. BOSTON, MASS.

Useful Arts and Handicrafts

A simple and practical series of books published weekly. Each book complete in itself; price 25c. Their aim is to encourage Home Decoration and Amusements. The following are now ready:

1 Design and Drawing for Beginners.
2 Wood Carving.
3 Picture Framing by Novel Methods.
4 Dyes, Stains, Inks, Lacquers, Varnishes and Polishes.
5 Gouge Work and Indented Woodwork.
6 Decorated Woodwork by Coloring and Wire Inlaying.

Mailed free on receipt of price.

THE PHOTO-BEACON CO., - CHICAGO

"Do Not Stammer"

Hundreds of Cured Pupils

"I never saw a more perfect cure than some of those brought to me, and the cure in each case was brought about in a simple, natural and truly wonderful way."

JOHN WANAMAKER.

Send for new illustrated book.

Philadelphia Institute for the Cure of Stammering, Established 1879.

1033 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Have You Read

Mistress Content Cradock?

By ANNIE ELIOT TRUMBULL

"A charming Colonial romance."—Congregationalist.

"A thoroughly wholesome book" giving a "definite picture of Puritan life."—Literary Review.

Illustrated. 12mo. Cloth, $1.00

At Booksellers', or sent postpaid on receipt of price by the publishers,

A. S. BARNES & CO., - NEW YORK

When calling ask for Mr. Grant.

Save on Books. Whenever you need any book, or information about books, write for quotations. Catalogues and special slips sent for 1 cent stamp.

F. E. GRANT, Books
23 West 42d Street, New York City

EUROPE SPRING—To Naples, Rome and Northward to PARIS SUMMER—To Norway, Sweden, Russia and Southward to ...

TWELFTH TOUR. FIRST CLASS. CIRCULARS READY.

WM. T. SHEPHERD, - 378 Boylston St., Boston

Why Not Get Up a Play?

Descriptive Catalogue sent for the asking

WE CAN FURNISH ANY TITLE THAT IS IN PRINT

THE PENN PUBLISHING CO., 923 Arch St., Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

them in matrimony, and, as she had no relatives, they were going to dine with the minister and his wife—a unique way of beginning a honeymoon.

It was Saturday, and George had supposed that he was to have until Monday to get out McDonald Street. There were twelve hundred bills on it, and many of them had back bills to be added. It was a good six-hour job, and it was now half-past one.

Mr. Dunham came up. "George, you're behindhand on those bills. I expect you to finish the street before you go home. Evans will keep the office open if you have to stay overtime." Evans was the janitor.

Now, George should have said immediately, "Mr. Dunham, I've promised to marry a young woman at six o'clock, but if you'll give me until Monday noon I'll finish the street." And Mr. Dunham undoubtedly would have not only given his consent, but would have detailed another man to make out the bills and would have bidden George stay away for a day or two. Certainly no Secretary with as much flesh and blood as the rotund Mr. Dunham would keep a clerk from his wedding because he was a few hundred bills behind.

But all that Doolittle said was, "All right, sir. I'll do them." And having received George's word, Mr. Dunham knew that the bills would be done before daylight. He went back to his room and George pitched into work with vigor.

In an hour Dunham went down to the bank with the deposit and Joe Morton came up and asked George to give his imitation of Daniel Webster on the field of Waterloo, a bit of preposterous impersonation that never failed to win rapturous plaudits from the boys, no matter how often George did it. But George could not be moved. He saw Esther making ready for the wedding and he tossed off bill after bill with almost as much speed as Ed Barnett brought habitually to his work. Even when a Chinaman came in and ordered a ton of coke and Walter Hixon asked him whether he wanted it delivered at "half-past" and then flashed the Chinese letter on him, even then George did not turn his head, although ordinarily the translation of the letter into pigeon English made a welcome quarter-hour break in the monotony of bookkeeping. He heard Wun Sing's astonished interrogation, "Where you get lat?" and Walter's injunction to "Sing it, John; sing it?" but he did not pause in his work.

At half-past four he still had three hundred bills to do and he began to doubt his ability to finish on time. He would have asked Ed to help him, but all the McDonald Street accounts were in the same ledger, so that was out of the question. At five the collectors began to come in, and Nemesis in the shape of Mr. Watkins came to him and asked him to look up an old account.

"Can't you wait until Monday?" asked George, anxiously glancing at the hurrying hands of the clock.

Watkins' tone was sweetness itself, but George fancied there was something sardonic in his answer: "I must have the amount to-night. I'm to go there at six o'clock and Mr. Heaton will pay me. It's conscience money."

"At six o'clock." That was the time that he and Esther were to be united. Six o'clock, and it was now a quarter to five and the Rev. Mr. Pettingale lived down in South Brooklyn, nearly half an hour away on the "L."

Accounts were traced back by the number of the meter when different consumers had used the gas, but George had neglected to transfer the number from the last ledger and this made a hard task of a simple one. Back, back, through ledger after ledger he went, until at last he found it in one of the first books ever used by the company. The account had been marked off as "dead." And a good half-hour had been consumed in the search. It did not make it any pleasanter for George when he reflected that if he had entered his meter numbers on the last ledger he could have found the account in five minutes.

Most of the clerks had gone home in the meantime, and all of the collectors except Mr. Watkins.

"Good-night, Handsome." "That's right. Stick to your work." "Be with you Monday morning, Gargoyle," were the adieus showered upon him. Watkins laughed in his feeble, cackling way, and George felt like smiting him. At last he went away with his bill, and George was left alone with three hundred bills to do and no time to do them unless he postponed the marriage.

He pictured Esther going to the parsonage in her pretty gray dress and waiting anxiously for his arrival. The minister would at first reassure her, and then he, too, would become worried.

Some young men would have shoved the unfinished bills into the desk, slammed the ledger into the safe and shut the door, but George was peculiar in many ways, and one of his characteristics was a pig-headed persistency that seized him at times. He would finish those bills without looking at the clock, and then he would hurry down to the parsonage just as he was, and even if he was late she would be waiting for him.

He did not know Esther.

Evans came up to him at six o'clock with his hangdog air as if he expected a kick and would be disappointed if he didn't get it.

"When'll you be through, Mr. Doolittle?"

"Shut up, Evans; I'm busy."

"All right, sir," said Evans, and shuffled meekly away.

And now as George worked he awoke to a realizing sense of his deficiencies. Here he was, late to his own wedding because he had neglected his work. What kind of a husband was he going to make? Did he deserve such a perfect little woman as Esther? No, sir; he did not. But if this horrid nightmare ever turned out right he would deserve her. He inked his pen with enthusiasm and the bills fluttered from under his hands like so many green butterflies.

It might have been seven or it might have been half-past when there came a tap on the front door.

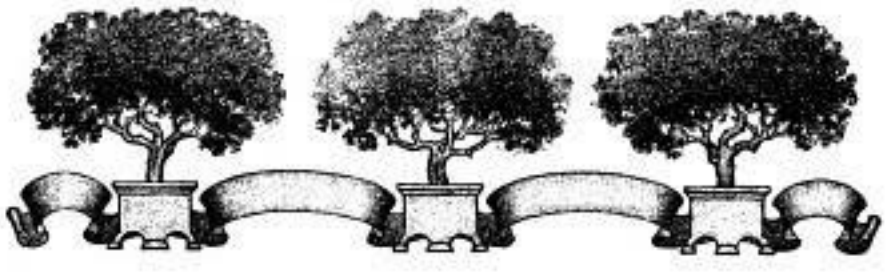
"Who in thunder is coming here now? Tell 'em the office is closed, Evans—to come Monday."

"All right, sir," said Evans obediently and teetered out to the door. He opened it and George heard him deliver the message. Then he heard a woman's voice but could not distinguish what she said.

"No, he's busy. Come around Monday morning," said Evans with borrowed authority.

Again the woman's voice, but this time louder. "But I must see him now. Tell him it's Miss Woodford."

George swung from his stool, vaulted over the desk, and threw the door wide open.



Then Evans was treated to the sight of a very pretty and plump young woman kissing "Old Handsome."

"I thought I'd find you here, you dear, old, hard-working boy. Did you forget that I was waiting at the Pettingales'? Their dinner's cold, and—we're not married. Aren't you ashamed?"

George, oblivious of passers-by on Fulton Street, and of Evans in the background, punctuated his reply with kisses. "I—am—coming—as—soon—as—I—make—out—about—fifty—more—tiresome—old—bills. I—promised—'em—to—Dunham—for—Monday."

"Well, Mr. Dunham ought to have been ashamed to ask it. I think business men are awful. They ought to raise your salary two hundred dollars for your faithfulness."

And they did. But maybe it was what Evans told Mr. Dunham that led to it, and as George has settled down to straightaway work in business hours now, and saves his little jokes for evenings, Mr. Dunham is beginning to talk of promoting him.

THIS IS THE

$2000 HOUSE

Published in the March, '97, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL. It has been built over 800 times, and is only one of 500 studies of Moderate-Cost Homes found in my books.

500 Times

IT HAS

Full Basement, Cemented Floor, Furnace, Ventilating System, Double Floors, 2 Attic Rooms, Laundry, Fireplace, Open Plumbing, Gas Piping.

Select Your Architect Do not spend your money to carry out an inferior design when, by a wise selection of your architect, you can get, at the same cost, the artistic touch that will double the value of your property.

500 Times

Inside Finish: Pine, painted, two coats; Mantel; Ingle-Nook, with seats; 1st Story, Clapboards, painted; 2d Story, Shingles, stained; Complete Pantry Fixtures; Refrigerator; Entry, etc.

My Personal Attention is given for special studies of bright, original and attractive homes, incorporating your own original ideas as keynote of the design.

"The Building of It," 128 page book, illustrated; enabling you to supervise the erection of your own home; to recognize and remedy faulty work. Language simple. A perfect guide. $1.00

Keith's Home Builder, a magazine illustrating monthly at least ten of the latest and best examples of Moderate-Cost Homes, etc. All newsstands, 10 cents copy; year, . $1.00

My Latest Books of Plans, Giving Views, Sizes, Costs, etc., are:

48 Studies of Sum. C'ts'g's,	$ .50		20 C'ts'g's	$2200 to $6000,	$ .50
25 Brick & Comb'n Houses,	.50		111 "	$1600 to $2000,	1.00
17 Practical Stables,	.50		126 "	$2000 to $2500,	1.00
10 Model Schoolhouses,	1.00		110 "	$2500 to $3000,	1.00
25 Modern Churches,	2.00		106 "	$3000 to $4000,	1.00
50 Cottages, less than $900,	.50		90 "	$4000 and up'd,	1.00
62 Costing $600 to $1200,	.50		190 mostly $1500 to $2500,		1.00

WALTER J. KEITH, Architect, 201 Lumber Exch., Minneapolis, Minn.

A FAVORITE HOME DESIGN—BEAUTIFUL AND IMPOSING

Getting to build, at present prices, from $3000 to $4000 (according on the location), including modern plumbing and hardwood finish for principal rooms 1st floor. Full cellar. Send 2-cent stamp for the figured floor plans if interested. Send us any sketch or idea of your own and I will work it up into practical shape on approval, if perfect is plenty and hope to furnish you with full plans. I guarantee all modern ideas throughout. The above design is from Book No. 11, new and full of up-to-date possible designs. Then my other 5 classified books give a great selection of good designs in all costs and styles. Select books according to cost of house desired, but remember No. 11.

Book	No. 6	has 56	designs from	$850 to	$1,500
"	" 7	" 57	" "	1,000 "	2,500
"	" 8	" 54	" "	2,000 "	5,000
"	" 9	" 50	(12 vaults)	5,000 "	10,000
"	" 10	" 87	(39 one-story)	450 "	5,000
"	" 12	" 48	{Colonial / New 70}	1,000 "	5,000

Views, plans, descriptions, dimensions, cuts, with modifications to each. Price, $1 each; any two, $1.50; any four, $2; any five, $2.50; all six, $5. Booklet of 30 sample designs, "How to Start Right and Save Money," 25 cts. (silver). Booklet and 37 other designs, 50 cts. All postpaid.

D. S. HOPKINS, Architect, Dept. "E," GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

The Jewett

Every employer who purchases a typewriter wants one that will last—one that will wear better than any other. The Jewett has the employed in any typewriter. The hanger is that part of the typewriter most used, so it follows that the Jewett lasts longer than others.

Strongest and Most Serviceable Hanger

The booklet illustrates and explains everything. Write for it.

Jewett Typewriter Co., 632 Locust St., Des Moines, Ia.

"Best in the World"

Your Whole Family

Would Be Satisfied

with one of these Surreys. They are handsome, strong, stylish, easy riding and durable. Selling on our plan you can examine it thoroughly before you are required to buy it.

WE HAVE NO AGENTS

but sell all goods direct from our factory to the purchaser at wholesale prices. We are the largest manufacturers of vehicles and harness in the world selling to the consumer exclusively. We have pursued this plan successfully for 17 years. You assume no risk, as we ship our goods anywhere for examination and guarantee safe arrival. Largest selection in the country, as we make 378 styles of vehicles and 65 styles of harness. Catalogue Free.

No. 195—Portable Buggy Harness, with nickel trimmings. Price, complete with collars and black straps, $22. As good as sells for $30.

No. 205—Extension Top Surrey, with double fenders. Complete with side curtains, aprons, lamps and pole or shafts. Price, $95. As good as sells for $40 more.

Elkhart Carriage and Harness Manufacturing Co., Elkhart, Ind.

There are Faber Pencils which are not

A. W. FABER PENCILS

See that all goods are initialed "A. W." before the name of "FABER" in order to get the best from the original factory, established 1761.

A. W. FABER'S Stationer's Rubber Goods, Inks, Rulers, etc., are as reliable as A. W. FABER'S Lead Pencils.

A. W. FABER'S

Round Gilt, Hexagon Gilt and Siberian Drawing Pencils

Have been sold for Thirty Years and more, and constantly improved.

Lead Pencil Manufactory Established 1761

Digitized by Google

WHAT to READ
The Books of the Week

Mrs. Howe's Reminiscences *

TO THE many volumes of memoirs which have recently been given to the public—to the New England public especially—Mrs. Julia Ward Howe has added the Reminiscences of her long and useful life. They cover a period of eighty years, are mainly personal and private in their character, and reveal an astonishingly retentive memory, from which not even the incidents of early childhood have faded softly away. Mrs. Howe remembers, for example, the difficulty she had in pronouncing the word "mother"; she recalls the first seams she sewed, her early writing lessons, and what she said when she saw Niagara at the age of four. The ice cream of occasional dinner-parties dwells vividly in her recollection, and the toast and preserves of ordinary supper-time, and the color of the drawing-room curtains, and the wholesome aversion she entertained for Paley's Moral Philosophy.

It was a serene if somewhat rigid atmosphere in which the girl was reared. Sunday began on Saturday evening, when no amusements were permitted. The unusual indulgence of coffee and muffins for the Sabbath breakfast heartened the young people somewhat for the severities that followed. Twice they went to church and twice to Sunday-school, and beguiled the intervening hours with Mrs. Sherwood's engagingly pious tales. "In the evening we sang hymns and sometimes received a quiet visitor."

After a while, however, there came along a visitor not so quiet—"a noble rider on a noble steed"—to wit, Dr. Samuel Gridley Howe, well known even then for his philanthropic work. Miss Ward was married to him in the spring of 1843, and the young couple sailed at once for Europe. With her usual attention to detail, Mrs. Howe assures us she was cured permanently of seasickness on this trip by the magnetism of her husband's will, which compelled her to struggle with her weakness, and by a "small dose of brandy with cracked ice"—usually the deadliest of remedies. To Italy they went, to Rome—not then despoiled and shorn in the name of progress. On their return home they began life very soberly and earnestly in Boston, where hitherto the bride had been but a "petted visitor."

Her zeal for emancipation connected her closely for years with the New England Abolitionists; yet when the Civil War, which they promoted, had been fought, she went over to old England—never at rest from weary and heroic struggle—to found and foster the Woman's Apostolate of Peace, which seems to have been as influential and as productive of good results as the recent congress at The Hague.

Her long championship of universal suffrage is too well known for comment. Upon this matter, as upon all others, she writes freely and frankly in the stout volume of Reminiscences, not ignoring even the social side of her life, and the amusements, which strike a languid reader as being of an intellectually athletic order. A lecture every ten days seems like severe fun for Newport in hot weather, and only a woman who confesses she "felt the need of upholding the higher social ideals, and of not leaving true culture unrepresented even in a summer watering-place," could have listened to them with cheerful resignation.

Two Stories for Young Folk †

AMONG the host of children's books which the Christmas season brought in its train is a slender volume of tales by Clara Morris and a really good story of early New England life by Beulah Marie Dix. Miss Morris' sketches are pretty, simple little episodes of child-life. They tell the adventures of Jim Crow, a small negro boy with acrobatic talents; of Shins, a ragged philanthropist of the slums; of Marty Many-Things, a half-starved little drudge to whom Santa Claus, in the form of a vaudeville actress, sends a Christmas dinner and a doll baby. The best story is about two little girls who learn to love each other very dearly at school, and who are parted suddenly and forever by the simple circumstance of one family moving far uptown. The lordly indifference of adults to anything so insignificant as a broken friendship is well described, and reminds us of Miss Thackeray's complaint that in childhood "intimacy and companionship depend almost entirely upon the convenience of grown-up people"—which seems a little hard.

The title of Miss Dix's book, Soldier Rigdale, and the sudden manner in which she breaks off her narrative, suggest a sequel to follow—a sequel in which little Miles Rigdale will be old enough to do some real fighting against the French and Indians. The present volume gives us but his early experience in that cheerless colony planted by uncompromising piety on the bleak New England coast. Miles is a real boy, who under more favorable circumstances might even have been a jolly boy. He is eleven years old when the Mayflower brings him over the sea, and he remembers with unregenerate regret the merrymaking of an English Christmas, in default of which he ventures to hope that he and the other children will be granted at least a holiday. But alas! and alas! for such unwarranted expectations. "We stain this virgin soil with no Popish festivals," says Master Hopkins grimly; and the newly arrived colonists work harder than ever from sunrise to sunset by way of proving that they honored not the day.

One glorious episode, however, compensates Miles for all his scoldings and whippings and scrapes. He is carried away by Indians, and for a few days of splendid freedom lives in their wigwams, and has—in spite of fearful misgivings—the good time of his life. Even when reclaimed by civilization there is left the joy of swaggering before less fortunate lads. "'Twas so brave a life I led among the savages" is his cry, and what right-minded boy would not endure greater hardships than befel Miles Rigdale to be able to say as much?

—Agnes Repplier.

By Way of the Cross *

IN SEVERAL respects Mr. F. Marion Crawford's Via Crucis: A Romance of the Second Crusade, is very different from any of the recent stories turned out by the great historical grist-mill. In some respects, on the contrary, it is inevitably quite like the other stories of its type. It might be expected to have as heroine a woman the most beautiful in the world, and as hero a man possessed of all knightly qualities; in Queen Eleanor it has the peerless beauty, in Gilbert Warde the peerless knight. It might be expected to have as incidents flaring battle-deeds and breathless duels; it has the unparalleled duel in an early chapter, the blood-swimming battle in a later one. It might be expected to describe at length the dress and arms of the knights (carefully or carelessly spoiled from the encyclopedias), the food that was eaten, the wine that was drunk, the oaths that were sworn. It might be expected to rouse one's interest in a well-born hero done out of his inheritance by a designing stepfather; a timid, shrinking girl in love with the bold, aggressive hero, but kept from him because of the before-mentioned spirit of evil, the stepfather; a couple of trusty henchmen to help the hero out of his tight places; and, finally, some deus ex machina to make all right at the end. All these things might be fairly looked for in a novel avowedly cast in the mould of the historical romance. Most of them one finds in Via Crucis.

Because it is in at least two respects entirely unlike the generality of books of the sort it is worth reading in a class by itself. It has a distinct, logical, artistic character-development far and away better than anything of the kind I have lately seen done. It has, all unobtrusively, all unpedantically, a definite moral purpose.

The two characters developed in the story are Queen Eleanor, the heroine, and disinherited Gilbert Warde, the hero. Queen Eleanor, as we know from our history and as we find in our Crawford, was essentially self-willed and unrestrained. At the beginning of the story she meets a young Norman gentleman, not yet a knight, not even squire, towering physically over other men, tranquil and strong, born to command. Him she promptly falls in love with; him, to his dismay, she soon kisses passionately. It's a far cry from this unrestrained, loving young Queen to the deeply emotioned, surpassingly glorious woman, who, more Queen than ever before in her life, at the Tomb of our Saviour knelt in the dark watches afar off from the purified maiden knight, her dearly loved, and there prayed "God, let me perish, but keep him what he is!"

Gilbert Warde, at first a simple Norman boy, becomes the blood-lusting warrior, killing for killing's sake without a thought of the why, and then, with many a step in life-weaving between, the serene, all-doing, all-well-doing Guide of Aquitaine, the one man in all the host of the Second Crusade able to lead the way to the Holy City.

And why the change in the lives of both? Here is the writer's purpose; here is the lasting good that comes to one for the moments of great joy that one spends over these pages: both Eleanor and Gilbert learned their life lessons by doing much, by sacrificing all things—Gilbert, comfort, rewards, bodily strength, revenge; Eleanor, love itself. Both came to their full stature by way of the Cross. —C. R. Gaston.

The Archbishop's Unguarded Moment *

IF THE Protestant Episcopal Church contains a dignitary so lost to all sense of humor and so thin of skin that he cannot enjoy a bit of artistic fun-poking at the human foibles to which even Bishops are heir, let him beware of Oscar Fay Adams' daintily satirical volume, The Archbishop's Unguarded Moment. But to the credit of all members of the Anglican clergy who have attained to the dignity of lawn sleeves be it said that they are altogether likely to constitute the most appreciative readers of these studies of the temptations and predicaments which assail those who have achieved high positions in Episcopal life.

It may safely be taken for granted that the scholarly clergy of the Established Church has as quick an eye for a well-trimmed dart of satire as any body of readers—even though the arrow puncture the vulnerable joints of a Bishop's armor.

To those who are looking for the conventional story, with traditional plot, with clockwork movement, and a finale as easily anticipated as the hour which a reliable domestic timepiece is due to strike, these quiet studies of ecclesiastical foibles will prove disappointing. Their satire is too delicate and their construction marks too radical a departure from set story form to appeal to them; but they will have a sure and appreciative acceptance among those who like their pearls of humor the better for being strung on a gossamer thread, and whose only demand of a story is not that it shall "come out right."

The reader who loves a story for its subtler qualities, for the light which it sheds on human character, will have but one quarrel to pick with Mr. Adams' art. No amount of readiness to accept the exigencies and eccentricities of modern "artistic endings" will prepare the way for submission to the half-hearted conclusion to which the last sketch in the volume is brought.

The effect of the closing paragraph of the Dilemma of Bishop of Oklaho is much like the jar which is experienced in climbing an unlighted stairway when the top is reached, and the foot, raised to make farther ascent, comes down upon the landing with unexpected force. The most sympathetic reader

---

* Reminiscences. By Julia Ward Howe. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

† Little Jim Crow. By Clara Morris. The Century Company.

Soldier Rigdale. By Beulah Marie Dix. The Macmillan Company.

* Via Crucis: A Romance of the Second Crusade. By F. Marion Crawford. The Macmillan Company.

* The Archbishop's Unguarded Moment. By Oscar Fay Adams. L. C. Page & Co.

GEBER

A Tale of Harun the Khalif

By Kate A. Benton

HARUN AL RASCHID is a name familiar to every one, but little has been written of his time and period except in histories that are slightly known and almost inaccessible.

This romance by Mrs. Benton is one seriously considered and successfully carried out. It deals with the latter part of the reign of Harun and tells the story of the fall of the great Barmek family.

Geber, after whom the novel is named, and of whose great skill as a physician we have only a fragmentary knowledge, of course plays a prominent part; but the story is not so much the record of one man as it is a gorgeous and splendid history of a court that was marked by a magnificence and splendor not surpassed by the pomp of the greatest monarchs the world has known.

No more fascinating period of history could have been chosen by Mrs. Benton than the time of Harun, nor one about which so little is known and there is so much curiosity.

Size, 4¼x7½ inches. 496 pages. Cover in red, black and gold, $1.50.

For Sale by All Booksellers, or Sent Postpaid.

Frederick A. Stokes Company

5 and 7, East Sixteenth Street, New York

A CORPORATION'S ADVANTAGES over a firm or individual is clearly set forth in the "Corporation Hand-Book" $1.50 Postpaid

"Corporation Management" $2.00 Postpaid gives the most successful Corporation methods adopted by the Rich Men To-Day

Organization Booklet, 25c. Circulars Free

Bankers' Stationery Supply Co., 146 Adams St., Chicago

Ready February 17

To Have and To Hold

AN EXTRAORDINARILY INTERESTING STORY OF EARLY VIRGINIA.

By

MARY JOHNSTON

Author of Prisoners of Hope

Illustrated. $1.50

Sold By All Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston

AD SENSE

Published monthly—one dollar a year. An ad is the right size—the right style—the right kind of literature for business men. For trial subscription, 6 months, send 50c.

Get a sample copy of the newspaper, or send a line to

THE AD SENSE CO., 79 Fifth Avenue, Chicago

Digitized by Google

feels himself confronted with the necessity of concluding that the sketch is intended either as a second Lady-and-the-Tiger puzzle or that the author had not the moral courage to bring the story to a legitimate end. His lack of moral stamina mars an otherwise clever "conscience study."

With the exception of The Dilemma of the Bishop of Oklaho, which is both serious and tender, the sketches are in lighter vein and play upon the secret prides and ambitions which occasionally creep under the sacred robes of Bishops, active and prospective.

Seldom is a more tantalizing situation more tactfully presented than that upon which turns the story that gives to this collection of quaint studies of the Episcopate its title. For the curate of an obscure country parish to rise, by dint of hard work, grace, and patient continuance in well-doing, to the proud position of a Colonial Bishop, is much; to marry the daughter of a Lord Bishop is much more; but to achieve from such humble beginnings the splendor and dignity of an Archbishop's estate is the superlative of Episcopal distinction. Then suddenly to have all this accumulation of glory struck away by an unhappy exclamation uttered under pressure of a mighty and unlooked-for provocation—the outburst of "an unguarded moment"—is to run the whole diapason of ecclesiastical joy and grief! Even if less artfully handled, an episode of this kind could not fail to interest any reader who has the slightest touch of what may be termed clerical feeling. In the sketch called The Evolution of a Bishop is presented one of the most deliciously humorous studies of ecclesiastical life to be found in recent literature. Altogether, these delicate and whimsical sketches make a pleasant and welcome contribution to that small and exclusive section of humorous literature which is appreciated in the ratio of the reader's refinement.

—Forrest Crissey.

Two Views of Art

THERE are two kinds of art: the kind that is addressed to the practitioner and the kind that is aimed at the general consumer. And there are two views of art: that which may be called (without undue pomp) the professional view, and that which may be called (without undue disparagement) the human view. Let us try to bring the two into as close association as may be.

Here is A, who works in the short story. Each piece in his latest volume is, from one reason or another, a technical triumph—is of the day and in the movement, shows a mastery over some curious new form, exhibits a singular deftness and originality in handling, takes in and breathes out again the latest afflatus transmitted by the past masters in the art over sea. Each—save one; and that one is a brief thing—a trifle tucked in at the end as a makeweight. It is deeply conventional in its form, wholly cut and dried in its efforts at pathos, carved out, basted and stitched together after a pattern completely archaic. A offers his volume to Mr. and Mrs. Friend—persons of some taste, judgment, cultivation. They pass over the strained modernities that compose the bulk of the volume to feed their fill on the trivial tailpiece that finishes it. "The best thing you ever wrote, old man," says Friend. "I cry whenever I think of it," adds Mrs. Friend heartily. Disgust of A, who is too narrowly professional to allow due play to the element of the merely human.

B is a conductor. He is shut in by a triple hedge of musicians, guarantors and holders of season tickets, and is the last man in the world to be reached by simple human considerations. His real interest is only in the erudite, the complicated; nothing pleases him and his pack more than a steeplechase over multiplied chevaux-de-frise of technical difficulty—he wills Dvorak, Tschaikowsky, Richard Strauss. A, who sometimes attends his concerts, makes moan: "Where is Träumerei? What has become of the Bach-Gounod Ave Maria? Have you no tunes, no melodies? Can't you give us something with some soul, some feeling?" Disdain of B, who wonders why he should be asked to confine himself to the rule of three after having fully qualified himself to deal with the differential calculus. For, in matters musical, A is human. It is only in fiction that he is rigidly professional.

C is a painter. His modernity is rampant. He is all for handling, values, and plein air problems. He loathes the "literary" picture. To him comes B with this plaint: "I don't care about your haystacks painted between sunset and moonrise. Why can't you paint something that appeals to people—something that tells a story?" Contempt of C, who would sooner die than tell a story in a picture, and who would even tell a story rather than relapse into Prussian blue and bitumen. For, as concerns painting, B, the musician, is human, like most of the rest of us. It is only in music that he holds rigidly to his professional standard.

And here is D, an architect. But why go on? Every art-worker has his two sides: one turned toward the sun—his sun—and the other turned to the shadow. Let each one try to remember that what is shade for him is sunlight for his next neighbor; let all of them try to bear in mind the rights of their patrons and supporters, for whom art, in any of its forms, is by no means a be-all and end-all, but simply a passing diversion in the thick press of more earnest and more immediate concerns; and let the public itself—well, there are several things that the public itself might bear in mind. First, that the artist is supported largely by his pride in his own workmanship and by the approval of a few others in his own field of endeavor who know; second, that an advanced or even an incomprehensible technique such as must battle in its own behalf to-day becomes an accepted commonplace, even to the average man, to-morrow; and third, that the function of the artist, whatever his vagaries, has an importance not always well enough realized; for though he does not rear the walls and roof of the social edifice, he yet provides a large share of the atmosphere that permeates it; and air to breathe is no less important than shelter overhead, or ground on which to find a foothold.

—Henry B. Fuller.

GLIMPSES OF NEW BOOKS

THE WESTERN STORY, as Mr. Bret Harte has crystallized it for us in his best work, is sharp, clear-cut, and soon over; humanity has but scratched the surface—behind it are the mountains, impassive and unchanged. Mr. Ralph Connor has attempted more, and the attempt comes somewhat as a surprise. Black Rock is a history—the history of a community. Behind it is the might of a movement, a creed. In the person of Craig, the missionary, the Christianity of Civilization serves its "tenderfoot" apprenticeship like any other newcomer, and grows up to strength and service. There is nothing cramped about Black Rock; Mr. Connor—we quote from Professor George Adam Smith's introduction—"writes with the freshness and accuracy of an eyewitness and with the style of an artist."—Fleming H. Revell Company.

The doings of a foundling grown up, in the Western border struggles that went before the Civil War; his association with the heroic but distorted figure of John Brown, and last—a chapter full of quiet self-restraint and manly strength—the story of a man who found his happiness in his friend's love, not in his own—these are the main divisions of Mr. William R. Lighton's Sons of Strength. Kansas thrown open for settlement—for settlement and war—was indeed a field for men.—Doubleday & McClure Co.

The lawyers have always had the name of getting more fun out of life than either the doctors or the clergy. Mr. Marshall Brown, himself a lawyer, has given the spare moments of a long and busy professional career to collecting examples of the Wit and Humor of the Bench and Bar. The resulting volume is alive at every page and sprinkled throughout with names eminent on both sides of the water.—T. H. Flood & Co.

In his preface to The Bond of Black, Mr. William Le Queux declares: "The things I have described actually take place in secret, as certain facts in my possession indisputably show." No wonder that he feels called upon to vouch for his statements. The Bond of Black is the secret oath of the cult of latter-day diabolism. How a brave lover was able by his devotion and courage to rescue for himself his sweetheart, and for his best friend the girl he loved, from despair and sin is what the story tells.—G. W. Dillingham Company.

Except that Pierre Debré did not marry an Indian, but a French girl of his own faith, his life with the Indians of Florida almost reminds one of Atala. In The Sword of Justice, however, Sheppard Stevens follows accurately Indian scenes and customs and adheres closely to historical fact. The history of the times in which the story is laid is rich with romantic interest as yet unexplored.—Little, Brown & Co.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

The Fitting of the Peats

NEXT week's issue of the POST will contain the opening installment of S. R. Crockett's new romance, The Fitting of the Peats. The scenes of this exquisite love story are laid in Scotland and France. The time is that of the Jacobite uprising in the middle of the last century. The hero is a young rebel of noble birth; the heroine, the daughter of a loyal laird. The story will be completed in the four February issues.

By S. R. CROCKETT, Author of The Raiders, The Sticket Minister, The Grey Man

NEXT WEEK'S POST WILL ALSO CONTAIN

With Lawton in the Field

BRIGADIER-GENERAL CHARLES KING contributes a remarkably interesting sketch of the late General Lawton, who fell in action last December. General King was his companion in the field and on the march during a considerable portion of his Philippine campaign. He writes of him as one friend would of another, and tells many new anecdotes of his campaign life.

By BRIGADIER-GENERAL CHARLES KING

Molly Elliot Seawell

MISS SEAWELL tells with delightful humor of the strange matrimonial complications of a susceptible Englishman.

Derwent's Love Affairs

R. Lindsay Coleman

R. L. COLEMAN, the man who is acknowledged to be the greatest in the bicycle industry, is the subject of a bright, entertaining sketch.

By Perriton Maxwell

Jerome K. Jerome

ANOTHER of Mr. Jerome's inimitable papers follows the fortunes of his misadventurous wheelmen on a tour.

Three Men on Four Wheels

Hon. R. P. Porter

THE United States Special Commissioner to Cuba and Puerto Rico, contributes a valuable article on the needs of Cuba—political, financial, industrial.

The Needs of Cuba

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

THIS is the title of a series of piquant satirical papers on the exclusive society of Washington. The author is a woman who has the entrée to all the "great houses" of the capital, and she is constantly meeting, in a social way, the most distinguished in Washington. Her racy chat and gossip will be illustrated by snap-shot photographs, taken especially for THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

5 Cents the Copy, $2.50 the Year, or sent by mail 5 months, on trial, for $1.00

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Digitized by Google

RIDING TO HOUNDS

Where and How to go Fox-Hunting

By A. H. Godfrey

IN THESE days of outdoor sports of all kinds no form of energetic exercise is more deserving of attention than the time-honored sport of hunting, by which is meant "riding to hounds."

Fox-hunting is recognized as an institution in rural life wherever the English language is spoken. In this country, especially, the sport has found a congenial home as being peculiarly suited to the energetic force underlying the American character and having just the requisite tinge of danger about it to give it piquancy. It is at once democratic and in keeping with all that constitutes good form. It is supported by men of wealth and those of moderate means, and its followers include enthusiasts of every grade of life. All are alike in the hunting-field, and there rich and poor strive for honor on an equal basis. The instant the fox breaks cover and hounds begin to run, "Ta-a-leo! Go-o-ne away!" is the cry, and then he is first after "Master" and "Whip" whose horse is able to place him there.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF FOX-HUNTERS

In this country the hunting enthusiast has a wide expanse to range over, and the follower of hounds, after wild fox or the elusive aniseed drag, can, without much trouble, find sport enough to satisfy the most exacting. There is no red-tape formality about it. With the indorsement usual in the acceptation of applicants to clubs everywhere, any decent fellow can count upon being enrolled on the membership list of one or more of the hunting organizations of Virginia, Maryland, Georgia, North and South Carolina, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Illinois, New York, Massachusetts and Canada, which affords scope for all the hunting one needs east of the Mississippi. But whether he joins a club or merely wishes to hunt occasionally, as means or time may permit, the enthusiast will be equally welcome. Provided he has heart and hands of the right sort, and bestrides a horse of blood, stride, condition and courage, the visitor to the American hunting-field will be afforded every opportunity to take his fill of sport, and may be sure of a cordial greeting from men whose friendship makes life worth living.

There are hunts and hunting-fields suited to all purses and all ages. Small and large packs of hounds are maintained by farmers and professional men as well as by wealthy clubs, and one can follow a few couples or half a hundred well-trained dogs according to the locality chosen, and that without further expense than the keeping of one horse approaching the thoroughbred type which, in the off season, can do good service as a park hack.

THE SELECTION OF A STABLE

Of course, if more ambitious and you desire to rank with the first-flighters throughout the season at the several hunts, you must maintain a stable of six or eight full-sized, well-bred horses, with their attendant grooms, and so on. For hunting two or three days a week with nearby packs, over a country of small fields and frequent woods, three or four horses of less value will carry a careful man over all the obstacles and keep him fairly well to the front. In hunting, the pleasure is by no means in proportion to the cost, and in hilly districts where the pace is necessarily slow and the difficulties great, the weighty individual on his sturdy cob has just as much fun and is as often in at the finish as he who bestrides the flying thoroughbred. Indeed, the balance is not infrequently in favor of the cob.

But the enthusiast who makes hunting his only pastime and follows hounds every day they can run will, if he is young enough, strong enough, and of stout heart, and can afford it, do most of his riding over a grass country, where fences are far between but high and tough-looking, where large horses are most in request, and lots of galloping is to be done after swift hounds. In such a country wild foxes must, of course, be numerous, and scent must, as a rule, lie strong. But such an enthusiast is a hard rider, and will generally be found farther afield than the novices to whom this article is addressed. I therefore leave him to take care of himself, and write only for the information of those who would like to take up hunting because they happen to own or hire one or two horses that they ride occasionally, and have leisure enough to enjoy a run with a pack of hounds located in their vicinity.

WAITING FOR THE MASTER OF HOUNDS

SOME OF THE BETTER-KNOWN HUNT CLUBS

Leaving out of this purview the history of the sport and interesting details of the several hunt-clubs, it is sufficient to enumerate a few of the better-known hunts. Of all Eastern cities, Philadelphia undoubtedly ranks first in the estimation of hunting men as affording easy access to an extensive hunting section. In less than one hour by rail from the heart of the city one can salute the Master of the Radnor Hunt, and within a radius of a dozen miles of that cosy club-house a man may "a-hunting go" with any one of nine packs of hounds—the Radnor, the Rose Tree, the Lima, the Gulf Mills, the Chester Valley, the Merion, the Donon, the Ortlipp, and the Washington of Valley Forge. Chester County is a veritable hive of hunting men, and Montgomery and Delaware Counties are not unlike it. For if Messrs. Howard Sharp, Gibson, Green, O'Brien and Glenn can give you a run from West Chester, Messrs. Mather, Hill, Dohan, Tarpey and Haley will each lead you a merry chase from Bryn Mawr, Media, Glen Riddle, King of Prussia and Merion Square. Then there are the Royersford, the Phoenix, and the Birchrunville packs, Pechin's at Strafford, and the Lionville, Trooper, Pottstown and Black Rock kennels, and others at Malvern, Pughtown, Font, Tanguay, New London, Gadsburyville, Everhart and White Horse. In Maryland there are the Green Spring Valley hunt on the Reistertown Pike, and the Elk Ridge, or "Old Baltimore," governed respectively by Messrs. Stewart and George. The Patapsco Hunt is in Howard County; Mr. Brice's pack is located at Chestertown, Kent County, and Mr. Clark is M. F. H. of the Overland, Towson.

The country about Washington is hunted regularly by the Chevy Chase pack, and there is, or was until recently, a cross-country, or paper-chase, organization thereabouts.

Of the prominent hunts in Virginia are the Deep Run, under Doctor Tritton's charge, at Richmond; Mr. Barker's pack at Warrenton; a pack at Lynchburg; Mr. Dulany's at Upperville, and the National Fox Hunters' Association, President, R. F. Sturgill, of Richmond.

In South Carolina, Mr. Thomas Hitchcock, Jr., maintains a pack of hounds at Aiken.

In New Jersey, Mr. Charles Pfizer conducts the Essex Hunt at Gladstone, Mr. P. F. Collier the Monmouth County at Eatontown, and James Converse the Ocean County Hounds. At Lakewood, Mr. George Gould and his neighbors, who make up the winter colony at this charming resort, enjoy many a run behind hounds maintained for the purpose at Georgian Court.

In New York State, the Old Westchester pack is maintained by Mr. Eugene Reynal; Mr. Edward L. Smith keeps the Ballston pack; the famous Meadowbrook Drag Hounds are maintained at Hempstead by Mr. Ralph N. Ellis; at New Rochelle, Joe Holloway keeps matters moving; J. S. Tailer hunts a pack at Richfield Springs, and Mr. W. A. Wadsworth holds the sport in hand in the Genesee Valley. Massachusetts has the Myopia Drag Hunt, with Mr. R. M. Appleton as Master, at Hamilton, and Mr. Joseph Balch conducts the movements of the Norfolk Drag Hounds at Dedham.

In Canada, Mr. G. R. Hooper is M. F. H. at Montreal, and Mr. Adam Beck is the hospitable host at London, Ontario.

ANENT THE MUCH-ABUSED DRAG

All hunting is good, but the best is straightaway going, after a live, wild fox across undulating country. These hounds are seldom at fault, and a decisive finish (such as a fox gone safely to earth, or a kill) is assured. Such affords scientific sport and all the hard riding that a reasonable man can demand, and even if the hard riding is of short duration, sportsmen worthy of the name, who hunt for the love of it, and not for the wholesale slaughter of foxes, will derive exquisite pleasure from the run.

Drag hunting consists of putting hounds on the scent of a drag—that is, an aniseed bag, a ferret's nest, or fox's bed or litter—taken by a man across country an hour or so ahead of the pack. In the true hunting sense of the term, this is not sport, but it affords exciting amusement and capital practice for any one desirous of learning how to ride fast and straight across country. It accustoms a young horse to the cry of hounds, and teaches a novice to decide, while going at a good pace, how to get out of a difficult place, and it also gets him into splendid condition for real fox-hunting. Indeed, to be in at the finish of a run with such packs as the Meadowbrook Drag Hounds a horseman must "harden his heart" and "keep his nag's head straight," and few are the packs of fox-hounds that can set a merrier pace.

THE PROPER HUNTING GET-UP

To be well and appropriately dressed according to the season adds much to one's comfort in the hunting-field. The novice, if he is wise, will choose an inconspicuous costume of sombre tint, such as a loosely fitting coat of gray tweed or black Melton cloth, and easy-fitting, well-made breeches of Bedford cord or other appropriate material, and either cloth or leather leggins or high boots of regulation pattern, all of which are procurable anywhere nowadays. Later, as he becomes more experienced and at home in the field, he can adopt the scarlet (pink) coat and white breeches of the full-fledged hunt club member. But whatever costume is adopted, it should be roomy and comfortable, heavily lined for winter wear, and of lighter weight for warmer weather, and the coat and vest should have plenty of pockets protected by flaps. As to head-gear, the high hat or the close-fitting velvet cap may be worn. Gloves may be of heavy kid, deer, calf, dog or buck skin.

WHAT GOES TO MAKE A GOOD HUNTSMAN

To ride to hounds among the first-flighters requires a knowledge of the sport and a knowledge of the geography of the country ridden over, horsemanship of the kind that enables a man to get over the complete course

INCOMPARABLE FOR THEIR GREAT CREAMY LUXURIOUS LATHER WILLIAMS'

SHAVING SOAPS
SOLD EVERYWHERE
Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cts.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cts.
Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cts.
Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cts.
Jersey Cream (Toilet) Soap, 15 cts.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barbers' 3/4 Round Cakes, 1 lb., 40c. Exquisite also for toilet. Trial cake for 4c. stamp.
THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO.
GLASTONBURY, CONN.

The Lloyd Muffler
Cotton, 25 cts.; Worsted, 50 cts.
Made in colors—White, Black, Gray and Garnet. A perfect protector for throat and chest against wind and cold. For Men, Women, Boys or Girls. Easily put on or taken off; fastens in back and front. Ask your dealer for them or if not procurable, we will send on approval.
STRATFORD KNITTING MILLS
240 Cherry Street, - Philadelphia

Warm Extremities, Warm all Over
Warm, Strong, Durable, Handsome are our 81 Large Gauntlet Black Fur Gloves, by mail prepaid. The same may be said of our Dollar quarter Genuine Mocha Kid Gloves in all colors for Women, and our Dollar-half, Seventy-five and Two dollar Unlined and Silk-Lined Mocha and Reindeer Gloves for Men.
Our illustrated booklet, "Glove Pointers," may be had free by mentioning this magazine. It will give you a lot of information about Dress, Driving and Work Gloves and Mittens. We also buy raw furs.
In Black Galloway and Frisian Fur Coats and Robes we are headquarters. Get our "Moth-Proof" booklet. Also Coon, Dog, Wombat, Russian Calf Coats. In Custom Fur Tanning of all kinds of hides and skins, Rug and Robe Work, Taxidermy and Head Mounting we are at home. Get our Custom Tan "Folder."
THE CROSBY FRISIAN FUR COMPANY
116 Mill Street, Rochester, N. Y.

Artistic Dwellings
Is a book giving views, plans, costs and descriptions of 120 Modern Houses, costing from $650 upwards. This is a late issue, gives the best ideas of specialists in home building, and will greatly assist intending builders. Prepaid for $1.00. Sample booklet free.
FRANK P. ALLEN, Architect, Lyon St., Grand Rapids, Mich.

The "CHID" A Crackless Cuff

They are new, possibly not yet in the hands of your dealer; if not, we will supply you direct on receipt of price, 25c. the Pair
CHID CUFF COMPANY, Lippincott Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

A New Idea in Trunks
The STALLMAN DRESSER TRUNK is constructed on new principles. Drawers instead of box. A place for everything and everything in its place. The bottom as accessible as the top. Dress as regular wardrobe. Convertible into ten trunk. Send C.O.D. subject to privilege of examination. Send 2-cent stamp for illustrated catalogue.
F. A. STALLMAN
60 West Spring Street, Columbus, O.

Digitized by Google

Perfect Service

via the Queen & Crescent to all Southern winter resorts

Through Pullman Drawing-Room Sleeping Cars Cincinnati to Chattanooga, Asheville, Atlanta, Savannah, Birmingham, New Orleans, Jacksonville and Tampa.

Send 2c. stamp for booklet on Cuba and Puerto Rico

54-hour schedules Cincinnati to Havana

W. C. RINEARSON, G. P. A., Cincinnati, O.

Uncle Sam's Examinations

for Civil Service appointments will soon be held in every State. 10,000 appointments last year. Chances even better for appointment this year. The National Correspondence Institute has prepared hundreds of applicants who have received early appointments. Instruction exclusively by mail. Particulars about all Government positions, salaries, dates of examinations, etc., free. Write to-day.

NAT'L CORRESPONDENCE INST. (Inc.),
19-02 2d National Bank Bldg., Washington, D.C.

California

Faster than ever

CHICAGO-UNION PACIFIC & NORTH-WESTERN LINE

TWO fast trains every day in the year. No change of cars. First-Class and Tourist Sleepers daily to California and Oregon. Personally conducted excursions every Thursday from Chicago. Illustrated booklet free on application to any ticket agent or address W. B. Kniskern, G. P. & T. A., Chicago & North-Western Ry., Chicago, Ill.

THE MAN BEHIND THE BOOKS

Holds a responsible position. We guarantee to prepare young men and women to fill the highest places in book-keeping, if they are ambitious to advance and will study "between times." Thousands have prospered through our unequaled course of

EDUCATION BY MAIL

in Electrical, Mechanical, Steam, Mining and Civil Engineering; Metallurgy, Art, Architecture, Practical Newspaper Work, English Branches, Stenography, Machine Designs and Mechanical Drawing. Low price; easy terms. Send free to those who enroll now, a complete drawing outfit worth $10.00, or other premium. Mention subjects interested in when writing to

THE UNITED CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
150-56-58 Fifth Avenue, New York, for Catalogue No. 78

BE AN ACTOR OR ACTRESS

Learn this noble profession at home, through the Desberger Method, also Elocution, Oratory and the Memory to retain volumes. "The Art of Acting," with fifty portraits of leading actors and actresses, sent free to all addressing

The Educational Institute of Drama
Dept. D, St. Louis, Mo.

MIAMI UNIVERSITY —76th Year—Superior educational advantages under Christian influences. Address President DAVID S. TAPPAN, Oxford, O.

WEDDINGS Correct forms and how to order invitations for a church or home wedding; proper usage, announcements and calling cards; other valuable points necessary to know in making arrangements for a wedding. 4 cts. in stamps. PANTAGRAPH CO., BLOOMINGTON, ILL.

without using up his horse, and a high quality of courage and judgment. It is not the harum-scarum youth or the hot-headed thruster who cuts out good sportsmen in the first burst of speed that is always in at the finish. Frequently such nuisances soon pump themselves out and are found ingloriously limping homeward over the highways when hounds are closing in upon their quarry. In agreeable contrast to such is the brilliant horseman, well mounted, and sailing over every obstacle as though on parade, keeping in sight of but never running over the hounds, and satisfied if he finishes fifty to a hundred yards behind the "Master." Between the "leader" and the "follower" in the hunting-field there is a marked difference; nevertheless, the man who never attempts to rush to the front may be an excellent sportsman. Of the hard riders, many of the more prominent follow hunting as a sport, and have done so ever since their childhood; others make a business as well as a pleasure of it, having a good or indifferent horse to sell now and then. Some ride for their health, and others because it is the fashion or because they have little else to do, and among them all will be found good men to follow, who seldom take or try to take an unnecessary fence, but never hesitate to negotiate anything practicable when hounds are in full cry.

BRINGING UP THE HOUNDS FROM THE KENNELS

ETIQUETTE OF MEET AND VIEW-HALLOO

On arriving at a hunt it is considered the proper thing to salute the Master by bowing to him in passing, and this is deemed quite sufficient unless he shows an inclination to greet you by a hand-clasp, as he may a personal friend. A friendly nod to the Huntsman (if there be one), who is the right bower, so to speak, of the Master of Fox Hounds, is usual, and the same form can be adopted toward the Whip. Then get your horse among the others, and acknowledge the salutes of your friends, if any be present, but avoid the wholesale handshakings which draw too much attention to yourself and interrupt the proceedings. Don't ask frivolous questions of the Master, Huntsman or Whip, and when the Huntsman moves into cover with a hound or two to scare up a fox don't go pottering in after him unless you want to make yourself appear ridiculous and get your hands and face scratched by the brambles. While near the wood, or at any other point waiting for the fox to break cover, don't "holler" the instant you catch sight of him, or he will likely turn back and you will get sworn at for your pains. Rather let the fox get well away, and then, unless some other man does it before you, stick your hat on your hunting-crop (whip) and shout, Tally-ho! Go-o-ne-away!! as loud as you know how. But don't run after the fox, unless the entire field has seen him, until the Huntsman comes up to where you are standing. Then point in the direction that "Rienecke" has taken, and when the hounds are put on the scent follow them and keep them in sight or hearing as long as you can.

THE NECESSITY FOR FIELD GENERALSHIP

Before the start, take a look over the country and the fences in your immediate vicinity and make up your mind as to how to negotiate the first two or three jumps. If you are unacquainted with the country it will be safest for you to follow the lead of some well-known cross-country rider whom you find near you. The actions of riders across the first field will enable you to pick out a good leader—but do this in the first few moments or you will surely get left, as when hounds have been running straight ten minutes not more than half a dozen riders will be close up to them. The field (horses and riders), if a large one, will be quickly noticed to divide up into troops or triangular groups, each headed by a horseman who seems to have either the best mount or the requisite courage and experience to lead the rest. As a rule, the foremost men will be mounted on typical hunters—that is to say, handy horses of good shape, great strength, and with a rare turn of speed. Their riders have nerve and are quick to take advantage of good or likely ground, set the pace, and, while keeping an eye on the hounds, seem to know the country so well that the moment they jump over a fence into a field they instinctively steer their horses to the best point that will let them out of it. One of these is the man for the novice to follow, but see that you follow him at a safe distance and a little to one side—say twenty-five feet, if there is room. There is no excuse for the duffer who, after kicking a pilot, jumps on top of him should the leader's horse make a mistake and fall.

PICKING UP POINTS OF CLEVER RIDING

Note how your clever leader gets a good start of the field and keeps away from the crowd by trotting along a fence until he comes to a low or open space, then, nipping his horse over it in a trice, is loping merrily over the next field before the nervous crowd have got a gate open. Then notice how your chosen leader crosses a bit of ploughed land at a tangent rather than along the furrows, then by a clever rise at the corner tops a stiff fence into a pasture where the going is a veritable dream. He has picked the spot where his horse "took off" for his jump, and you will have noticed how his good hunter spreads himself at every leap so as to clear everything and land well with his hind legs under him. Thus he is able to recover his stride without straining, and to go on.

If there is a wood near by it is quite likely that the fox will steer for it, and, if so, the hounds may be checked for a moment. In such a case your leader, who may have been contemplating a stiff, high fence, will very likely suddenly turn aside and get into the next inclosure or the road by clipping open with his crop a convenient gate. If you are close up he will swing the gate open for you to catch, and if you are clever you will get your horse through before the bars swing back into place. If you lose sight of the hounds, try to catch the sound of their music "down wind." Your leader, if he knows the country, will generally get you on terms with the pack again. If the hounds get out of hearing it is some consolation to remember that foxes generally turn on their tracks, and if you don't go floundering around too much you may get into touch with Reynard as he comes out of the wood.

HEADWORK IN SAVING YOUR HORSE

If the pace is hot you must keep your horse at a gallop up hill and down dale, over rough ground and smooth. Hold him well in hand, however, and watch out that he does not sprawl and strain himself, and always be prepared to turn quickly, thus avoiding boggy and soft ground. Rather than pump out your nag over ploughed land, take him around the edge of it, where the footing is firmer. Let him trot easily up to and leap high timber, dash over ordinary brush or low fences, creep or push his way through gaps, carefully climb or descend steep banks (in many such cases you had better dismount and lead him), step over narrow ditches, and, finally, when approaching broad water, let him gradually increase his speed so that he can take it in his stride. If you will follow this plan and keep your ears alert for the cry of the hounds you will not be "far out of it" at the finish, and with luck you may perchance get the fox's "brush" (tail).

"Beacon Hill Prints"

IN PLATINUM

8x10 on 11x14 Mounts

50 Cents Each

Send 2-cent stamp for Illustrated Catalogue

CELEBRITY PHOTO AND ART CO., 256 Boylston St., Boston

Wm. C. Sprague, Editor.

$1000 for BOYS

Send 10 cents for 3 months' trial subscription to

THE AMERICAN BOY

A practical magazine for boys. Departments: Short Stories, Successful Boys, What Boys are Doing, Talks on Business—Insurance, Savings Banks, Book-Keeping, etc.). Boys as money-makers, The Boy in the office, store, factory, home, church and school, Games and Sport, The Boys' Library, The Boy Journalist, Printer, Collector—stamps, coins, cards, etc.), Photographer, Mechanic, Artisan, Orator and Debater, Boys and Animals, Prizes and Puzzles. Interesting, instructive, pure, elevating, inspiring.

$1000 in Cash Prizes and a choice from 500 elegant premiums given for subscribers. The magazine canvasses for itself. You need but show it. The best paper ever issued for boys. References in every city. $1.00 a year. Trial, 3 mos. sub. for 10c.

SPRAGUE PUBLISHING CO., 101 Majestic Bldg., Detroit, Mich.

MAKE GOOD USE OF YOUR SPARE MOMENTS

by securing a thorough technical training in your profession. Systematic Home Study will increase your efficiency and ADVANCE YOUR SALARY. Steam, Electrical and Mechanical ENGINEERING taught by mail.

Write for "Handbook 1"

AMERICAN SCHOOL OF CORRESPONDENCE
(Chartered by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts)
Boston, Mass., U. S. A.

Learn to Draw

Classes in newspaper, magazine and book illustrating. Practical instruction by successful illustrators, experienced as teachers. Send for illustrated catalogue, free.

N. Y. SCHOOL OF ILLUSTRATING
114 West 24th St., New York

Geo. Andrew Lewis.

DO YOU STAMMER

Write at once for our new 200-page book, The Origin and Treatment of Stammering. The largest and most instructive book of its kind ever published. Sent free to any address for 6c. in stamps to cover postage. Ask also for a free sample copy of The Phono-Meter, a monthly paper exclusively for persons who stammer. Address

The Lewis School for Stammerers
110 Adelaide Street, Detroit, Mich.

A Shoulder Brace

That really straightens you up—that's guaranteed to do it—is the

Gamble Shoulder Brace

It straightens and strengthens, and it's comfortable. For men and women and little folks.

All sizes—postpaid— . . . $1.50
Special Brace—extra strong—$2.00

NOTE—Send names of two dry goods or furnishing dealers who have not the Gamble Brace, and one will be sent you, prepaid, for $1.25. Your money back if you are not satisfied.

Send bust measure over vest. Send C. O. D., prepaid, for examination if you prefer. Christmas Braces in finest satin $2 extra.

GAMBLE SHOULDER BRACE CO.
Send for Booklet. Dept. A, Chicago

Digitized by Google

THE BULL MARKET

(Continued from Page 657)

aspects of the question then. Barton was filled with bitterness over his "bad luck." And appalled at the size of the loss, at the apparent hopelessness of paying the sum by themselves, she accepted gloomily their humiliating position.

Of course old Blake "paid up." Knight & Turner knew that he would when it came to the pinch. He had merely remarked at the close:

"You have had your lesson, Barton. Better stick to railroading now."

Both men understood what that meant.

Chapter IV

SHE said to herself that it would have been much better if they had been forced to take the blow, not allowed to escape in this shambling fashion. Her father had taken away the blow for her sake, and mercifully to Barton. In his eyes it had been a young man's folly, and perhaps one slip thus early in life would be salutary—would serve to protect his own fortune later.

She was not sure that the lesson had been learned, however. Barton had changed since the day of their marriage, and she had changed, too, since the bull market. They loved each other, but with big reserves. For instance, she admired less blindly. That he felt, and he judged her to be a bit hard. Of course each knew the other's thought. And when at the breakfast table he shook out that sheet of the newspaper which contained the stock lists, he realized the lines about her mouth without looking up.

In the weeks that followed the settlement she refrained persistently from talking it all over, until McDonald began to feel bitter at her coldness. When he implied as much once, she replied frankly, as an equal:

"It's no use going into it, Barton. We sha'n't agree about the matter. The trouble isn't with the loss of the money, nor with the failure in the speculation. I am a stupid woman; I don't know whether stocks are wrong or right. But to me the sad thing, the thing we can't talk over, is that you did something you wouldn't have done five years ago. It's almost as if you made love to some other man's wife—flirted, like Billy Kernan. Something you don't believe in. But to you, the only difficulty is that we didn't succeed—in beating the market."

This was for her a long and casuistical speech. He replied, and before they closed he came nearer to understanding this ethical distinction she had made for herself. By this she held him aloof; he was as other men—both fallible and devious. He began to pass into the shadow of unreality that seemed to pervade her life. She explained her heavy heart to herself by saying that she was growing old, approaching the disillusioned clear light of middle life.

The Ponds had disappeared. Some one said they had gone to Denver; some one else, to Isabelle's aunt in Massachusetts. At all events, they were wiped off the board, like yesterday's quotations. In a way, this made it easier for Mrs. McDonald. The streets of Chicago contained no special reproach. Thus the summer of the year of the famous bull market drew on.

There was naturally no talk of Europe, not even of the summer home. McDonald suggested renting a cottage at Wheaton, near the golf club, but his wife displayed no interest. They went on just as before—the same people, the same dinners, the same kind of talk. Yet, withal, a trifle vaguer, a trifle more vapory than usual. Her eye was too much on her own affairs.

"May McDonald is growing dull," the Kernans said after a dinner.

"You look confoundedly bored," Barton had complained on the same date.

She had merely gazed at him thoughtfully without replying. How could he find any amusement in dawdling on, just as before! She was growing ashamed of Barton; even he felt it—he who had always been a figure of strength and success! Just what he could do to retrieve himself was not evident. Both secretly pondered that subject. She dreamed of something rather heroic, like saving life—some sacrificial repentance; he, of something material, like recouping himself and paying off his father-in-law. Each was equally out of the question, and he grew restless and cynical. He had all he could do to keep the house in Ritson Place going on the liberal footing of old.

It was in July that she began to be conscious of new developments. She would have taken her oath that they were in stocks again. It seemed too preposterous to mention. It would have been easier to suspect any impossible thing. But the house was feverish once more. Hints of anticipations, of desires, floated in and out. Barton was absorbed, and alert, and then—insomnia. There was no longer any question of it in her mind; railroad supplies never kept him awake. For a week she gathered herself for the blow. When he returned from the city one afternoon, creased, dirty, haggard, she spoke:

"Barton, tell me first, this time."

The time had been when he would have refused such a peremptory order. Now he answered wearily:

"You might as well know—I am done for this time. The old man will never stand this."

Her next question was strangely to one side.

"Did father understand that you were never to go into this again?"

"Something of the sort was said," he admitted.

"Stand it!" she flashed. "How can you think of going to him again? I would not respect—I would leave you, if you did such a weak thing."

His eyes glowed dully. Respect or no respect, she must understand—but she had the whip hand.

"How much is it?"

"Between thirty and forty thousand. Nearer forty," he answered grimly.

His tone was that in which he might have admitted second drunk, or tenth, or fifty grains of opium. He had the vice. She saw it in a flash—a vice, something that ate and sapped until its victim toppled over, dead.

"I meant to get even," he explained, ashamed of the triteness of the apology. "I couldn't stand your contempt."

He wanted her to take a share in his difficulty.

"And you thought that was the way I cared to have it come about? Oh, Barton, Barton! how little you know!"

The scales bent now the other way. It was she who had the understanding, and he who must learn the rudimentary facts of life from her.

"If I were only even with the game," he muttered, careless of the shiver that his figure of speech gave her. "I would quit the whole thing. I feel dirty, grimy, greasy. I'd like to feel like a gentleman again, and not like an office-boy who is playing the races."

"You can," she answered authoritatively.

"Your father?" he brought his lips together sourly.

"No! no! Not that!" she exclaimed passionately. "What has happened to you, Barton? That is not the way to get——"

"You needn't finish—I understand," he interrupted. "But I see no way," he continued bitterly, "except to get out. Yet it's only a business mistake, what four men out of five do."

She shot a glance at him which penetrated. Yet in the end they came much closer than they had been for months. She outlined the campaign in a few primary principles: they were not to leave Chicago—that would be too simple; they must sell everything and settle the last score of debts; and—over this he debated a long time querulously—they were to live as miserably simple as they could and save a few thousands every year, to pay back something of what had been given them before.

Wearily they took themselves to bed, neither fully content with the prospect. She wondered if he had not really changed, was not merely bullied into accepting her plan temporarily—until the dice somehow turned up double sixes. For such, she said to herself, was the nature of man.

Chapter V

BUT she held him to it relentlessly. She took upon herself the paternal storm and made it out that the stern plan was Barton's, not hers. She met her mother's tears and entreaties. She selected the flat on the South Side and dismissed the servants. And she explained it to their intimates. The others could divine for themselves. As for McDonald, it must be said that he followed her without protest, although he wanted badly to leave her with the Blakes and to try his fortune elsewhere.

Then the stifling weeks of August began. Their cramped apartment was like a little dusty oven, but she refused to leave town, even for the two weeks he could legitimately take.

"That will come later," she persisted, "when we know what it means to be comfortable and can enjoy it."

Curiously she seemed to be getting a good deal of pleasure out of their life now. She was planning to make the whole thing fit, to have the children at the public school, to save here and there and swell the sinking-fund. The insubstantial character of her possessions began to wear off; she called things "mine" and "ours." The very food was food, not dinner here and dinner there.

A new, tolerable ground existed between her and her husband. She recognized the hardships it had meant to him, would mean daily, and she saw that he took them, that he did not seek to escape from the monotonous vista of ordinary life. She knew now that she had been wrong about the kind of rehabilitation she wanted for him. It was not saving life; it was patience and humility and effort. There was but one sad thing, one unfortunate memory of a brutal handling of others—the wretched Ponds. However, she had to content herself to forget them, to hope that no one else would ever suffer through them.

So she blanched when McDonald remarked one evening: "Pond called on me at the office to-day. He was pretty seedy—had evidently been going it hard. He said Belle is somewhere in the East with the children. He had been hunting a job up in Duluth. I gave him ten dollars."

His wife turned crimson.

"You gave him ten dollars! How could you! Give him a few dollars, like a tramp. Why didn't you ask him here?"

McDonald growled uncomfortably.

"Oh, come, now! Willie Pond always was a fool and was hunting for trouble. Belle was a fool to marry him."

"I'm not sure," she answered coldly. "Willie Pond is a fool and weak—but he hasn't——"

"As I have," he broke in nervously. "You think I have done worse?" he asked sadly.

She avoided the issue.

"If it hadn't been for us," she continued illogically, "poor Belle would have her home and her husband."

McDonald shrugged his shoulders at her logic, but he was not anxious to go deeper into the question of responsibility. He said nothing when she came nearer to him and put her hand gently on his shoulder.

"You see, we have to look out for the foolish ones, the weak—and we are all weak sometimes."

He winced but said nothing. A day or two later he brought word that he had looked Pond up and found him at a cheap hotel, getting over a spree.

"I think I'll make a place for him in the office," he went on; "something to get him started once more, if he can start. I was fortunate enough to save my skin and not go to the devil."

Egged on, perhaps, by his wife's look of appreciation, he continued:

"We might have him here for a time, if you think it would do any good. There isn't much sand in him, never was, and he needs a prop."

So Willie Pond came, shamefacedly, to take up his quarters in the McDonalds' flat. He came and went, circumspectively, gratefully for six weeks, and then Mrs. McDonald broached a new plan.

"I should like to write Belle to have her come on with the children for a visit. We could manage it by getting a room from the people downstairs."

McDonald made no objection. Pond went to the station alone to meet his family. While he was gone, the McDonalds had some talk about the matter. Barton, she saw, had brought himself to take another step, one that sent a thrill into her heart.

"I could," he said, "find a way to get them back into the Buena Park box they had. You could manage the thing with Belle? It

A LONG LESSON WELL LEARNED

The experience of a quarter of a century has taught the makers of the

Remington Typewriter

how to produce the most durable, reliable and generally efficient writing machine.

Wyckoff, Seamans & Benedict
327 Broadway, New York

Yerba Maté Tea

"Helen herself could serve no daintier cup"

The finest health-giving beverage in the world, already used by over 20,000,000 people in South America and Europe, and now introduced into this country for the first time. Digestible, and does not injure the nervous system. Acts as a powerful invigorator for invalids. Has none of the deleterious effects of other drinks.

What is YERBA MATÉ

A tea-like beverage, considered very refreshing in fatigue.—Century Dictionary.

The infusion contains the same active principle (theine) as tea and coffee, but not their volatile empyreumatic oils.—Standard Dictionary.

The infusion has a pleasant odor with an agreeable, bitter taste, and is much used for tea in South America.—Webster's International Dictionary.

In the Southeastern republics, it is a much prized article of luxury, and is the first thing offered to visitors. Maté acts as a restorative after great fatigue.—Encyclopædia Britannica.

Send five 2-cent stamps for sample and illustrated booklet, containing opinions of leading scientists who have analyzed Maté; or, better yet, send one dollar and you will receive, postpaid, a month's supply for several persons.

THE YERBA MATÉ TEA CO., Sole Importers
257 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Simplicity, Durability, Speed, Visible Writing.

FRANKLIN TYPEWRITER

FRANKLIN TYPEWRITER CO.
812 Greenwich Street New York
SEND FOR CATALOGUE NO. 15

LEARN PROOFREADING

If you possess fair education, why not utilize it as a genteel and remunerative profession paying $15 to $30 weekly? Situation always obtainable. We are the original instructors by mail.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL, - PHILADELPHIA

Send for free Catalogue of POPULAR MUSIC

Impression Waltz—Kerby Mills' latest. 25c
Grandfather's Story—A beautiful waltz song. 25c
High School Galop—A dashing two-step. 25c
Bunch o' Blueberries—Two-step, played by "Sousa." 25c. The 4 pieces mailed for 85c. We handle musical merchandise of every description.

Aldrich Music Co., 241 Wabash Ave., Chicago

Digitized by Google

X RAYS

ARE NOT REQUIRED
To show the good qualities of
WHEATLET
They speak for themselves
GIVE IT A TRIAL
It does not irritate weak stomachs and is especially adapted for those suffering from indigestion.
If your grocer does not have it, send us his name and your order — we will see that you are supplied. Booklet Free for the asking.
The Genuine Made only by
FRANKLIN MILLS CO.
LOCKPORT, N. Y.

Floors
If your floors are unsatisfactory is it not because you have not used
JOHNSON'S PREPARED WAX?
Free: A half-pound can (sufficient for polishing 150 square feet) and our illustrated booklet "The Proper Treatment for Floors" to any one having a floor. . . . We manufacture hardwood floors which can be laid over your present floors by your carpenter. Ask for Catalog.
S.C.Johnson Racine Wis. U.S.A.

PURE WATER
How to Obtain It. 80-page Catalogue FREE, WRITE THE NATIONAL STILL CO., Columbus, Ohio, U.S.A.

Wanta Manicure File?
Real emery. Two dozen by mail, 25 cents.
WANTA FILE COMPANY, Downers Grove, Ill.

DON'T SET HENS THE SURE OLD WAY.
THE NAT'L HEN INCUBATOR beats old plan 3 to 1. Little in price but big money maker. Agts. wanted. Send for cat. telling how to get one free.
National Hen Incubator Co., B 26, Columbus, Neb.
Rev. H. Houser made a 100 Egg Hatcher cost $7.00

wouldn't take a great deal. I saw the man who got the place when they went under, and for a reasonable sum down he would be glad to go out. It might put new life into Pond—or he might go to the deuce again and cost us some thousands."

"We'll try him," she exclaimed eagerly. "It's a risk," she added mischievously, "a legitimate risk."

Before the Ponds left the McDonalds' to take possession of their old home, Mrs. McDonald gave her first dinner-party of the new season—a small affair for four. She put into it the taste and contrivance that had made the Ritson Place dinners locally celebrated. The service was not all that she could as an exemplary hostess approve of, but the table was pretty, the courses excellent, and the talk above the average for animation. She had levied on her father's cellar for a single bottle of champagne, judging that Willie Pond's share of one bottle would not be dangerous to his new resolution. She proposed the first toast:

"To the Bull Market."

The men drank it silently, thoughtfully; the women clasped hands under the table. There were no other toasts.

STORED ATMOSPHERE

By Waldon Fawcett

A MARVELOUS new engineering force, second only to electricity in the number and diversity of its uses, has stolen quietly into a most important place in the world of industry. The path of progress along which compressed air has forged during the past few years has not been marked by figures like a Franklin with his kite, or an Edison with the manifold products of his workshop, standing like milestones along the avenue of its advancement.

It was air-driven tools that helped to make possible the rapidity of construction of the Athara Bridge, which did so much to open the eyes of Great Britain to the dangers of American competition. It was a realization of the capabilities of these pneumatic appliances which enabled the Cramps, of Philadelphia, to capture from the Russian Government contracts for war vessels because they guaranteed to deliver them in thirty-three months, whereas the French builders demanded over four years.

Indeed, the stored atmosphere is doing almost as great a variety of work as the electric current. It propels our automobiles, operates our street cars, whisks our letters through miles of underground tubes, and performs almost every service save locomotion for our great railway systems. Finally, compressed air has made possible the submarine boat which is to revolutionize naval warfare.

In no sphere of work is the introduction of compressed air working greater wonders than in marine wrecking. By reason of the assistance which it lends, salvage operations which a few years ago would have been regarded as nothing short of foolhardy are now undertaken as a matter of course. That most interesting memento of the Spanish-American war, the cruiser Reina Mercedes, and the souvenir which we found, only to lose again—the cruiser Maria Teresa—were both secured for us by means of compressed air. Not only did Lieutenant Hobson use countless rubber bags filled with air to raise the Teresa, but in patching up both vessels hundreds of rivet holes were driven under water by means of the pneumatic appliances. Right here, too, was scored another little victory for American tools, for when the Russian naval attaché who was watching the operations at Santiago saw the work done by the novel utensils he straightway recommended that every warship in the Czar's navy be provided with a full equipment in order to facilitate repair work.

It is almost too early to estimate the value of compressed air for the propulsion of automobiles and street cars, but that it has a place as a public transportation agent has already been demonstrated conclusively. Prominent capitalists, who are not only men of millions but capable engineering experts as well, have backed their judgment by investing heavily in companies organized to utilize compressed air in the operation of heavy trucks. In one of these new corporations such men as Richard Croker, Lewis Nixon, the shipbuilder, and Henry W. Cramp, superintending engineer of the Cramp shipyard, are heavily interested.

The autotruck, its advocates claim, will revolutionize the trucking business of the metropolis, and indeed every city of any size. The compressed-air trucks are, of course, quite heavy, but their projectors claim that this is a decided advantage in that it will contribute to strength. Being designed for operation only with a comparatively restricted district, it will be convenient for them to return at intervals to a charging station for a new supply of power. Once arrived at the central station, a few minutes will suffice for the refilling of the storage tanks with compressed air.

Among the people who are acquainted by reputation or otherwise with the brainiest men in the transportation business in America, it is of immense significance that President Vreeland, of the Metropolitan Street Railway Corporation of New York City, has within the past few weeks come forward with the declaration that compressed air constitutes preëminently the ideal motive force for street railways upon short branch lines, especially those that have many switches. Mr. Vreeland is also interested in a company which intends to place in service upon the highways of New York City cabs driven by compressed air.

It was only five years ago that Mr. John Wanamaker, then Postmaster-General, first introduced compressed air for the transmission of the mails by the establishment of a pneumatic mail tube line in Philadelphia. It was almost an absolute innovation, and it demonstrated the entire practicability of the project. Now there are miles and miles of these tubes in the principal cities of the country. In some instances single circuits have a length of from three to four miles, and through these there shoot, almost with the speed of projectiles, cartridges carrying more than half a thousand letters.

To the railroads of the country belong the credit of taking the fullest advantage of the enormous possibilities of compressed air. The principal transportation lines have vied with one another in its utilization. It sweeps the stations, paints the cars, handles the baggage, rings the locomotive bells, signals the trains, stops them, and finally even dusts and cleans the cushions, carpets and furniture in the coaches.

The employment of many of the appliances introduced by the railroads has conferred benefits not only by economy of time but by a direct pouring of money into the coffers of the companies. Thus there have been few bills for damages for misused trunks where the pneumatic baggage handler is in use, carefully lifting a trunk weighing a quarter of a ton into a car in five seconds, and car carpets and cushions wear much longer when the dust is driven out by a rush of air than when the furnishings are turned over to the tender mercies of men armed with brooms and carpet-beaters.

It was one of the dreams of the late Colonel Waring, Commissioner of the Street Cleaning Department of New York City, that the health and cleanliness of the metropolis would be immensely increased if, first, some other motive power than that furnished by horses could be obtained, and second, if some more thorough and efficient method of street cleaning could be devised. These aspirations are likely to ere long be realized.

As for street cleaning, the compressed-air blower has already demonstrated its wonderful serviceability, and there is reason to believe that the demonstration has only just commenced.

The novel uses to which compressed air is being put would fill a long list. Every housewife knows of its use in pneumatic mattresses, but probably very few persons know that it has given the sculptor a new tool which enables him to chisel statues with wonderful rapidity, that it rings church bells in the spires of two continents, and that it hammers the rivets in bridges and ships many times as rapidly as the best workman could do by hand. Up in a little town in Michigan thousands of bushel baskets are made each day by compressed-air machines, and in some of our Eastern shipyards a machine driven by this new motive power sprays paint evenly over the sides of a ship, which thus serves to reduce the dangers of one of the trades most detrimental to health.

Finally, it is interesting to note that whereas half a dozen years ago the total capital represented in compressed-air appliances of all kinds in this country was less than a million dollars, to-day it is a hundred times that sum, and increasing with a rapidity that almost baffles computation.

Perhaps You Doubt that
ROYAL DUTCH COFFEE
Roasted by the Beach Process
(which refines Royal Dutch and extracts from it the tannic acid and other causes of the harmful effects of coffee drinking) is the coffee that anybody can drink without injurious result, even the person with the most delicate stomach. If so, send for Our free booklet and be convinced. It is interesting reading, and will dispel your doubts. All we want is your name and address.
WALTER McEWAN
Albany, N. Y.
Importer and Roaster of High-Grade Coffees.

You Don't Have to suffer with Varicose (or enlarged) Veins, Swollen and Inflamed Limbs.
Our Patent Seamless Heel
Elastic Stockings
Knee Caps, Leggins, Anklets, etc.
Promptly overcome all troubles of this kind.
They Fit Because we make them to your measure.
Small Expense Because you get them from factory at factory prices.
Send for Catalogue, Measuring Directions, Prices, etc.
CURTIS & SPINDELL CO.
"Alley Building," Monroe Street, Lynn, Mass.

Combined Baby Jumper and Rocking Chair
Ornamental, indestructible, and a nursery necessity all the year. It is indispensable in hot weather
For LAWN, PORCH or INDOORS
It's light — it's cool — easily moved — it amuses and keeps baby healthy daytimes, and puts her to sleep at night; made into a chair or bed in a minute — saves buying a crib. You sew or read while baby entertains herself. Indorsed by physicians. A picture book telling all about it — FREE.
GLASCOCK BROS. MFG. CO., Box 31, Muncie, Ind.

The WOODEN HEN

A high-class, self-regulating incubator on a small scale. Fifty-egg capacity. Heat, moisture and ventilation automatically and perfectly controlled. Price only $7.00.
Send for the Wooden Hen Book; mailed free, together with a book about the EXCELSIOR INCUBATOR, to those who name this magazine.
GEORGE H. STAHL, Quincy, Illinois

Digitized by Google

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

May I set myself right with the numerous well-meaning persons who misread my ironical article entitled A Plea for Asphalt?

I am glad to find that there are so many people in the country who love trees; it may be that after a time all people will love them, and then the statute books will contain a law making it a penal offense to kill a tree—except in self-defense. I read the other day of a man who sacrificed a $25,000 house in order to save a clump of trees. All honor to him! It was because there are so many who without thought cut down a tree that may have taken centuries to attain its glorious height and awe-inspiring proportions that I wrote the article, not thinking that Americans would need a chart to explain its meaning.

I am sorry to have been misjudged, but I am glad that trees have so many defenders. May a strong public spirit for the preservation of what is next to man "the noblest work of God" be fostered and spread throughout the various communities of the country!

And the next time I joke about trees I will give due warning. CHARLES BATTELL LOOMIS.

Scotch Plains, New Jersey.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Might a man who at thirty-six years of age feels that he has made a failure be permitted to offer a few remarks?

In my opinion, one of the principal causes for non-success in a business career is the square peg in the round hole brought about by parents putting their son at a business in which he can never take an eye-single interest, if, indeed, it be not totally repugnant to his tastes and inclinations. Nowadays a business man who has made a success sends his son to high school and university, and the young man there perhaps finds that his tastes lie toward the practice of law or medicine, or he may wish to engage in literary pursuits or to enter the ministry. But instead of the parent asking the son what profession he wishes to enter, it is an even chance that after the young fellow laid out his plans to engage in one of the learned professions his parent will, after his graduation, tell him to come down to the store.

And the result can be nothing but failure.

The writer speaks not at random, but from personal experience. When a boy in my native land over the sea I studied earnestly and diligently to fit myself for a certain career, but after going to school and academy for thirteen years I was sent out here to friends with the request that they put me in business. No charge was ever brought against me save that I had no business tact or application. Indeed, strive as hard as I might, I could not give my employers satisfaction, and after being told by two different firms that my services were no longer required I gave up trying to be a success as a business man.

Among my schoolmates in Ireland was Mr. William McClure, the Secretary of the New York Stock Exchange. At his studies he excelled in arithmetic, Euclid and algebra. This was of itself a hint as to where his talents lay, and his coming to America in 1879, working for Mitchell, Fletcher & Co. and John Sigrian, Front Street below Chestnut, were but the stepping-stones to a position in the American Exchange National Bank of New York. So step by step he has risen.

My remedy is this: Let the young man be given his choice of what field of labor he wishes to enter. Do not coerce him or persuade him in any way, and I am firmly of the opinion the number of young men who make success will be larger, and fewer will have to admit their lives a failure. JNO. H. ROBINSON.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

"We generally start life thinking we will build a great cathedral, a crowning glory to architecture, but in the end we build a mud hut and get into it like the earth men," said the Disagreeable Man.

Despite the pessimism of the Disagreeable Man, I think he expresses concretely the idea of most of us. It was not a matter open to choice which threw me in the line which I follow to-day. Money had to be earned. Ten years have passed away and the new year finds me following practically the same line of business through which I first brought home a few dollars. More dollars come my way now, being just tribute, and perhaps will come until—well, no one misses us very much.

Failure? Yes. No heart in it. I get through the day honestly to my employer, but only God knows how monotonous it all is—being here in a false position and not in love with my work. Yet, you understand, I am honest to my employer.

Think of the possibilities and opportunities if circumstances had been favorable for my commencing in a bookstore or thrown in the way of literature. Instead of an automaton, a man with soul and ambition, and, in lieu of monotony, life and personal interest.

Yes, Mr. POST, I'm on the road between New York and Bombay, when my real journey should be from Naishâpûr to Babylon, and until it is, I shall be one of the young men who inhabit the mud hut. But I pray that before it is all over I shall see the sun reflected from the "Crowning Glory" and I shall know in my soul my dream is realized, and that I left failure way behind on the other road.

New York City. PERCY LYLE.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

COLORED COVER BY GEORGE GIBBS

Stories

		PAGE
La Lettre d'Amour Illustrated by Howard Chandler Christy	Richard Harding Davis	649
A Bull Market Illustrated by John Wolcott Adams	Robert Herrick	655
Three Men on Four Wheels Illustrated by Harrison Fisher	Jerome K. Jerome	664
A Rub of the Green Illustrations by F. R. Gruger	Edwin L. Sabin	668
Tales of Men of Many Trades—The Belated Wedding Illustrated by F. R. Gruger	Charles Battell Loomis	672

General Articles

The Strong Young Men of the Administration Illustrated with Photographs	A. Maurice Low	652
Bohemian Days in San Francisco Illustrated by Gustave Verbeek	Bret Harte	660
The Fireship Illustrated by Norval Marchand	George Gibbs	661
The Call of the Country	Charles M. Skinner	666
The Clerk Who Makes Friends	William H. Maher	670
Riding to Hounds Illustrated with Photographs	A. H. Godfrey	676
The Old Daguerreotypes (Poem)	Joe Lincoln	652
His Proposal (Poem)	Kate Masterson	666
Stored Atmosphere	Waldon Fawcett	679

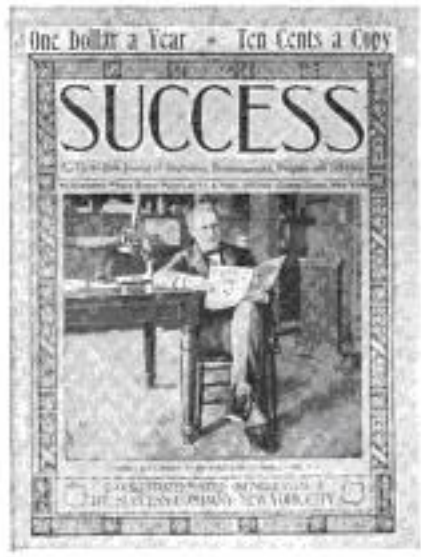
Departments



Editorials		662
Judging a Flock by the Black Sheep	Clinton Rogers Woodruff
The Poet and the Poet Laureate	Lynn Roby Meekins
A Plan to Abolish the Kitchen	Robert Ellis Thompson
The Cross-Cut Path to Riches	Herbert Bashford
The Age of the Fighters	Webster Wallace
Men and Women of the Hour Illustrated with Photographs		658
"Publick Occurrences" that are Making History Illustrated with Photographs		663
At the English Capital	E. W. Sabel	667
Books	Agnes Repplier
What to Read	C. R. Gaston, Forrest Crissey, Henry B. Fuller	674
Letters to the Editor		680

15 CENTS For a Trial Subscription

SUCCESS is a large and handsome monthly, superbly illustrated. Its unique contents, which are the product of the best talent in the land, are extraordinarily interesting and valuable. No matter what your age, sex or position in life may be, you need SUCCESS, the most helpful and inspiring publication in the world. A trial will prove it; hence, to introduce it into new homes,

We will send SUCCESS Three Months for 15 Cents

Stamps accepted in payment

ADMIRAL SCHLEY says: "SUCCESS is the best publication I have ever seen."

REV. DR. WITHROW, of Boston, says: "SUCCESS is the most useful periodical in the world."

DR. TALMAGE says: "SUCCESS is an ideal family magazine for American homes."

An Ideal Family Magazine

In every number SUCCESS gives a wide and varied assortment of delightful and useful reading—always something exceedingly good for every member of the family. It is truly an ideal family magazine.

Among the noted contributors to the January and February numbers of SUCCESS are Chauncey M. Depew, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Henry Watterson, Hezekiah Butterworth, Whitelaw Reid, Marshall P. Wilder, Mary A. Livermore, Edward Atkinson, Lyman J. Gage, and others. There are good stories, strong editorials, etc. Profusely illustrated. Printed on fine paper, with handsome cover.

$1.00 a Year. 10 Cents a Copy

AGENTS WANTED

We want an Agent in every community, office, store and school-room. We pay liberal commission to any one who sends two or more yearly subscriptions to SUCCESS. No previous experience in taking subscriptions necessary, and it will not interfere with one's regular work. We offer easy, pleasant and very profitable employment to those who can give a portion or all of their time to it. Send for our terms to agents, subscription receipts and complete outfit—ALL FREE. Address

THE SUCCESS COMPANY, Nos. 7 to 29 Cooper Union, New York City

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

I firmly believe that any young man who is blessed with good health and fails has but himself to blame for his failure. To-day he who would learn has opportunities at every hand to gain a good education if he cares to give a little time to study. A man with a good education need never fail. If he does it is his own fault. The success or failure of any man rests not upon the accident of birth, the lucky opportunity, or by the pulling or shoving of powerful or influential friends or relatives, but simply and absolutely upon himself. If a man awakens the spirit within and can say to himself that he will not fail, then success will surely be his. It may not come to him in years, but it will be sure, however slow. Right here it may be well to state that there are several kinds of success, but that is altogether another matter. The success I mean is that for which most men crave—that of wealth and power. It has been my good fortune to come in contact with a great many young men who have not failed, and some, I regret to say, who have, but I have yet to hear one of the latter class accuse anybody but himself for his lack of success. There is one case which comes to my mind now that I would like to use to illustrate my point of view.

Eight years ago there was working in one of the large factories in New Haven, Connecticut, a young man twenty years of age. He had been employed there for three years and was then earning wages of seven dollars a week. His education was meagre, having left school when thirteen years old, and the only tools he possessed with which he was to fashion a successful life were good health and a bulldog tenacity of purpose. One day this young man, who had an almost uncontrollable temper, got into a disgraceful altercation with an Italian fellow-laborer, and the latter received a sound thrashing. The young man was called before the official head of that great human beehive, who gave his pugnacious employee his walking papers with this kindly and sterling advice: "You have broken one of the rules of the company and must leave our employ, and I desire to say to you that you might just as well go now as any time, for you will never make a success of yourself here or anywhere else."

As he walked away the words of his former employer kept ringing in his ears. Was it so, then, that he would never make a success of anything? Going upon a wharf which ran out into the harbor, this young man threw his dinner pail as far as he could away from him and took a solemn oath that henceforth he would never fail, no matter what he undertook to do. Seven years from that time he walked into the office of the manager of the factory and made that astounded official a liberal offer for the large share of the stock in the concern. It was only eight years before when he threw away his dinner pail, yet to-day this young man is a lawyer of prominence in the large city where he has taken up his life's work. Last year his practice brought him in over six thousand dollars, and it is constantly increasing. He has begun to be a power in politics, has represented his city in the State Assembly, and stands directly in line for Congress.

How did he do it? Here is what he told me one day: "A man to get up in the world must have an education. Everything else being equal, the educated man will distance his fellow-man. I realized this, and set about it by doing reportorial work at night and studying in the daytime. I entered a law school not knowing where my tuition was coming from, let alone my board and lodging, but I kept up my reportorial work to pay my way, and finally graduated. In the mean time I was studying the Bible diligently and soon became convinced that I ought to become a Christian. This I did, and since then have faithfully tried to live as one. After this it was not so hard. I have known what it is to be hungry and cold, but through it all I never failed to say to myself, 'I shall succeed.'"

But few of us are doing what we love to do, but this should not keep us from having our heart in our work. All things are not so arranged here that we are allowed to do just what we wish to. If it were so everybody would eventually wear the garb of mediocrity, because there would be no striving for higher and better things, and men would rest, which would result in a state of inaction, and finally chaos. If man makes the best of himself, no matter where he may be placed, he is doing just what God has willed.

If the young men of to-day would be the successful men of to-morrow they must first decide that they will succeed, put their trust in Him who fashions all successes, and then, whatever they do, do it well.

The goal is sure, but the making of it is in their own hands. JOHN F. BRONSON.

Waterbury, Connecticut.

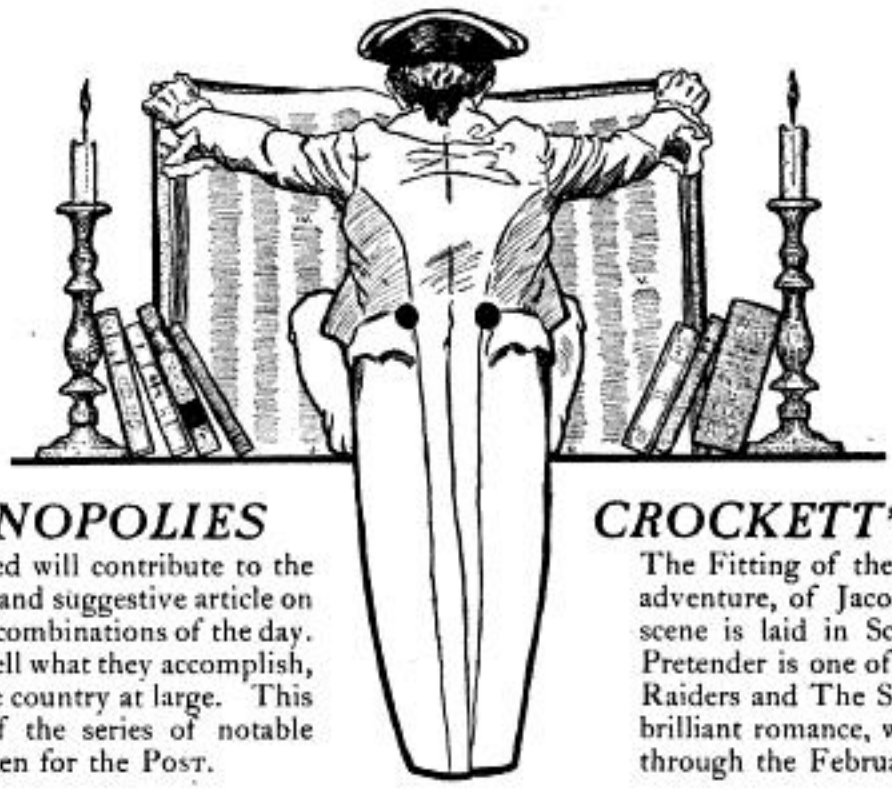
Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Has it never been observed by the writers of the series "Why Young Men Fail" that it is a negative question, and that the answers in no way say how to succeed, although many have presumed so? Granting that every man had the elements of success and knew how to use them, it does not follow that they would be successful. Is it not a fact that most of us are destined to fail in business? Does not experience prove this? Can we all be superintendents or managers?

There is beyond doubt an element of luck in business success. How many successful men know themselves why they succeeded? Is there one who can tell exactly how he achieved wealth and position? No. The articles have generalized, but there has been no definite and precise answer, for the simple reason that there can be none.

But is not personal influence a great factor of success? In the language of politics, a "pull" is the most potent means of success. Hundreds of young men to-day owe their positions to this influence. Why not have some sage attempt to answer the question, "How can I succeed?"

New York City. OTTO HENSCHEL.



Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Founded A° D' 1728 by Benjamin Franklin

The Post
FOR FEBRUARY

THE four February numbers of the Post will contain some of the most notable articles and short stories of the year. In each of these numbers there will be much that will make a strong appeal to YOU. The list below is but a partial one.

What will $2.50 buy?

FIFTY-TWO copies of the best weekly magazine published, containing hundreds of stories and articles by the greatest living writers in every field of literary activity. The Saturday Evening Post is the only magazine in the world that gives for five cents each week the best work of the best writers and artists.

MR. REED ON MONOPOLIES

The Honorable Thomas B. Reed will contribute to the Post of February 10 a valuable and suggestive article on the great business and industrial combinations of the day. He will explain why they exist, tell what they accomplish, and discuss their effect upon the country at large. This is easily the most important of the series of notable articles that Mr. Reed has written for the Post.

CROCKETT'S NEW ROMANCE

The Fitting of the Peats is a dashing story of love and adventure, of Jacobite plots and hard fighting. The scene is laid in Scotland and France, and the young Pretender is one of the characters. The author of The Raiders and The Stickit Minister is at his best in this brilliant romance, which is to begin next week and run through the February numbers of the Post.

OTHER SPECIAL ARTICLES IN FEBRUARY NUMBERS

COLONEL A. K. McCLURE

Colonel McClure's next paper in his series, How We Make Presidents, is entitled Lincoln's Two Campaigns. He gives an insider's view of these remarkable Presidential battles, in which he himself bore a prominent part.

JULIUS CHAMBERS

One of the most successful newspaper men in the country opens a new series, Famous Feats of Journalism, with a remarkable paper on A Visit to a Mad World.

EX-SENATOR INGALLS

Ex-Senator Ingalls is undoubtedly the most popular political writer of the day. His next paper will describe The Stormy Days of the Electoral Commission.

HON. R. P. PORTER

The United States Special Commissioner to Cuba writes authoritatively on The Needs of Cuba—political, financial, industrial. This paper will appear in the Post of February 3.

A NEW CONGRESSMAN'S WIFE

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife will run through the February numbers. It will continue to discuss the Nation's notables as they impress a clever woman who meets them daily in Washington society.

FOR YOUNG MEN

Several important articles directed particularly to young business men will appear in the near future. They have been written by business men who have discovered the secrets of success.

HON. THOMAS G. HAYES

Putting a City on a Business Basis is the title of a valuable article on Municipal Economy, by the Mayor of Baltimore.

300,000 MILES WITH HENRY WARD BEECHER

Major James B. Pond, for years the lecture manager, traveling companion and intimate friend of the late Henry Ward Beecher, now writes of his acquaintance with the most famous of all American clergymen. Such a faithful Boswell was Major Pond that he had his stenographer take down in shorthand much that was said by Mr. Beecher in familiar conversation. This matter he has supplemented with his personal recollections and many hitherto unpublished anecdotes. The first of Major Pond's delightful papers on the great preacher will appear in the Post next month.

PRACTICAL POLITICS FOR YOUNG MEN

Judge Nathaniel C. Sears, one of the foremost jurists of the West, will contribute to early numbers of the Post a series of three exceptionally interesting papers on Practical Politics for Young Men. Judge Sears has long been a power for good in Chicago politics, and he knows the workings of politics as well as any man in the Middle West.

Five Cents the Copy, $2.50 the Year, or sent by mail Five Months, on trial, for $1.00

$208 FOR A MONTH'S WORK

A young man in Rochester, New York, writes: "Some time ago I saw a notice in the Post saying that agents were wanted in various parts of the country to represent the magazine. I had been looking for some profitable employment and decided to take up the work, though it was entirely new to me. Counting the cash prize which you sent me, I earned $208.00 in a little more than a month. This is the largest sum of money I have ever earned in that length of time, and you may depend upon it I shall continue." What this young man accomplished is being done by many other young people throughout the country. The "prize" which he refers to was one of 170 cash awards, amounting to $3000, which were paid to Post agents, in addition to the commission paid upon each order. We have just arranged another offer similar in character, but in which $18,000 will be given to 764 persons. It is within the power of any one, with a little effort in spare hours, to secure a part of this sum, and a very liberal commission will also be paid upon each order when it is sent. All the necessary information will be sent by the Post Circulation Bureau.

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

OTHER STORIES IN EARLY NUMBERS

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS

Mr. Harris will contribute to an early number his second story based upon war-time history. In the Order of Providence is the personal story of the man who took the life of President Lincoln.

BRET HARTE

Two stories by Bret Harte, both of them dealing with California life in the days of the gold seekers, will appear in early numbers of the Post.

A. T. QUILLER-COUCH (Q)

Two strong short stories of love and adventure from the pen of "Q" will be features of early issues.

JOHN A. BARRY

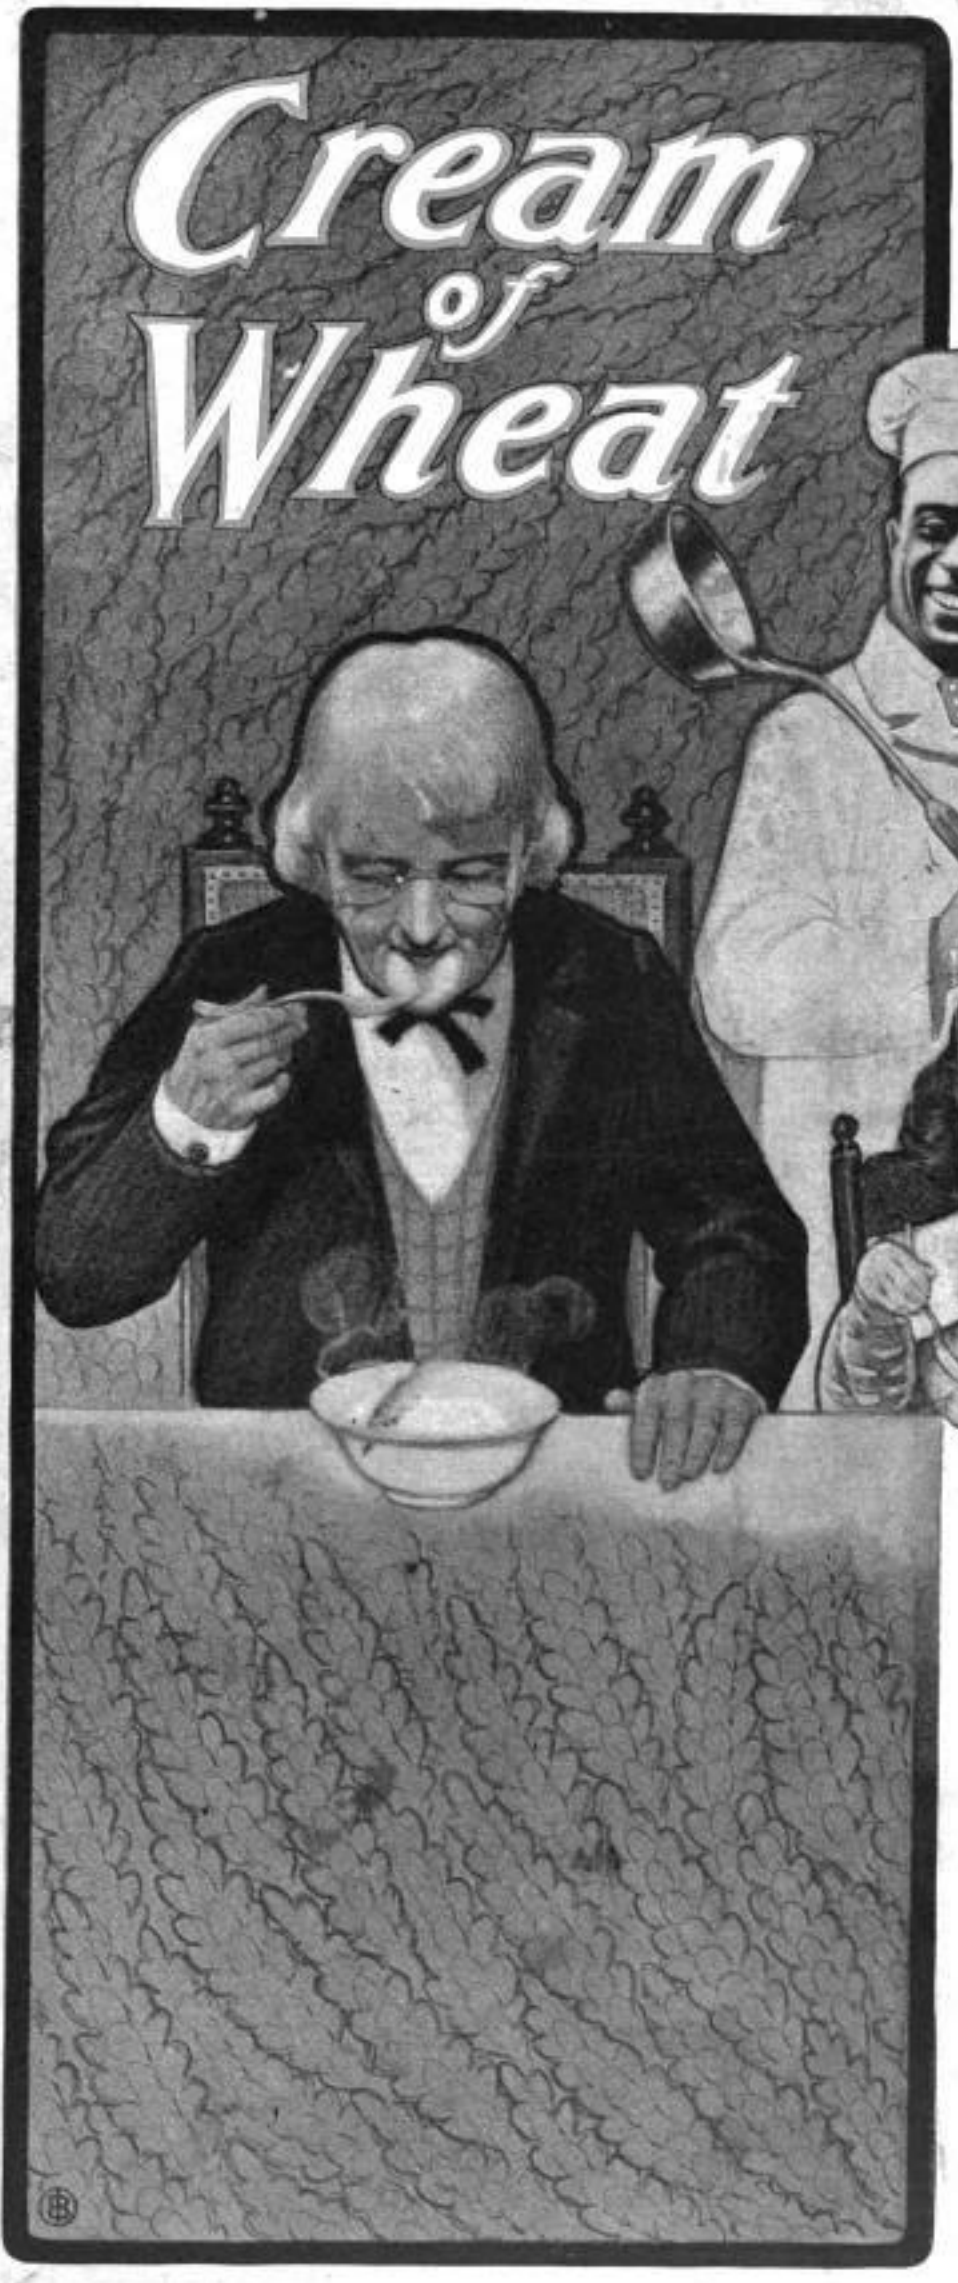
The Biter Bitten is a curious sea story, in which the crew of an English sailing vessel capture the French steamer that sent their ship to the bottom.

CLINTON ROSS

The Third and Fourth Generation is the title of one of several brilliant little stories of the Army and Navy which Mr. Ross has written for the Post.

ELLEN MACKUBIN

The Ordeal of Isabel, soon to appear, is a love story of unusual force and originality, with a piquant mystery.



F. HOPKINSON SMITH

The author of Caleb West and The Other Fellow will have a delightful story in one of the March numbers.

W. A. FRASER

Mr. Fraser will contribute stories of life in many lands and a tale of adventure in the Far East.

Digitized by Google

In Youth it is needed to supply constructive material.

In Age it is needed to repair waste.

Made of hard, Northern Wheat, almost all gluten, little starch or other useless matter, it is easily digested and assimilated, as it meets a natural craving in old and young, and is the food for constructive uses. Makes many good things to eat besides breakfast food.

PICTURES FREE

Ask your grocer to show you our elegant views of Northwestern Scenery, one of which he will give with each purchase of two packages. They are fine gravures, in no sense cheap, but soft, beautifully toned pictures mounted on dark mats, size 15 by 17 inches, entirely fit to appear on the stateliest wall, and without mark or advertising of any sort.

CREAM OF WHEAT CO., Minneapolis, Minn.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded A° D¹ 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Volume 172, No. 32 — Philadelphia, February 3, 1900 — 5 Cents the Copy; $2.50 the Year

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 421 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

The Fitting of the Peats

By S. R. Crockett

Digitized by Google

Drawn by HARRY C. EDWARDS

—took off his broad blue bonnet and wiped his brow

The Fitting of the Peats

By S. R. Crockett

Author of The Stickit Minister, The Raiders, The Lilac Sunbonnet, The Grey Man, The Red Axe, etc., etc.

Copyright, 1906, by S. R. Crockett. Copyright in Great Britain

First Chapter

NINIAN MACLURG, Laird of Millwharchar, in the hill country of Galloway, took off his broad blue bonnet and wiped his brow. It was customary for lairds at that time to wear broad-brimmed hats which came from Edinburgh, or even London, according to the standing of their territorial sasine upon the rolls of the county sheriff.

But there are lairds and lairds, bonnets and bonnets. So Ninian MacLurg wore a blue broad piece almost as heavy as a steel cap, with a checked band of red and white Rob Roy tartan and a round button of brightest scarlet on the top, which to the initiate meant that the headgear had been manufactured no farther away than Kilmarnock, in the neighboring shire of Ayr. The Laird of Millwharchar's bonnet was no mere common bonnet, new coft from the shop of Rob Rorrison on the Plainstanes of Dumfries. It did not dazzle the beholder with the brilliance of its checked pattern. No flaunting feather cocked recklessly at an angle upon its right side, as was too much the fashion among the unhallowed young callants who roamed the countryside after the lasses.

No—many times no, indeed. Ninian MacLurg's bonnet was a sober, serious, responsible piece of headgear, well befitting its stern wearer. Generally it was drawn firmly down on either side till the band touched the tips of the wearer's ears. It was worn doggedly, belligerently, almost insolently. For that was the way in which Ninian MacLurg wore all his garments, till even when lying upon a chair by his box-bed at nights they seemed able and willing at any moment to expound the Catechism, contradict an opinion upon any subject, by whomsoever advanced, or to deal either any unlicensed night-raker or Episcopalian dissenter a most discomposing buffet on the side of his head for the good of his soul.

Ninian MacLurg was looking for his daughter Bell. He had three younger daughters and two sons, but, somehow, Bell took more looking after than all the others.

"The de'il's in the lassie," was his unpaternal way of explaining and denouncing this fact. "I declare, I canna gang to the hoose o' God on the Lord's great day but it's 'Where's Mistress Bell?' 'What for brocht ye no Miss Isobel wi' ye, Laird?'—as if the feckless, hellicat lassie had been the minister himsel'!"

But after all there is no accounting for taste, and so the matter stood. Then not only was this strange popularity of his daughter a trouble to the laird at kirk or market; it was equally troublesome when he abode on his own acres.

Two stout sons he had, Alec and John by name, who labored all day at plough and flail to satisfy their father, but at the gloaming went off on their own visitations at other farm towns, where the gloom was less pronounced than within the sphere of influence dominated by the severe Laird of Millwharchar.

"The man that shall tak' daughter o' mine frae aboot the hoose," he was wont to proclaim loud enough to be heard between kirk door and market cross, "maun hae three hunder pound o' coined siller and three hunder acres o' good plow land besides. He shall satisfy me upon three points o' doctrine according to the Presbyterian standards of our faith, and lastly, he shall stand up to me, Ninian MacLurg, with a stieve cudgel of oak in his fist, and therewith he shall break my head. Then after that I will speak with him in the gate concerning my daughter."

All the same, Bell MacLurg took a good deal of the trouble inseparable from the task of finding such a paragon out of the laird's hands; and used her fine eyes so resolutely and to such purpose among the faithful on Sabbath mornings at the kirk that young bloods from distant parishes, who for years had systematically neglected the stated assembling of themselves together, became constant and devout attenders upon ordinances at the kirk of Dullarg. Moreover, some curious and recondite motive induced them to congregate along the west wall—a spot not much in favor with the general body of the faithful, inasmuch as not only was it hot in summer and cold and draughty in winter, but what was worse—from the seats along the west wall one could not watch the minister's movements during time of sermon, nor yet make certain that on the top of the shut pulpit Bible there was not room for the most microscopic of written "notes." All the same, these highly undesirable benches were now generally better filled than the rest of the kirk. And it has really nothing to do with the matter to add that the square, black-lettered pew of the MacLurgs was placed at the lower angle of the west wall, and that Bell MacLurg never passed a sprig of thyme or sleep-dispelling southernwood to her sisters without having a whole battery of admiring eyes directed upon her movements.

One famous Lord's Day as Ninian MacLurg opened the small pew door to marshal his family in before him he stopped suddenly aghast. All four seats were piled high with branches of sweet-scented "sidderwood," and as the laird said afterward, "What with flowering thyme and other play-actin' trash the decent Millwharchar pew was steaming like a haystack that had heated."

Ninian MacLurg was not, however, a man without commonsense. He had been, as the countryside expressed it, a "gye boy" in his youth—which, being interpreted, meant that he had had some repute of wildness before the arrival of that inward grace which in the Bonnet Laird had now so entirely gained the mastery over original sin and actual transgression.

The Laird of Millwharchar, casting back into his own unhallowed youth, instantly divined whence the "rubbish" had come, and correctly estimated its meaning and purport. With a haughty gesture of his left hand he kept his family, as it were, at bay, while he entered the square "seat." Then, with an action exactly like a binder on the harvest-field, he took up the southernwood, the thyme, and yet rarer growths in his arms, pressed them into small compass, and strode with them to the bench along the west wall, which was already filled with the bachelordom, eligible or otherwise, of three parishes. Then, like to a sower on a windy day, he swept his mighty arm along the astonished row—and lo, their offerings to Venus, as one might say, the frankincense and mixed spices and myrrh were scattered in the very faces of those who had brought them to the temple. Thereafter Ninian MacLurg passed slowly down the west wall with his oaken staff in his hand ("thick as a bullock's hind leg," said Rob Gregory, of the Borelands), and held it a moment under every young man's nose, giving him ample time to inhale the perfume of its polished knobs and sinewy, compacted strength.

After that the western wall was more thickly populous than ever with daring and worshipful swains, but the Millwharchar "box-seat" remained forever empty, and swept—but wholly ungarnished.

"Bell—Bell MacLurg—oh, ye besom, wait till I lay hands on ye! The kye are yet on the hill. 'Tis not an hour to milking-time! The lads are wanting their suppers, and gin ye dinna come, ye'll miss the worship o' God—and I'll daud the head aff ye, my lass!"

This comprehensive denunciation Ninian addressed to the waving broom and nodding gowans of the "park" pastures which lay like a bright green fringe outside the gardens and orchards of Millwharchar. But only the girdling woods of Larbax and his own white barn wall gave back the echo.

Thwarted outside, Ninian MacLurg went into the house and relieved his feelings by subjecting his younger daughters to wholesome spiritual discipline. Then, being sore by reason of Bell's impudent evasion, he yet further regained his self-respect by going to the hayfield in order to tell Alec and John that they were lazy good-for-nothings, who would not sleep that night with whole bones unless they worked twice as hard as they had been doing.

But these projects, agreeable and delightsome as they appeared, were instantly banished by a sight which fairly dumbfounded the Laird of Millwharchar.

On the face of a brae some three hundred yards from the farmhouse his daughter Bell appeared, in the broad light of day, unblasted by the lightnings of heaven, calmly walking toward him with a young man on either side of her.

Second Chapter

THIS is how it happened. As usual in such cases it was in no sense the lady's fault.

Bell MacLurg had gone out to the moor avowedly to "fit" such peats as had been drying on the heather, after being carried out of the "face," or wet bank of fibrous fuel, from which her father's strong arms had cut and "cast" them. It was a hot day, so Bell took with her a white summer bonnet of linen framed on wire, the materials for which she had bought out of her butter money last Rood Fair—without, however, thinking it necessary to consult her father on the transaction. It was a becoming article of attire, but, nevertheless, the lady wore it mostly in her hand, or drooping over her shoulders by the strings.

Isobel MacLurg arrived at the peat-moss in due time, and sat down to recover herself upon a convenient tussock of dry heather, when she saw an apparition strange to be discerned in that wild place—that is, save and except when Mistress Bell by chance wandered thither. A tall young man was coming over the moss toward her.

Bell MacLurg shaded her brow with her bonnet. She did not need to lift it very high in order to do this, for the sun was already quickening his pace for the final plunge beneath the horizon.

"It cannot be Will Begbie," she mused; "Will is not so slender, and he always comes through the wood at any rate. It cannot be Allan of the Hill. He walks too fast for Allan. It must be some one new—some one I do not know. How interesting that will be! But ought I to have ventured so far away from home? My father says that there are some of my Lord Dalmarnock's rebels lurking in the moss-hags yet! Shall I run home?"

She rose to her feet and kilted her coats with a pretty action of her hands at either side her already attenuated kirtle.

"No, I will not," she said, "upon second thought; he does not look like a rebel—from a distance, that is!" Then she fell on her knees and began to "fit" the peats with the most intense and abstracted concentration, added to many turnings of her head to this side and that, besides divers pauses, finger on lip, to consider abstruse problems of architecture, drying and ventilation.

"It seems a difficult job, this which engrosses you so entirely, madam," said a voice close behind her. "Pardon me for inquiring if I can be of any assistance to you?"

Bell arose instantly to her feet with a little cry, and yes—explain it who will, the blushful color of an infinite surprise mustered most becomingly upon her neck and cheeks. She could not have looked more astonished if the speaker had suddenly dropped from the new moon, which, like a blown leaf of autumn, floated already high above the horizon.

"I have startled you," said the newcomer regretfully; "pray pardon me. I should be more sorry than I can say to discompose so fair a maiden."

In the first burst of surprise Bell had placed one hand on her breast below her throat, as if to recover herself—Eve's attitude when Adam caught her that first time looking at the apple. Then she put her other hand up beside it with charming unconsciousness of her pose, and looked at him through her mantling eyelashes.

He was tall—taller even than she had thought when she diagnosed him from Will Begbie. He was, as it seemed at a first glance, somewhat shabbily dressed, yet he wore every article with such distinction that, as Bell put it to herself, after "a little you came quite to think him better put on than my Lord Queensberry himself." He was a young man—but yet not so very young either; a little on the shady side of thirty, perhaps. But his face was so pale and thin that he looked older than his years, and when he took the military hat with its binding of tarnished gold lace off his head Bell could see a frosting of early gray at his temples. His surcoat, unbuttoned all the way down the front, and dotted irregularly with gold buttons or the threads which had once attached them to it, was also white—or, rather, had once been white. The undercoat, belted easily at the waist, had likewise, doubtless, at the same time been red. It was still faced with gold lace, and had large silk pockets, from one of which the ear of a dead hare projected with a curious suggestion of listening to what was going on.

But by this time Bell had quite recovered herself. A brief, comprehensive glance, at once reproachful, playful, tragic,

---

Editor's Note—The Fitting of the Peats, by S. R. Crockett, will run through four numbers of The Saturday Evening Post.

Digitized by Google

and coquettish, had told her all that the pen has been able to pack into a longish paragraph. She decided that she would not be frightened any more—for the present, that is.

"And please, sir, who are you?" she asked, looking up again at the man in the white coat with the straggling gold buttons.

The young man laughed and, before answering, glanced about him uneasily, as if looking for some one.

"Glenmorrison would never forgive me if he knew I had told you, but I am called Adam Home!"

"How strange I never had one—I mean, I never knew any one of that name," said Bell. "It must be very awkward."

"And why awkward?" queried Adam Home, smiling down at this pretty rustic who yet spoke so like a lady.

"Because," said Bell slowly, "if there were any one you liked very much—any one who liked you, that is—there is no nice 'little name' for them to call you by."

She seemed to turn the whole subject of this second transgression of Adam over in her mind. Then she shook that small, dark head of hers, with the scarlet snood bound low about it, so vigorously that one of the crisp brown ringlets escaped from that slender band as gladly as children getting loose from school.

"No," she repeated emphatically, "it would not be nice at all!"

Adam Home stood smiling before her, his hat still in his hand.

"And may I ask what names fulfill these severe conditions sufficiently to be eligible for your favor?"

"Why," said Bell to herself, "I declare he talks like Fontinbras, in that book I hide from father, writ by Mistress Aphra Something or other."

But aloud she said, "Well, I like William, though it is common, but Charles and Francis are best of all. Willie, Charlie and Frank are so sweet to say!"

And she looked as if she had experience of them all.

The young man bowed.

"I am fortunate enough to be able to oblige you with two of these. My full name happens to be Adam Charles Francis Charteris Home!"

"You are not deceiving me?" she said, looking up at him with an innocence which added without words, "for I could not possibly deceive you!"

"On my honor, no!" he cried, with a quick rebound from the somewhat formal gravity of demeanor he had hitherto observed. "I would not attempt to deceive one on whose countenance Nature has marked both sweetness of disposition and trustful innocence, in addition to a delicate beauty all its own."

"Oh! Oh!" cried the girl, clapping her hands. "It is wonderful! How well you know me, and without ever setting eye on me before!"

But if Mr. Home of the many prænomens had been at all an observant man he would have noticed a very roguish smile lurking about the corners of Mistress Bell's mouth, which might have caused him to modify at least one clause of his somewhat flowery eulogium.

But at that moment his eyes were ranging the heather and trying to pierce into the dark woods which edged the Millwharchar Moss to the eastward.

Third Chapter

"YOU do not ask me my name—it must be because you know it already," said Bell, who did not approve of young men looking over her head at fine scenery, still less as if they were looking out for some one else. It was a trait of male character to which she had been little accustomed. So, to the spoilt little beauty this grave young man with his stately periods, his tantalizing, errant eyes, his tarnished clothes and his noble bearing was like a spur in the flank of a mettlesome steed.

Adam Home's eyes returned slowly to his pretty companion's, lingering by the way on hillock and hollow with a sedulous and anxious regard.

"Nay," he said, "but indeed I know not your name. Will you tell me to whom I have the honor of speaking?"

"Is it not usual for gentlemen to ascertain that first, before speaking at all?" said Bell, tartly enough.

At this Master Adam Home started as if a wasp had stung him.

"By Heaven, you are right, madam!" he said, lifting his hat ceremoniously; "still I think the circumstances may plead for me. This is, if I mistake not, Millwharchar Moor, and these brown, shaggy hillocks at the back are denominated Lamachan and the Black Craig of Dee?"

Bell inclined her head, hoping that if he went on in such language as that she might be preserved from smiling too obviously. But she replied gravely enough: "Indeed they are, and the effort to denom—I cannot mind that most excellent word—proves you a Scot and a countryman. It is as good as an introduction at the Assembly Rooms of the town of Edinburgh. If it please your Highness" (she made him a low curtsy), "I am nominate—thank you, denominate—Bell, or otherwise Isobel MacLurg, eldest surviving daughter of Ninian, Laird of Millwharchar."

The young man bowed again, with yet more humble and respectful, observance.

"Mistress Isobel," he said, "I come to you with something more than the commonplaces of introduction. Your kindness or cruelty may mean my life or death. So fair a lady must needs in this amorous country of ours have had such a sentence addressed to her before. But never by a man in such a case as I."

The mirth gradually died out of Bell's eyes as he spoke.

"The fact is," he went on, "that I and a companion have had a small difficulty with the Hanoverian Government, in which we have come off somewhat at the worse. There is a price upon our humble heads which would make you safe of new bonnets to the end of your life, and which, if he chose, it would greatly enrich your father to obtain. For our sins we have been compelled to take refuge with certain wild outlaws of these inmost hills, headed by one Hector Faa, who calls himself of the Honest Party, but who, in fact, is ready to be honest or dishonest, just as may suit him best.

"Now there is pressing need for my friend and myself to get to France, both on account of the cause which we have at heart and because the search for us grows daily more hot and close. Also for my own part I am greatly weary of a damp and dreary cave in the rocks and of the society of Hector Faa, the hill gipsy, and his tatterdemalions."

"You are not a murderer?" cried Bell, standing a little farther off defensively; "you have never taken human life?"

The grave young man, Adam Home, laughed a little self-contemptuous, ironic laugh. "Indeed, I cannot flatter me that I have. I was never in but one affair, and that was a raveled, unsatisfactory piece of business. It took me all my time to keep the swords of King George's Hessians off my own crown."

"Then you are a rebel," she said, panting a little; "how lovely!"

"I am very glad you think so," he said. "I am in hopes that in that capacity I may make a similarly favorable impression upon your father, and mayhap induce him to accommodate us with horses, and conduct us privately to some cove on the southern shore of Galloway, whence we may obtain boat for France."

As he had been speaking Bell's countenance had gradually been falling. As soon as he had finished she came a step nearer him, and held up her clasped hands with a sweet, penitential innocence which was not on this occasion all assumed.

"Oh, do not!" she cried, "do not! For Heaven's sake—yes, and your own—never dream of going to my father. If you are of the Pretender's party, or favorable to my Lord Kenmure, he will have no pity upon you—not though your case were ten times as needful."

"Mistress Isobel," said Adam gravely, "I will not conceal from you that we have heard some such reports of the laird of this bleak heritage as discouraged us from approaching him directly. But that was before we knew that he owned a jewel so rare that to possess it—nay, even to gaze upon it—were worth—were worth——"

"Who may you be calling it?" inquired Bell pointedly, as he stammered and paused for a fitting price with which to round his phrase.

The unexpected interrogatory knocked the bottom out of his compliment. Adam Home laughed, colored, and finally said: "I' faith, Mistress Bell, you have not your wit to seek. We will be having you at Versailles yet, clattering up the great gallery upon the prettiest of red heels and parrying and riposting with each courtier as you go."

"Indeed, I were better employed fitting the peats," said Bell; "but to your needs. I am concerned, sir, for your necessities and those of your friend. But I do urgently dissuade you from approaching my father. He would, of a surety, hand you over to the Government without question or pity, being a strong friend of their party."

"But he is a gentleman, a laird on his own property. He would surely have some compassion on misfortunate men whose heads are already forfeit to the executioner's ax."

Bell shook her own pretty head, and felt her neck with a little shudder as if to make sure that it was rightly attached.

"Ah," she cried, again interrupting him, "you do not know my father when you speak so! He is a strong, fierce man, a Covenant man of the sternest sort, and he hath sworn that if ever he catch any of the Pretender's folk he will slay them like so many rats in a trap."

"That he might not find so easy," said the youth. "We are at least men of our hands, we rebels of the moss and cave."

"I see, sir, that you know not my father," she answered, not without a certain satisfaction; "he could break a dozen"—she was about to say "of you," but refrained—"a dozen men in his fingers at once. There is none in all the countryside can stand against him for a moment—no, not even Sir Alexander Gordon himself."

Then a quaintly willful look stole over her face as she looked at the young man in the frayed coat.

"But there may be a way," she said. "My father goeth to Wigton to-morrow. I know where there are horses on the moors which you can catch with a feed of corn at any time. Saddles there are in the stable, and that shall be unlocked. I will put plenty of providing for man and beast behind the park dyke in a hollow of the rock which I shall show you. I myself will set you on your way, and, it may be, provide a safe escort who will hold his tongue—a neighbor lad who will do the thing I tell him, and who will guide you to the shore at a place where a boat may be obtained."

It was now the young man's turn to shake his head, which he did slowly and sadly enough.

"Nay, my fairest lady," he said sententiously; "I thank you from my heart, but it cannot be. It shall never be said that Adam Home took another man's horse and provend without asking his leave."

"Is not this somewhat nice in a man who by his own account came over to take a King's crown?"

"You little Whig!" he cried admiringly. "I knew not that you had been so well trained in your father's opinions."

"Nay," she answered, "'tis all the same to me—one way or the other. But I acknowledge your side hath the prettiest fashions in dress, and also the most glossing tongues. So, for the safety of other poor innocent maids I ought to help you all out of the country as fast as needs be."

Fourth Chapter

BELL told herself that she liked to flout this sobersides of a cavalier, because he took every saucy saying with a little quick uplift of the head which showed him unaccustomed to be so treated by any woman. And ever as soon as she had got in her shot she knelt down and fell to fitting peats with much becoming earnestness and innocence. Adam Home was longer this time in finding anything to say in reply.

At last he broke the silence, as if he had finished reviewing the whole field.

"Nay, Mistress Bell," he said, "I sincerely thank you for your kind and courteous offer. It is well intended. But I am sure that Glenmorrison would never agree to it. It would not consort well with the spirit of a gentleman."

Bell looked up sharply.

"Doth it consort with the spirit of a gentleman to stand with his thumbs in his pocket-holes while a girl fits peats on her knees?"

Again there came over the grave face the startled look which the minx had so quickly learned to try for as a sufficient reward.

"My dear lady," he cried, with a quick change of mood, "I crave a thousand pardons. To my undying shame I had not observed your occupation, so intent was I on yourself and my wretched affairs. Permit me——"

He knelt down beside her, and at the first attempt succeeded in knocking over no less than five of the "fittings" which Bell had been engaged so busily in constructing before his arrival, and which she had persevered with in spite of so many interruptions.

The girl gave a little cry of horror on thus beholding her work undone.

"Hold! hold!" she cried; "you mistake. These are not ninepins. This is Millwharchar peat moor, not a skittle alley. That is not the way to fit peats, but thus—and thus."

And seizing his wrists she showed him how to take the first peat, set it anglewise on its stronger base, face and balance it with a second, buttress it with a third, and finally, having built a fort after the manner of stooked sheaves in a harvest field, how to pat the all-important "crown" upon the work—"to turn the rain," as Bell explained technically.

(Continued on Page 698 of this Number)

—with a young man walking demurely on either side of her

Digitized by Google

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

—One of Schneider's Pretentious White Stone Houses

He has Taken the Corcoran House for the Winter

Washington, December, 1899.

WELL, here we are at last, Robert and I, actually realizing our ambitious hearts' desire. The first and most precious step of the way is accomplished. Robert has taken his seat in the House of Representatives, and we are installed in one of Schneider's most elaborate and pretentious white stone houses in the most exclusive section of Washington and in one of the most fashionable streets therein; and I have the proud satisfaction of knowing that my appointments are all in the highest vogue.

My little Southern friend, Page Mason, who is also my guide and philosopher, says the whole outfit is too much overdone—house, decorations, carriages and servants. But what does it matter? If the Celestial-eyed minister from China can live in one of these gorgeous houses, and Commander Clover, of the Navy, in another, I do not see why Representative Robert John Slocum and his wife, Agatha, may not live in one of them, too; aye, live and flourish, for the situation commands a view of the great Leiter mansion, and who knows but a corner of their mantle may not fall upon us? I believe that my golden key will fit the lock of any door among the smart set, for open their doors I can and will. We have the money and can pay the shot, and I have not campaigned Robert into Congress out of sheer patriotism or for the good of the Constitution. No, not a bit of it!

If I can only persuade Robert to heed me in all matters pertaining to our social advancement I will promise not to meddle any more than I can help in his political affairs, although I have felt it my duty to give him the benefit of my advice already. He has, unfortunately, an idea that his mission in the House is to reform the Constitution, but I am convinced that that rôle has already been overworked ad nauseam, and that during the first half of the session he would better content himself with not taking any part in the proceedings whatsoever save to answer to the roll-call.

Page says that his safest plan, till he knows the ropes thoroughly, will be to stick quietly to distributing garden seeds, or to sending out literature about potato bugs and assorted worms, and I agree with her to a certain extent; but Robert is a bright man, albeit a trifle pig-headed, and he must rise to national prominence. He must go from the House to the Senate, and the way thither is not by an agricultural by-path.

He confessed to me just after he had been sworn in that he felt very insignificant and very much like the man whom his fellow-Representative, Amos J. Cummings, tells about, who wondered all during the first week how in the world he ever got to Congress, and afterward he wondered how in the world any of them ever got there.

I was up in the gallery the day Congress assembled, and I was never so nervous in my life until the group of members containing Robert had taken the oath, and then I immediately braced up and resolved that Robert must forego hereafter the wearing of a white cambric tie in the daytime, as I am convinced after seeing him among other men thus arrayed that it might create a misunderstanding: what use would there be for me to keep a butler who wears a white tie in broad daylight if my husband elects to wear one, too?

I was fortunate in having some one with me who could explain things to me and point out prominent men and women. I never saw such crowds of people in my life. The lobbies, committee-rooms and corridors swarmed with all sorts of men, and women of all sorts, conditions and colors. There were red men, black men and white men, who wanted everything under the sun and were there to get it—consulates, mail-lettings, new projectiles, claims, pensions, trusts, post-offices, and Heaven knows what besides.

Everybody seemed to be buying an ugly dark-blue book, which I promptly learned was the famous Blue Book, so dear to the heart of the office-seeker. Finally, when we had squeezed our way into the gallery, and the House had been called to order, I, womanlike, began to ask all manner of questions. I could not for the life of me understand why so many members on the floor kept their hats on, nor could I understand one word of what the clerk was droning out, or what effect the mace was supposed to have upon the order of the House when borne aloft by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

I was interested, though distinctly disappointed, in the mild appearance of the new Speaker, about whom the thing that impressed me most was his gigantic voice. I heard a whisper run around the gallery that his bearing as a presiding officer is a sad let-down after Mr. Reed, and that if the Reed rules should be modified, as is threatened, the House is likely to break over the traces altogether before the session is half over. The new Speaker has one prime recommendation over and above all his predecessors: he was born out of the country, and cannot indulge in Presidential aspirations; therefore there is likely to be harmony between the Capitol and the White House for the first time in years.

To me the House seemed like a school full of unruly, fidgety boys, and when the Chaplain made a prayer and the House rose and stood they were more than ever like school-boys who, upon being compelled to submit to a dose of piety, took it in a lump, as though to get it over with.

There were ever so many members I was curious to have pointed out to me. I wanted to see Mr. Bailey, the ex-minority leader, and Mr. Richardson, the new minority leader, who has been dubbed "Slim Jim" because of his unusual height. Robert says that he ought to be called "slick" instead of "slim," though Robert would not explain what he meant by that. I've understood that he is held to be among the finest parliamentarians on the floor. I wanted to see Mr. Sulzer, who thinks that he resembles Henry Clay and poses accordingly, and also the Tammany member, William Astor Chanler, who is the pluckiest, richest and youngest man in the House; though when I did finally see the latter he looked very inoffensive, very well groomed, and very much as though he had no particular interest in life. I wanted above all to see the notorious Mr. Roberts, of Utah.

—Mr. Bailey, the ex-Minority Leader

Well, I saw Mr. Roberts out in one of the corridors. He was accompanied by a tall, graceful young woman, whom he held by the hand and who seemed to be about twenty years old. I learned that this young woman was the daughter of one of his marriages, and that she came here to help her father's cause, which under the circumstances seems a painful and terrible thing for a girl. What she can possibly expect to accomplish in such a fight and in such an arena I, as a woman, cannot understand.

The man himself made an uncomfortable impression upon me. He possessed a certain immobility of purpose which looks at you out of his clear, steady, blue eyes. There is caution in the firm lines of his square-cut jaw, and one cannot help feeling the effect of the impressive quiet of his voice and the telling moderation of his language. The keynote of the man's character I should judge to be self-control. He was talking earnestly to a group of people and, as we passed by slowly in order that I might have a good look at him, I caught these words spoken clearly:

"I can look any man or woman in the face and say from my heart I have done no wrong, and whatever happens I shall stand erect where I am, to fight or fall."

As we passed on I had a singular feeling of the menace this man is to the house, and I determined to give Robert a brace on the subject; for I heard him doubting whether, constitutionally, the House could exclude the member from Utah.

—"Billy" Mason, as He is Familiarly Called

I was anxious to get a glimpse of the Senate, too, on that opening day, so we made our way thither, and my companion pointed out a little corner off Statuary Hall, where he says women office-seekers generally await the slow motions of their "influence." He said that the condensed heartaches and desperation that are crowded into that narrow space day after day are enough to draw tears from the "whispering stones" which pave the way under foot.

In the Senate almost every man was one I had long wanted to see, from the strong and able President pro tem. to the very funny, fat "Billy" Mason, as he is familiarly called, who, with the assistance of the great Mr. Hoar, holds up the Constitution so continually. I wanted to see Mr. Hale, not because of his anti-expansion utterances, but because he is credited with being the best-dressed man in the Senate, and one who prides himself upon his Chesterfieldian manners. He is said to pose for the ladies' gallery.

Then there was the celebrated Mr. Depew, who makes such lovely bombastic speeches. He has taken the Corcoran House for the winter, and is expected to emulate the departed Brices in entertaining the swell mob. Robert says he does not believe Mr. Depew will amount to shucks as a statesman, but he has said one catchy thing lately that might make a good campaign watchword. He said that the Republicans stood for "Gold and Glory," which is alliterative and pithy.

Of course I saw other celebrated men, among whom were the burly Mr. Hanna, the wise Mr. Proctor, the smooth Mr. Foraker, the scholarly, strong Mr. Davis, the overreaching Mr. Wellington, and the newly wed Mr. Thurston.

I was glad finally to get away from Congress out into the bright sunshine. Late that afternoon I picked up Page, and as we bowled over the smooth streets we had a talk about my prospective social chances.

I will confess that I am a bit staggered to learn from Page that to be a Congressman's wife is in reality rather a social handicap than otherwise. She even hinted that I would do well to keep Robert's membership as much in the background as possible. She tells me that there are not many of the Senators' wives who hold any great social position here, and that it is not always a sure thing that even the first lady in the land will be in the smart set.

All this is a blow to me, for I had banked considerably upon our strong friendship with the Presidential family being a social lever to us. Page tells me that of course such a friendship will be of use to us, as it will always secure a card to the White House, but that we must rely almost solely upon our wealth and tact to accomplish anything with the smart set.

This wise child, who seems to me to be scarcely out of the cradle, is a veritable social Napoleon in petticoats. She comes of a long line of gentle Southern folk. She goes everywhere, knows everybody, and is the most charming, the most whimsical, and at the same time the most long-headed little Southerner who ever came out of Dixie. She is to be my General in command, and she has already opened the campaign.

She has skillfully let fall a word here and there as to our wealth and the possibilities of my ballroom for dinner dances, which are so much the fad at present. She has presented to me various men of her acquaintance, and shoals of débutantes. These fair young things, scarcely out of their pinafores, possess a worldly foresight that is something astonishing. I heard Page say to one of them, in her queer Southern lingo:

"Ah want you to be right nice an' polite to Mrs. Slocum. She's goin' to entertain the débutantes, an' she's got the loveliest ballroom in Washin'ton. She'll do lots of nice things for you gyirls, but she won't stan' such nonsense as you treated pore Mrs. Westin'house to last year."

This was the first I'd heard of any entertainment to the débutantes, not one of whom do I know, nor their mothers before them, and I'd never heard of Mrs. Westinghouse either; but I smiled and nodded, and was gracious to this little chit, who belonged to one of the "Court" families, as they grandiloquently call the families of the Supreme Court Judges here.

The whole social structure of the Capital as explained by Page seems to me to be a huge joke. There is a continual talk of precedence, and it seems to be of great importance who shall come first at dinner-tables.

The plan, so far as I am concerned, is to be this: I am to lay in hundreds of visiting-cards with "Tuesdays in January" marked in one corner. Then I am to start out visiting, with a coachman and footman in full livery on the box of my smart brougham, or, if the weather should be superfine, I am to use my new cabriolet. My only regret is that Page will not allow me to have a crest put on any of my carriages. She says that it would open up a fund of quiet ridicule among the diplomats, who are well up in heraldry, and that I must avoid all such mistakes.

Digitized by Google

My first few weeks are laid out as follows: On Monday I am to devote myself to visiting the "Court families"—that is, the wives of the Supreme Judges; and Page says that nowadays this is not at all formidable, for the time has gone by when they were a social power, for the family of the Chief Justice has never taken any lead whatever, and the rest are all very simple folk, and that among the whole of them there is only one recognized snob; but she would not tell me who it is, for she said my courage might desert me, and besides, I'd find it out soon enough for myself.

—THE CELEBRATED MR. DEPEW, WHO MAKES SUCH LOVELY BOMBASTIC SPEECHES

Tuesday is to be devoted to calling upon the wives of the Representatives, and this will be a herculean task, for they live in all sorts of impossible places, notably in the outskirts of Capitol Hill; and I groan in spirit when I recall the wife of one Representative whom I saw the other day in the Housegallery, with a crochet collar lavishly displayed around the neck of an old-fashioned black velvet jacket.

Wednesday I shall go the rounds of the Cabinet, and this will be an ordeal; for while the Cabinet ladies are many of them gracious and unspoiled, there are one or two houses in high places where the blood of a visitor is pretty apt to congeal in the veins unless given a fillip by the thawing presence of the respective secretaries. Page says that I must assume the air of the grande dame—sweep in and sweep out again, and not be more than three minutes in the operation.

Thursday I am to visit the wives of Senators. My first visit among them will be only upon those who are most widely known and where it will be a help, socially, to me. I shall have to call upon those from Robert's own State; fortunately, both these women are most gracious.

Thank goodness that Friday and Saturday are of no official importance. The former is citizens' day in a general way, and it is also the day at the British Ambassador's; but into this holy of holies I cannot yet penetrate, though I hope it is to be my good fortune one day to be bidden there. The jolly way in which Lord Pauncefote trundles around the town on his tricycle is truly delightful. He sits on his tricycle very much as though he were on a favorite hunter that was adapted to cross-country riding, and would not be guilty of giving him, in hunting parlance, any "nasty croppers."

Lord Pauncefote—or "Sir Julian," as he is still called by many—seems to be genuinely beloved by people here, and I don't wonder, if he is as genial as he looks. I saw his daughter, the Honorable Lilian Pauncefote, the other day, out at the Chevy Chase golf-links, whither I had driven with Page to catch a glimpse of the smart people gamboling on the green at play. The Honorable Lilian was an object of much interest to me, as well as to others, for it was her first appearance publicly since the announcement of her engagement to Mr. Bromley, one of her father's under-secretaries, and Page, who spoke to her, was accorded the privilege of inspecting the betrothal ring of sapphires and diamonds.

Everywhere that I have gone during my first weeks here I have been on the qui vive to get a glimpse of Admiral Dewey, and it came about as I was on the point of despair.

Thanks to Robert's friendship with the President, we were bidden to the reception given at the White House to the visiting delegation of Methodist Bishops. I was naturally in great trepidation at making my first social bow on so formidable an occasion, but I put on my war paint and feathers and took a good look at Robert to see that he had committed no indiscretion of toilet, and we set out. I am not going into any description of the function save to say that I was impressed chiefly with the general shabbiness of the White House and with the charming graciousness accorded us by the President; and I want to state also that I had not more than passed the receiving line when I felt quite to the manner born; and I could not help thinking that, given the chance, I, too, could grace a Presidential mansion. We had scarcely made our way into the East Room when an unwonted stir among the guests caused everybody to start forward eagerly, and immediately a murmur ran around, "Admiral and Mrs. Dewey."

It was some little time before the crowd parted sufficiently for me to see this famous pair, and I was surprised at the appearance of both. In the first place, the Admiral is younger and far better looking than any published picture of him. He has a great deal of manner, which, though courtly, is a trifle fidgety. I should think that he might be a man of quick, excitable temper, who shows in his bearing the nervous strain he has been under. He was in full uniform, which made him a striking figure among the other men.

Mrs. Dewey was even more of a surprise to me than the Admiral. The papers had spoken of a "gracefully rounded figure," of a face "fair, mobile, and untouched by any marks of time." Well, if I had been making out her passport I should not have set her down thus. She was, however, a charming, pleasing woman. Her smiling face was surrounded by a profusion of reddish hair, dressed elaborately and graced with a diamond aigrette. She wore a beautiful frock of heavy white lace, made in long, severe lines, and cut decolleté. But the striking thing about her, and the thing that seemed to catch every eye, was an unusually large and brilliant object depending from her neck, which at first glance I took to be rather an overblown locket. Suddenly a conviction flashed over me that this brilliant gem-set ornament was no locket, and I was just about to whisper to Robert when a naval officer's wife standing near me ejaculated loud enough for me to hear:

"I do believe she is wearing the Admiral's jeweled watch, presented to him by the State of Vermont!"

I was so lost in wonderment at the begemmed object, and at the diamonds which glittered upon her neck, that I was oblivious of time, until Robert said testily:

"Are you going to stand there staring at her all night, Agatha?"

I was recalled to myself only to find that I had lost my opportunity to be presented to the hero of Manila and his bride. My disappointment was keen thereat, but was somewhat softened by the fact that my evening at the Executive Mansion had been something in the nature of a liberal education to me.

—THE ADMIRAL IS YOUNGER AND FAR BETTER LOOKING THAN ANY PUBLISHED PICTURE OF HIM

INDIAN MERMAIDS AND FAIRIES

By Charles M. Skinner

OUR Indians are a serious people, but though their symbols and fictions contain much of killing, fighting and robbery, they have many of a gentler sort, and some are absolute poetry. Students of their myths are sure to be impressed, before they have carried their researches far, with the likeness of some of these legends to the traditions that have come to us from Greece, from Israel, from Egypt and India. There is, for example, a myth that is prevalent over half the world, if not the whole of it, in which a person is translated from his element into either water, air, earth or fire, and seeks to draw others after him either by force or by love. We have stories of mermen and mermaids, firmly believed in by navigators of the South Seas, and no more doubted by Columbus than he doubted his vane or his needle. We have tales of tritons, nymphs and sirens from the Greek; Undine and Melusina are types of somewhat later date; and no longer ago than 1782 one Venant St. Germain reported that he had seen a mermaid in Lake Superior, at the south end of the Paté. It was of the size of a seven-year-old child, brown of skin and woolly as to hair. He wanted to shoot it, but his Indian canoemen cried in alarm that it was a water-god, and if injured would fearfully revenge itself. Apparently it had read the thought of the adventurer, or had learned to know a rifle when it saw one, for within a couple of hours a storm blew up, and during three days following there was little intermission in the downpour or the violence of the gale. An Alaskan tribe is said to have preserved a tradition that its ancestors crossed the sea under lead of a man-fish with green hair and beard, who charmed them with his singing.

THE MERMAID WHO LONGED FOR A SOUL

The Canadian Indians relate that a member of the Ottawa tribe, while lounging beside a stream, was confronted by an undoubted mermaid that arose from the water and begged him to help her to land. She was weary of being half fish and wanted to be all human, but this might be only if she wedded. The Ottawa, moved by her appeal, took her home, doubtless in his arms, for fishtails where feet should grow must be a sore hindrance in the woods. He adopted her, and in time found a husband for her—an Adirondack youth—and on their marriage the dusky Undine received a soul. But the people did not like her; they held her in distrust. In the end the Ottawas and Adirondacks fought about her. Their war continued until all of the latter tribe had perished—all save one, who, wandering beside the Mississippi at St. Anthony's Falls, into which the mermaid had been thrown by her vexed and vexatious relatives-in-law, was seen by her and pulled beneath the water to her home. The Minneapolis flour mills have made the river so turbid that one seldom sees her nowadays.

THE MAN-FISH LOVER

Battao, a Nisqually girl of Puget Sound, was plagued by lovers. She had charm and gentleness and prospects, and it was the latter that kept the suitors hanging about the premises, for her father was rich. There came to the village, one summer, a tall stranger of noble presence who had tales to tell of other lands, and of sights and adventures so strange that even the old medicine-man forgot himself and listened.

To Battao this stranger stood for all that was daring and splendid. She was touched by a new emotion. She admired him. She was happy when he was near, restless when he was absent. One morning when a warm, luminous mist hung over the Sound, the stranger, who had been strolling and talking with her, looked into her face with a smile, then, without further word, walked off on the surface of the water and disappeared in the fog. The girl was naturally startled and frightened, and as day after day went by and he did not return, a sadness weighed upon her which she tried to dissipate by visits to Fox Island. Every day she would be rowed across from the mainland where she lived, and there she would sit, hour after hour, running beach-sand and pebbles through her fingers, just as she and he had done a thousand times during their talks together. The agates, thus sifted out as she watched the sea with longing eyes, fell in the odd forms which visitors to the island have noticed. On one of these excursions her boat came to a sudden stop, as if it had been driven into mud. The oarsmen made the water foam with their paddles, but the canoe advanced not a foot. Leaning over the side to discover the cause of this detention, Battao saw the smiling face of her lover through the clear tide, far below; saw his arms outstretched to embrace her, and his voice came, faint, telling her that he could not return to land, but begging her to join him, and, in an access of longing, she spread her arms and leaped into the water.

On the fifth day from her seeming death she arose from the Sound, and ran up the beach to her father's lodge. In five days more she returned to the sea again, and from that time, for several years, she divided her time between her lover and her people. She was enchanted now; more gentle, more beautiful than ever, more affectionate and thoughtful withal, for if a storm were arising or any mishap threatened she would appear from the waves and cry a warning. But when all her friends had died, the ties of earth no longer held her, and she went below the sea.

THE SPIRIT IN THE BARK BOX

It is at the Great Lakes that we discover a complement to this tale. Near what is now Gros Carp, Michigan, lived the hunter Kandawagonosh, famed for his affection for his parents and his care of them in their age. Heavy were their hearts on the day when his canoe washed ashore and was found broken among the rocks, for by this token they knew he was at the bottom of the lake. Yet, in love and the hope of his spirit's freedom, they built a memorial grave for him, and under its roof placed his knife, arrows, bow, kettle and paint, also burying his dog alive, so that if his soul did return it would find the outfit for the journey to the happy hunting-grounds. The weapons and kettle were not disturbed, however, and in due time the old people took their way to the shadowland together. Kandawagonosh remained at the bottom of the lake—but not dead. A water-spirit had seen and loved him. It was she who broke his canoe and drew him down, down to the grottoes of crystal and green below; she who inflamed his heart with an equal love and kept him there in a long content.

Kandawagonosh, nevertheless, did not forget the upper world. He remembered, with moments of longing, the friends in his village, and he had misgivings when he pictured his parents as weak and old. There were twinges, almost like jealousy, as he thought of his place being taken by others, of his name forgotten among those who had often spoken it. Ah, yes, he wanted his freedom. He wearied of constant happiness. He must have an hour of action. "Let me go back to the earth for a day and see my parents," he pleaded. "They will need my help, for winter is coming on again and they are growing feeble."

"You shall go back to the sunlight for a time," consented the mermaid. "We will wait for you, our children and I. Look; here is a box of bark. Keep it always fast to your belt, and bring it back unopened. If you take off the cover you will never see this home in the green water-world again."

They embraced, and the man arose swiftly through the lake. Brighter and brighter it grew until his head was above the surface and he saw once more the wooded shores and felt the burn of the sun on his bleached face. With a few strokes he reached the land. He parted the branches and plunged into the wood. Strange! Where his father's tepee had stood a pine of several years' growth moved its arms. And what was this? A grave? He bent close, and examined the symbols and weapons that were half-buried in the mould. The grave was his own! Hark! What was that? Somewhere down in the earth an animal was scratching and whining. It sounded like a dog. Puzzled and troubled, he sank upon the mound, and brooding on these changes he unconsciously turned in his fingers the box his water-wife had made. The cover came off. A cloud poured from it in the shape of the mermaid, who looked at him with reproach. His cry of remorse had hardly ceased when his dog burst, panting, from the grave, seized him by the throat and forced him beneath the ground. For, without knowing it, he had been in the water for a lifetime, and when he sat upon the grave all those years together had fallen upon him in an instant and he was too old to live.

Digitized by Google

The Needs of Cuba

By Robert P. Porter
Special Commissioner for the United States to Cuba

THE civil and industrial reconstruction of Cuba must be more or less retarded by the deplorable condition in which the United States forces found the population, January 1, 1899, when the entire island was turned over to our military authorities. The work of pacification has been satisfactorily brought about, the insurgent army disbanded, and the men composing it, in a majority of cases, have returned to peaceful occupations. This has been accomplished without serious riots or disorders, and the disposition of the people appears to be law-abiding and, under the circumstances, cheerful and hopeful.

The new tariff for Cuba, though quickly framed to go into force simultaneously with American occupancy, has proved satisfactory, and as a revenue measure has exceeded the maximum estimates of its framers. The experience of officials in administering it naturally suggests modifications in classifications and administration, and possibly some changes in rates; but until a complete and equitable system of internal taxation, with which to supplement the customs revenue, has been established, radical reduction of rates will be impracticable. The revenues collected have been managed with economy and skill, and the expenditures made with a view of giving immediate relief to a people who for many years had been plundered of their legitimate revenues. That the condition of the people is gradually improving under these expenditures for improved sanitary conditions, better roads, schools and similar purposes is undoubtedly true, but years must elapse before the scars resulting from a century of misgovernment, a generation of disorders and a three-years' war of extermination will disappear.

PHOTO BY GIACOMO BRIGI, HAVANA

ROBERT P. PORTER

THE WORKINGS OF A POLITICAL RECONSTRUCTION

The work of reconstruction, to be complete, must begin at the bottom and proceed upward—not at the top and proceed downward—to the minor civil divisions. The first step to secure civil government is a full and accurate enumeration of the people of the island, and the dawn of independence in Cuba must come with the establishment of municipal and minor civil division elections by the people. The machinery to bring about this establishment of a civil government in all its various branches has been put in motion and the work of taking a census is in process of completion. Good municipal and local administration is the foundation of all independent government, and after the Cubans have demonstrated their ability to elect local administrators and manage local and provincial affairs with honesty and precision the establishment of a stable government will be neither a long nor a difficult undertaking. With the establishment of sound local government must come modifications in the present judicial procedure, the revision of which is already occupying the attention of United States officials, assisted by many able and public-spirited Cuban jurists and lawyers.

THE FRICTION BETWEEN THE THREE CLASSES

During the process of building up the civil government the friction which would at once develop between the three antagonistic elements of the population—Spaniards, native-born Cubans and the blacks—can only be restrained by the presence of a military power. The Cubans, unhappily, have never known any other than martial law. The methods by which the United States authorities propose to build up a civil government are strange and unknown to the Cubans, and may account for the impatience exhibited in some quarters. Thoughtful Cubans realize and frankly admit the danger of sudden change, without first having arranged for popular government in the municipalities. When the local tub is able to stand on its own bottom it will be far more likely that the island government will be able to retain its equilibrium. Experience with Cuba has demonstrated that the three distinct classes of population of the island must be handled with tact and firmness. A government in the hands of any one of these three antagonistic classes would, it is believed, not be stable. A stable government is usually a growth of years, sometimes of generations. The United States has neither moral nor political right to withdraw from the responsibilities of administering the affairs of Cuba until all the machinery for an orderly and peaceful government has been established and is harmoniously in operation.

The industrial reconstruction of Cuba began when the last transport of Spanish soldiers departed. The people have been gradually finding employment, the cultivation of the soil has been taken up again, and the work of vivifying devastated districts progresses. Scarcity of capital and of the right sort of labor, together with the uncertainty as to the future and stability of the government, are the deterrent forces which impede industrial progress. All the available cash funds have been drained away from the island, $130,000,000 having gone to Spain since January 1, 1899.* The wealthy Spaniards whose interests are interwoven with the commercial and industrial interests of Cuba will not bring that money back until assured that a stable government has been established—a government strong enough to protect and hold inviolate investments prior to the war.

WHAT PRUDENCE DICTATES

Foreign citizens (and the Spaniards now rank with the English and Germans in this respect) hold the United States responsible for the protection of their property in Cuba. Before any considerable investments are made, ordinary prudence dictates that the future of the island should be removed from uncertainty. The scarcity of labor, like the scarcity of capital, is a menace to industrial prosperity. The present immigration laws, practically those of the United States, are too stringent and should be modified, so that thrifty Spaniards and Canary Islanders may be tempted thither. Many of the Spanish soldiers who are acclimatized and know the country would gladly return to take up peaceful pursuits but for the severity of these regulations.

THE HARDSHIPS OF THE SUGAR TARIFF

Industrial progress is also retarded by the fear or knowledge that with Cuba independent the Cuban sugars would be met with our maximum tariff on sugar, while those coming from Puerto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines, aggregating nearly 400,000 tons (exceeding the entire crop of Cuba last year), will be admitted free. Under these conditions the sugar planters of Cuba realize that the crops in these islands will, of course, rapidly increase and make it more difficult for the Cuban planter to regain even his old position; and this fact makes it difficult for the Cuban planter to borrow money to replace his machinery. Sugar is the most important crop of Cuba, and, with tobacco, lies at the basis of the prosperity of the island. The existing rates of duty on sugar valued at 2½ cents, free on board, amounts to a discrimination of about 68 per cent. ad valorem against Cuban sugar when compared with these free-sugar countries. After the ratification of the treaties between the British Colonies and the United States, sugar of equal grades may be imported under four classifications:

1—A countervailing duty against the sugars of Continental Europe where bounties are paid.

2—Existing rates of the Dingley Tariff Law against all countries excepting such countries with which reciprocity treaties were made prior to July, 1899, under the reciprocity clause of the Dingley Act.

3—The reduced rates of duty established for sugar from the British West Indian Colonies, with which treaties have already been negotiated and are pending confirmation of the Senate.

4—Free sugar, as aforesaid, from Puerto Rico, Hawaiian Islands and the Philippine Islands.

Under these conditions the three last-named islands offer vastly better fields for investments of capital in the sugar industry than does Cuba. The disadvantage from which Cuba will suffer when these treaties go into effect may be forcibly illustrated by taking the duty-paid price of centrifugal sugar in New York, which amounted in July to 4⅝ cents the pound, for basis of standard grade on 96-test centrifugal sugar, coming from six sources, viz.: Germany, Cuba, Java, English Colonies, Puerto Rico and Hawaii. At this moment the price of sugar has declined to 4¼, or under, in the New York market, which leaves hardly any profit on equal duties for all sources of supply. Deducting from the 4⅝ cents all accruing charges, including duties (where payable), it will be found that the German producer will get for his sugar as free-on-board value 2.71 cents, the Java producer 2.46 cents, the English colonist 3.07 cents, the Puerto Rican 4.28 cents, the Hawaiian 4.14 cents, and the Cuban only 2.69 cents. Under equal duties in the United States against all countries one-half a cent the pound would be considered a fair profit to the producer of sugar, while under the figures above given there would be a discrimination against Cuban sugars: as against Puerto Rico of 1.59 cents the pound, as compared with Hawaii of 1.45 cents, and as compared with the English Colonies of .033 cents.

These are some of the stern facts which face the Cubans who are seeking for immediate independence. The United States could hardly be expected to give up the large revenue collected from Cuban sugars unless it received some equivalent in return. On the other hand, an independent government in Cuba could not exist without revenues, and as the largest percentage of Cuban revenue is collected from custom duties on commodities which the United States exports to Cuba and in a reciprocal negotiation with that island would want free, it is difficult to see how such an arrangement could be made mutually advantageous. A decided discrimination in favor of Cuba as an independent country would, of course, disturb our relations with countries claiming the right of the "most-favored-nation" clause, and result in international complications. Pending the formation of a stable government it might be well for those interested in the future welfare of Cuba to divest themselves of sentiment and study the trend of these economic questions to their legitimate conclusion.

There are other dangers which must be provided against before Cuba can safely set up in business for itself besides the mere establishment of an Assembly and central government. There should be an available surplus and credit. Leading French economists contend that a large proportion of the loan which was taken by French holders of Spanish-Cuban loan bonds form a lien on the custom-houses of Cuba. Is there no danger of France enforcing this claim in the event of the United States withdrawing its protection from Cuba? At home it is understood that vouchers for a large amount were delivered to the insurgent army when it disbanded, payable on the independence of the island. While the return of prosperity might justify this payment as well as the two and one-half million dollars of bonds issued to aid Cuban independence, an immediate demand for such payment might seriously interfere with the successful launching of an independent government.

MATTERS FOR IMMEDIATE ATTENTION

The matters which require immediate attention by the Military Government, and the adjustment of which General Leonard Wood, the newly appointed Governor, will find in no way at arms with the broader question of the future status of Cuba, are in the order of importance as follows:

1—Modification of the present immigration laws.

2—Abolition of direct railway taxation.

3—Abolition of the three per cent. tax on real estate transfers.

4—Inauguration of a complete and just system of internal taxation.

5—Revision of the tariff with a view to simplify the administration.

An adjustment of these matters, together with the general work already referred to with which the War Department is occupied, may proceed without involving questions which the people of the United States and the people of Cuba are not yet prepared to pass upon. The serious question of the advisability of repealing the resolution prohibiting the granting of franchises has been purposely omitted. The question whether the United States has the right to grant privileges to American citizens and foreigners unless we are prepared to defend them afterward is one of grave import. The refusal to grant such rights has undoubtedly prevented the investment of millions of dollars and the employment of thousands of laborers. For this misfortune, however, the United States can hardly be held to blame, for the other course might have resulted in even more serious complications.

* This may seem a startling statement, but it is vouched for by one of the ablest and best-known Spanish bankers in the island.

Digitized by Google

DERWENT'S Love Affairs

By Molly Elliot Seawell

SHE was an American, and a pretty one at that.

So much was plain to Derwent, who, though an Englishman, had an American mother, and knew the ways and wiles of American women. He decided that she was from the South—probably New Orleans—with a dash of New York in her which enabled her to wear her clothes properly. The very fetching character of her costume contributed to what was her chief beauty and charm—an extreme girlishness and youthfulness. She was one of those women who carry something of youth with them into the grave. Her figure was slight and willowy, and her thin, black gown showed off its delicate outlines. She sat alone at a table on the terrace of the Kurhaus, looking down on the rich green park below, lying in placid beauty in the mellow light of the August afternoon. There were few people in the park at that hour, and scarcely any one on the terrace, except Derwent, and the charming creature in the black gown; it was not yet four o'clock, and the music did not begin until five. Derwent, with his cigar and a newspaper before him, had every opportunity to watch the young woman in the black gown. She sat, with a book open upon her lap, and occasionally read in it; but Derwent, who knew all the highways and byways of women, discerned a faint and furtive coquetry in her.

She was not in her first girlhood—she looked twenty-five, but Derwent concluded that she was at least thirty; American women have such a way of disposing of five or six superfluous years that nobody suspects where they are gone. Her complexion was of a beautiful creamy pallor; her hair was dark, and so were her eyes. In those eyes Derwent saw something which belied the girlishness of her figure and the youthfulness of her air. They were eyes which had evidently looked deep into the mysteries of life.

Half an hour passed; people began to stream upon the terrace. Derwent, glancing up for another look at this charming creature, caught sight, at the same moment, of Lady Sarah Battle, bearing down upon him, with her niece, the Honorable Mrs. Mannering. They were making a bee line for him. Mrs. Mannering had not always done this. A few years before, when he was a beardless young Lieutenant in the Guards, available as a substitute at dinners, and very available at balls, Maria Greville had been the object of a faint and distant passion for him. She was a London beauty in those days, bent on making a great marriage, going about seeking whom she should devour, and had little time to waste on beardless Lieutenants with two hundred pounds a year and their pay. She had married rather badly, and was now a widow, dependent on a small annuity and Lady Sarah's good will. Meanwhile, Derwent had become heir to a fine estate and a baronetcy, had resigned from the Army, and had a seat in Parliament. The tables had been turned with a vengeance.

As the two women approached—Lady Sarah, tall and stout as a grenadier, and eagle-eyed, with Mrs. Mannering mincing beside her—Derwent could not help seeing the contrast between his former adored one and the new vision which had fixed his attention for the last half hour. Maria Mannering affected extreme youthfulness, but Derwent did not remember that she had ever been young. She had been old and wary at twenty-five. Derwent arose, as the two women approached, and politely placed chairs for them at his table. Lady Sarah planted herself, and remarked savagely:

"Well, Maria, I hope you are satisfied now. I've walked over half this terrace trying to find a table that suited you. One was too much in the shade, another was too much in the sun; one was too near the café, and the other was too far from the music. Here I shall stay, unless Mr. Derwent orders us off."

"Then," said Derwent gallantly, "you'd better have a tent put up, and a hammock swung."

Mrs. Mannering smiled rather faintly at these pleasantries. It was mean to tell Derwent that she had been hunting for him, but she did not retaliate on Aunt Sarah. It is difficult to show righteous indignation toward an elderly lady who has sixty thousand pounds to dispose of by will, as Lady Sarah had.

Tea was brought and conversation begun. Derwent's body was at the tea-table, but his eyes were at that other table, where the lady in black sat and read and pondered. This did not escape Mrs. Mannering, but she discreetly refrained from comment. Not so Lady Sarah Battle.

"Bless me!" she cried, putting up her glass; "there is that handsome Madame Schaffenberg. Schaffenberg had the grace to die and leave her a widow, a year or two ago. He was a good man—he played the best game of écarté I ever saw in my life. You know Madame Schaffenberg, Maria?"

"Yes," said Maria, smiling pleasantly; "I've known her a good many years. She is here with her children—seven of them."

Derwent did not catch the whole of this sentence. All widows had children, or ought to have, but—she was a widow. This did not lessen his interest in her in the slightest degree.

"I always felt sorry for that woman," said Lady Sarah. "Her father was one of those Southern irreconcilables, who came to Europe after the Civil War in America, and would never go back. Her mother was one of those crazy American women who would marry their daughters to imps of Satan, provided the imps were foreigners and could go to Court. The girl was married off, at eighteen, to Schaffenberg, who was old enough to be her father. He was quite a decent fellow—very rich—and could take his wife to Court whenever or wherever he pleased. I heard at the time that the girl pined to go back to America, but her simpleton of a mother would not take her. The father was dead by that time, and the poor girl had no choice but to take Schaffenberg."

Here was an interesting story, thought Derwent. Perhaps the joys of life were just beginning for that sweet creature there, now that Schaffenberg was gone.

Mrs. Mannering prattled on pleasantly, thinking she had spiked her enemy's guns with the seven children. But Derwent had not caught the fateful word "seven." And then the band came, and the crowd followed it; the tables filled up, and the blare of the music rent the summer air.

Madame Schaffenberg still sat alone at her table, listening to the music with a pretty air of abstraction, and occasionally dipping into her book.

Derwent was past the age when he thought every pretty face he saw might influence his destiny; but not for a long time, and possibly never, had he seen a woman whose mere appearance had interested him so vividly. He knew better than to talk about one woman to another, and therefore in his conversation with Lady Sarah and Mrs. Mannering he did not come within a thousand miles of Madame Schaffenberg, or anything relating to her; but Mrs. Mannering, who was a tolerably fair mind-reader, caught an occasional furtive glance of Derwent's, which told the whole story to her experienced mind. She felt, therefore, when the music was over and they walked homeward through the purple twilight, that she had spent an unprofitable afternoon, albeit she had held Derwent in tow and he was even then escorting them homeward. When they reached the street which led to their villa he politely excused himself and returned the way he came. As he was passing along one of the ferny glades which the dying glow of sunset filled with a beautiful, unearthly light, he saw Madame Schaffenberg coming toward him. She moved with perfect grace, and as he lifted his hat respectfully to let her pass she flashed him a look of recognition and walked on with a half bow.

DRAWN BY JAS. CATTELL

DERWENT AROSE AND POLITELY PLACED CHAIRS FOR THEM AT HIS TABLE

Derwent, like most men of his age, cherished his illusions, and anxiously asked himself if there was enough youthful feeling left in him for the chance sight of a woman like Madame Schaffenberg to impress him deeply. He was only thirty-five, but he had lived a good deal, which made him feel older than his years.

He actually dreamed about Madame Schaffenberg that night, and was as pleased as possible when he waked up the next morning at the thought that he might meet her again. The next morning was dull, cold and gloomy. A fine mist was falling that was worse than a pouring rain. Derwent went down to the Kurhaus for his breakfast and found the park and terrace deserted. He strolled along through the park, scarcely hoping to see Madame Schaffenberg, when, to his delight, in one of the secluded, bosky dells that seemed made to meet the woman one had dreamed of the night before, he saw Madame Schaffenberg sitting on a bench under a low-branched larch tree. His heart gave a thump as if it were eighteen years old instead of thirty-five. As he approached her it suddenly came on to rain violently. He had an umbrella in his hand, and knowing that American women understand perfectly, and even exact, certain civilities which are considered liberties among Europeans, he walked up to her and said, "Permit me," and held the umbrella over her. The larch tree, thick and impenetrable as a roof, arched over them. It would be clearly absurd, while the pouring shower lasted, to give up so secure a protection, and Derwent said so.

"Thank you; you are right," replied Madame Schaffenberg. "See, the water is pouring along the paths; but don't let me deprive you of your umbrella, or detain you."

"Don't mention it," said Derwent. "Nothing is a privation to me which assists a lady in distress." And then he added with a smile which showed his excellent, white teeth, "My mother was an American."

"Was she?" said Madame Schaffenberg, her eyes sparkling with pleasure. "I am an American, too, although I have not seen my native country since I was five years old. My father was a General in the Southern Army, and he could not bear to go back after the war was over; but I always wanted to."

There was no need to tell Derwent that she was Southern. This frank disposition to tell her family history was enough.

"I knew a Southern General once," said Derwent.

He had seated himself, meanwhile, without any invitation, and Madame Schaffenberg bent her clear gaze upon him with an air of fearless friendliness.

"He was the finest old chap I ever saw in my life. He came to my father in England with a letter of introduction, and used to stay down at our place in the country. I was nothing but a lad then. He taught me how to shoot—he was the best shot I ever saw—and gave me my first cigar. He used to tell me great stories about the battles at the South. The fact is, I think he was responsible for my going into the Army instead of the University. He was such a noble, chivalrous, impossible, mediæval sort of an old fellow. You ought to have seen a Duke try to patronize him, and the way he turned the tables on the Duke and patronized him; it was great. When he died I felt as if I had lost something out of my life that never could be replaced. I never knew a man quite so guileless and high-minded—or quite so ready to fight."

"What was his name?" asked Madame Schaffenberg. She was leaning forward a little, and breathing rather quickly. "When you praise him it seems as if you were praising my father."

"It was General Baskerville," said Derwent, "General Roger St. George Baskerville. It was a fine name, and it suited him exactly."

Madame Schaffenberg leaned yet a little closer to him. Her breath came quickly, and her eyes grew bright with tears as she said in a low voice:

"That was my father."

Derwent put out his hand, and she laid hers in it impulsively, and gave it a soft pressure. Two big, bright drops rolled down her smooth cheeks.

"It is the first time I have heard my father's name spoken for ten years by any one who knew him," she said. "Now pray tell me yours, and tell me all about yourself. I am Madame Schaffenberg. My name is Austrian, but my heart is American."

"And my name is Derwent—William Derwent."

"Papa often spoke of you," said Madame Schaffenberg joyfully. "Though I was but a little girl at the time when he was in England, he wrote me many letters, and in all of them he told me something about William Derwent. I have those letters now. You see, after my marriage and my mother's death, I was cut off from everything associated with my father; and it is like a dream to hear him spoken of."

If her appearance had charmed Derwent before, her manner completed the spell laid on him. It was very simple, very direct, straightforward, thoroughly American, perfectly frank, yet exquisitely modest. He wondered how she could have acquired such a manner, brought up in Europe; but he remembered the old General; it was impossible that his daughter should be anything but open and unaffected. And yet there was no forgetfulness of herself. She had the unruffled dignity of a woman born to good position, that nothing can elevate and nothing can depress.

Digitized by Google

Of course, after that, conversation flowed rapidly. A magnetic sympathy flashed between them. Each knew what the other was going to say before the words were spoken. Manlike, Derwent talked about himself; womanlike, Madame Schaffenberg talked about her feelings, her emotions. She had lost her husband within the last two years; the best and truest friend—she did not say lover—any woman ever had; a man worthy to be named beside her father. Her husband's family were good to her—she had entire control of her children. As she said that there was a little pause and hesitation; a strange look came into her eyes. It was the first expression on her mobile face that Derwent had yet failed to understand. She loved her adopted country, and their country home near Prague; but she could never cease yearning for her native land, although she would probably be an old woman before she would see it again. Her children, she felt, must be educated in their father's country—must be taught to love it; their estates, of course, were there; and again, at the mention of her children, that inscrutable look came into her face.

While they were talking the rain stopped and the sun came out gloriously and decked the trees with diamonds and strewed the grass bright with crystal drops. They were perfectly dry and comfortable under the shelter of the umbrella and the larch tree. Far across the park they heard the distant tolling of the town clock. It was two o'clock. They thought they had been sitting there half an hour; it had been nearly two hours.

Madame Schaffenberg rose instantly. "I must return," she said. "My children will think I am lost."

Derwent arose, too, and together they walked through the dripping park, the sun blazing brightly overhead. It was an awakening from an exquisite dream, but the magnetic current yet pulsated between them.

Derwent walked back to the Kurhaus feeling as if he were treading on air. His lost youth had come back to him. He was in love—not in the cold, bored way in which men are apt to fall in love after thirty-five—but in a good, wholesome, robust, foolish, enchanting, wild fashion that was highly agreeable to him. He ordered a good dinner, drank a pint of champagne, and tipped the waiter to the tune of a couple of marks. After his midday dinner he went to the park and smoked a cigar, and was back again on the terrace at four o'clock. He suspected that she came there every afternoon. "She," of course, was Madame Schaffenberg. It was in vain that Mrs. Mannering planted herself like a lion in his path; he would have none of her—that is to say, when she, with infinite tact and art, tried to attach him to her, he, with infinite tact and art and entire politeness, escaped from her.

Mrs. Mannering, like most women of her kind, knew when she was beaten, and let him go with a smile. It was, however, rather exasperating to have Aunt Sarah say:

"What's the use of your bothering your head about Derwent, Maria? He isn't going to marry you now. You might have had him once, and you wouldn't take him. 'He that will not when he may, when he will he shall have nay.'"

This roused Maria.

"I think, Aunt Sarah," she said with dignity, "you say very coarse things"; and then remembering the sixty thousand pounds, held her peace, and drank her tea in bitterness of spirit.

Derwent wandered about the terrace, sitting down and listening to the music occasionally, but keeping a sharp lookout for his inamorata. Five o'clock, six o'clock came, but not Madame Schaffenberg. He then did what he would have done twenty years before—strolled off, and seated himself on the bench where he had passed those two happy hours that very morning. If she passed that way she would see him sitting there; she would know what it meant. Derwent had a soul big enough and a heart warm enough yet to make a fool of himself in love; and he was in love. In twenty-four hours the world had resolved itself into Heaven and hell—Heaven where Madame Schaffenberg was, hell where she was not. She had spoken of her children. His heart warmed toward them, dear little innocents. They should never lack a father's care while he lived. He privately concluded that she had two—a boy and a girl; possibly three, but the thought of the third was rather disquieting, so he put it out of his head. If there should be four—but no, that was impossible. He sat on this bench of romance, and sweet, loverlike fancies flitted through his mind, like butterflies in the sun. He then got up and wandered around the park, but did not meet her. At dusk he crossed the park and strolled past the villa where she lodged. There was a light within the salon, but he could see no one. He walked around to the other side, where the garden of the villa sloped upward to a hayfield, and that still farther up to a wooded height over which a young moon hung trembling in the deep blue sky.

There was a balcony at the back of the villa, and while Derwent watched he saw Madame Schaffenberg come out and, seating herself in a chair, lean both arms upon the balcony railing. She was bareheaded, and although he could not, by the faint light of moon and stars, make out her features, he saw the exquisite pose of her graceful figure. Presently two children came romping out—a boy and girl, apparently between six and eight years of age. They clung around her, and she kissed their fair heads tenderly. Derwent looked at her with rapture. Every woman looks beautiful when caressing her children. Derwent could not imagine Mrs. Mannering caressing her children, if she had ever had any. She would have turned them over to nurses and governesses, and not allowed them to spoil her hair and disarrange her dress by any excess of affection.

Derwent did not go home until Madame Schaffenberg had gone indoors with the two children clinging to her. He went back to his lodgings and found a pile of correspondence awaiting him—invitations, friendly letters, business communications, bills, and a quantity of Parliamentary matter. He set himself resolutely to this last, for he was a rising man in the House, and full of ambition. By a tremendous effort of will he succeeded in fixing his attention upon it, but Madame Schaffenberg's beautiful eyes, and those pretty children clinging to her, and the soft, maternal kiss she pressed upon them, continually came between him and the written page. With all his endeavors he worked but slowly. It was four o'clock in the morning before he went to bed; it had taken him since ten o'clock to do the work he should have done in a couple of hours.

DRAWN BY JNO. CASSEL

"BLESS ME!" SHE CRIED, PUTTING UP HER GLASS; "THERE IS THAT HANDSOME MADAME SCHAFFENBERG"

Next morning he tried to remember whether he had asked permission to call on Madame Schaffenberg or not. He did not know, but that troubled him little. He was certainly entitled to call upon General Baskerville's daughter, and remembered with anguish that he had not done so the day before, but consoled himself with the thought that when a man is truly in love he does not always know where his own interest lies. He lost no time, however, and at eleven o'clock precisely presented himself at Madame Schaffenberg's villa and was ushered into the salon on the second floor. It was a pretty room, bright with flowers, and the balcony was shaded with tall palms.

Madame Schaffenberg did not keep him waiting long; she came in at once. For the first time he saw her in a white gown with a jaunty little jacket, and a mannish little collar and tie. She looked younger than ever. Her frank pleasure at seeing him was changed into a charming coyness at the lingering pressure of his hand. Derwent's first words brought a vivid blush into her clear, pale cheeks.

"I looked for you yesterday afternoon on the terrace," he said. "Then I went into the park, and sat on the same bench where we were together yesterday morning, hoping that you might pass, but you did not. I should have availed myself of your kind invitation to call" (Derwent was an able and felicitous liar where women were concerned), "and determined to lose no time this morning."

Now, to a man so far gone as Derwent, the sight of the woman who exercises this strange and sudden charm over him, blushing and smiling and lowering her lids before him, was not calculated to release him from his infatuation; and Madame Schaffenberg had the true American gift of conversation, tempered by European training. She had, too, an American woman's natural ability to cope with the other sex in flirtation. Derwent boldly and pointedly inquired into all her movements, not only for the next week, but for the next month and year. Madame Schaffenberg parried his questions, laughingly yet skillfully, and told him no more than she wished him to know. She let fall words, however, which plainly indicated that she was about thirty years old. Derwent spoke of her beautiful children. She smiled and sighed as she replied:

"They are a great joy, but a vast responsibility."

And then he boldly announced that he should look for her on the terrace that afternoon, and only took his leave when a sudden commotion and irruption in the next room showed that the children were on hand.

It was certainly delightful to feel young again. So Derwent thought as he dressed that afternoon, carefully selecting his tie, and laughing to himself at his own reflection in the glass, while he brushed his hair vigorously.

Madame Schaffenberg was, indeed, on the terrace; but she played him a shabby trick by having a wheezy old French baron at her elbow, to whom she devoted herself. Derwent, however, was not of the stuff to be set aside for a wheezy old French baron. He planted himself at Madame Schaffenberg's side with quite the air of an invited guest, and immediately plunged into reminiscences of her father. This was a subject which could not fail to attract Madame Schaffenberg, but in which the wheezy old baron had no earthly interest; so he soon got up and walked away.

"Thank God!" said Derwent fervently. "I was determined to get rid of him if I had to pitch him headlong over the terrace."

There was no mistaking the glance of his eye now, and the tone of his voice. Madame Schaffenberg must have been a fool indeed if she had not known that William Derwent and all that he had lay at her pretty feet for her to pick up; and to Derwent's experienced eye it was equally plain that he was not disagreeable to her.

But she became sad and distraite. He led her to talk of her life, and he soon found that there was a burden upon her: it was her children. He was rather surprised at that, because he saw in her a resolution, a courage, a spirit which she had inherited from that bland and polished old fire-eater, General Baskerville. He could not quite make out why two happy, healthy children—as he supposed hers were—should weigh so upon her.

"I feel," she said, "how difficult it is to apportion my time between my children and other things that claim my attention; for a woman should be something else besides a mother. I owe it to them to read, to improve myself, not to make them ashamed of me when they grow older. I have led a most retired life during my marriage; I have scarcely been in the world at all since I was eighteen. Now, when I go to a ball, the thought comes home to me with a chill—I should be at home with my children. While I am reading and studying it occurs to me that I should overlook their governesses and masters. I suppose I shall get used to it in time, but it seems to me as they grow older I am more overcome with the sense of responsibility. I feel it more now than I did two years ago."

Derwent gently reasoned with her. He thought it a sweet and noble instinct in excess, but it can scarcely be called a fault in a woman to be too devoted. Every moment that he spent with her increased his admiration for her. The intoxication of the music, too, was in his blood. The orchestra was playing the wild love story of Lohengrin; the bridal music echoed among the trees.

Derwent began to ask himself when he could make his direct proposal to her. Should it be in a week, or in a month? And then suddenly it came to him, like a direct inspiration—why not that very afternoon? He would walk home with her through that lovely path by the larch tree. It would be at twilight. He would be a fool to neglect such an opportunity. He would not stand dangling and dawdling about her for a week—no, not for a day, nor an hour—and so, when they arose and took their way through the purple twilight, his mind was made up. Just let him get away from those streams of well-dressed, idle, laughing, chattering people, in the sweet seclusion of that charming spot, and under the protecting ægis of that larch tree, and he would put his fate to the touch—to win or lose it all.

Digitized by Google

They were rather silent as they walked along. Madame Schaffenberg, too, had her moment of illumination. It was coming. Derwent was hers if she wanted him; but she had not made up her mind what to say to him. She knew, however, what she wished to say to him. His boldness had not hurt his cause—it never does with women.

As they neared the larch tree they heard a shout of childish voices, and suddenly a mob of children sprang from behind the shrubbery and rushed toward Madame Schaffenberg. There were seven of them. Derwent stood back, a little staggered by the sudden onslaught. It did not occur to him that they were all Madame Schaffenberg's; but after half a minute of observation, of seeing them crowding around her—three tall girls, the eldest about eleven, three smaller boys, and a little tot of about two years old, in a white frock, all graduated like stair steps—the awful truth flashed upon him: they were all hers, all seven of them. There could be no doubt about the eldest girl: she was her mother all over, and promised to be even handsomer; and the others—there was no mistaking them either. All had the same long, fair hair and the same bright, dark eyes; they were as alike as seven cherries in a bunch. Madame Schaffenberg had seven children under eleven years of age! It was perfectly plain to him then. Madame Schaffenberg glanced toward him. He was perfectly pale, and was gnawing his mustache. She, too, turned a little pale. She read him like an open book. There was a moment's awkward and agonizing pause, and then she said, with an air of perfect sweetness and dignity:

"These are all my children, Mr. Derwent. Do you wonder now that I am oppressed with the responsibility of them?"

Derwent, with a ghastly smile, mumbled some reply. In spite of the horror of knowing there were seven he was still human enough to admire them. They were the handsomest children he had ever seen in his life. Any mother might feel proud of them; any father; but any stepfather—that was another story.

There were governesses and a valet, too, in the background. The whole thing was appalling; but one thing was certain—there was no opportunity to make love to Madame Schaffenberg with seven romping, laughing, healthy, happy, noisy children around her. Derwent approached to escort her the rest of the way. She waved off the children, who retreated with perfect discipline; but she said to them, "You may follow us, my dears"—which they did.

Derwent felt to the core of his heart the grotesqueness of his position. The seven children followed, and two governesses and a valet followed the children. Derwent, however, was a man, and he acted a man's part. When he said good-by to Madame Schaffenberg he gave her hand the same tender pressure he had given it when he thought she had but two children, and said:

"May I call to-morrow morning?"

Madame Schaffenberg hesitated for a moment, and then faltered out, "I—I will let you know," and then vanished indoors, the children trooping after her.

Derwent walked back, altogether dazed by the strange position in which he found himself. He was certainly in love with Madame Schaffenberg, and he called himself a coward and a poltroon for letting the seven children weigh a feather in the matter; but seven children do weigh more than a feather, anywhere and under any circumstances. If Madame Schaffenberg would marry him—and he had had a sweet and comforting assurance in her glance that he was not disagreeable to her—how would they settle the problem of those children? She could not take them all to live in England; she could not be separated from the younger ones; he could not live at the country place near Prague. It was fearful. Still, he had made up his mind to ask her to marry him, and when a man who is truly a man goes that far, nothing should turn him back.

He went back to his lodging and ate his supper, but it tasted like chips and sawdust. He spent a sleepless night. Talk about the responsibility of the children weighing upon Madame Schaffenberg! They weighed him down like so many tons of lead. If Madame Schaffenberg should urge them as a reason for not marrying him he would feel bound in honor to protest. Altogether, it was maddening.

At five o'clock he arose. It was a beautiful, fresh, dewy August morning, and, making his toilet rapidly, he went out of doors. He did not go near the park—that was too noisy—but wandered through the town until he got to the little railroad station. There was an early train to Frankfort. He watched listlessly from a corner of the street the people hurrying into the station, and heard, far off, the scream of the engine and watched the long train as it thundered into the station.

There were not many passengers, but one party he noticed because it was so large, and in a moment or two he recognized Madame Schaffenberg. There were the seven children, the two governesses, the valet de place, the tutor, a couple of maids, and a nurse. There were, likewise, baby carriages, go-carts—all the impedimenta necessitated by seven small children. They were whisked into a couple of railway carriages—they more than filled one. Madame Schaffenberg paused a moment before stepping in and looked around her. There was regret in her attitude and her air; but in another moment she had taken her seat, the guard had banged the door, and the train was off.

Derwent felt as if he were in a nightmare. He spent the whole morning wandering about, forgot to take his coffee, and at ten o'clock went to the villa Madame Schaffenberg had occupied.

"Yes, she was gone," the maid volubly informed him, "very unexpectedly. She had left no address behind."

Derwent returned to his own lodgings much disturbed in mind. He could not fail to suspect that he was the reason of Madame Schaffenberg's sudden flight. She had seen the difficulty in the way and had fled from it.

He sat down and wrote her a long letter and sent it to her home near Prague. He waited a week for a reply, and got none. He wrote again, this time putting on the outside of the envelope his address, so that the letter, if not delivered, might be returned to him. It was not returned; neither were two others that he wrote. At the end of a month the conviction was forced upon him that Madame Schaffenberg, for a reason either most flattering or unflattering to himself, declined to hold any further communication with him.

Derwent returned to England a changed man. He was disappointed and embittered—but, yet, the seven children. He felt that fate had played him a scurvy trick. He was a long time getting over it, and he never reached the point when he could laugh at it.

Ten years passed, and on another August afternoon he found himself on the terrace. Nothing had changed except the fashions and the people. No one was there that he knew, not even Mrs. Mannering, who still had a way of turning up at places where Derwent was likely to take his holiday. He spent several days there, and lived, as it were, those past days over again.

One afternoon he was sitting on the terrace when, looking up, he saw Madame Schaffenberg approaching. Three handsome young women were with her. They were evidently her daughters, and were apparently between twenty-one and seventeen years of age. She still looked singularly young, and might easily have passed for the elder sister of those handsome girls.

Derwent arose at once and went toward her. She met him as affably as if she had parted from him in the most courteous manner, with perhaps a slight shade of embarrassment. Derwent squeezed her hand just as he had done at their last meeting, and Madame Schaffenberg's hand trembled a little in his. She introduced him to her daughters—the eldest one, Claire. Derwent thought them all charming, but the eldest girl was one of the loveliest creatures he had ever beheld. She had inherited all her mother's charm.

Derwent accompanied them to a tea-table, sat and took tea with them, and thought how happy he would have been had unkind Fate given him such a wife and such daughters. He was forty-five years old, and was beginning to feel very lonely. He had changed, however, as little in appearance as Madame Schaffenberg. By virtue of a clean life and an active mind he looked young, though he felt old.

He saw them every day after that. He tried very hard to get back upon his old footing with Madame Schaffenberg, but vainly. She would have none of it. He inquired with paternal interest after the other children. They were all well, happy, and likely to be a credit to themselves and to their mother.

The three girls were great belles, and at the Kurhaus dances were surrounded by admirers. Derwent, who thought he had forgotten how to dance, was laughingly persuaded by Claire. In fact, the dear girl—"the child," as Derwent called her to her mother—developed a strange friendship for him. A man is not past the danger line at forty-five. It was impossible for him to be insensible to the delicate flattery she paid him; but he steeled himself against it, saying to himself that it would be a shame to take advantage of her childish fancy.

He soon had an opportunity of proving his sincerity. Tommy Uxbridge, Lord Balmaine's eldest son, turned up at the Spa, and in a week had made a formal application to Madame Schaffenberg for permission to pay his addresses to her daughter Claire. Tommy was a fine fellow—there was no doubt about that. So much Derwent assured Madame Schaffenberg; and declared that Claire ought to be made to see the wisdom of marrying Tommy. And then Derwent went off for a solitary stroll in the park, whistling jovially.

His thoughts led his steps to the larch tree. He sat down on the bench and his eye fell upon a little manuscript book lying there. He picked it up. One casual look at a page told him the story of Claire's heart. She was deeply in love with him, and that little book was her confidante. Derwent closed the book instantly, feeling like a murderer at having read even a part of the confession of this innocent girl.

And there, rushing down the path, was Claire.

"My book, my little book!" she said. "Have you looked inside of it?"

Derwent, quite dumb, looked into her eyes. He wished to tell her a lie; but he could no more do it under that clear, searching, maiden gaze than he could have lied to an archangel; and she, noting his silence, turned from a rosy red to a sudden pallor and burst into a passion of tears.

What man would not have succumbed to that? On that bench, under the larch tree, Derwent became engaged to Claire Schaffenberg.

It was very difficult to tell Madame Schaffenberg. He could not say, what he knew to be the truth, that Claire's love was the spontaneous gift of her young heart; nor was he pleased at the thought of appearing in the rôle of an old fool, running after a girl young enough to be his daughter.

Madame Schaffenberg received his communication kindly and gracefully. Derwent owned up to his age with shame and sorrow. Madame Schaffenberg smiled.

"I, at least," she said, "can have nothing to say on that score. My husband was twenty-five years older than I. Never was there a wife more tenderly and generously treated than I. I cannot but hope that my child will have the same good fortune that I had. I cheerfully give her to you."

So Derwent and Claire were married. The women generally, especially Mrs. Mannering, called him an "old fool." The men called him a lucky dog.

DRAWN BY JNO. DANIEL

—AND SHE, NOTING HIS SILENCE, TURNED FROM A ROSY RED TO A SUDDEN PALLOR AND BURST INTO A PASSION OF TEARS

Digitized by Google

PHOTO BY FRANCES BENJAMIN JOHNSTON, WASHINGTON

WU TING-FANG

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

One of the Greatest Achievements of the Times

In many respects the most important achievement of recent months was the success of the United States in throwing open the whole of China to the nations of the world. This was done by one of the cleverest pieces of diplomacy in history. England, France, Germany, Russia, Italy and Japan had pounced upon the Chinese Empire and got as much of it as they could—not exactly taking the property, but placing political mortgages upon it. Our statesmen saw that if something were not done the whole Empire would soon be rent asunder, and that the Chinese trade of the United States, which is second only in importance to that of Great Britain, would be destroyed by tariffs and other discriminations. Secretary Hay proceeded in a practical way. He sent notes to each one of the Powers mentioned and demanded assurances in writing that our trade rights should be respected, and that there should be no discriminations and no differences in favor of other countries. In brief, that in any part of the Chinese Empire, whether under the protection of Great Britain, or France, or Germany, or Russia, the American should stand on the same plane as an Englishman, a Frenchman, a German, or a Russian, and so on. To this England agreed first, Germany next, France next, Japan next, Russia next, and Italy last. Thus in placing the American on an absolute equality with others the Americans placed everybody on the same equality. This is the open door about which we have heard so much, and it is a feat of diplomacy brilliant in itself, and of incalculable advantage to the peace and well-being of the world.

PHOTO BY TAYLOR, WASHINGTON

JUTARO KOMURA

Some of the Big Questions of the Year

As a rule, every century goes out with a peck of trouble and a burst of glory. The greatest of the centuries is evidently destined to keep up the record. Already the facts are before us. In all parts of the earth not only do the difficulties and problems exist, but they are on a scale almost without parallel in history, and they demand the broadest, widest and wisest statesmanship. The great war in South Africa, whatever its results, will involve more or less actively the politics of the world. The possibility of an outbreak in the far East, with the contest between Russia and Japan, brings forward a race issue of extreme interest and significance. These two great problems ought to be sufficient, but there are others.

The insurrections and rebellions in South America promise more than the customary excitement. The building of a ship canal, whether through Nicaragua or Panama, is to be decided. The Alaska boundary question is still in the condition of truce. The modus vivendi agreed upon in October, 1899, has effected only a temporary settlement of the main point of dispute—that is, the demand of Canada for a port on Lynn Canal. The United States still retains full possession of the coast and all of the harbors, but Great Britain is within a mile and a half of a stream leading to tidewater, and it is against all reason to think that when the negotiations are opened she will not do everything in her power to get what she wants. The trade differences between Germany and the United States are still serious, but the President in his message said that our relations with Germany are most cordial, and the German Minister has told in glowing terms of German friendship for us. In the trade arrangements between Germany and the United States gradual improvements are being made. Though the progress is slow it is going on. The greatest achievement was in securing the admission of American insurance companies to the German Empire. The Paris Exposition presents problems in industry, but many Americans are wondering how they will get to the big show if Great Britain uses up so many of the ships for transports. Our colonial questions are still pressing, but they seem to be in solution more through good administration than through any special legislation or diplomacy.

Our trade with all our new possessions is very materially increasing. The question as to whether or not we shall take Cuba is still discussed, but underneath it all there seems to be the conviction that Cuba will sooner or later be a part of the United States.

Of all the colonial questions Cuba unquestionably presents the most difficulties, because, though this country is responsible for its order and well-being, it is under a distinct pledge not to annex it as spoils of war. Consequently it must give it a quality of administration far beyond the average. That is being done under the governorship of General Wood, whose appointment evoked the most enthusiastic approval everywhere.

Governor Wood's administration thus far has been marked by the same merits which gave him so much fame at Santiago. Indeed, there is no example before the world that offers such opportunities and promises such results as that which Governor Wood is now presenting in the fortunes of one of the richest islands of the hemisphere.

CUSHMAN K. DAVIS

The American Brand of Diplomacy

Some years ago, when Mr. Bayard was Minister to England he caused a slight ripple in politics by declaring that the time had come for diplomacy to abandon quibbles and subterfuges and speak the truth; but gradually the change is taking place. The diplomatic procedures in the far East deal in flattery or bribery. For instance, when the great Powers were after Chinese territory some of them were offering to lend the Chinese Government tens and even hundreds of millions of dollars. All the resources of skilled intrigue were used, and in some instances are still being used. The course of the United States was different. It put its desires in plain English, and instead of requesting the usual polite assurances it asked for replies in writing—and it got them.

Thus through the power of candor and honesty this nation to-day occupies the greatest diplomatic point of vantage in the world. The nations look to us and trust to us because they know that Uncle Sam means what he says and will carry out any promise he makes. No better proof of the diplomatic rise of the United States could be found than in the coming to Washington of some of the greatest diplomatists in the world, such as Count de Cassini, who did priceless work for the Russians while Minister at Peking, and who is to-day one of the greatest men of that great nation; Mr. Wu Ting-fang, the Chinese scholar, who has charmed American audiences by the purity and beauty of his English, and a man who has made his impression by his great intellectual force; and Mr. Jutaro Komura, the new Japanese Minister, known for his experience and grasp of international questions; and others who need not be named. These men are adepts in statecraft, and it is remarkable to observe how quickly they have adapted themselves to the conditions of American life.

In other countries the idea of such men speaking freely in the newspapers would be preposterous, but here all of the three mentioned have become rich mines for the interviewers, and they not only talk their praises through the columns of the daily press, but accept invitations to address learned bodies, using every opportunity for expressing their great admiration for the American people.

In other countries it would be necessary for them to weigh and cultivate only the Court influences. Here they are obliged to take into account the sovereign force of public opinion. It is undoubtedly a new experience for them, and they must be highly interested in it. They have to deal with such men as President McKinley, Secretary Hay, and Senator Cushman K. Davis, the Chairman of the Senate Committee of Foreign affairs, who are all past-masters in the science of popularity—men who are apt to trust more to the voice of the country than to any theories which they may individually hold, and thus even through our public men we are educating the representatives of monarchy in the blessed influences of liberty and free government. In the meanwhile the sentiment among the people of this country against participation in any foreign difficulties or wars was never stronger than it is to-day. They believe in minding their own business.

PHOTO BY CLINEDINST, WASHINGTON

COUNT DE CASSINI

When Anglo-Saxon Meets Anglo-Saxon

There is a feeling in some quarters that the Anglo-Saxon is not only making a supreme effort to control the world, but that he is actually nearing the point of victory. The increase of the Anglo-Saxon speech, trade, power and population since the beginning of the century is one of the marvels of history. The showing is so large that its leaders and members freely predict that it must control every part of the earth. Thus in peaceful seasons we have much talk of a union between the United States and Great Britain, but it so happens that when any one speaks of this too confidently a feeling of opposition arises.

As a matter of fact, Anglo-Saxons are a bad people for any other race to tread upon or contend against, but they seem to be even more sensitive when any question comes between themselves. An illustration of this was found the other day when British warships seized merchant vessels containing cargoes of American goods. The seized ships were not American, but the goods were, and while the British put up a temporary contention that the food supplies were intended for the South African Republic, our State Department filed a protest as quickly as a cable could get it to London.

We really never fully outgrow our old quarrels, and this refers to nations as well as to individuals. One hundred years ago Great Britain maintained that it could confiscate neutral property as contraband, and Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson repudiated the idea. It was because the famous Jay treaty allowed outrages of this sort to a certain extent that the people arose in their wrath, and it was all that President Washington, who accepted it, could do to escape their indignation, although he did it only because he believed that it was the only way to avoid another war. But the people were not satisfied, and later the war of 1812 brought out their sentiments about the matter and taught Great Britain that she must respect rights upon the seas. Of course these latest seizures are nothing like as serious as those of a century ago, but there is no question about the feeling that they aroused among our people.

However powerful politics and passions may be in these closing days of the century, trade in reality rules the world, and to interfere with its rights is to set in force the machinery of diplomacy or of war. Of course there was no likelihood of any serious difficulty with Great Britain, but she was told that she must let American goods alone unless they regularly belong to her through gift or purchase. And thus has come the reply of the British Foreign Office to the United States. As condensed by Secretary Hay and officially bulletined by the State Department it was as follows: "The British position as to the vessels and hostile destination is that they can only be considered contraband of war if supplying the enemy's forces, it not being sufficient that they are capable of being so used, but it must be shown that this was their destination at the time of seizure. This qualification virtually concedes the American contention that the goods were not subject to seizure, and practically disavows the seizures, it not being claimed that there is any evidence of hostile destination." And thus the United States scored again in diplomacy and humanity. Indeed, it is hard to see how the world could get along without Uncle Sam! He increases the blessings of peace, and mitigates the misfortunes of war.

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN OF THE HOUR

PHOTO BY NOTMAN PHOTO CO., BOSTON

THOMAS N. HART

The Excellent Luck of Mayor Hart

Mayor Thomas N. Hart, of Boston, conducted his own campaign in a masterly manner. The situation was peculiarly delicate. Normally, Boston is Democratic, but at the December elections there was a bolting wing of the Democracy that threatened at the first sign of a mistake or the utterance of an unwise sentiment to return its allegiance to the Democratic candidate. Mr. Hart therefore planned for a short campaign with few speeches. There were no mistakes, and the bolting Democracy elected Mr. Hart.

When it was "all over but the shouting," Mr. Hart, in conversation with one of the Republican leaders, said:

"This campaign reminds me of the old Southern darky who was brought before the court for stealing chickens."

"In what way?" some one asked.

"Why, the Judge asked the old man, looking at him sharply and speaking in his sternest manner: 'Were you ever in court before for stealing chickens?'

"'No, sah,' said the colored brother with a grin; 'I'se been mighty lucky, sah.'

"And so have I," said Mr. Hart with a hearty laugh.

Alexander MacArthur's Surprise-Party

Alexander MacArthur, author of a successful study of life in the Latin Quarter of Paris, which brought to the writer both popularity and profit, is also the pupil and biographer of Rubinstein and is a close friend of Paderewski. The author lived for two years in St. Petersburg, corresponding for the London press, and taking part in some thrilling adventures, but the most singular of the writer's experiences happened in Chicago after the novel had been brought out by a publisher of that city. The book had been so successful that the publisher decided to give the author a dinner to which a dozen of the leading men of letters in the Lake City were invited. The guests had assembled when the author was announced.

Through the blue haze of smoke there appeared a handsome young woman attired in evening dress.

"We are expecting Mr. MacArthur," said the host; "Mr. Alexander MacArthur, the novelist."

"So I understood," returned the unexpected guest. "I am Alexander MacArthur."

"You?" gasped the publisher.

"Yes. Didn't you know? I am Lillian MacArthur, at your service. I have been writing over the name of Alexander even since I left my home in Dublin."

It was only the work of a minute to rearrange affairs, and the dinner was a great success.

What Mr. Cummings Would Have Done

Before Amos J. Cummings was a Congressman he was managing editor of the New York Sun, editor and founder of the Evening Sun, and President of the New York Press Club. During his many years of active journalistic work Mr. Cummings' paper was first and foremost in his mind. That is one reason why he was always at the top of the profession. He unconsciously illustrated this characteristic at a social function of the Press Club. There were several amateur and two or three professional entertainers present. One of the latter was reciting a dramatic incident with marked force and finished elocution. Mr. Cummings sat at the head of the table deep in thought over the next day's paper.

"The murderer crept up to my bedside," whispered the elocutionist tremulously. "He thought I was asleep. But I was awake. Oh, awake! Hours passed between each tick of the watch under my pillow. He looked into my face and raised his keen knife above my head. Just as he was about to strike I heard a low whistle and the desperado leaped from the room and disappeared out of the window. Now, sir, what do you suppose I did then?" he asked in thunderous tones.

Mr. Cummings came to for a moment. "I'd have hustled down to my office and written it up for my paper," he replied in a matter-of-fact way.

The True Explanation of a War-Time Coincidence

The law of coincidence works wonders. During the blockade of Santiago, Admiral Sampson and his officers were sitting, one more than sultry day, upon the deck of the flagship New York. It was too hot for conversation, and almost for thought. The fighters simply blinked and glared. The silence was broken by one who said: "Next to having a brush with the Spaniards, I'd like to have a Georgia watermelon."

The suggestion brought a smile to every face, which widened when the Admiral echoed, "A watermelon? I want two for myself."

A moment afterward the Quartermaster announced the arrival of a boat from a supply-ship which had just come in from New York City, and added, "The boat is full of Georgia watermelons off the ice."

Red tape was disregarded, and soon all on board, from Admiral down, were having one of the most enjoyable feasts of the entire war. When it was over the officers tried to find how it was that their wishes were so promptly answered, but although they came near the truth they never learned the true story of the coincidence.

Mrs. Van Brunt, a New York artist and a member of many of the patriotic organizations which were brought into being by the Spanish-American War, heard one day of the excitement produced on the Texas by the arrival of a large but somewhat dilapidated watermelon from home. The story touched her, and the same day she secured several barrels of the choicest fruit and shipped them by the first supply-ship going to Santiago. The Captain of the vessel was courteous and obliging, and when told of the consignment put every one of the melons on ice and agreed to send them to the Texas the moment she arrived at her destination, and in the event of the Texas not being there to present them to the Admiral in charge.

But the voyage was swift, and, as luck would have it, the supply-ship passed the Texas on the Cuban coast.

Convincing Evidence for Madame Ruegger

Mlle. Elsa Ruegger, the Swiss 'celloist who is touring this country, was born in Lucerne. Her father is a Government official. Before she was twelve years old her parents decided to send her to the Royal Academy at Brussels for a musical education. She first played in public at a charity concert when she was eleven years old. Two years later she left the Academy, having received many medals and prizes. She first made a tour through Switzerland and from her native land she went to Germany. In the latter country she met with great enthusiasm. After one of her performances in Berlin she was presented with a necklace and bracelet from the Emperor and Empress. Mlle. Ruegger in appearance somewhat resembles Eleanora Duse, the Italian actress. Like Madame Duse, she has a penchant for the mystical and occult. Her mother, who travels with her, is very much exercised over these fads.

PHOTO BY GUTEKUNST & VAN BRUNT, NEW YORK

MLLE. ELSA RUEGGER

"Does she believe in them?" a caller asked.

"Oh, I don't know. I think she does."

"Do you believe in them?"

"Now you ask me a hard question. The palmists, astrologers and phrenologists my daughter and I have met are certainly wonderful people. Do you know every one of them says my daughter Elsa is a genius?"

PHOTO BY CHICKERING, BOSTON

COL. SIDNEY M. HEDGES

A Joke the Boston Ancients Tell

The visit to the United States next June of the Honorable Artillery Company of London will be an event of more than ordinary importance. The man upon whom the task of doing the honors will fall is Colonel Sidney M. Hedges, of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston, whose guests the London visitors will be during their stay.

When the Boston Ancients were in England in 1896 as guests of the London Artillery the members were entertained every moment. It happened one afternoon that Colonel Hedges and a large company of friends were invited to Marlborough House by the Prince of Wales. Now the Princess and her daughters had never met Colonel Hedges, but they thought more highly than ever of the Massachusetts society that claimed as one of its members an ex-President. They had taken the Colonel for Grover Cleveland.

The story leaked out through Lord Denbigh at a dinner at the Prince of Wales Club just at the time when all good stories come to the surface. The joke tickled Colonel Hedges immensely, and by his friends who were in the secret he has been slyly called "Grover" ever since.

A Meteorological Surname

The Rev. Dr. Norman Macleod, Moderator of the Church of Scotland, has a magnificent voice. An Englishman said to him one day, "Doctor, how do you pronounce your name?"

The Doctor was somewhat taken aback, but answered with dignity and some force, "Think of a cloud, sir, a dark, storm cloud."

"Thank you, Doctor; but you need not use the voice of thunder to carry out the illustration."

A Novel Way to Dig Canals

Prince Hohenlohe is a strong advocate of Emperor William's scheme for a great ship-canal which will connect the interior of Germany with the ocean. In discussing the subject with one of the Agrarian nobles who opposes the project the latter said: "Your Excellency, you will find the opposition to be a rock in the path of your canal."

The Prince's eyes twinkled as he retorted, "We'll imitate the prophet Moses, smite the rock, and then the water will flow."

A Tree Like a Grocery Store

Admiral Von Diederichs, the new executive of the Imperial German Navy, is not the cold, calculating personage depicted by the American press when he annoyed Admiral Dewey in the summer of 1898 at Manila. Those who know him well describe him as a highly educated, well-bred officer with a large fund of good nature. At Ceylon, while eating breadfruit for the first time, one of his staff who was a naturalist said:

"The tree, besides supplying breadfruit, also produces a nutritious oil or vegetable grease."

The Admiral looked up. "Why not call it the bread-and-butter-fruit tree?"

Not According to the Regulations

Lord Roberts, the British commander in South Africa, is very popular among the rank and file, who usually refer to him as "Bobs." He began his career in 1851 as a Second Lieutenant in the artillery, and fought and worked his way up with remarkable success. No one better understands "Tommy Atkins." When near a barracks in India one day he was annoyed by several terriers belonging to the soldiers. The owners rushed forward, kicked the quadrupeds, and humbly apologized for their pets' misdeeds. The Colonel listened and then said:

"They undoubtedly make good sentries, but I don't like the way they salute their superior officers."

Digitized by Google

DRAWN BY GUSTAVE VERBEEK

Training Animals and Performers

From the Notes of W.C. Coup ◆ Edited by Forrest Crissey

THE awe inspired in the breast of the average countryman by the "daring act" of the lion-tamer is well founded. Long years of familiarity with this feature of the show business have not served to dampen my sense of admiration for the grit of a man who does not flinch to enter the cage of any fierce animal and prove man's mastery over the brute creation. In justification of this sentiment I have only to point to the professional animal-trainers of long experience. If there is one of them who does not bear on his body the marks of his encounters with his savage pupils he is a rare exception to the rule. The whole fraternity is physically ragged and tattered—torn and mutilated by the teeth of beasts they have trained. I have never ceased to marvel that men will deliberately choose to follow the subjugation of animals as a profession, particularly when they have only to look upon the veterans in the business to behold a ghastly and discouraging array of ragged ears, of split noses, of shredded limbs and lacerated trunks. But at these substantial warnings the novice and the past-master in the art of "working" animals alike only laugh and scout the idea of danger or dread. At least, this is their attitude in private conversation, when not attempting to make an impression on the minds of their auditors.

If all animals subjected to training were even in disposition, and did not have their ugly moods, the same as their human lords, the principal element of danger to trainers would be removed. Unfortunately, it is the universal testimony of the men who have devoted their lives to the training of fierce creatures that the most docile, obedient and friendly carnivorous creature is sure to be in an ugly humor sooner or later, and then is the great time of test. These sudden, unexpected and abnormal moods in the animals handled are responsible for having sent scores of good trainers to early graves.

THE PERILS OF A TRAINER'S LIFE

Let us suppose an animal to be even-tempered. This means he is always at his maximum of ugliness. He shows every day the worst that is in him, and the trainer knows the limit of what to expect in that direction. But animals are not constituted that way. They are generally on their good behavior, or at least have an astonishing reserve of ferocity to be vented on the hapless trainer when the day of abnormal ill-humor comes—provided, of course, the trainer is not discerning enough to detect the gathering storm.

In no other profession is eternal vigilance so surely the price of safety. There is nothing more certain than the fate of the trainer who once relaxes the intensity of his vigilance. Just as surely as he throws himself off guard the animal he is working will get him. This is an accepted rule among those who train and perform with animals. Of course, it often appears to the outsider that the men handling ferocious animals are off their guard and nonchalantly indifferent to the creatures in the cage. But the experienced animal-man knows better. The fact that a trainer or performer allows two or three lions to pass behind his back might seem to indicate that watchfulness is not necessary, and that creatures naturally ferocious may at least sometimes be put absolutely on their good behavior—trusted with a man's life without being subjected to the slightest surveillance. In nine cases of every ten a momentary adherence to this departure would result in disaster.

WHERE STEADY NERVES ARE IN DEMAND

The best men of the profession I have ever known have all assured me that the stupidest animal is quicker to detect the slightest relaxation of a trainer's watchfulness than is the keenest trainer to observe the abnormal and hostile mood of his pupils. For this reason no trainer or performer should be allowed to enter a cage unless he is in a normal frame of mind—sober, in full command of all his faculties, and not subject to any distracting influence.

Most of the tragedies of the profession are chargeable to a disobedience to this rule. The unfailing brute instinct at once detects the fact that the trainer has let down the bars of his mind, and then comes the long-delayed attack!

Never do I tire of watching a good trainer work his animals, especially those fresh from their native wilds and full of snap and spirit. What sport more splendid and royal can man imagine than that of placing his life in imminent peril for the purpose of putting a wild beast—a creature far his superior in strength, in swiftness of movement, and in all-round fighting power—in complete subjection to his will! It is truly a sport for a King!

CAPTURED ANIMALS PREFERRED TO CAGE-BORN

The only universal rule for working animals recognized by all trainers is this: First, show the creature what you wish done; then make him do it. Easily said, but sometimes almost impossible in practice. I have yet to find any other line of human effort demanding such unwearying patience and application, shifty tact and unflagging alertness. All of these mental qualities are brought into activity during every moment that a trainer is working his animals. And not for an instant may he safely slacken his courage or control. A stout heart is his only safety. To go into a cage in a state of fear is recognized among these men as a foolhardy undertaking.

My observation is that trainers almost universally prefer captured animals to those born in captivity, so far as working purposes are concerned. This preference is founded on practical experience—for your animal trainer is little inclined to theorize or experiment in his work. The answer which my trainers have invariably returned to questions on this point of animal nature has been: The wild animal is afraid of man, recognizes him as a strange, dangerous enemy, and is willing to make a safe retreat from him. The carnivorous beast born in captivity is accustomed to the daily sight of man, and has not the wholesome and instinctive fear of him that dwells in the breast of the free-born denizen of the jungle. On the other hand, the cage-born creature seems to retain all the mean, treacherous and savage traits of its race.

Then the trainers declare that the jungle-reared animals are more intelligent and active, and therefore make better performers. This I have no reason to doubt. Leopards are the least in favor among trainers, and the latter prefer to undertake the education of lions rather than tigers, as the former have more stability of disposition, and lack the element of treachery which seems so universally a characteristic of cat nature.

THE EDUCATION OF A YOUNG JAGUAR

The first active step which a trainer takes in the education of an animal which has never been handled is to test its temper. I recall very distinctly watching an excellent trainer working a leopard and a jaguar from start to finish. No man had ever been into the cage along with these vicious brutes before "Frenchy," as we called this crack trainer, laughingly took up his tools and slipped gracefully through the iron door which closed behind him with a sharp bang. Realizing that these animals, which were full grown, belonged to the most spiteful and treacherous of the cat kind, I scrutinized the face of Frenchy to see if I could possibly detect the slightest sign of inward anxiety or disturbance. Not the slightest evidence could I see to indicate that he approached his dangerous task with a particle more excitement than any business man feels in going to his daily work.

As he slipped into the cage he thrust before him an ordinary kitchen chair of light, hard wood. This was held in his left hand by gripping two of the central spindles of the back, thereby obtaining an excellent purchase which enabled him easily to hold the chair outstretched with its legs pointed directly at the animals. In his right hand he carried a short iron training-rod. The only other article which he used in his first lesson was a stout, movable bracket, which could be instantly hooked upon any of the horizontal bars which extended the length of the cage in front.

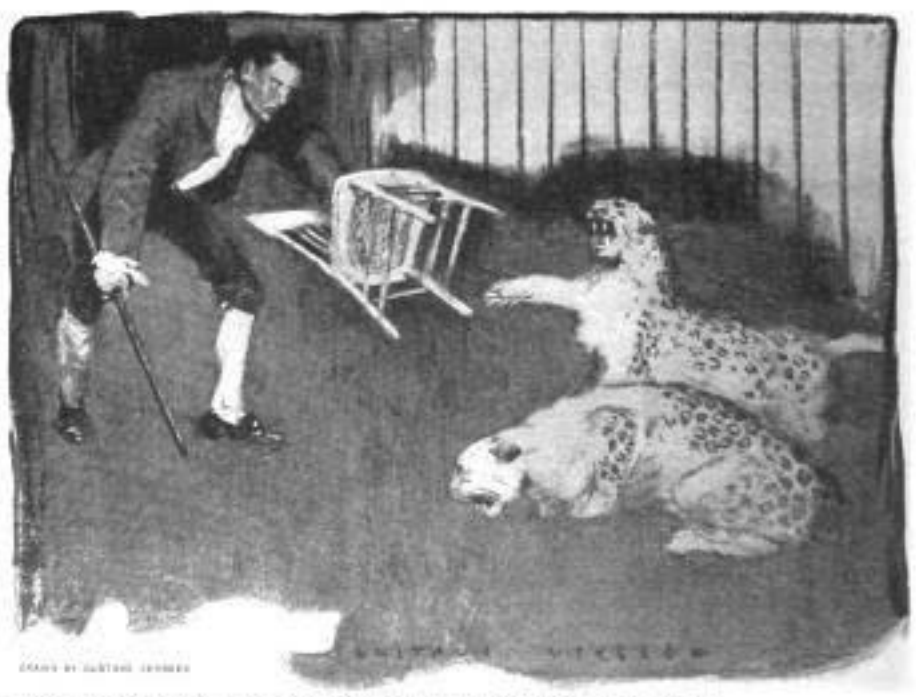
The instant the trainer faced his pupils there was a regular feline explosion—a medley of snarls, growls and hisses. And the way those spotted paws slapped and cuffed the rounds of the extended chair which served as a shield to Frenchy's legs was something to be remembered. Never before had I seen such a startling exhibition of feline quickness as in this preliminary skirmish between master and pupils. The latter's claws seemed to be everywhere in a moment and played a lively tattoo on the shield and against the point of the rod with which the trainer protected himself. During all this excitement the trainer was as calm as if standing safely outside the cage. However, he did make some lively thrusts with his rod as the leopard attempted to dash under the legs of the chair.

While one of the beasts was engaged in carrying on an offensive warfare, the other would invariably attempt to sneak behind the trainer. How alert the latter was to the movements of the creature which apparently claimed little of his attention was impressed on me by the fact that every time the crouching animal attempted to steal past the trainer he was met with the quick, sidewise thrusts of the prod, which sent him back spitting and hissing into the corner.

THE LEOPARDS AT KINDERGARTEN

In less than half an hour the leopard and the jaguar seemed to realize that they, and not the man, were on the defensive. Their savage dashes were less frequent, and they were more inclined to crouch close to the floor and lash their tails in sullen defiance. Then it was that Frenchy began his first attempt at teaching them. Hooking the movable bracket upon one of the lower rounds about three feet from the floor of the cage, he made a forward movement toward the animals, veering a little to the side opposite the bracket. The creatures had long been attempting to get past him, and now their opportunity had apparently come.

Together they made a rush to run under the projecting bracket. Quick as a flash, however, the trainer was back again in his old place, and the head of the foremost animal struck the rounds of the chair. This checked the leopard's progress for a moment, but the creature was not given a jab of the rod as before. Instead, the chair was slightly withdrawn, with the result that the spotted cat instantly bounded upon the narrow bracket—precisely the result at which the trainer had been aiming.



Before the leopard was fully aware of what was transpiring, Frenchy reached forth his training-rod and rubbed it caressingly along the creature's back from head to tail. Of course the animal struck out spitefully with its paw, but the blows were received by the chair and did no harm, while the trainer had been able to bestow upon his ferocious pupil a caressing touch of approval.

Even at that early stage in the education of the animal I fancied I could see an understanding of this commendatory stroke. Certainly within a week this sign was clearly understood, and never did one of the animals leap upon the bracket without receiving this token of approval. Before Frenchy came out of the cage on the occasion of this first experience with these two creatures his chair was splintered beyond repair. Backing out as deftly as he had entered, he leaned up against one of the posts in the winter quarters and remarked:

"Those cats will make good performers. They've got just enough fight in them. I don't mind working a leopard that's been captured, but I don't want anything to do with cats that have been born in a cage. By the time an animal has cuffed one chair to pieces I can generally size him up and get at his disposition. I don't mind a creature that's ready for war right at the start. The sulky, sullen brutes are the ones that keep a trainer in a perpetual state of suspicion."

HOW THEY PUNISH UNRULY PUPILS

Most of the training is done while the animals are in winter quarters, the cages being generally arranged in a semicircle or along the wall, while the centre of the main room is occupied by a big ring or circular space inclosed by a very strong and high fence of iron bars. At first the animals are worked in their cages, later in the ring. Lounging about in —THE LEOPARD AND THE JAGUAR SEEMED TO REALIZE THAT THEY, AND NOT THE MAN, WERE ON THE DEFENSIVE

Digitized by Google

front of the cages is a man with a long iron rod having a sharp point. The duty of this guard is to keep watch of all the cages where animals are being worked, and to be ready to come to the instant relief of any of the trainers who happen to get into trouble. Occasionally he assists them from the outside in various ways; as, for instance, by slipping his rod between the bars and heading off an animal which is attempting to sneak out of doing his trick. In the main, however, he is there to do heroic service in times of emergency.

Should a lion, tiger or any other savage creature get a trainer down or fasten its teeth or claws into his body, the watchful guard on the outside is expected to plunge his spear into the animal, or get into the cage with hot irons, if necessary. The use of heated irons is, of course, only justifiable in cases of extreme peril, but more than one trainer's life has been saved by recourse to this weapon, which quickly cows an infuriated creature which has had a taste of blood when nothing else will avail.

PUNISHMENT OF TREACHEROUS BEASTS

I have already cited one cardinal rule recognized by all animal workers. There is one other just as universally accepted by the fraternity of trainers. This is, that any animal which has inflicted injury on a trainer must be punished until completely subjugated. This punishment must be given, if possible, by the one whom the creature has injured.

No doubt more than one trainer who has been half killed by a treacherous animal has been inclined to overlook this chastisement after recovering from his injuries. This, however, is regarded as professional treachery, for it is practically certain that the rebellious animal that is not chastised in this manner will kill the next man who enters its cage. To neglect to show the brute which has injured you that you are its master is therefore, according to the ethics of the profession, a deed of cowardice, and a sure way of bringing disaster upon any other person having the hardihood to trust himself in the power of an animal that has "downed" its trainer.

Of course some trainers are killed outright, and others are so disabled in severe encounters that they are absolutely unable to continue in the service. Then the duty of inflicting the chastisement falls upon a new man, and you may rest assured he never looks forward to the job with any particular pleasure. There is but one course, however, and that is to beat the creature until it howls for mercy. Occasionally an animal famed for its splendid performances is suddenly and without any apparent reason retired from the program. As a performing animal is worth many times as much as one that has not been trained, this would seem a strange and unbusinesslike course on the part of the management.

The outsider would immediately ask: "Why not continue the performance with this animal so long as it does not kill a man or conduct itself more savagely than many others of its kind which have the confidence of trainers and performers?"

The answer is very simple: The man handling the animal and knowing well its character has been able to discern a radical change in its disposition. He declares that the brute is no longer to be trusted, and any wise and humane showman who receives this kind of a warning from a reliable and efficient trainer or performer will retire the brute in question to a cage and leave it there. On the other hand, some animals which have tasted blood, and even "killed their man," are continued in the service. Why? Because the trainer who goes in to chastise them believes that he has been able to beat the animal into a permanent state of penitence, humility and wholesome fear, and to effectually obliterate the sense of triumph in the mind of the creature.

A SINGLE-HAND FIGHT WITH FIVE LIONS

Occasionally a foolish and intermeddling spectator will endeavor to show his brilliancy by experimenting with the animals. More than once this tendency has well-nigh cost a performer his life. I recall one instance when a performer was doing an act in a cage containing five lions. He had just begun his work, and the lions had taken their positions. In the middle of the cage, facing him, was one large lion, and at either end sat two others. Of course a big crowd had collected in front of the cage and was pressing heavily against the guard ropes. Suddenly a countryman of the smart kind was seized with a desire to distinguish himself and attract a little attention. Slipping inside the ropes, he stooped down and took up the ragged little dog that was crouching at his heels. The instant he lifted the cur up to the level of the cage every lion gave out a roar and made a wild leap for the yellow mongrel.

For a few moments the performer was completely lost to view, buried underneath the writhing bodies of the infuriated lions. Of course the animal men outside made a rush for the cage door, but before they could reach it with their irons in hand the plucky performer was on his feet again and fighting his own battle. A tooth or a claw had split his nose and upper lip, and the tattered condition of his clothing indicated that he had suffered severely. Although his face was bathed in blood, he stood his ground and plied his rod on the heads and noses of the growling beasts until they were momentarily driven back. But they had tasted blood and were furious. Before he could reach the door they were at him again, and in the onslaught his right arm and hip were frightfully lacerated. His grit, however, was indomitable, and he struck and jabbed right and left like a gladiator. Finally the howls of pain from the lions revealed the fact that he was getting the upper hand of them, and at last they were driven howling and whining into the corners of the cage and he backed out of the door. No sooner was he safely outside the cage than he became unconscious.

—EVERY LION GAVE OUT A ROAR AND MADE A WILD LEAP

It was a good thing for the countryman whose folly had stirred up the lions that he contrived to make his escape from the grounds before the circus men got hold of him. This incident is simply typical of hundreds of others perhaps more interesting and exciting. It will, however, serve to indicate the constant perils that surround the trainer or performer, many of which arise from sources over which he has no control.

I have often been asked if the training of animals does not quite generally involve considerable cruelty. This, it seems to me, may fairly be answered in the negative, although one exception should be made. Though great firmness must be shown in working wild animals, and frequent and severe chastisements are called for, there is nothing essentially cruel in the method of training. This, however, cannot be said of the methods generally followed by the trainers of horses.

I can never forget how forcibly and painfully this exception was brought home to me. In company with Mr. Costello I had brought from Texas and New Mexico a herd of beautiful pinto ponies, or broncbos. They were handsome piebald creatures, and apparently very intelligent, although desperately wild. From a herd of about forty we picked out sixteen to be educated for the ring. About ten miles out of Chicago we put up a convenient stable and engaged one of the most celebrated trainers in the United States. In the course of a few weeks the animals became accustomed to having men about them, and then I told the trainer to begin his work.

I had never watched a trainer work horses for the ring, and I was greatly interested to see how it was done. The method was so cruel that I told the trainer if he could not invent a method which inflicted less torture he might quit and we would have the horses sold. He had not the ingenuity or patience to devise a more humane method, and consequently retired from the field, leaving his assistant to work out the problem under my directions. This we finally succeeded in doing with fair results, but the method followed by the trainer is a more general one.

TEACHING A HORSE THE TWO-STEP

In teaching a horse to dance, the master would strike the poor animal above the fetlock, and this would produce a painful swelling. The result was that in a very short time the motion of the stick, in time with the music, would cause the horse to raise its foot. Before the swollen limb was healed the performance was repeated so frequently that the animal did not need the incentives of fear and pain to cause him to keep step with the music.

Jumping the rope is taught in nearly the same manner, a chain being attached to two long sticks swinging back and forth, striking the horse just below the knee. As a man was stationed on each side of him, the poor horse had no way of retreat, and was compelled to jump in order to escape the blow from the swinging bar. A horse is taught to roll an object or to push open a door in a very simple manner, and without cruelty. One man stands in front of the horse and another behind him, the three being stationed in a passageway too narrow for the horse to turn. After standing a bit in this way, the man behind the horse gently slaps him on the back and urges him forward. Instinctively the horse pushes against the man in front, and the latter quickly moves along. In this manner the horse soon learns that by pushing against an object in front of him it may readily be forced out of his way. An intelligent spectator can always tell by the attitude of a horse toward its master whether it has been ill treated. If fear seems to be the governing motive it may be depended upon that the horse has been harshly dealt with; on the other hand, the very nature of the trick performed by the animal goes far to indicate whether fear or intelligence has been the main factor in acquiring the accomplishment displayed. If you see an animal open a trunk or drawer and pick out some article for which it has been sent, you may know that this feat is the result of an appeal to the creature's intelligence and not to its fear, for no amount of punishment could ever teach a thing of this kind.

RING PERFORMERS TRAINED WITH A DERRICK

Ring horses are generally irritated when the rider first stands upon their backs. Probably the action of the foot pulls the short hair; but the irritation ceases in a short time. Riders are first trained to do their tricks on the ground. When complete masters of themselves on the ground they are put upon the back of a horse having an even gait and a reliable disposition. To the performer's belt, at the back, is atttached a stout rope which runs to the end of a strong arm or beam running out from a post set in the centre of the ring. This arm is swung around by a helper, who keeps the loose end of the rope in his hand in order to regulate the slack and prevent the young performer from having a heavy fall should he lose his footing. Again and again the rider is pulled up just in time to prevent him from falling under the hoofs of his horse. He is swung forward, dangling from the arm of the derrick, until he regains his balance and his footing upon the back of his horse.

To describe in detail how every feat and specialty is taught would require a volume, but on general principles it may be said that all tricks are first learned on the ground, or at a safe and minimum elevation. Then when the performer has attained absolute self-confidence and is wholly without fear he is allowed to swing higher, until he finally reaches the height required in the public performance.

CIRCUS PEOPLE A LONG-LIVED RACE

In the old days it was the general custom for the circus proprietors to put their own children into the business, teaching them to do everything in the acrobatic line, from bareback riding to trapeze and bar work and slack-rope and tight-rope walking. Many of them were also skilled musicians and could play several instruments in the band.

At the present day many persons not familiar with the inside life of the circus will no doubt be horrified to think that a man wealthy enough to own a big circus and menagerie would train his sons, and particularly his daughters, for the ring. Let me say on this score that I could name a long list of families in which this custom prevailed, and must say that the private and domestic life of these people was far above that of the average family in fashionable society. Almost invariably the members of each family were devoted to each other and were refined and intelligent. Many of the young women of these families married wealthy and cultured men, and retired from the circus business to become the mistresses of refined and happy homes. Many old showmen whose children were star performers carried accomplished teachers with them on the road, and the children were as well educated as if the entire time had been spent attending school.

Their training and work in the ring not only afforded them splendid physical exercise, but taught them patience, application, alertness, and many other valuable lessons which made their progress very rapid when it came to their lessons from books. It is a fact worthy of notice that the circus people are a long-lived race. I can name almost a score of famous performers who have attained an age of more than eighty years. This would tend to show that circus work is quite as healthy as any other. I may add that the charge so frequently brought against showmen, that the training of children for the circus ring is cruel, is not well founded.

While I have seen many instances of cruelty in this connection, there is nothing in the work itself which necessitates hardship or harshness. In fact, quite the reverse is true.

The child is the sooner trained into an ability to do a dangerous and daring feat through gentleness and encouragement. In other words, the more they overcome their fear in every direction the better able are they to swing from one trapeze to another, to walk the tight rope at a dizzy height, or to turn somersaults from the back of a galloping horse.

Editor's Note—In the series The Memories of an Old Showman, from the notes of the late W. C. Coup, this is the third paper. The first appeared in the issue of November 18. Others will follow in early numbers.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
421 TO 427 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA

February 3, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription
5 Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

To Buyers of The Saturday Evening Post:

IF YOU have arranged to have THE SATURDAY EVENING POST delivered weekly at your house or office, and the newsdealer with whom your order has been placed is not serving you promptly and regularly, we should be glad to have a line from you, briefly stating the facts. And if you do not find the POST at your newsdealer's, or he is inadequately supplied, we should be glad to know that. The appreciation of the POST by the public has been so generous that we have been hard pressed to keep pace with the rapidly increasing demand. But we have been running our presses twenty-two hours a day—and are having a large number of new presses built—that the newsdealers may be adequately supplied and no buyer or subscriber disappointed.

It's cheaper to be on hand when the train starts than to overtake it with a special.

The Leading American Question

AN HONEST vote is still the greatest issue in American politics. When we think of the sacrifices that were made; of the good lives that were freely given; of the stress and strain of war and peace that the citizen might be sovereign, it seems incomprehensible that the pollution of the ballot-box should not only have continued through the century, but that it should have acquired a certain justification in the acquiescence of the people themselves. It is surely to our large discredit not only that every reform for the purity of the ballot has had to be fought with great patience and great vigor, but that it has had to be absolutely wrested from the forces of partisanship and corruption which had entrenched themselves in the strongholds of the States. The battle has been going on for years, and it is yet not more than half won. At the very time we are teaching other parts of the world the blessings of liberty and honest administration, millions of our own people at home are not doing what they can to compel the emancipation of the franchise from the bosses and corruptionists. On its face the situation seems absolutely absurd. If it were proposed that the right to vote should be taken from you, Mr. Citizen, you would not only invoke the courts, but you would be willing to fight as your forefathers did. Yet, what are you doing to protect that vote? When one of your party rascals cheats his way in, or buys his way in, you would hardly take the trouble to appear on the witness-stand against him, and possibly if you were a member of the Grand Jury you would be inclined to condone the act as belonging to the tricks of politics.

Of course, much has been done. Every State but two has the Australian ballot method, or some modification of it. But the modified Australian law is a very elastic and unsatisfactory arrangement. It generally has the name of that excellent measure with enough loopholes for the old rascalities. Just see how inharmonious the whole thing is! Three of the States do not even require registration of voters. In two States registration is prohibited by constitutional provision. In half of them registration is required only in cities. In some of the others the registration is annual; in others every two years; in others every four or five years. In many of them are thousands of names which come to light only when used by repeaters at the polls. Qualifications for voting vary considerably, and the voting itself presents extraordinary differences. For instance, in the last election, Maryland and Mississippi, with about the same populations, voted for Governor. In Maryland the total vote was 244,695, while in Mississippi it was only 48,648. The last Presidential election drew out the highest vote the country had ever known, and yet Alabama, casting less than 200,000 votes, had 11 votes in the Electoral College, while Kansas, casting over 334,000, had only 10. Mississippi, casting about 70,000 votes, had 9 votes in the Electoral College, while Nebraska, casting over 220,000, had only 8. The total vote in the Presidential election was under 14,000,000, and Mr. McKinley's plurality of about 600,000 was unusually large; and yet there were enough votes outside the ballot-boxes to reverse the entire result, not only in the total vote polled, but in the Electoral College.

Compulsory voting is a dream which regularly finds its way into nearly every legislative body, and never gets beyond the committee-room. It is practically impossible to make a man do his higher duty by mere legislation. That is not what is needed for the good of the ballot. When a man knows absolutely that his vote is going to count for its full value, and that he can cast it with comfort, convenience and privacy, he will be more apt to vote than if there were a law providing a penalty for remaining away from the polls. And this reform of the ballot is so simple a matter that it can be accomplished at once and for all time if the people would only determine that it shall be done. Ballot reform is really a mere matter of mechanics. Fence the voter in and fence the briber out; give the voter plenty of room and keep the party workers a safe distance from the booth. Add to this compulsory secrecy in the marking and casting of the ballot, and the whole thing is done. Even if entirely honest judges cannot be secured at first, enough of them can be put in jail to serve as object-lessons to any others who would follow their example. But what the country needs in order to make the reform complete is that sentiment which holds the man who corrupts the ballot as the meanest and most contemptible scoundrel of the land, whether he be a mere tool in the hands of others or a boss worth millions, in or out of Congress.

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

When in doubt the average American either votes the independent ticket or goes on an excursion.

Geography from a Car Window

KNOWING one's own country, like knowing one's self, is a matter of distances and perspectives. Looking at the map and becoming familiar with the shore-lines, the courses of rivers, the situations of towns and cities, and the peripheries of States and counties, can afford but small knowledge touching the real features of a continent. True, we might easily recognize a mountain peak or a stretch of headlands by reference to a small photograph; but when we come to climb the height or walk some miles along the sea-washed and wind-swept bluff there comes an understanding vastly deeper and greater than could have been even vaguely suggested by the most truthful descriptions and pictures, maps and tables of distances. Landscapes, sea-reaches, horizons, hills, valleys, towns, cities, countrysides, have a way of informing us directly and immediately—they give us a thousand details not down in the best guide-books.

On the map the little space between St. Louis and Philadelphia looks scarcely worth considering; but undertake the journey across it by the ancient stage-coach and the distance will gradually grow and grow, until midway of it the task undertaken will burden every nerve of the body and discourage every well of mental energy. We begin to realize, under such a strain, what the smaller areas of our country may be. Day after day we plod along; at every stopping-place we look at the map to see where we are, and our progress is slower, it seems, than that of a snail.

But it is when we set our faces Southward or Westward and fly by rail that the splendor of distances truly dazzles us. Perhaps a winter sweep toward the Gulf of Mexico from a high Northern point affords the most sudden realization of America's greatness of extent. A day of snow and ice, the wind blowing fiercely from a Boreal cave, the thermometer cruelly boasting its ability to dive many degrees below zero, the hills white, the trees bare, the sky like blue ice, the sun a mere twinkle on the far Southern sky-slope—and in one's pocket a bit of pasteboard good for a seat in a railway parlor-car all the way to the Gulf shore; a long whistle-blast, and then a rush down the slope of the world.

Twenty-four hours later, after a night of broken sleep in a narrow and shallow berth, we look forth and see palm trees gliding and whirling backward past us. Where are we? Is this Asia? Africa? Have we leaped a space of sea and struck a tropical island? The car-porter informs us that we are in Louisiana, or Southern Mississippi, or Texas, or Florida. When he opens the window a fragrant breath of pine and salt marsh puffs in, and we hear one of Sidney Lanier's odes singing itself in our mind. Yonder is a pleasant cottage in the midst of an orange grove; there are great masses of roses in full blow on a trellis of the veranda.

This is our country. Yesterday it was a frozen land, blizzard-tortured, snow-heaped, leafless, barren; to-day it is a region of summer with all the sweetness of June in December. Distance enforces its deepest significance upon us; the grandeur of our national estate awes us, and at the same time charms us strangely. In the "globe-trotter's" eye our journey looks small—only a thousand miles or so—but to the thoughtful patriot there is a meaning in what these distances compass. These miles flung behind during our flight of twenty-four hours measure far more than mere geography and climate: the people are measured; manners, customs, industries, aspirations are measured. From far off yonder on Puget Sound or by the Golden Gate, from the stark hills of Maine, a little flight, as time goes, sweeps us by almost every variety of surface and soil and people.

Magnificent distances, indeed, are the measures of our domain, and every American should realize them fully before wandering in foreign lands.

—MAURICE THOMPSON.

Travel to learn and learn to travel.

The Fate of Irony

AMONG the sad, familiar commonplaces of life is the fact that no human being ever perfectly understands another. Any difference in knowledge, capacity or antecedents is enough to disturb a perfect correspondence between speaker and hearer. I say X and mean X: but if you had said X you would have meant X + a or X — a; consequently you suppose that I mean X + a or X — a. People, however, continue to go about with the pathetic illusion that they are understood, and many pairs of them really believe that they are "one." The philosopher knows that they are not, that when they seem to say or to desire the same thing the thought is different.

A familiar and elementary fact of life, and yet though all this is so, though even when a man tries his utmost to say what he really thinks, some different thought will certainly be attributed to him, people are actually found who deliberately say what they do not think and yet expect their real thoughts to be discovered! When once a habit of irony has grown upon a man he cannot resist it, however frequent his experience that he will be taken literally. Statistically worked out, the proportion of the race that understands irony is roughly .00000001. But you can never persuade the ironical man that he will be taken seriously; editors in particular are always trying to persuade him. The ironical man expounds some monstrous heresy by way of a joke: immediately he is surrounded by an infuriated crowd which has put him down for a monstrous heretic. In vain does he declare that he was only in fun; if the subject-matter is serious he will very likely be persecuted to the end of his life. But he goes on his ironical path incorrigible. I am not sure, indeed, that if he does succeed in convincing people that he was in fun his case will not be even worse. For then he will never be allowed to be in earnest; nobody will credit him with sincerity, and at his most sincere moment he will merely be thought guilty of an unusually poor joke.

Disraeli was a great master of irony, and much of the misunderstanding and distrust there were of him came from that fact. Here is a trivial but significant instance. He was once showing Sir William Harcourt, or some other important person, over Hughenden, and remarked as a mild joke against himself, Hughenden being but a small place: "Excuse the vanity of a landed proprietor." I have seen that remark quoted hundreds of times, and every time as an instance, not of playfulness at his own expense, but of ridiculous pomposity.

Lord Salisbury is another ironical person, and I notice that the confidence England places in him generally seems to be slightly diminished when he has made a speech. It is your absolutely matter-of-fact man with whom people feel secure. A part of the odium which Byron incurred, and which to us seems so strange, was probably due to his habit, in mere humor and good spirits, of falling in with his critics' preconceived idea that he was a very wicked man. I myself—to come to insignificant things—pay two penalties to this day for having written an ironical little book: part of that portion of the human race which has read it insisting that I meant it all in propria persona, and the other part (which has very kindly gone through the labor of finding out that I meant to be funny) refusing to believe that I ever mean to be anything else. When my tragedy—— But my space is full.

—G. S. STREET.

The quickest way to solve the trust problem is to make every voter a stockholder in the monopolies.

The God of Battles

MAN is the only animal that wars upon his own species. The fact has long been used as a reproach, but it really indicates the essential difference between man and brute. The physical life which man has in common with the brute he will sacrifice for an idea, whereas the brute simply obeys his individual appetite and fights for its satisfaction. The distinction shows that in his moral and intellectual nature man is of another order of existence than the brute.

Despite all the miseries which attend war, it really seems to be a part of the moral discipline of the human race, for all philosophic inquirers agree that civilization is to a large extent a military product. There is no instance in history of a people rising in the scale through the arts of peace alone. Mr. Herbert Spencer, while holding that the evolution of a pacific and industrial type of civilization is the true goal of progress, admits that warfare originally developed the habits of discipline and order without which the existence of civilized communities would be impossible.

But if character has been formed and heroic virtues developed through warfare, the same may be said of the general conflict between good and evil in which man's whole existence plays its part; and even though evil abounds that grace may more abound, yet evil is none the less evil to be condemned, and the sentiment that abhors war and labors against it is well founded.

—HENRY JONES FORD.

Digitized by Google

Americans in Paris

LAST year the City of Philadelphia bought for the Wilstach collection one of the most important pictures exhibited in the Salon in many a day. It was the Annunciation, by H. O. Tanner. This young man belongs to that race of which the great novelist, Dumas, was the glory: he is a mulatto. Beard and hair are crinkly; his regular, thin and handsome features are yellow. He was born in Philadelphia, learned there the rudiments of his craft—with Aikens and at the Academy of Fine Arts—and then, in 1892, came to Paris to study with Benjamin Constant and Jean Paul Laurens. Four years later he sent his first picture to the Salon, where it received an "honorable mention." The picture was the revelation of a new talent, at once mystic and realistic. It was a Daniel in the Lions' Den—grim, crouching beasts, and a man leaning in the shadow of a brick wall. And it was the Orient and it was the Bible, and it was art as modern as that of Whistler. There was race in it—a quality new to Biblical painting. His next picture was bought by the French Government. The young mulatto had "arrived," as they say here. He ranks with the great religious painters of the century, and he won his triumph in five years.

MADEMOISELLE LA MARQUISE OF BEANPOT

THERE is an American in Paris whose sole authentic name is Beanpot, though she is also known as "the daughter of the Colony." I had the pleasure of meeting her the other day, and she sat on my knee and looked at me with solemn eyes and said: "My real name is Beanpot; that's all I know." This was not quite true, for she knows the French irregular verbs and a great many other things, but, for all that, it was just what she should have said, as you shall see.

Four years ago a queer little American made his appearance in Paris. His name was Hubert or Herbert or Gilbert, or something of the sort; no one knows quite what it was. He haunted the studios of the Latin Quarter, for he had invented an adjustable picture frame. It was made of collapsible tubes, and was really quite extraordinary. He had no money and he could not speak French, but he had come to Paris to sell his adjustable frame to the painters. He must have been a hopeful man. He had brought his wife and baby with him. For months he pestered the artists with his absurd frame; they knew he was a nuisance and thought he was a trifle crazy. Finally, growing raggeder and leaner, he begged for work of any kind. He wanted to run errands—though he did not know Paris and could not speak French—to sweep out the studios, to do anything. Some of the artists helped him—Faulkner, who painted those wonderful Venice pictures; Flanagan, the sculptor; Seymour Thomas, Tanner, and a few other Americans. But they did not know about the wife and they did not know about the child—and then there are in Paris many Americans with broken fortunes and tilted wits. Early one morning when Faulkner came to his studio in the Impasse du Maine he found the little frame-maker shivering on his doorstep.

"My wife's dying," said the little man, "there alone—will you come?"

A moment later they were in a cab. They came to the house. It was in the Rue Boissonade, near the Observatory. The room was at the top, and there they found a woman dead in bed and a little girl of three crying on the floor. The artist went out for assistance. He sent the concièrge of the house up to the death-chamber. He secured a doctor, why he does not know. It was perhaps half an hour before he returned. The sheet was drawn up over the dead woman's face. By the bedside sat the old concièrge holding in her arms the little child. The little frame-maker was gone. Since then he has not been seen. He simply dropped out of knowledge, if not out of life.

When they asked the little girl her name she said "Beanpot." After the funeral a few of the American artists determined to provide for this American country-woman. They formed the Beanpot Club. Once a month they meet in one of the studios and smoke pipes and make sketches, and, before separating, they auction the pictures off to each other, and the money is put away for Beanpot. She is seven years old now, a dark little girl, with solemn eyes and a pretty, womanly face. She lives with an old woman who lives in an old lodge at the gates of an old studio building. From eight in the morning until four in the afternoon she goes to school and knows the irregular verbs and speaks French like a little Marquise. When she grows up (she says) she intends to paint horses and dogs and cats. Perhaps it is just as well she should learn to paint something, for her whole inheritance is made up of a few rusty iron tubes—the "adjustable picture frame" that will not adjust.

GENERAL PORTER KEPT IN COUNTENANCE

MORE important than the Beanpot Club (though I am not sure that it does any more good) is the American University Club, made up of exiles who have attained to the dignity of sheepskins. It is four years old, and the other night it gave a dinner at the Hotel Continental. General Horace Porter presided, and was kept in countenance by M. Paul Ribot, a former Prime Minister of France. Among the guests were M. de Ricaudy, who discovered the grave of John Paul Jones; Professor J. C. Freeman, of Wisconsin University, and Patrick Geddes, of St. Andrews. But the guest of honor was a slim, dandified man, with a little, dark mustache and an eyeglass with a thick black cord—Henri de Régnier, the poet. He is to be next year's Hyde lecturer at Harvard, and he will tell you all about Mallarmé and Verlaine, symbolists, decadents, egoists, and all the other little schools of French poetry.

And this is quite right. No one knows better than M. de Régnier all these schools of verse. He has belonged to them all. With unflagging enthusiasm he has followed every leader who has come to the front during twenty years, even Walt Whitman. And so, though it has been his misfortune never to be quite himself, he has written volumes of good poetry. Withal, he has had his duels and all that. A few years ago he married a daughter of José Maria de Hérédia, who is himself a poet and a son of that Cuban poet whom Bryant praised. Some day M. de Régnier will be a member of the Academy, and thus one-fortieth part Immortal.

GALLIC SYMPATHY FOR THE BOERS

IF YOU were to take a plebiscite of the American women in Europe you would find that nine-tenths of them are in sympathy with the stout little burghers of the Transvaal in that far-away war. Doctor Nevin, the well-known American pastor of Rome, has spoken for Italy, and I can answer for France. So far as German countries go, the subscriptions to the Red Cross speak louder than words. Of course in London the American women, titled and untitled, have fitted out a hospital ship, the Maine, to sail under the English flag; but on this side of the channel the womanly sympathy has gone to the weaker side. Perhaps it is natural. Certainly it is beautiful.

One of these American women has found mere money-giving unsatisfying. She has equipped an ambulance, and by the time you read this will be on her way to Pretoria. This lady, years ago, was Miss Agnes Le Clerq Joy, of Washington. There in the early sixties she married the Prince Felix von Salm-Salm. He fought through your American war and she served among the nurses. In the Franco-Prussian War the Prince held a high command and the Princess Agnes accompanied an ambulance. And so the danger and hardships she will find in Africa will not be new to her. She knows what she has to face. Not only did the Princess Salm-Salm equip the ambulance, but she engaged a corps of German physicians and nurses. In the Franco-Prussian War her heroism won for her the Iron Cross. The little Boer Republics have no dignities to bestow, but brave and beautiful deeds always find their own reward.

THE LOVE OF LOVES

By Madison Cawein

I HAVE not seen her face, and yet
She is more sweet than anything
Of earth; than rose or violet
That April winds and sunbeams bring.
Of all we know, past or to come,
Of loveliness none can forget,
She is the high compendium;
And yet——

I have not touched her robe, and still
She is more dear than lyric words
Of music; or than strains that fill
Wild brooks and throats of summer birds.
Of all we mean by poetry,
That rules the soul and charms the will,
She is the deep epitome:
And still——

She is my world: ah, pity me!
A dream that flies whom I pursue!
Whom all pursue, whoe'er they be,
Who toil for art and dare and do;
The shadow-love for whom they sigh,
The far ideal affinity,
For whom they live or gladly die.
Ah, me!

CONSTERNATION OVER THE NEW RÉGIME

OVER in that queer American colony on the left bank—the land of velvet coats and long hair—there is consternation. The painters have just learned the conditions upon which they may (possibly) exhibit at the Exposition of 1900. The space allotted to the American artists is two hundred yards on a line. This is bad enough. There will be room for scarcely one-tenth of the representative American painters, even if no one exhibits more than one picture. Already the two greatest American artists have been forced out. Whistler and Sargent will exhibit in the British section. This is itself a crime. As well might Edison figure among the Germans. But—they will tell you over in the Latin Quarter—there is worse behind. An outsider has been appointed head of the American art department. Mr. John Cauldwell, as every one will agree, is one of the most charming fellows in New York, but he is not an artist. And he is to select the pictures that will figure in the Exposition. Probably he will select a jury of New York artists to help him out, but that will not do much to help the artist exiles of Paris. Dannet, McEwen, Melchers, and a few others too important to be overlooked, will unquestionably find places on that two-hundred-yard line, but the younger men have given up hope. In order to get a broad idea of American art in 1900 you will have to go to the British section and the Salon.

SATURDAY NIGHT IN THE LATIN QUARTER

IN SPITE of this dark outlook, the painters, who are merry folk, are enjoying themselves after their kind. Perhaps you do not know just how harmless a way this is. Of course there are always students, coltish persons raw from American villages, who riot in the old Du Maurieresque fashion; but the painter who has arrived is a serious person. All week he works like a galley-slave. It is only on Saturday night that he turns the studies to the wall, rolls away the easels and prepares to enjoy himself.

The other Saturday night the "crowd" met in Herbert Faulkner's huge studio—a ghostly place with tapestries and queer bits of old carving. On a sideboard were quaint German beer-mugs, a punch-bowl of mulled claret, piles of tomato sandwiches, and a Dutch cheese. In the centre of the room, under a big lamp, was an old oak table, round which sat a half-score of artists working away for dear life. There was John Flanagan, the sculptor who is making the four big eagles that are to crown the American building here; Seymour Thomas, who came from Texas; Eugene Grivaz, whom you remember in New York; Lazare, oldest and shortest of them all; Simpson, McRae, Marsh—all men who have made a mark at the Salon. Each had a zinc etching plate on which he was spreading—with fingers or brushes or bits of wood—brown oil-paint. I circled the table like an uneasy ghost. Flanagan was building up with his sculptor's thumb the head of a football chap, wild hair, sweater, and all. Thomas, having stippled over his zinc in a reddish brown, was sketching with a match some old Spanish mission-house of San Antonio. Grivaz had a tall knight, lance in hand, riding along some lonely mediæval street. And when these zinc plates and all the others were finished the "printing" began. The plate was covered with a sheet of wet white blotting-paper and run through an American clothes-wringer. All the color, of course, was transferred to the paper, and the result was a monotype. At this delightful game—and you would be surprised to know how much chance there is in it; how a meadow may turn out to be a sea and a knight's lance a fishing-pole—they spent the evening. Of course they smoked many pipes and drank the beer and ate the Spanish tomatoes and the Dutch cheese, but it was far—very far—from the Trilby revels and all that sort of thing; and far more amusing.

THE LAST BRAVE BOHEMIAN

THERE is indeed very little Bohemianism among the artists of the day, and even the students have learned that genius, after all, is merely the habit of working eight hours a day. I think the last of the Bohemians is André Castaigne, and even his Bohemianism is dignified with the red ribbon of the Legion of Honor. (You know he has just been made Chevalier.) His studio in the Rue des Fourneaux is as decorative as need be, and Castaigne, stalwart and big, with a dragoon's mustaches, has the look of a prosperous poet. He takes his Bohemia at dinner-time. Near his studio, in one of the noisiest streets in the Quarter, is a bureau de tabac—a dark little shop where they sell tobacco and wine and where one may dine for eighteen cents. The only customers are workmen in blouses, cabmen in white hats and—the Chevalier Castaigne. He takes his soup, his square of bread, his two cents' worth of carrots like the rest of them.

"They are men," says Castaigne, "these fellows. I like to take off my coat and sit down with them. They don't chatter of 'light and shadow,' 'drawing by the masses,' 'producing effects,' 'relations,' 'tones,' and all the nonsense of the studio. They are men who live and work and see things. Their talk is worth all the books ever written."

And yet Castaigne is as exigent an artist as you ever met. In his studio I saw a pile of unopened magazines.

"I don't care to open them," he said. "In the first place, I don't want to see what the other fellows are doing, and then—it breaks my heart to see the reproductions."

And there spoke the artist.

That reminds me of Edwin Abbey's experience. The art editor of the magazine buying his work wrote him a letter urging him to make his drawings bolder and broader. "Your effects are so delicate," he wrote, "that our men cannot reproduce them."

Abbey wrote back: "Get better men."

That is just what they did, and, incidentally, raised black and white illustration to the dignity of a fine art.

—VANCE THOMPSON.

Digitized by Google

—while our office boy, with an excellent pair of scissors for his assistant, was responsible for our supply of Wit and Humor

Three MEN on Four Wheels

By Jerome K. Jerome

Copyright, 1899, by Jerome K. Jerome. Copyright in Great Britain

The Universal Educator

A STORY is told of a Scotchman, who, loving a lassie, desired her for his wife. But he possessed the prudence of his race. He had noticed in his circle many an otherwise promising union result in disappointment and dismay purely in consequence of the false estimate formed by bride or bridegroom concerning the imagined perfectability of the other. He determined that in his own case no collapsed ideal should be possible. Therefore it was that his proposal took the following form:

"I'm but a puir lad, Jennie; I hae nae siller to offer ye, an' nae land."

"Ah, but ye hae yersel', Davie."

"An' I'm wishfu' it wa' onythin' else, lassie. I'm nae but a puir, ill-seasoned loon, Jennie."

"Na, na; there's mony a lad mair ill-lookin' than yersel', Davie."

"I hae nae seen him, lass, an' I'm just a-thinkin' I shouldna care to."

"Better a plain mon, Davie, that ye can depend on than ane that would be a-speerin' at the lassies an' bringin' trouble into the hame wi' his floutin' ways."

"Dinna ye reckon on that, Jennie; it's nae the bonniest Bubbly Jock that maks the most feathers to fly in the kail-yard. I was ever a lad to run after the petticoats, as is weel kent; an' it's a weary handfu' I'll be to ye, I'm thinkin'."

"Ah, but ye hae a kind heart, Davie; an' ye love me weel. I'm sure on't."

"I like ye weel enoo', Jennie, though I canna say how long the feelin' may bide wi' me; an' I'm kind enoo' when I hae my ain way, an' naethin' happens to put me oot. But I hae the deevil's ain temper, as my mither can tell ye, an', like my puir fayther, I'm a-thinkin' I'll grow nae better as I grow mair auld."

"Ay, but ye're sair hard upon yersel', Davie. Ye're an honest lad. I ken ye better than ye ken yersel', an' ye'll mak a guid hame for me."

"Maybe, Jennie. But I hae my doots. It's a sair thing for wife an' bairns when the guid man canna keep awa' frae the glass; an' when the scent o' the whuskey comes to me it's just as though I hae'd the throat o' a Loch Tay salmon; it just gaes doon an' doon, an' there's nae fillin' o' me."

"Ay, but ye're a guid man when ye're sober, Davie."

"Maybe I'll be that, Jennie, if I'm nae disturbed."

"An' ye'll bide wi' me, Davie, an' work for me?"

"I see nae reason why I shouldna bide wi' ye, Jennie; but dinna ye clack aboot work to me, for I just canna abear the thocht o't."

"Anyhow, ye'll do yer best, Davie? As the minister says, nae man can do mair than that."

"An' it's a puir best that mine'll be, Jennie, an' I'm nae sure ye'll hae ower muckle even o' that. We're a' weak, sinfu' creatures, Jennie, an' ye'd hae some deeficulty to find a man weaker or mair sinfu' than mysel'."

"Weel, weel, ye hae a truthfu' tongue, Davie. Mony a lad will mak fine promises to a puir lassie, only to break 'em an' her heart wi' 'em. Ye speak me fair, Davie, an' I'm thinkin' I'll just tak ye, an' see what comes o't."

Concerning what did come of it the story is silent, but one feels that under no circumstances had the lady any right to complain of her bargain. Whether she ever did or did not—for women do not invariably order their tongues according to logic, nor men either, for the matter of that—Davie himself must have the satisfaction of reflecting that all reproaches were undeserved.

I wish to be equally frank with the reader of these papers. I wish here conscientiously to set forth their shortcomings. I wish no one to read these papers under a misapprehension. There will be no useful information in them.

Any one who should think that with the aid of this story he would be able to make a tour through Germany and the Black Forest would probably lose himself before he got to The Nore. That, at all events, would be the best thing that could happen to him. The farther away from home he got, the greater only would be his difficulties.

I do not regard the conveyance of useful information as my forte. This belief was not inborn with me; it has been driven home upon me by experience.

In my early journalistic days I served upon a paper, the forerunner of many very popular periodicals of the present day. Our boast was that we combined instruction with amusement; as to what should be regarded as affording amusement and what instruction the reader judged for himself. We gave advice to people about to marry—long, earnest advice that would, had they followed it, have made our circle of readers the envy of the whole married world. We told our subscribers how to make fortunes by keeping rabbits, giving facts and figures. The thing that must have surprised them was that we ourselves did not give up journalism and start rabbit farming. Often and often have I proved conclusively from authoritative sources how any man starting a rabbit farm with twelve selected rabbits and a little judgment must at the end of three years be in receipt of an income of two thousand a year, rising rapidly. He simply could not help himself. He might not want the money. He might not know what to do with it when he had it. But there it was for him. I have never met a rabbit farmer myself worth two thousand a year, though I have known many start with the six necessary, assorted couples. Something has always gone wrong somewhere; maybe the continued atmosphere of a rabbit farm saps the judgment.

We told our readers how many bald-headed men there were in Iceland, and for all we knew our figures may have been correct; how many red herrings placed tail to mouth it would take to reach from London to Rome, which must have been useful to any one desirous to lay down a line of red herrings from London to Rome, enabling him to order in the right quantity at the beginning; how many words the average woman spoke in a day; and other such like items of information calculated to make them wise and great beyond the readers of other journals.

We told them how to cure fits in cats. Personally, I do not believe, and I did not believe then, that you can cure fits in cats. If I had a cat subject to fits I should advertise it for sale, or even give it away. But our duty was to supply information when asked for. Some fool wrote, clamoring to know; and I spent the best part of a morning seeking knowledge on the subject. I found what I wanted at length at the end of an old cookery book. What it was doing there I have never been able to understand. It had nothing to do with the proper subject of the book whatever; there was no suggestion that you could make anything savory out of a cat, even when you had cured it of its fits. The authoress had just thrown in this paragraph out of pure generosity. I can only say that I wish she had left it out; it was the cause of a deal of angry correspondence and of the loss of four subscribers to the paper, if not more. The man said the result of following our advice had been two pounds' worth of damage to his kitchen crockery, to say nothing of a broken window and probable blood-poisoning to himself; added to which the cat's fits were worse than before. And yet, it was a simple enough recipe. You held the cat between your legs, gently, so as not to hurt it, and with a pair of scissors made a sharp, clean cut in its tail. You did not cut off any part of the tail; you were careful only to make an incision.

As we explained to the man, the garden or the coal-cellar would have been the proper place for the operation; no one but an idiot would have attempted to perform it in a kitchen, and without help.

We gave them hints on etiquette. We told them how to address peers and bishops; also how to eat soup. We instructed shy young men how to acquire easy grace in drawing-rooms. We taught dancing to both sexes by the aid of diagrams. We solved their religious doubts for them, and supplied them with a code of morals that would have done credit to a stained-glass window.

The paper was not a financial success—it was some years before its time—and the consequence was that our staff was limited. My own department, I remember, included Advice to Mothers—I wrote that with the assistance of my landlady, who, having divorced one husband and buried four children, was, I considered, a reliable authority on all domestic affairs; Hints on Furnishing and Household Decorations—with designs; a column of Literary Counsel to Beginners—I sincerely hope my guidance was of better service to them than it ever was to myself; and our weekly article, Straight Talks to Young Men, signed "Uncle Henry." A kindly, genial old fellow was Uncle Henry, with wide and varied experience and a sympathetic attitude toward the rising generation. He had been through trouble himself in his far-back youth, and knew most things. Even to this day I read Uncle Henry's advice, and though I say it who should not, it still seems to me good, sound advice. I often think that had I followed Uncle Henry's counsel closer I would have been wiser, made fewer mistakes, felt better satisfied with myself than is now the case.

A quiet, weary little woman, who lived in a bed-sitting-room off the Tottenham Court Road, and who had a husband in a lunatic asylum, did our Cooking Column, our Hints on Education—we were full of hints—and a page and a half of Fashionable Intelligence, written in the pertly personal style which even yet has not altogether disappeared, so I am informed, from modern journalism: "I must tell you about the divine frock I wore at 'Glorious Goodwood' last week. Prince C—— But there, I really must not repeat all the things the silly fellow says; he is too foolish, and the dear Countess, I fancy, was just the tweetish bit jealous"—and so on.

Poor little woman! I see her now, in the shabby gray alpaca with the ink stains on it. Perhaps a day at "Glorious Goodwood" or anywhere else in the fresh air might have put some color into her cheeks.

Our proprietor—one of the most unashamedly ignorant men I ever met—I remember his gravely informing a correspondent once that Ben Jonson had written Rabelais to pay for his mother's funeral, and only laughing good-naturedly

"Come," urged the professor, growing impatient; "you have been reading about this wood for the last ten minutes. Surely you can tell me something about it"

Editor's Note—Three Men on Four Wheels was begun in the Post of January 6. Each chapter is practically an independent story and may be read with enjoyment without reference to preceding installments. In the previous chapters the three men—George, Harris and the author—have arranged to make a bicycle tour through Germany. The mounts are to be a tandem and a safety bicycle.

Digitized by Google

when his mistakes were pointed out to him—wrote, with the aid of a cheap encyclopædia, the pages devoted to General Information, and did them on the whole remarkably well; while our office-boy, with an excellent pair of scissors for his assistant, was responsible for our supply of Wit and Humor.

It was hard work, and the pay was poor; what sustained us was the consciousness that we were instructing and improving our fellow men and women. Of all games in the world, the one most universally and eternally popular is the game of School. You collect six children and put them on a doorstep, while you walk up and down with the book and cane. We play it when babies, we play it when boys and girls, we play it when men and women, we play it as, lean and slippered, we totter toward the grave. It never palls upon, it never wearies us. Only one thing mars it: the tendency of one and all of the other six children to clamor for their turn with the book and the cane. The reason, I am sure, that journalism is so popular a calling in spite of its many drawbacks, is this: each journalist feels he is the boy walking up and down with the cane. The Government, the Classes and the Masses, Society, Art and Literature are the other children sitting on the doorstep. He instructs and improves them.

But I digress. It was to excuse my present permanent disinclination to be the vehicle of useful information that I recalled these matters. Let us now return.

Somebody, signing himself Balloonist, had written to ask concerning the manufacture of hydrogen gas. It is an easy thing to manufacture—at least, so I gathered after reading up the subject at the British Museum; yet I did warn Balloonist, whoever he might be, to take all necessary precaution against accident. What more could I have done? Ten days afterward a florid-faced lady called at the office, leading by the hand what she explained was her son, aged twelve. The boy's face was unimpressive to a degree positively remarkable. His mother pushed him forward and took off his hat, and then I perceived the reason for this. He had no eyebrows whatever, and of his hair nothing remained but a scrubby dust, giving to his head the appearance of a hard-boiled egg, skinned and sprinkled with black pepper.

"That was a handsome lad this time last week, with naturally curly hair," remarked the lady She spoke with a rising inflection, suggestive of the beginning of things.

"What has happened to change him?" asked our chief.

"This is what's happened to him," retorted the lady. She drew from her muff a copy of our last week's issue, with my article on hydrogen gas scored in pencil, and flung it before his eyes. Our chief took it and read it through.

"He was Balloonist?" queried the chief.

"He was Balloonist," admitted the lady; "the poor, innocent child, and now look at him!" He stood there before me in all his baldness.

"Maybe it'll grow again," suggested our chief.

"Maybe it will," retorted the lady, her key continuing to rise, "and maybe it won't. What I want to know is what you are going to do for him."

Our chief suggested a hair-wash. I thought at first she was going to fly at him, but for the moment she confined herself to words. It appeared she was not thinking of a hair-wash, but of compensation. She also made observations on the general character of our paper, its utility, its claim to public support, the sense and wisdom of its contributors.

"I really don't see that it is our fault," urged the chief—he was a mild-mannered man; "he asked for information, and he got it."

"Don't you try to be funny about it," said the lady (he had not meant to be funny, I am sure; levity was not his failing), "or you'll get something that you haven't asked for. Why, for two pins," said the lady with a suddenness that sent us both flying like scuttled chickens behind our respective chairs, "I'd come around and make your head like it!" I take it she meant like the boy's. She also added observations upon our chief's personal appearance that were distinctly in bad taste. She was not a nice woman, by any means.

Myself, I am of opinion that had she brought the action she threatened she would have had no case, but our chief was a man who had had experience with the law, and his principle was always to avoid it. I have heard him say:

"If a man stopped me in the street and demanded of me my watch, I should refuse to give it to him. If he threatened to take it by force, I feel I should, though not a fighting man, do my best to protect it. If, on the other hand, he should assert his intention of trying to obtain it by means of an action in any court of law, I should take it out of my pocket and hand it to him, and think I had got off cheaply."

He squared the matter with the florid-faced lady for a five-pound note, which must have represented a month's profits on the paper; and she departed, taking her damaged offspring with her. After she was gone our chief spoke kindly to me. He said:

"Don't think I am blaming you in the least; it is not your fault; it is Fate. Keep to the moral advice and the criticism; there you are distinctly good; but don't try your hand any more at Useful Information. As I have said, it is not your fault. Your information is correct enough; there is nothing to be said against that; it simply is that you are not lucky with it."

I would that I had followed his advice always; I would have saved myself and other people much disaster. I see no reason why it should be, but so it is. If I instruct a man as to the best route between London and Rome, he loses his luggage in Switzerland, or is nearly shipwrecked off Dover. If I counsel him in the purchase of a camera, he gets run in by the German police for photographing fortresses. I once took a deal of trouble to explain to a man how to marry his deceased wife's sister at Stockholm. I found out for him the time the boat left Hull and the best hotels to stop at. There was not a single mistake from beginning to end in the information with which I supplied him; no hitch occurred anywhere; yet now he never speaks to me.

Therefore it is that I have come to restrain my passion for the giving of information. Therefore it is that nothing in the nature of practical instruction will be found, if I can help it, within these pages.

There will be no descriptions of towns, no historical reminiscences, no architecture, no morals.

I once asked an intelligent foreigner what he thought of London.

He said: "It is a very big town."

I said: "What struck you most about it?"

He replied: "The people."

I said: "Compared with other towns—Paris, Rome, Berlin—what did you think of it?"

He shrugged his shoulders. "It is bigger," he said; "what more can one say?"

One ant hill is very much like another. So many avenues, wide or narrow, where the little creatures swarm in strange confusion; these bustling by, important; these halting to pow-wow with one another. These struggling with big burdens; these but basking in the sun. So many granaries stored with food; so many cells where the little things sleep and eat and love; the corner where lie their little white bones. This hive is larger, the next smaller. This nest lies on the sand, and another under the stones. This was built but yesterday, while that was fashioned ages ago, some say even before the swallows came; who knows?

Nor will there be found herein folklore or story.

Every valley where lie homesteads has its song. I will tell you the plot; you can turn it into verse and set it to music of your own.

There lived a lass, and there came a lad, who loved and rode away.

It is a monotonous song, written in many languages; for the young man seems to have been a mighty traveler. Here in sentimental Germany they remember him well. So also the dwellers of the Blue Alsatian Mountains remember his coming among them; while, if my memory serves me truly, he likewise visited the Banks of Allan Water. A veritable Wandering Jew is he; for still the foolish girls listen, so they say, to the dying away of his hoofbeats.

In this land of many ruins, that long while ago were voice-filled homes, linger many legends; and here again, giving you the essentials, I leave you to cook the dish for yourself. Take a human heart or two, assorted; a bundle of human passions—there are not many of them, half a dozen at the most; season with a mixture of good and evil; flavor the whole with the sauce of death, and serve up where and when you will. The Saint's Cell, The Lovers' Leap—call it what you will, the stew's the same.

Lastly, in these papers there will be no scenery. This is not laziness on my part; it is self-control. Nothing is easier to write than scenery; nothing more difficult and unnecessary to read. When Gibbon had to trust to travelers' tales for a description of the Hellespont, and the Rhine was chiefly familiar to English students through the medium of Cæsar's Commentaries, it behooved every globe-trotter, for whatever distance, to describe to the best of his ability the things that he had seen. Doctor Johnson, familiar with little else than the view down Fleet Street, could read the description of a Yorkshire moor with pleasure and with profit. To a Cockney who had never seen higher ground than the Hog's Back in Surrey, an account of Snowdon must have appeared exciting. But we, or rather the steam engine and the camera for us, have changed all that. The man who plays tennis every year at the foot of the Matterhorn, and billiards on the summit of the Rigi, does not thank you for an elaborate and painstaking description of the Grampian Hills. To the average man, who has seen a dozen oil paintings, a hundred photographs, a thousand pictures in the illustrated journals, and a couple of panoramas of Niagara, the word-painting of a waterfall is tedious.

An American friend of mine, a cultured gentleman, who loved poetry well enough for its own sake, told me that he had obtained a more correct and more satisfying idea of the Lake district from an eighteen-penny book of photographic views than from all the works of Coleridge, Southey and Wordsworth put together. I also remember his saying, concerning this subject of scenery in literature, that he would thank an author as much for writing an eloquent description of what he had just had for dinner. But this was in reference to another argument, namely, the proper province of each art; my friend maintaining that just as canvas and color were the wrong mediums for story-telling, so word-painting was, at its best, but a clumsy method of conveying impressions that could much better be received through the eye.

As regards the question, there also lingers in my memory very distinctly a hot school afternoon. The class was for English literature, and the proceedings commenced with the reading of a certain lengthy but otherwise unobjectionable poem. The author's name, I am ashamed to say, I have forgotten, together with the title of the poem. The reading finished, we closed our books, and the Professor, a kindly, white-haired old gentleman, suggested our giving in our own words an account of what we had just read.

"Tell me," said the Professor encouragingly, "what it is all about."

"Please, sir," said the first boy—he spoke with bowed head and evident reluctance, as though the subject were one which, left to himself, he would never have mentioned—"it is about a maiden."

"Yes," agreed the Professor, "but I want you to tell me in your own words. We do not speak of a maiden, you know; we say a girl. Yes, it is about a girl; go on."

"A girl," repeated the top boy, the substitution apparently increasing his embarrassment, "who lived in a wood."

"What sort of a wood?" asked the Professor.

The first boy examined his ink-pot carefully and then looked at the ceiling.

"Come," urged the Professor, growing impatient; "you have been reading about this wood for the last ten minutes. Surely you can tell me something about it."

"The gnarly trees, their twisted branches——" recommenced the top boy.

"No, no," interrupted the Professor; "I do not want you to repeat the poem. I want you to tell me in your own words what sort of a wood it was where the girl lived."

The Professor tapped his foot impatiently; the top boy made a dash for it.

"Please, sir, it was the usual sort of a wood."

The Professor gave up the top boy as hopeless.

"Tell him what sort of a wood," said he, pointing to the second lad.

"I REALLY DON'T SEE THAT IT IS OUR FAULT," URGED THE CHIEF—HE WAS A MILD-MANNERED MAN; "HE ASKED FOR INFORMATION, AND HE GOT IT"

Digitized by Google

The second boy said it was a "green wood." This annoyed the Professor still more; he called the second boy a blockhead, though really I cannot see why, and passed on to the third, who for the last half minute had been sitting apparently on hot plates, with his right arm waving up and down like a distracted semaphore signal. He would have had to say it the next second whether the Professor had asked him or not; he was red in the face, holding his knowledge in.

"A dark and gloomy wood!" shouted the third boy, with much relief to his feelings.

"A dark and gloomy wood," repeated the Professor, with evident approval. "And why was it dark and gloomy?"

The third boy was still equal to the occasion.

"Because the sun could not get inside it."

The Professor felt he had discovered the poet of the class.

"Because the sun could not get into it, or better, because the sunbeams could not penetrate. And why could not the sunbeams penetrate there?"

"Please, sir, because the leaves were too thick."

"Very well," said the Professor. "The girl lived in a dark and gloomy wood, through the leafy canopy of which the sunbeams were unable to pierce. Now, what grew in this wood?" He pointed to the fourth boy.

"Please, sir, trees, sir."

"And what else?"

"Toadstools, sir." This after a pause.

The Professor was not quite sure about the toadstools, but on referring to the text he found that the boy was right; toadstools had been mentioned.

"Quite right," admitted the Professor; "toadstools grew there. And what else? What do you find underneath trees in a wood?"

"Please, sir, earth, sir."

"No, no; what grows in a wood besides trees?"

"Oh, please, sir, bushes, sir."

"Bushes; very good. Now we are getting on. In this wood there were trees and bushes. And what else?"

He pointed to a small boy near the bottom who, having decided that the wood was too far off to be of any annoyance to himself individually, was occupying his leisure playing noughts and crosses against himself. Vexed and bewildered, but feeling it necessary to add something to the inventory, he hazarded blackberries. This was a mistake; the poet had not mentioned blackberries.

"Of course Klobstock would think of something to eat," commented the Professor, who prided himself on his ready wit. This raised a laugh against Klobstock, and pleased the Professor.

"You," continued he, pointing to a boy in the middle; "what else was there in this wood besides trees and bushes?"

"Please, sir, there was a torrent there."

"Quite right; and what did the torrent do?"

"Please, sir, it gurgled."

"No, no. Streams gurgle, torrents——?"

"Roar, sir."

"It roared. And what made it roar?"

This was a poser. One boy—he was not our prize intellect, I admit—suggested the girl. To help us, the Professor put his question in another form:

"When did it roar?"

Our third boy, again coming to our rescue, explained that it roared when it fell down among the rocks. I think some of us had a vague idea that it must have been a cowardly torrent to make such a noise about a little thing like this; a pluckier torrent, we felt, would have got up and gone on, saying nothing about it. A torrent that roared every time it fell upon a rock we deemed a poor-spirited torrent; but the Professor seemed quite content with it.

"And what lived in this wood besides the girl?" was the next question.

"Please, sir, birds, sir."

"Yes, birds lived there. What else?"

Birds seemed to have exhausted our ideas.

"Come," said the Professor, "what are those animals with tails, that run up trees?"

We thought for a while, then one of us suggested cats.

This was an error; the poet had said nothing about cats; squirrels was what the Professor was trying to get.

I do not recall much more about this wood in detail. I only recollect that the sky was introduced into it. In places where there occurred an opening among the trees you could by looking up see the sky above you; very often there were clouds in this sky, and occasionally, if I remember rightly, the girl got wet.

I have dwelt upon this incident because it seems to me suggestive of the whole question of scenery in literature. I could not at the time, I cannot now, understand why the top boy's summary was not sufficient. With all due deference to the poet, whoever he may have been, one cannot but acknowledge that his wood was, and could not be otherwise than, "the usual sort of wood."

I could describe the Black Forest to you at great length. I could translate to you Hebel, the poet of the Black Forest. I could write pages concerning its rocky gorges and its smiling valleys, its pine-clad slopes, its rock-crowned summits, its foaming rivulets (where the tidy German has not condemned them to flow respectably through wooden troughs or drain-pipes), its white villages, its lonely farmsteads.

But I am haunted by the suspicion you might skip all this. Were you sufficiently conscientious—or weak-minded enough—not to do so, I should, all said and done, succeed in conveying to you only an impression much better summed up in the simple words of the unpretentious guide-book:

"A picturesque, mountainous district, bounded on the south and the west by the plain of the Rhine, toward which its spurs descend precipitately. It is well watered with numerous streams, while its populous valleys are fertile and well cultivated. The inns are good; but the local wines should be partaken of by the stranger with discretion."

THE FITTING OF THE PEATS

(Continued from Page 683 of this Number)

"Now," she said, "take care that you do it exactly right after this, and when you turn around, see that you knock no more of my 'fittings' down, or else they will say: 'What blundering bullock has been among the peats?'"

"'Tis the first time that ever I was called a blundering bullock," said the young man, starting half around, as on a pivot, at her speech.

"It will not be the last if you do not keep more watch over your feet," said the girl with a vicious click of her pretty teeth; "pray endeavor to finish one fair job without whirling around every moment like a teetotum."

The young man worked a while in silence, feeling a little sullen at being thus thwarted and tantalized by one whom he had thought to be no more than an ignorant pretty maiden of the country. But Bell's saucily unconscious air of command piqued him, and he resolved to excel in the occupation to which he had been set.

It was not long before she looked again.

"Ah, that is better—much better," she cried, sitting up on her own knees and letting the wide summer bonnet fall back from her head so that the latter stood out against the sky with a certain comely and shapely determination. Adam Home thought he had never seen the like anywhere before.

He did not feel the necessity of leaving the country to be so pressing or immediate as it had been.

But he was to be quickly and somewhat unpleasantly reminded of the duty on which he had come. For at the very moment when Bell had again taken his wrist to help him with a "fitting" of peats whose moist slipperiness prevented them from being easily "set," a shadow fell between them, and there within three yards stood the figure of a man, silently and, as it appeared, somewhat contemptuously, regarding their occupation. Bell's first instinct was to start up to her feet and apologize for having been the means of causing her companion to be discovered in so trivial a task. But after one glance at the regardant intruder the young man on his knees went calmly on with his peat-fitting, turning his head to the side and studying the architecture after the manner of his mistress, and "hefting" the peats in his hand as if his whole soul were in the work before him.

The newcomer was a smallish man with a thin mustache, which he kept twisting assiduously, black eyebrows, which, thick in the middle, turned sharp at the outer corners and flashed defiantly upward like feathers in a Highland bonnet, with an air at once conceited and insolent.

But the amateur in peat-fitting was not intimidated by his attitude.

"Ah, Hector!" was all that he said, and went calmly on with his work, so different is the effect of a supercilious regard in man and in woman. Adam Home had responded like a tuned instrument of strings to Bell's disdainful eyes and petulant words, but now he labored, apparently unconscious as any hind, at his menial occupation, under the contemptuous stare of another man.

The figure addressed as "Hector" retained its first attitude of disapproving reserve for some minutes, but as neither of the objects of contempt appeared at all affected he was at last forced to break the silence.

"My lord," he said, "you seem to have forgotten in congenial employment the purpose for which you came hither."

Adam Home glanced sharply up at him.

"Keep the 'my lording' for the next campaign in Flanders," he said. "I am no lord of yours!"

Bell MacLurg rose to her feet. What had she been doing? A lord—and she tried to think over all she had said to him. The tally did not turn out a very suitable or a very respectful one.

The olive-skinned, dark-mustached man made a little impatient movement with his foot.

"No man is the lord of Hector Faa—that is well enough known in Galloway. And indeed, if I may venture to remark, it ill becomes your—I mean it is ill befitting one in your situation to handy compliments or waste precious time when the scaffold is as near you and your friend as that heather buss is near me."

And he stamped on a tussock of heather bells with an angry gesture.

Adam Home now arose to his feet and deliberately dusted his hands.

"You are right," he said; "I did wrong to forget Glenmorrison in the time of trouble which he shares with me. I crave your pardon, Hector Faa; now let us go down and speak with the laird."

The man addressed started back.

"Nay," he cried, "not I. There is still some sense left under my bonnet, Hector Faa is not going to venture his life, unattended, near such an old heathenish Cromwell as Ninian MacLurg, of Millwharchar!"

"Then," said Adam Home tranquilly, "I will go alone—or at least with this lady, if she will deign to accompany me."

The little dark man hesitated a moment. Then with great deliberation he pulled out a pistol, half-cocked it, looked to the priming, and anon restored it to his side pocket. Next he set his hand upon his thigh and half drew a dagger therefrom, as if to ascertain that it worked easily in its sheath.

"Lead on," he said; "you shall not cast it up that Hector Faa was afraid of any man that breathes. But mind you, if there be a 'tulzie,' each of us will look only to the safety of his own life. This is no quarrel of occasion of mine."

And this is the reason that Bell MacLurg came into the presence of her father, Ninian, Laird of Millwharchar, with a young man walking doucely on either side of her.

(To be Continued in the Next Number)

Buy at First Hand

Deal with the makers direct and secure handsome, staunchly-built, latest-style carriages and high-grade harness, with only one moderate profit added to the cost of making—Dealers' Profits Cut Off.

Our Catalogue will help you to choose from the biggest and fullest assortment of carriages, buggies, harness, robes, blankets and horse equipments. It accurately pictures and describes all the many styles, and fully explains our method of selling direct. Mailed free.

THE COLUMBUS CARRIAGE AND HARNESS CO.
Columbus, Ohio

REGISTERED TRADE MARK W B

Burpee Seeds

are sold in any quantity, but only under seal. They are always genuine as dated, and are fairly described in

BURPEE'S FARM ANNUAL FOR 1900

This is a bright new book full of practical information, which we are pleased to mail free to progressive planters, who desire to raise the choicest Vegetables or most beautiful Flowers.

Write To-Day

W. ATLEE BURPEE & CO.
PHILADELPHIA

How Much Do You Grow?

What's your garden going to yield this year? All depends on the seed. Sow right and the chances are you'll reap right. Sow and you'll get the greatest yield your ground will give. All seeds guaranteed. Year Book for 1900 contains broad-gauge offer to all who grow vegetables or flowers for pleasure or profit. Write for it.

Gregory's Seeds

J. J. H. Gregory & Son
Marblehead
Mass.

GREGORY'S SEED CATALOG FOR 1900

The WOODEN HEN

A high-class, self-regulating incubator on a simple scale. Fifty-egg capacity. Heat, moisture and ventilation automatically and perfectly controlled.

Price only $7.00.

Send for the Wooden Hen Book; mailed free, together with a book about the EXCELSIOR INCUBATOR, to those who name this magazine.

GEORGE H. STAHL, Quincy, Illinois.

D AND C ROSES

The 31st edition of Our New Guide to Rose Culture, the leading Rose Catalogue of America, free on request. 192 pages, superbly illustrated. Describes briefly 200 entirely new sorts and all old favorites. Makes success with D. & C. Roses sure. Describes all other desirable flowers. Also free sample of our magazine "Success with Flowers."

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO.
West Grove, Pa.

PALMS ROSES CALIFORNIA GRAPE VINES

Exclusive Growers and EXPORTERS of Acclimated, Drought-resisting PHŒNIX ROSES

(No potted or greenhouse plants.)

California Nursery Co.
Niles, Alameda Co., Cal.

A. T. KING ROSE CO.
Ontario, California

POULTRY PAPER, Illustrated, 32 pages, 25 cents per year, 6 months trial 10 cents. Sample Free. 64 page practical poultry book and handsomely illustrated. Book alone 10 cents. Catalogue of poultry books free.

POULTRY ADVOCATE, Syracuse, N. Y.

Digitized by Google

IN THE FIELD WITH LAWTON

By CHARLES KING, BRIGADIER-GENERAL U. S. V.

IT WAS early in March when the first transports by way of Suez reached Manila, and with the foremost, as I remember, came Lawton, the tallest man on the ship, and the "biggest" in point of reputation as a frontier fighter yet sent to the Philippines.

Those of us who had served with the cavalry through the Indian wars knew him well, for I doubt if any of the long list of zealous and ambitious officers who won distinction under Crook, Miles and Merritt on the plains and in the mountains would deny to Lawton "the head of the class." He was a wonderful field quartermaster to begin with; could step into a corral of unbroken mules, parcel and pair them out, dividing them off six by six, perfectly sized and matched. Then he could break them to harness, train them to work as lead, swing or wheel teams, and "lick them into shape" for service in quicker time and with fewer swear words than any dyed-in-the-wool teamster I ever knew. He was the admiration of veteran wagonmasters of the war days, who fairly swore by him, and one of them, at an old Texas post in the Comanche country, after watching Lawton "coach" mules for one of McKenzie's expeditions, away back in the early seventies, turned to his fellows with an emphatic whack of his broad palm upon a muscular thigh, and said:

"Boy an' man, I've been tacklin' mules for thirty years, an' demme me if ever I see a man could larn 'em the fear of the Lord quicker'n the Lieutenant."

LAWTON'S REPUTATION AS A HARD WORKER

Lawton was just as keen a hand with the cavalry horse, conquering always by patience and kindness—never by fear or heavy punishment—the "mount" of his troop, when he was Captain in the famous old Fourth Cavalry, being renowned for the "fit" condition in which it was ever to be found even after long and hard marches. Yet, with his own superb physique and apparently vigorous health, he could stand so much more work than many of his fellow-officers and men, that troopers who lacked ambition and grit would shun his command as they would an ambush. He was tireless on the trail, and he worked his men for all they were worth, and they were proud of it and of him.

It was a big loss to the cavalry when Captain Lawton accepted promotion in the Inspector-General's Department, that being the only way of rewarding his heroic and indomitable campaign against the little but vicious band of Chiricahuas. Time and again, could it have been permitted, he would gladly, as I believe, have exchanged back into the rough life of the mounted service. He was far better fitted for it than for what is called office duty.

KEEPING IN THE THICK OF THINGS

It was perfectly characteristic of Lawton that the moment the war was over in Cuba he should seek service in the Philippines. The insurrection had not begun when he begged to be allowed to drop the command of a corps d'armée in the South to go to Manila and take any command General Otis might see fit to give him. Every other soldier could see with half an eye that Aguinaldo and his Cabinet "meant business," and that the storm was sure to break. When Lawton sailed from New York the indications were that hostilities might begin any day, despite all the reassuring and pacificatory dispatches that so frequently appeared about that time in our papers. When he reached Manila the insurrection was a month old, the hardest fighting of the campaign was over, the fiercest battles had been fought, and "Johnny Filipino" had learned a gruesome lesson at terrible cost.

LAWTON'S NERVE ON THE FIRING LINE

Wheaton, an old regimental friend and comrade of the Commanding General's, had just been placed in command of the "flying column" when Lawton arrived, and with keen interest the veteran Indian fighter hastened out to the southeast front of Manila and up the Pasig River to see the start. I was commanding the First Brigade of the First Division at the time, our line stretching from the river 'cross country southwestward until it reached the left of General Ovenshine's, near the little "Barrio" of Culi Culi. Wheaton's brigade launched out from our front, and Lawton stood watching the move from our salient, the cemetery height of San Pedro Macati, totally heedless of the Mauser bullets that came singing in from the treetops about Guadaloupe church to our left front or the mile-away ridge beyond Wheaton's steadily advancing lines.

Wheaton went out some distance and was gone several days, driving the insurgents everywhere before him. Finally, finding it impossible to get them to stand and fight in force, he turned back, in compliance with orders from General Otis, and passed on to the north of Manila to bear valiant part in MacArthur's splendid advance on Malolos.

THE OLD INDIAN FIGHTER IN A TIGHT PLACE

This left Lawton in command of a little division of two little brigades to hold a long, thin line at the east and south fronts, four miles out from Manila at its nearest point (Pasay near the Bay), and seven miles at the left front, the village of Taguig on the Delta. Moreover, this line at the left front, held by my brigade, was split by an unbridged, unfordable river, and the big town of Pasig and the villages of Pateros and Taguig, garrisoned by the First Washingtons, and menaced by the enemy, were across the Pasig, and reached only by a raft ferry that could "tote" but twenty men at a time.

Lawton shook his grizzled head over the situation, for if the insurgents had only known their power they could have massed a few thousand men and hurled them on Wholley and his fine regiment on the islands of the Pasig Delta, or concentrated in front of Guadaloupe church on Treumann and the North Dakotas—another aggregation of fighting volunteers led by some of the finest field officers it was ever my lot to know.

Of course the situation demanded the utmost vigilance day and night, and it resulted that for a fortnight Lawton was often with us all day long, and I spent hour after hour with him in saddle, riding the lines, trotting out to Pasig and Pateros, and scouting along the ridge that stood like a barrier between the river and the bay. Being the tallest man in the party, mounted always on the biggest horse, and wearing habitually a white helmet, Lawton was a target for Filipino sharpshooters wherever he went, and the placid way in which he would continue a conversation with the whiew of a Mauser or ping of a Remington bullet punctuating every other word was something inspiring, in a way, yet ever suggestive of the reflection, "What if he should be hit?"

AN ANNOYING LITTLE INTERRUPTION

His staff pleaded with him to keep more under cover, not on their account—for braver fellows than Edwards and young King, who were always with him, were not to be found in the field—but for fear that some bullet better aimed than the rest might find its billet in his great heart and rob us forever of his heroic leadership. As next to him in command in the division, I did more than plead. I protested. Twice while I was engaged giving some instructions along the outposts he slipped away, and to my consternation was next seen clambering a high rock or swinging into the branches of a tree far out to the front. Then we would have to rush a platoon, picked up anyhow or anywhere, to cover the ground beyond him, twice nearly bringing on a fight that General Otis particularly desired to avoid while our line was so thin. It is a marvel Lawton was not killed or captured sooner, and all because he would rather go himself than send officer or man into danger.

One day he was standing with only two or three comrades about him and reading a dispatch just received. The two orderlies holding the horses were close at hand, and the Filipinos in the bamboo a few hundred yards away were peppering at the party. A bullet ripped through the paper Lawton was reading and spoiled the context. A puzzled look came into his eyes as he held the paper closer, and just then one of the little native ponies we had to use as mounts squealed and kicked.

"Take the horses behind that clump, Orderly," said Lawton; "they may get hurt."

And then Lawton was a Spartan in self-denial. The sun beat down with fierce intensity as March wore on. I never felt such heat in Arizona, and sometimes for six, eight or ten hours we would be riding or scouting unsheltered from the burning rays. Canteen water was only just off the boil, but Lawton said he was following his old Indian campaign rules of schooling himself to go without drink of any kind, if need be, for a day at a time.

LAWTON'S SCORN FOR COOLING DRINKS

My headquarters were in the village of San Pedro Macati, in a house that had just before the outbreak been the headquarters of General Pio del Pilar. It was close to the river, and every day the hospital launch, steaming out of town, would leave a big lump of precious ice at our back door. The officers of my staff, with one or two others detailed for duty at the front, "messed" together here, and we had a refrigerator of goodly size stocked with bottled soda, Milwaukee beer, and the light Spanish wine known as La Vallesa de Mandor—mighty comforting things to a parched gullet after long hours in saddle under that broiling tropic sun. While Wheaton's column was out along the Laguna, officers were constantly passing to and fro, from city to far afield, and some one of our staff was always in readiness to administer creature comfort in the shape of hot coffee by night or a cooling drink by day, to the end that scores of thirsty souls went on their way refreshed. I don't know how many times we have come in from a long day's prowling about that extended and intricate front, and, dismounting at our headquarters, found Lawton's carriage or launch ready there to take him home far back in the city. Every mother's son of the party would have a throat as dry as a limekiln, and our Chinaman and his two Filipino aids would come scuttling down the stone steps with hissing goblets of lemon and soda or foaming glasses of beer. Staff officers of both division and brigade—and the Brigadier, too, for that matter—would eagerly gulp down the refreshing fluid, but Lawton would only grin and shake his head. "I had some water before we started out," he would say. "That's got to last till dinner-time."

We are called

A Nation of Dyspeptics

And it's all on account of the food we eat, or rather the starchy, indigestible matter we eat and the "food" we don't eat. "Food" is something that strengthens, upbuilds and enriches the human system; the BEST food is that which does this most. Those who have tried a perfect wheaten cereal, say it is the most delicious, easily digested and nourishing food extant. It has a nutty flavor, not found in other foods, and contains strength-giving qualities utterly lacking in other cereals.

WHEATLET

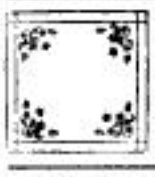
If your grocer does not have it, send us his name and your order; we will see that you are supplied. Postal brings FREE BOOKLET.

Genuine made only by the

FRANKLIN MILLS CO.
Lockport, N. Y.

They do right
Who do write
With Spencerian Pens
For they do write
Well!



Sold everywhere by everybody who deals in Stationery

The Land of Bread and Butter Is the title of a new illustrated pamphlet just issued by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, relating more especially to the land along the new line it is now building through Bon Homme and Charles Mix counties in South Dakota. It will be found very interesting reading. A copy will be mailed free on receipt of 2c. stamp for postage.

Address GEO. H. HEAFFORD
CHICAGO, ILL. General Passenger Agent

Live Agents Make Big Money
There is no equal to
The Excelsior Carpet Stretcher and Tack Hammer Combined
TWO TOOLS IN ONE
Simple, effective, strong and compact. A child can operate easily.
Postpaid for 65c. Stamps
With first order for one dozen deliver the title as we propose to furnish working AGENTS OUTFIT FREE, QUICKLY and for free illustrated circulars.
QUICK MFG. COMPANY, Dept. P, Gilden, Mich.

HEMSTITCHED CENTRE (20 x 20) 15c.
To advertise our business, we will send to any one this stamped Hemstitched Centre, together with our 400-page Catalogue of STAMPED LINENS, Handkerchiefs and Jewelry, for only 15 cents.
C. S. DAVISSON & CO.
881 Broadway, New York. Dept. 84

"Mizpah" Valve Nipples
WILL NOT COLLAPSE
and therefore prevent much colic. The valve prevents a vacuum being formed to collapse them. The ribs inside prevent collapsing when the child bites them. The rim is such that they cannot be pulled off the bottle. Sample Free by Mail.
WALTER F. WARE, 507 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Write for sample copy of "ANTIQUES"
A weekly illustrated journal for collectors of all kinds, the only one printed in the U. S. It contains considerable information of various orders.
Office, 9 East Eighth Street, New York

PAYS to write for our 256-page free book. Tells how men with small capital can make money with a Magic Lantern or Stereopticon.
McALLISTER, Mfg. Optician, 49 Nassau St., New York

Digitized by Google

MEN OF ACTION

R. LINDSAY COLEMAN

By Perriton Maxwell

Drawings by CHARLOTTE HARDING

WHAT new kind of wagon are you making?" asked a friend of Michaux (the Parisian carriage builder who invented the first real bicycle), as he watched the latter fitting a crank to an old Draisenne velocipede.

"I am not making a new kind of wagon," retorted M. Michaux; "I am making a new kind of horse."

In the light of present-day bicycle perfection that dialogue glows with import; in proper time it will pass into history along with the famous sayings of Cæsar and Napoleon, of Watts and Stephenson, of Robert Fulton and Elias Howe. It is only forty-four years since Michaux gave voice to his unconscious prophecy, and it proves no less the juvenility of the wheel than it does the prescience of its parent. The interesting fact of the moment is that in less than half a century the centre of bicycle production has shifted from Paris to Chicago. From Michaux to Coleman is less a matter of time than of bewildering accomplishment.

"I am not making a new kind of wagon; I am making a new kind of horse"

The name of Michaux is the property of the world; the name of Coleman—Reuben Lindsay Coleman—is scarcely known outside of cycling circles. In the business world of "bikes" Mr. Coleman is always an unknown quantity, but the effect of his actions is never underestimated. He prefers the modest position of power behind the throne; he is to the world of bicycle manufacture what Richelieu was to the Court of France. Nor is the simile overdrawn, for "R. L.," as he is called by his business associates, is dictator and adviser in every large and important move that concerns bicycle production, and those who profess to heed him least are the first to seek his counsel in a crisis.

THE GREATEST BICYCLE MAKER IN AMERICA

"Who is Lindsay Coleman?" asked a new arrival in the cycle trade after hearing the name repeated a dozen times in the course of a ten-minutes' conversation. "Oh, he is the largest manufacturer of bicycles in America," was the rejoinder.

Later, when this same newcomer had met "R. L." and was asked what he thought of him, he replied: "He is a splendid fellow, but I can't understand how such a mild-mannered man can wield so much influence."

The secret of Lindsay Coleman's power is not generally understood, for he is a quiet man who works with the least possible friction, while steadily holding his own and aggressively pushing forward his plans and ideas. There is no obtrusive egotism in his personality, but you feel in his presence that he has a store of latent strength. With this he has that expansiveness of heart which frequently dictates impulsive acts of helpfulness and generosity that sometimes work a detriment to the purse, and which have no place among the unwritten and uncompromising laws of business. And yet no man more dearly loves a vigorous clash of arms than "R. L." He does not go about with the proverbial chip on his shoulder, looking for an encounter royal, but at the drop of the hat he is squared for action and ready for the fight. He is the kind of man of whom a wag once remarked: "He will smile on you when you tread on his toes if you apologize, but he will thrash the deuce out of you if you don't."

The tendency of the times, industrially, is toward the amalgamation of interests and the combination of capital. Much has been said and written for and against this unification of producers, and each side has its logical conclusions and its convincing arguments. The truth about the formation of so-called "trusts" and their effects for good or evil does not enter into consideration here; moreover, the American Bicycle Company does not claim to be a trust. "The law of our existence in this nineteenth century has been concentration," says one, "and the 'trust,' 'combine,' or whatever you are pleased to call it, is merely a continuation of this concentration of labor and capital." Another economist has put it: "Trusts and labor unions are immediate stepping-stones to our next industrial system, under which public functions will be greatly extended."

FORMING THE BICYCLE COMBINATION

The American Bicycle Company, including as it does nearly every bicycle manufacturer of any importance in America, claims to work for the good of all concerned in the production and use of the riding-machine. Since the fall of 1878, when Colonel Albert A. Pope put on the market the first one hundred bicycles manufactured in this country, nothing so momentous as the organization of the American Bicycle Company has occurred in the wheel trade. Nor was this organization a simple matter. Large bodies move slowly, and even when the plans of this great industrial coalescence were on the eve of perfection there came a stumbling-block, and that stumbling-block was Lindsay Coleman; he did not approve of certain methods of organization, and his threatened withdrawal would have wrecked the proposed corporation as the keystone knocked from the arch makes the structure topple. Perhaps it was not so much the withdrawal of Mr. Coleman and the important concern he represents that endangered the existence of the embryonic organization, as the fact that his opinion on any given subject relative to the business is law to a large number of other bicycle manufacturers; and, though "R. L." is not the kind of man purposely to influence the acts of others by his own conduct, it is a truth conceded by those who know his power that what "R. L." does, so do a dozen other manufacturers. For a personage of purely commercial importance Mr. Coleman has a larger number of loyal followers than is usually given one man to enjoy.

Singularly enough, Lindsay Coleman's part in the formation and controlling of the American Bicycle Company is on the surface a purely supernumerary one. He seeks no official title and wants no conspicuous position in its affairs. And yet that his is the hand on the lever no one in the secrets of the giant company's operations can deny. It is as if "R. L." were only the tail of the dog corporate, to be swayed by every fancy of the main body, while in reality he is the whole dog, but not, let it be understood, the dog in the manger. Other men whose names are a household word among cyclists stand in the lime-light glare of this newest and strongest of consolidated manufacturing companies, but Lindsay Coleman is content with a place in the background.

"Did you shoot that pea?"

MR. COLEMAN AND HIS PEA-SHOOTER

Mr. Coleman's ready wit and gift of repartee are a byword in the bicycle world. His earliest witticism on record is one of the schoolboy period. It was a warm day, and the scholars droned sleepily behind their books, while the teacher, a maiden lady famous for her severity, dozed gently over her desk. Suddenly a pea, shot with unerring aim from young "R. L.'s" sugar-cane blowpipe, landed squarely on the gentle lady's nose. She awakened wrathfully, and by that kind of instinct known only to those who are accustomed to deal with a roomful of unruly youngsters, singled out the trembling culprit.

"Did you shoot that pea?" demanded the irate teacher.

To the query came no response; but little "R. L.'s" face showed traces of subdued mirth.

"Did you shoot that pea?" again questioned the now thoroughly angered teacher.

"No'm," replied young Coleman; "I shot you," and the maiden lady's sense of humor saved the future bicycle magnate from a drubbing.

The plain biographic facts about Reuben Lindsay Coleman can be told in few words. Born in Richmond, Virginia, November 30, 1852, he is that rare type of Southerner in whom much of the breeziness of the Westerner and much of the prevision and shrewdness of the Yankee have been infused by environment. But despite these alien and acquired characteristics, he cannot be mistaken for aught but a son of the South, and his love for the land of his birth asserts itself not only in his manner of speech but in his methods of recreation. When business cares have prompted a respite from work he packs his traps and is off for the old Virginia homestead, where, with his high-bred dogs, his amiable servants, his hunting and his fishing, he is the contented Southern gentleman of wealth—and bicycles be blowed. It is because of these frequent expeditions to his native heath that "R. L." preserves a robust physique. As dearly loved as is the old homestead today, there was a time when it seemed a mere cage made to imprison an ambitious and venturesome boy, and like most lads of his temperament, young Coleman bolted for the great, wide world.

GETTING A FOOTHOLD IN BUSINESS

The usual result followed. Vicissitude piled on vicissitude, but were met with a determination that made them insignificant. One day the adventurer found himself the incumbent of a "job" which yielded him a weekly income of eight dollars. Life took on a rosier tinge, and the comforts of the forsaken homestead did not seem quite so far away. That was in 1880. Afterward came experiences in the printing business in Philadelphia. The famous "Jay Cook failure" and its accompanying panic worked its disaster to "R. L." along with its thousand other victims. In Baltimore the nineteen-year-old fortune-seeker found himself stranded—"flat broke," says Mr. Coleman, "with neither a sound pocket nor a dollar to put into it." But very soon as an agent "R. L." prospered for a time, until, in sheer disgust, he left the man who employed him—cast off a living salary and the good things that go with it for a principle. "I couldn't endure to work for a man who mixed affected piety with barefaced robbery, and who put his trust in God and his hands in other people's pockets," he explains.

While the eighties were still young Mr. Coleman drifted to Leadville, Colorado, and there had a taste of mining life, the flavor and memory of which will last him to the end. At the outset of the Leadville period he saw no hope of employment, and the little "blue devils," which either drive a man to desperation or successful effort, hovered around him for a longer time than he now cares to remember. One fine day—it is always a fine day when such things happen—there was need of an engineer at one of the mines. A competent man was nowhere to be found though the recompense was three dollars per day.

"Why don't you apply for the job?" asked a friend who knew how badly Coleman needed employment.

"I know nothing about running an engine," sadly replied the stranded Southerner.

"Bosh!" said the friend. "A fellow of your alertness can run that machine by instinct. Make a bluff at knowing it all and

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

For next week will contain a notable article on monopolies and modern corporation methods, by Honorable Thomas B. Reed. In this suggestive paper Mr. Reed explains the birth and growth of industrial monopolies, and discusses their relationship to the country at large. This is the most important paper that Mr. Reed has contributed to the Post.

THOS. B. REED on Monopolies

HOW PRESIDENTS ARE MADE
Recollections of Lincoln's two campaigns, by
Col. A. K. McClure

HOME ATHLETICS FOR THE BUSINESS MAN
By
Dudley A. Sargent of Harvard University

THE ARGUMENT FOR DOTY
A story by Octave Thanet

THE FITTING OF THE PEATS
A dashing romance by
S. R. Crockett

THREE MEN ON FOUR WHEELS
Another story of the comedy of bicycling by
Jerome K. Jerome

THE CAPTURE OF PATSY EARLY
The first paper in the series, Famous Feats of Journalism, by
And W. V. Byars

SINGULAR SANG-FROID OF BABY BUNTING
By Guy W. Carryl

5 CENTS THE COPY of All Newsdealers

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
PHILADELPHIA

Digitized by Google

in a week's time you will be a master engine-driver."

"But what about 'Big Pete?'" queried Coleman. "He engages all the men, and he'll never trust that hoisting engine to a tyro."

"Tell him you're an engineer and want to run his engine."

"No; I'll not lie to get the job."

"All right. Suit yourself about the moral part of it. I'll tell him about you and you can fix up the rest as best you can."

—"flat broke"

"R. L." TRIES RUNNING A HOISTING ENGINE

Next day the applicant for the vacant position confronted "Big Pete." "He had bonfire hair and a temper to match," says Mr. Coleman in narrating the episode. "He chewed more tobacco and swore more new and wonderful oaths than any other man" in Leadville. He was not one of your careless, haphazard blasphemers. He swore fluently, gracefully, comprehensively, methodically, homogeneously—I had almost said prayerfully."

"Do you know how to run an engine, you blank tenderfoot?" asked "Big Pete."

"I can run your engine," replied Coleman.

"By the blankety blank," roared the prospective employer, "I didn't ask you if you could run our engine, but if you can run an engine."

"I can run your engine," calmly repeated the applicant.

For a few minutes "Big Pete" eyed the young man before him as a cat eyes a mouse before crushing out its breath and, turning on his heel, said:

"Well, go ahead and run it, and be dashed!"

THE SCANDINAVIANS' CLOSE CALL

Coleman did run the engine and was dashed—by "Big Pete"—when a few days later his inexperience as an engineer nearly cost two lives. The hoisting engine wound and unwound the rope to which was attached the basket that carried the miners up and down the perpendicular shaft of the mine. Two Scandinavian delvers were descending in the basket and the rope ran off its reel steadily enough until something snapped. Coleman saw the hempen cable tearing over the great wheel on which it was wound with a speed that made it crackle and groan and roar. Human lives were at the other end of that racing rope and, when it ceased its plunging, death would wait at the bottom.

With all the strength of despair the amateur engineer threw his weight against the brake provided for such emergencies. It did not work. It was well for the men in the dropping basket that the brake was inoperative, for suddenly to check their downward plunge would be to throw them headlong out of their shallow car. With an inspiration born of fright young Coleman seized a length of iron pipe lying close at hand, and bracing it, lever-like, under the whirring rope-drum, gradually brought that perverse apparatus to its normal speed. The basket and its freight were not far from the bottom by this time, and with collapsing relief the new engineer finally saw the taut line leading into the mine's throat sag and then hang limply on its pulley. Somehow the engine was repaired, and the badly frightened Scandinavians were brought to the surface. Money or persuasion could not induce them to venture again into the black hole that had nearly swallowed them. More for joy at their safe delivery and to relieve the nervous tension under which he had labored for five frightful minutes, Coleman set upon both of the rescued men and thrashed them as their fathers never did and as few other men may. Fisticuffs, for "R. L.," took the place of tears in those rough days.

SWAMPING THE HOUSE WITH ORDERS

In 1883 Mr. Coleman traveled eastward, but nothing of importance came into his life until two years later, when he found himself with a toy company in Chicago. The business of this concern was the making of baby carriages, light wooden playthings for the nursery, and velocipedes. "R. L." relates with a reminiscent smile how he had to beg for a place with the firm. They did not want him, and lost no time in telling him so, but the same grit that enabled him to cling to the flying drum of the hoisting engine finally gave him a place in the toy factory. He must have felt that his persistence in this case meant future success. His work was more varied than congenial. It finally came to his mind that his principals were so busy making goods that they left no time for selling them. He proposed to "go on the road" for his concern, and after some persuasion his wish was granted. "R. L.'s" trip astonished his employers, for he sold so many goods that the factory was unequal to the demands made upon it. Other trips were made with still more wonderful results, and then "R. L." was called home and entreated not to sell any more goods until the capacity of the factory was equal to his capacity for keeping it busy.

Mr. Coleman's success as a commercial traveler determined his position, though his salary was not made burdensome. It was not long before he became a factor in the firm's business. The usual story of intelligent energy and profitable achievement is the story of Mr. Coleman's career at this period—and after. The business of the company expanded, to the wonderment and envy of its competitors; plot after plot of ground was purchased and built upon.

In the latter part of 1885 Mr. Coleman opened an Eastern branch in New York. The company had become the largest makers of cheap grade and juvenile bicycles and of iron and wooden velocipedes in the country. As far back as 1872 the company had manufactured two-wheeled velocipedes, and in 1877 had put on the market a number of the old high-wheel "ordinaries." This was the first step toward the present position of Mr. Coleman's concern as makers of the marvelous modern bicycle. In 1887 "R. L." was making his presence felt among wheel manufacturers. He had first a proprietary interest in the Eastern branch of his concern, and soon afterward came into absolute control. The firm name was changed about this period, and the Eastern agent's weekly remittance to the parent concern was an average of $5000. Between 1891 and the latter part of 1893 Mr. Coleman became a principal with a controlling interest in the Chicago business, and in 1894 became its manager and Vice-President. The little toy factory had grown to be a great corporation worth $1,000,000.

—gave him a place in the toy factory

A GOOD YEAR FOR BICYCLE MEN

To-day R. Lindsay Coleman is a man of fortune and the foremost bicycle manufacturer in the land. As his contribution to the American Bicycle Company he brings the largest plant in the world devoted exclusively to the production of cycles—a plant equipped with the most perfect bevel gear cutting machinery, labor-saving devices for making chains and sheet-steel stampings, automatic mechanisms capable of finishing 325,000 small parts daily, and a staff of workmen able to complete 1000 bicycles in a working day of ten hours. Twenty-five hundred persons are employed by Mr. Coleman in the various departments of his factory. Proudly enough, "R. L." points to his ledgers recording the sale of more than 100,000 bicycles last year; this year's sales will probably far exceed this number. A glance at these figures shows plainly why R. Lindsay Coleman is a power in the new organization of wheel manufacturers.

—and tells a story pithily

A COMPANY WITH FIFTY-SIX PLANTS

As it is now constituted, the new bicycle combination is able to produce anything utilized in the making of a riding-wheel. The list of manufacturers includes forty-five concerns and fifty-six plants, and there are options upon other plants. The men and history of the concerns in the combine are the men and history of American cycling—nay, of cycling the world over. It is claimed that the effect of this gigantic coöperation in the production of one of the necessities of modern existence—the bicycle—will be the cheapening in price of riding machines and the fixing of a still higher standard of excellence in their making. Those who know say that the coming season will see a greater production of bicycles of a finer grade and for a lower price than has ever been known. "Bicycles will be cheaper than shoe-leather, and the human animal will cease to walk except in a sitting posture," is "R. L.'s" picturesque way of unveiling the future.

A SNAPSHOT OF "R. L."

Whatever comes to pass, the name of R. Lindsay Coleman must find a forward place in future histories of the wheel. For the benefit of these bicycle Gibbons and Macaulays let it be recorded here that "R. L." is a square-jawed man with a vagrom fancy for saying things in an incongruous manner. His wit is without hurt or bitterness. He is generous, hearty and wholesome, and tells a story pithily. Because he seldom goes among his trade-fellows he is a celebrity in name more than in person. He is a valiant hater and a staunch friend. He has the courage of a lion, but looks the lamb. His business principles embrace the virtues of fair dealing, thoroughness and honest representations. He studies the game long and thoughtfully, but once his move is made nothing can alter his course or shake his determination. First and last, he is the ideal American man of affairs, cautious in planning, quick in acting, and accomplishing everything on a broad and generous scale.

"Coleman is bigger than his business, greater than his millions," said one of his friends to the writer. "When there is anything too big for any one else in the trade to tackle, take it to 'R. L.' and you'll find it six sizes too small for him to bother with it."

TO MY OWN

By Edwin L. Sabin

THE squirrel lies hid in his hollow tree,
All wrapped in his long, soft tail;
The rabbit is snuggled as snug can be
In his home 'neath the old fence rail;
The partridge is only a bunch of down
Where thickest the arching brush—
They in the forest and we in the town,
Hush, my honey-boy, hush.

The field-mouse curls in a velvet ball
Far under the dead swamp-grass;
In his hole by the frozen waterfall
The mink dreams oft of the bass;
And every chick of the ground and air
Is cuddled in haven deep—
So here, in the glow of the fire-light fair,
Sleep, my honey-boy, sleep.

The North Wind romps with the whirling snow;
Sly Jack Frost noses about;
But wood and field are abed—for no,
Not even the owl is out.
And here, where the motherkin's breast is warm,
And motherkin's arms are tight,
Safe from the snow and the frost and storm,
Good-night, honey-boy, good-night.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

SOME NEW FEATURES SOON TO APPEAR:

The late Dwight L. Moody will be the subject of some reminiscent papers which are to be an important feature of several early issues of the Post.

These anecdotal articles, dealing in a most interesting fashion with the greatest of American evangelists, have been written by Mr. Moody's son, W. R. Moody—the one man best fitted to write them. They throw powerful sidelights on the man's character and reveal his true greatness.

Memories of Moody

By his son

W. R. MOODY

SHORT STORIES

A. T. Quiller-Couch

This popular English story-teller contributes two rattling tales of adventure in his best vein. These stories will be superbly illustrated.

F. Hopkinson Smith

The versatile artist-author, will have in an early number one of his inimitable short stories.

W. A. Fraser

The author of The Eye of a God, has written for the Post another curious story of a missing gem—The Brunswick Diamond.

Bret Harte

This great American story-teller will contribute in the near future two tales of life in California in the fifties.

Joel Chandler Harris

The creator of "Uncle Remus," has written for the Post a companion story to Why the Confederacy Failed. In the Order of Providence is also founded upon a chapter of war-time history.

PRACTICAL POLITICS FOR YOUNG MEN

Have you ever thought of "going into politics"? These papers by Judge Nathaniel C. Sears will tell you how to set about it.

Judge Sears has directed campaigns against the municipal abuses in Chicago, and he knows the game of politics inside and out. By

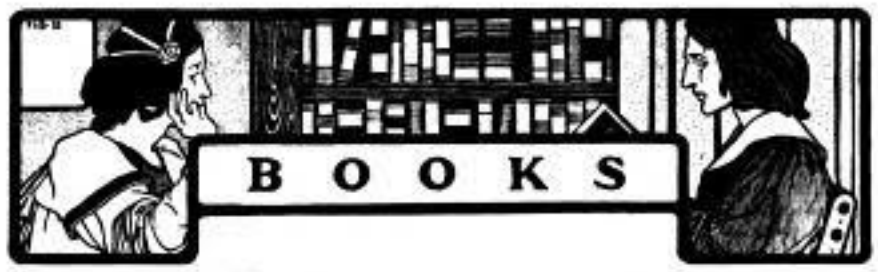
Judge Nath. C. Sears

PUTTING A CITY ON A BUSINESS BASIS

A new paper in the Post's series on municipal affairs, is from the pen of

Hon. Thos. G. Hayes

(Mayor of Baltimore)



Whose work in that city has attracted attention all over the country.

These articles are merely samples of a few of the features that the POST offers.

To be had of All Newsmen at 5 cents the Copy, or sent by mail 5 months, on trial, for $1.00

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY PHILADELPHIA

Digitized by Google

In Ghostly Japan *

MY COUNTRY, good-natured and ever breaking into smiles lyrical and soft as the moon and all her own, has posed, . . . but who can pretend to tell how many times and before how many painters, good, bad, indifferent, and so called; and the Buddhas only know, perhaps, with how many heart-aches and despairs. And then, after many days, came Mr. Hearn. I have never seen my home-land so coquettish, so pleasing, so altogether pleased with her charms as since her acquaintance with Lafcadio Hearn. He is a magic mirror—this near-sighted genius of a poet-artist—at which one stares in ecstasy or in a ghastly horror, as the case may be, because therein one sees not one's form, or lines external, but the secrets that, in dullness and vanity, we fancied well screened from the vision of the gods. And before this mirror stands Japan happy as a girl of sixteen when her own sweet image shimmers back at her from the smiling, melting eyes of her sweetheart. I cannot think of any higher tribute to my land than this.

Of course she had been shy at first, this convent maid, Japan—three centuries of hermit life, you remember—but by and by, as a maiden will, say and do what you please, she lost her heart to Mr. Hearn; and now, with that grace and abandon which come only from utter forgetfulness of self, she has unlocked to him, one by one, the deeper chambers of her heart, and invited him to light his way into them with that lamp called genius which the gods give.

He did not despise her invitation, and so this new volume came to be. The Heart-Shadows of Japan may not be a better title than In Ghostly Japan, but somehow I fancy that it is a truer one. In A Fragment, and The Story of a Tengu, he pushes ajar the gates of that dreamland—Japan's and his—that you and I, mere mortals, may catch a glimpse of it and speculate on the depth of the mysteries of life and death. Furisode, A Story of Divination, Ingwa-Banashi, are short tales which you can find scattered all over Japan—lying idly neglected as rocks by the road-side—rocks, which in the magic hands of the master turn into pearls. Incense is an essay, concise and at the same time comprehensive—for there does not seem to be a single word which you could weed out of these pages—on the history of Japanese incenses and of a certain game in which they are used. And the scholarship of his article on Footprints of the Buddha is such that I do not see how in the world Mr. Anderson could stand in peace before gods and men till he revise a certain statement in his catalogue of Japanese and Chinese paintings in the British Museum. In A Passional Karma, Mr. Hearn tells—as only he could tell a story of this sort—the skeleton story of a drama, called Botan-Doro, which is now being acted in Tokyo by Kikugoro, and which shows a certain phase of our picturesque cult—you may call it a superstition if you like.

The author wrought a miracle in his translation of some Japanese poems and proverbs. A miracle, yes—really there is no other word for it. Translate Shakespeare into French! —George Sand made a fool of herself at it, and Dickens had a gloriously merry time at her expense and over the whole matter. But do not dare dream for a moment that the task of translating the Japanese poetry into English is anything as easy as the dressing out Shakespeare in French. This is the job which a few thousands of Japanese young men to-day, who could understand the English language as well as, say, an average graduate of Johns Hopkins or of Oxford, and whose knowledge of the Japanese is incomparably superior to that of any foreigner, have not dared to undertake as yet; it is the work which the gods would not take up without a second thought—it is a miracle, as I have said. And Mr. Hearn—that singular darling of the gods—has performed the wonder, not perfectly, no, but better than any one else has ever done. In a few years, when the purer days of our faith shall have returned, if you visit Japan, you must not be surprised at a tablet pendent at the centre of a torii bearing the inscription in gold: Hearn-Myo-Jin; or at the discovery of a shrine, buried and made modest in the fragrant bosom of the blossoming cherries of the Third Moon, dedicated to the Hearn-the-Enlightening-god.

To him has been vouchsafed the apotheosis of that power of the pen which gives a mere mortal that attribute of the divine called "avatar," so that he can make another's personality his and feel the shudders that were Macbeth's and the thrills that were Napoleon's. His also is the triumph of prose—the commercial English prose at that —over the viewless, the spiritual; he has painted therein the things which neither the eye can see, nor ear hear, nor nose smell, nor hand touch, nor mouth taste. And what a wedding of the deep and the simple!—you cannot speak but in exclamation about this —it makes you think of the famous passage, "Consider the lilies of the field," wherein the Master crammed the white throat of a simple flower with wisdom deep as life, and sang about it without an adjective. There may be a more graceful, ornate and simpler prose than this, but the angels must be reading it.

When the Japanese Government, in acknowledgment of his ability and the gracious labor of love which he had lavished upon our country, asked Mr. Hearn to honor a chair in the Imperial University with his acceptance, the editor of the Tai-Yo (a leading Tokyo magazine) was indignant at the ingratitude of his Government; the reward was too insignificant for the merit. I agreed with him perfectly; and so also a million others. But to be enshrined in the hearts of a people is surely something. And our gratitude, . . . but a man cannot write with ink everything his heart feels.

—Adachi Kinnosuké.

*In Ghostly Japan. By Lafcadio Hearn. Little, Brown & Co.

Sermons in Stones *

SINCE the subject is ecclesiastical sermons we may alter the saying of the Wise Man of old to read, Of many sermons there is no end, and much reading of them is a weariness of the flesh. The wife of a clerical friend of mine wittily said that one assurance of the truth of Christianity lies in the fact that it has survived eighteen hundred years of bad preaching.

The question is often asked, and rarely answered correctly, "What is the first requisite of a sermon?" As I understand it, it is that it should be interesting. You may speak with the tongues of men and of angels, yet if your sermon does not possess that indefinable but actual quality of being interesting to your hearers you might as well have used sounding brass or tinkling cymbals. Of course, to be interesting is only the beginning of the series of qualifications necessary to a proper sermon; there must be other things of equal importance; but to be interesting is first in order if not in degree, and these sermons are all of that.

There is a simplicity, an appositeness about Mr. Wells' Sermons in Stones that is absolutely beguiling. You commence by reading some delightfully put scientific fact, or by enjoying some clever little personal experience, and you find before you know it that a moral or ethical lesson has been driven in you so hard that it stays, and you feel it, for sometimes it hurts. Then, too, they are so eminently plain and understandable, so thoroughly sane, healthy and practical, and there is withal such a vein of delicate humor through them that they are to be commended in the highest way, and not merely from the standpoint of sermons.

Of course the book is not meant for continuous reading as the reviewer attempted it, but is intended to be taken up at odd moments and each essay devoured and digested; indeed no one who reads can help considering, for the little preachings make people think. There is never a word too much of the lesson, although frequently it is only a suggestion, which has, nevertheless, a world of meaning. Rarely is the connection between the illustration and the lesson a strained one, and with few exceptions, easily overlooked in the genuine spirit of the writer which shines out from every page, is there evidence of a lack of taste in the treatment.

The style of the author is excellent; sometimes it is epigrammatic, and the advice given frequently lies in a quaint and curious transformation of a commonly accepted idea; for instance, the admonition to "Talk easy; Listen hard!" There is something in the sermons for almost every kind of man and woman. Geological discussions, botanical investigations, astronomical reflections, and the trolley car, the telephone, the camera, the printing office, the business world and the highway have each contributed their various lessons of "good in everything." For those who love the infant preacher in the household (and who does not?) there is a delightful little section called From Caroline's Pulpit. I wish it had been longer.

—Cyrus Townsend Brady.

*Sermons in Stones. By Amos R. Wells. Doubleday & McClure Co.

GLIMPSES OF NEW BOOKS

AMONG the sea towns of the Levant, Mr. Robert Barr has been playing at Innocents Abroad; and if one may judge from his book about it, a very pleasant and amusing occupation it must have been. Mr. Barr is a trained observer who sees the comedy side of life all about him—whether in Detroit or London or Jerusalem, it matters not; he has a nose for humor, and his keen eye everywhere detects the comic, be it never so well disguised.

The Unchanging East, as he calls his book, is alluring and insidious. It contains so much real information enlivened with fun and disguised with local color, and it beckons the reader on from chapter to chapter with such persuasive interest.

Mr. Barr's camera has done the reader good service in furnishing the interesting pictures which adorn the two handsome little volumes. It will be recalled that several chapters of the book appeared in these columns—under another title—last summer. L. C. Page & Co.

If the windows of the booksellers are any indication of the public taste there would seem to be a growing inclination on the part of people at large to recognize the work of the artist in color and line along with that of his fellow-workman, the author—and, of course, the publisher will be the first to admit that he is here to gauge the public taste. From the presses of a New York house we note: a fac-simile reproduction of one of Mr. E. W. Kemble's sketch books—cover and all —full of his quaint humor and quick seizure of types Northern and Southern; to the accompaniment of verse by Arthur Waugh, twelve drawings in color, called The Square Book of Animals, by Mr. William Nicholsons, done in the same inimitable manner which has marked his incisive portrayal of current celebrities; eighty scenes of that snug and tidy English country life and landscape that lends itself so easily to prettily picturesque treatment, from the work of Mr. C. T. Taylor; and in the broader manner of frank caricature, The Record of Three Bears, by Mr. Frank Ver Beck, and Animal Jokes, a comical distortion of animal life by Mary Baker-Baker—the first published collection of her work. R. H. Russell & Co.

In Child Life in Colonial Days, a companion volume to her Home Life in Colonial Days, Mrs. Alice Morse Earle throws a most interesting side-light on the formative influences of American history—by which let it not be understood that anything is detracted from the normal interest that always attaches to children as children. Mrs. Earle describes how they were brought up, what they wore, what they studied, how they played, and what discipline was meted out to them by our conscientious forefathers. One hundred and fifty illustrations of toys and dresses make the picture additionally real. The Macmillan Company.

Tales of an Old Château, by Margaret Bouvet, illustrated by Helen Maitland Armstrong, is an attractive little book containing six delightful stories in which romance, chivalry and the glamour of old days

WARNER'S RUST-PROOF

Uncle Sam's Examinations

for Civil Service appointments will soon be held in every State. 10,000 appointments last year. Chances even better for appointment this year. The National Correspondence Institute has prepared hundreds of applicants who have received such appointments. Instruction exclusively by mail. Particulars about all Government positions, salaries, dates of examinations, etc., free. Write to-day.

NAT'L CORRESPONDENCE INST. (Inc.), 29-48 16 National Bank Bldg., Washington, D.C.

Letters Copied While Writing

Keep a copy of all letters; no press; no water; no brush; no work. Any ink; any pen; any paper. Our Pen-Carbon never smuts; our clip holds paper firm. Write with no extra pressure, and our Pen-Carbon Letter Book produces a perfect copy. Can be used anywhere. If your stationer does not keep it, write for free sample.

DEPARTMENT G
PEN-CARBON MANIFOLD CO.
145-7-9 Centre Street, New York

HOME STUDY

of BOOK-KEEPING SHORTHAND BUSINESS FORMS PENMANSHIP, Etc.

with our Private Lessons BY MAIL given to Young Men and Women for good paying positions. We give just the training needed for success in business. No interference with work—all spare time required. The cheapest and best method of study. Highly indorsed, national reputation, established 45 years. We also teach English, Civil Service and other courses by mail. Trial lesson, 10c. A fine Catalogue free.

BRYANT & STRATTON, 156 College Bldg., Buffalo, N. Y.

PLAYS Recitations, dialogues, and other entertainment books. New 136-page catalogue sent free on request.

DRAMATIC PUBLISHING CO., - CHICAGO

Save Postage by using the Envelope Clasp. Sample mailed free.

CHICAGO CLASP COMPANY, - Buchanan, Mich.

Digitized by Google

are pleasantly portrayed. The leading story concerns a small Swiss timepiece which was given to the author's maternal great-grandfather by a lady of noble birth in reward for his courage and valor in a time of peril. Miss Bouvet tells how this amulet saved his life on one interesting occasion. The other stories are also entertaining. A. C. McClurg & Co.

Critical Confessions, by Neal Brown, range from Andrew Lang and Honoré de Balzac to Max Nordeau and Americanism in Literature. They are the frank expressions of a man who has read widely and who has opinions about writers and books. He deplores the lack of real greatness in the present-day literature, but has hopes of the future. In ending his essay on Americanism he says: "There must have been many unsung Odysseys in the lives of those hardy adventurers who came with Raleigh and Smith, and whose descendants later drifted down the Ohio and the Mississippi and over the plains, driving the Indian and the buffalo before them. But we had no Homers to put this pioneer wonderland into verse. Life was too stern and exacting and pitched in too intense a key, so we built literature slowly in our pioneer age. This early poverty had its effect on the really great builders like Longfellow and Cooper, who came later." The Philosopher Press, Wausau, Wisconsin.

Songs from Puget Sea, by Herbert Bashford, is a collection of poems, sonnets and quatrains, the subjects of which are peculiar to the life and scenery of that glorious section of our country. They are marked by a high appreciation of Nature and a close acquaintanceship with the life and history of the land and people. Whitaker & Ray, San Francisco, California.

NEWS FROM BOOKLAND

A Sympathetic Little Aristocrat.—The Rev. R. H. Stone, author of In Afric's Forest and Jungle, tells a pathetic story of Bishop Crowther, the black Sierra Leone evangelist. The Bishop does not know what his real name is, but he knows that he was found by friends on a Portuguese slave-ship and by them named Samuel Crowther. He was educated in Sierra Leone and afterward in England. On account of his piety and wisdom he was made a Missionary Bishop of the Church of England.

Once, when visiting a nobleman's country-house in England, he was telling of an incident in his life, when he felt his hand being softly rubbed by his host's little daughter. As a tear dropped from her eyes he said, "Don't cry, little one."

But the tears dropped faster and faster and the soft rubbing kept on.

"Well, well, what is the matter?" exclaimed the Bishop.

"I'se trying awful hard to wash that smut off of you," was the unexpected but sympathetic reply.

An Undesirable Neighbor.—The Mystery of Mr. Cain, an odd bit of fiction by Lafayette McLaws, who in private life is Miss Emily L. McLaws, of Augusta, Georgia, created no end of a disturbance in that quiet town when it appeared. Every one was proud of the success of the young writer, but as the scene was supposed to be laid in Augusta and there was a great deal of local color worked in, some of the citizens took their pleasure sadly. One, who is somewhat of a littérateur himself, said to a relative of the author:

"You see, we think the story is a great yarn; plenty of blood and thunder in it, and interesting enough to keep you up nights, but it's the atmosphere that chills our local pride. Why, the author has the heroine commit murder right in our town, pick the corpse up and dispose of it in the most offhand way. Anybody would think we had a cordon of Parisian morgues bordering the settlement."

"So you don't care for the story?"

"Care? I think it's great. You tell Miss Emily to write all she can of them, but tell her to take some other town for her next scene, will you?"

Why Miss Ganahl Gave Up Art.—Harriet Adams Ganahl, author of Plantation Sketches and Stories, belongs to an old Georgia family which met with reverses after the Civil War. Although a young and comely woman, in the twenties at the present time, she has been a breadwinner for years. Her first ambition was writing, but as she could not earn a comfortable income at that time from her pen she eked out a living by teaching school, singing, and giving music lessons. Once she thought she had a special talent for decorative painting, as several jars she had painted sold for high prices and took some prizes at the Southern county fairs. But this aspiration was soon nipped in the bud. The old family servant, a most devoted darky, came into her room one day while she was at work putting the finishing touches upon a calla lily which was painted at one corner of a stone jug.

"Oh, Miss Hattie," said the servant, "that's jest Heavingly!"

"Is that so, Auntie?" asked the painter.

"Yes, indeed, honey," went on Auntie; "it's jest saintly. You's a regular Rosie Bonny, you is, sure enough."

"Well, what is it Auntie that you like?" replied the artist, her pulse quickened with pride.

"Why, Miss Hattie, anybody can see. It's jest the most celestial thing I ever seed. It's one of them flying fishes. That's what it is."

After that Miss Ganahl gave up art.

Anthony Hope's Mad Season.—Anthony Hope, among other odd characteristics, has a strong dislike to poetry. A bright London belle, knowing this trait, once tried the joke of reading some verses to him. To her surprise he listened complacently and at the end of the infliction thanked her in superlatives. It was too much for her comprehension. She forgot about the joke and said:

"I thought you hated poetry?"

"So I do in my lucid intervals," was the consoling rejoinder, "but this is the spring season, which affects me like the March hares."

Mrs. Thomas' Narrow Escape.—Mrs. Clotilde Thomas, an author and critic, who was in Puerto Rico last spring and summer gathering literary material, was the guest of Major and Mrs. Sharpe, the former the Judge Advocate of his district. While there she accepted an invitation to spend a few weeks with American friends in the mountains. She bade her hosts good-by and started for the hills. The route was by the way of the coast, where, thanks to the excellent postal arrangements, she received her home mail. On opening it she found that she was called urgently to the United States to look after some property interests. A steamer was about leaving, and she only had time to send a few lines to the friends in the mountains. A short time after her departure came a terrible tornado and flood which obliterated the hacienda where she had intended to go.

Why She Loved Him So.—The memoirs of Jules Massenet bring up an incident of his courtship told by Coquelin. It seems that when Liszt, Sgambati and Massenet were studying together in Rome they all became fascinated with the daughter of an aristocratic Frenchman. The trio spent their spare time composing and playing themes to the object of their affections. One evening the young woman showed marked favor to Massenet, and he proposed to her after having asked her father's consent. He followed her to Paris in a few days, where he was accepted by her and the marriage soon took place.

One day Massenet said to his bride before a party of friends:

"My dear, do you remember the day you first showed me that you preferred me to Sgambati and Liszt?"

"Yes."

"Well, do you know, besides proving to me that you loved me, it also gave me great joy to know that you believed I played so well, even excelling the others?"

"Oh, but it wasn't that," answered his wife quickly. "It was because you played so badly that my love went out to you."

It is said that the great composer never referred to the incident again.

"A CLOSET WITHOUT A SKELETON"

The above picture illustrates how the "Practical" Trousers Hanger and Press

makes a closet arrangement that gives maximum convenience and two-fold capacity. It is a perfect device; keeps the trousers "smooth as if ironed," and separately get-at-able; automatically adjusts itself to any thickness of cloth. The cloth will not be marked with ugly lines or stained by rust, as the parts of the Hangers that come in contact with the cloth are made of quartered oak, finished as carefully as high-grade furniture. Metal will rust or corrode.

SEND FOR OUR FREE BOOK (100 pages). It tells what over 3000 well-known men think of our device, which, since it was introduced seven years ago, has universally satisfied the most exacting.

Guarantee Offer! You may return the goods any time within 60 days, at our expense, if you are not completely satisfied, and we will immediately refund the full purchase price.

OUR $5.00 SET consists of six Trousers Hangers and three Closet Rods; it is sent, prepaid, on receipt of price. This quantity meets the average requirements. Single Hangers, 75 cents. Single Rods, 25 cents. For $1.00 we will send one Trousers Hanger and one Rod, prepaid, and afterward, when wanted, the balance of the $5.00 set for $4.00.

PRACTICAL NOVELTY CO., 425 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Use Kuyler's

LICORICE TABLETS

made with pure SPANISH LICORICE

Unsurpassed for cure of COUGHS & COLDS

5 AND 10¢ PACKAGES

GLYCERINE TABLETS

For Throat Affections & Dryness of Mouth

Highly recommended by Medical Profession

In decorated Tin Boxes – Pocket size.

25¢ per BOX

Sold by Druggists everywhere, or sent prepaid on receipt of price

Kuyler's • 863 Broadway • New York

Gilbert's Heel Cushions

Worn inside the shoe for Easy Walking

Arched Instep, Increased Height, Better Fitting Shoes, Ease and Comfort. Simply placed in the heel, felt down. Do not require longer shoes. ⅜ in. 25c.; ½ in., 35c.; 1 in., 50c. per pair. Ladies' or Men's.

READ. Send name, size of shoe, height desired, and two-cent stamp for pair on ten days' trial.

GILBERT MFG. CO., 16 Elm St., Rochester, N. Y.

The "CHID" A Crackless Cuff

They are new, possibly not yet in the hands of your dealer; if not, we will supply you direct on receipt of price, 25c. the Pair

CHID CUFF COMPANY, Lippincott Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

"Beacon Hill Prints"

IN PLATINUM

8x10 on 11x14 Mounts

50 Cents Each

Send 2-cent stamp for Illustrated Catalogue

CELEBRITY PHOTO AND ART CO., 256 Boylston St., Boston

Wanta Manicure File?

Real emery. Two dozen by mail, 25 cents.

WANTA FILE COMPANY, Downers Grove, Ill.

Are You Deaf?

We have 25 kinds of Instruments to Assist Hearing. Sent on approval. Write for catalogue.

WM. Y. WILLIS & CO., 134 South 11th Street, Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

The New Mother Goose

By Guy Wetmore Carryl

1. The Mischievous Music that Little Boy Blew

BESIDE the fence that flanked a dense and rustling crop of corn,
A farmer's boy with vicious joy performed upon a horn.
The vagrant airs, the fragrant airs around that field that strayed
Took flight before the flagrant airs that noisome urchin played.

He played with care The Maiden's Prayer, he blew God Save the Queen,
Die Wacht am Rhein, and Auld Lang Syne, and Wearing of the Green.
With futile toots, and brutal toots, and shrill chromatic scales,
And utterly inutile toots, and agonizing wails.

The while he played, around him strayed and calmly chewed the cud,
Some thirty-nine assorted kine, all ankle-deep in mud.
They stamped about and tramped about that mud till all the troop
Made noises, as they ramped about, like schoolboys eating soup:

Until at length they tried their strength upon the fence forlorn,
The railing cleared, and then careered, carousing through the corn,
And viciously, maliciously went prancing o'er the loam.
That landscape expeditiously resembled harvest-home.

"Most idle ass of all your class," the farmer cried with scorn,
"Alas! my son, what have you done? The cows are in the corn!
Oh, brat!" said he, "Oh, drat!" said he. The cowherd seemed to rouse.
"My friend, it's worse than that," said he, "the corn is in the cows!"

THE MORAL lies before our eyes: when tending kine and corn
Don't spend your noons in tooting tunes upon a blatant horn,
Or, scaling, and assailing, and with energy immense,
Your cows may take a railing, and the farmer take offense.

Editor's Note—The New Mother Goose will be continued through six numbers of The Saturday Evening Post.

Protection
FOR PLANTERS

Seed is the planter's ammunition, and good seed is just as important to the man behind the plow as good ammunition is to the "man behind the gun."

Our 1900 Catalogue of

EVERYTHING FOR THE GARDEN

is a 190-page book, 9 x 11 inches, containing over 700 engravings and 6 superb colored plates of Seeds and Plants—a perfect mine of information on garden topics. To give our Catalogue the largest possible distribution, we make the following liberal offer:

EVERY EMPTY ENVELOPE
Counts as Cash

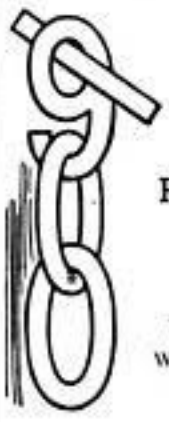
To every one who will state where this advertisement was seen, and who incloses us 10 cents (in stamps), we will mail the Catalogue, and also send, free of charge, our famous 50-cent "Harvest" Collection of seeds, containing one packet each of New Large-flowering Sweet Peas, New Giant Pansy, New Giant Comet Asters, White Plume Celery, French Breakfast Radish and New Freedom Tomato, in a red envelope, which when emptied and returned will be accepted as a 25-cent cash payment on any order of goods selected from Catalogue to the amount of $1.00 and upward.

PETER HENDERSON & CO.
35 and 37 CORTLANDT STREET, NEW YORK

The Seeds You Sow

Will determine the size and quality of the crop you reap. You take no chances of a poor crop when you sow Johnson & Stokes' seeds. You can see the results almost as well before you begin, by examining the handsome photographic plates shown without exaggeration, in the new century GARDEN AND FARM MANUAL for 1900. The most valuable book ever given away to seed buyers, whether you sow a few seeds or many.

Our Special Collection Offer for 1900



12 Superb Vegetable Novelties for 50c. Large packets each—Early Bird Tomato, Myer's All Right Lettuce, Paul Rôse Muskmelon, Cincinnati Market Radish, Early Snowball Turnip, Australian Brown Onion, Perle-le-Grande Celery, All Year-Round Cabbage, New Meteor Beet, French Market Carrot, Market Gardener's Parsley, Arlington Cucumber—making you the choicest Vegetable Garden, for only . . . 50c.

10 Choicest Floral Beauties for 25c. Pansies, Poppies, Nasturtiums, Fire-Feathered Celosia, Scarlet Sage, Sweet Alyssum, New Zinnias, Beautiful Semple's Asters, Double Diadem Pinks and Dainty Sweet Peas, for only . . . . . 25c.

Or Both Vegetable and Flower Collections for 65 cents

SEND QUICK—DEPARTMENT B

JOHNSON & STOKES, 217 and 219 Market Street, Philadelphia

In 1900

how much more comfort poor people will have than fifty years ago! Nowadays all sorts of labor-saving things make living easier and cheaper. Pearline, for example. What one thing has done so much for the woman who has to do her own work?

Pearline has freed her from house-drudgery; easy washing, easy cleaning, less work, more leisure, when women use Pearline. 601

Millions now use Pearline

Don't Take Any Chances

on an inferior vehicle or harness. Your life and that of your family depends upon their quality and reliability. You can't tell very much about the quality of a vehicle by simply looking at it. The paint and varnish effectually hides the quality of material. Vehicles must be bought largely on faith—faith in the honesty of the manufacturer.

WE HAVE NO AGENTS

but have been selling vehicles and harness direct to consumers for twenty-seven years. In fact we are the largest manufacturers of vehicles and harness in the world selling to the consumer exclusively. These facts speak volumes for the quality of our goods and our method of doing business. You take no chances; we ship our vehicles and harness anywhere for examination and guarantee everything. Send for our large Illustrated Catalogue before buying. IT'S FREE.

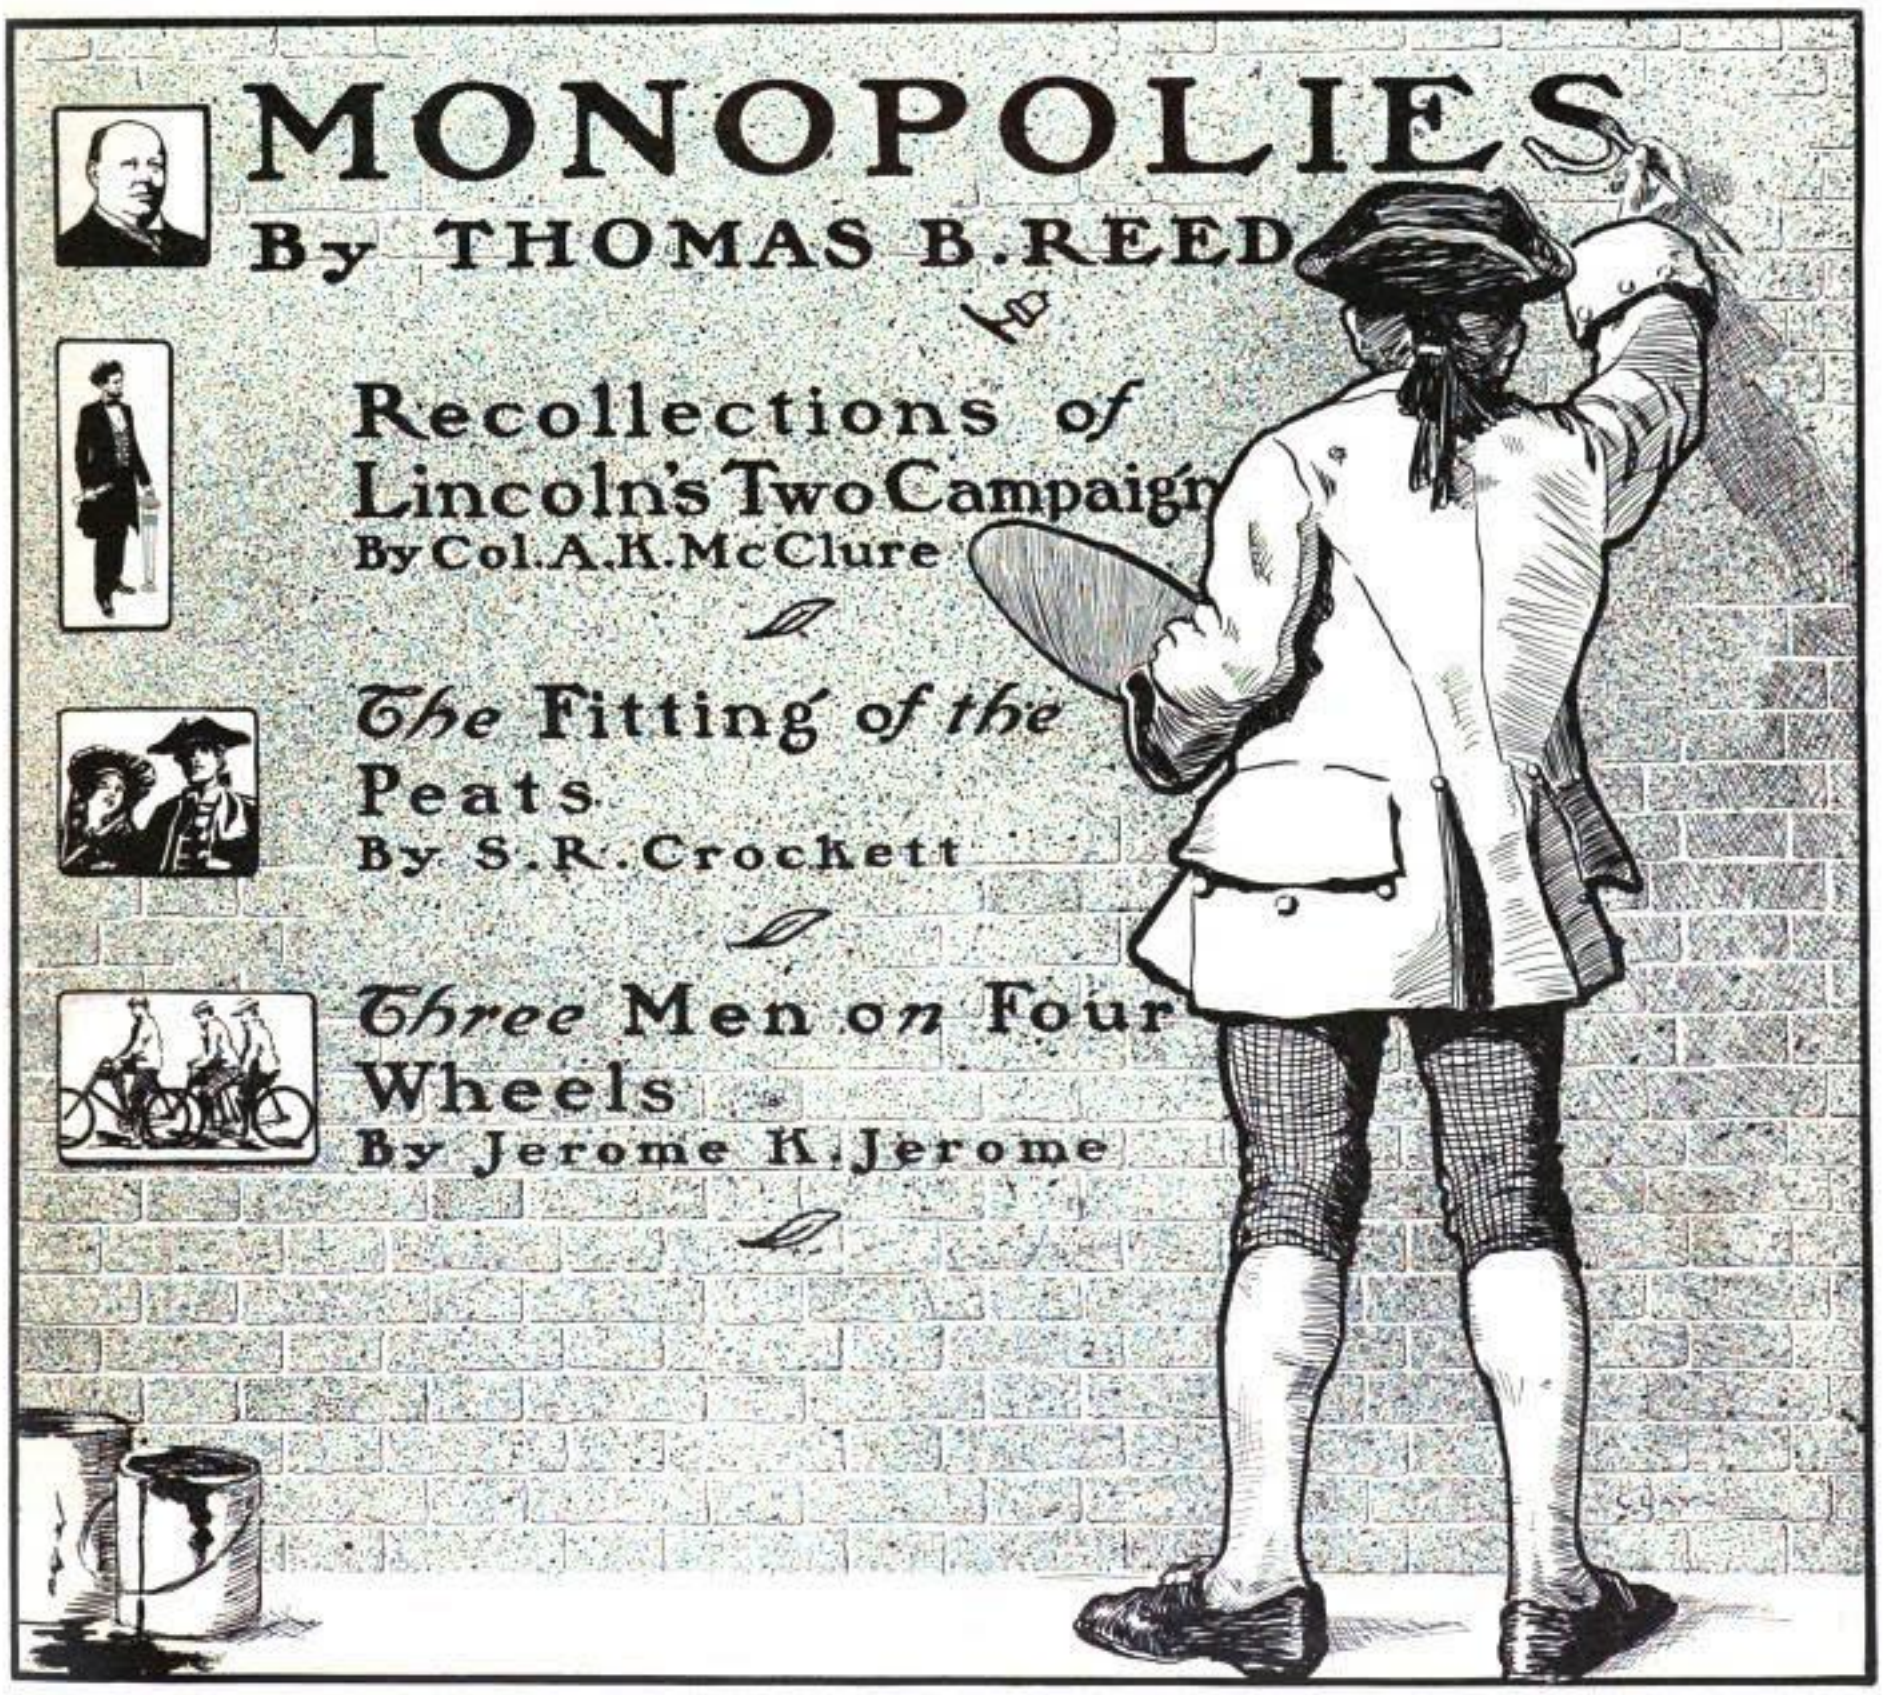
No. 75—Single collar and hame harness, with side-reins as shown. Price, $14. Used to usually sells for $20.

Elkhart Carriage and Harness Mfg. Co., Elkhart, Ind.

Digitized by Google

Lincoln & Illinois 1830
Lincoln Neb
81018

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST



An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded Aº Dⁱ 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Volume 172, No. 33 — Philadelphia, February 10, 1900 — 5 Cents the Copy; $2.50 the Year

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 421 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

Digitized by Google

MONOPOLIES

By Thomas B. Reed

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

WORDS in any language are not definite. They mean, too often, different things to the speaker and to the hearer, though both assume that they mean the same. Words, too, are often laden, especially in the popular mind, with the sorrows of other days—sorrows which have passed away, but the memories of which have survived. Words, again, are epithets, and are easier to utter than descriptions carefully framed to convey true ideas. Descriptions require thought, and appeal to the mind; reproaches only appeal to habits of thought. There are some words used in discussion of the modern methods of doing business which not only have the indefiniteness of all words, but have in addition associations which are misleading and confusing. They are epithets for reproach and not language for explanation.

A great many years ago, all over the world, there were real monopolies, things to be tolerated only in barbaric times, by which noblemen and high statesmen were enriched at the expense of people so poor that we have in our day no conception of their lives or of their misery. Singularly enough, the reign of her whom we call "Good Queen Bess" was one of the worst of all in English history for the establishment of monopolies and exclusive rights.

A real monopoly without limit of time is a thing not to be endured, and never has been endured. The divine right of Kings, even when apparently sanctioned by all human agreement, was never powerful enough to keep it alive. Even in despotic ages it could not be maintained even among peoples who bent willingly to the King's prerogative. Like all other things, it had to yield to the laws of human nature. Human selfishness is universal, and can be curbed only by selfishness itself. Where the selfishness of a few is intrusted with unlimited power and buttressed up by all the power of the State formally enlisted in its behalf, it has never been able to resist successfully the selfishness of all. In other words, the selfishness of a few is always met and mastered by that greater power, the selfishness of all. The struggle may be long and may seem doubtful, but it never is so in the result. All history is full of examples. For hundreds of years the unprivileged seemed in France to be struggling hopelessly against the privileged, and the story was the most melancholy in the history of the world; but the final result was liberty and equality. Nowadays there can be no such prolongation of the fight.

A MONOPOLY TO WHICH NO ONE OBJECTS

We still have monopolies; but they are limited in time or are governmental in their character. With the Government monopolies we have no concern at present, though some of them have been the subject of fierce struggle in times gone by. Taxes used to be farmed out and great burdens laid upon the people, forcing them to contribute, sometimes beyond human endurance, to enable superintendents of finance and postmasters-general to revel in wealth, to live in stately palaces, and excite human envy by luxurious festivals. The post-office with us is a Government monopoly, but the only way this affects the people unfavorably is by making them pay from six to twelve millions of deficit every year for the benefit of those whose mail is carried for less than cost. There have been times in the history of the country when it was made much of a question whether this whole business should not be turned over to private enterprise; and no less a man than Horace Greeley was its most earnest advocate. Had it been a mere question of prompt and proper service, especially in regions where a full population would have made it pay, much could well have been said in favor of that view. But a nation in its relations with the post-office has many other requirements besides those of business letters, and especially is this so in a nation of the broad expanse of the United States, where the citizens of one State are not only in theory the citizens of the whole country, but are likely in fact to become citizens of any other State. It is for the interest of a nation like ours to facilitate communication between the different parts because it is another bond of union between regions so widely separated. Therefore was it wise to make postage uniform at three cents all over the Union, and then equally wise to reduce it to the two-cent level.

Of such a monopoly nobody can successfully complain, and nobody tries to do it either successfully or unsuccessfully.

Government has itself everywhere established another set of monopolies, and they have the sanction of the Constitution itself, and that sanction is fully justified by the history of the world's progress. Nevertheless, these monopolies are oftentimes the subject of the same abuse as the bad, old monopolies which not only ground the faces of the poor, but afforded them not the slightest compensation. The monopolies to which I refer are those which are the result of copyright and patents. Of copyrights I shall not speak because they are the subject of very little public comment, and the largest complaint comes from those to whom they are not granted rather than from the people who pay for those which are granted.

THE MONOPOLY GRANTED TO INVENTORS

The Constitution provides that if any inventor make a discovery he shall have the exclusive right to it for a limited term of years. For this limited time, this right of discovery thus recognized becomes to the inventor a monopoly protected by the laws of the country, by all the enginery of courts and all the power of the United States. No other person not authorized by the inventor may make, or use, or sell it. The inventor levies upon the public whatever tribute he sees fit. It is his right to do with it what he pleases. At the end of the limited time it becomes the property of the public, and the monopoly of the inventor wholly ceases.

One would think that this was very simple, but human selfishness, at once the maker and the destroyer of things, steps in and begins to do its work, and the inventor finds that he needs all the aid of the Government to save his rights. A new discovery leaves open all that was known before. Men lose nothing they had before. If a man had invented a whole steam engine and a whole railroad train and the trucks also all at once, it would have left open any other method of transportation which formerly existed. The world would be no worse off if not a car wheel was turned, yet if the inventor should ask a large price for transportation, even if it were but one-half what the old transportation cost, there would be outcry and disturbance at once. Yet it is for the advantage of all that patents are granted. If men can be so stimulated by the offer of a monopoly for a few years that new discoveries can be made to lessen cost, the world loses nothing and gains much by the bargain. It gives the man the product of his brain for fourteen years and takes for itself all the remaining years. Yet there is always a most unreasoning eagerness to refuse to let the inventor have his fourteen years in peace. In theory, the inventor of the railroad train would seem to be entitled to charge for his fourteen years what people paid for the old system of carriage. His genius has made the difference and ought to have the difference. But there are two things which step in and wake him from his dream of bliss. In the first place, he cannot invent all the new ways of doing the carriage. Even his own effort, beyond which he cannot go, lights up the pathway of a greater than he. Then by the laws of trade the highest price is seldom or never the most remunerative price. More things at a less price may outvalue fewer things at a larger price. So even during the life of a patent, the period during which it is a monopoly, we are greatly protected by natural laws from the inventor's unreason. Moreover, he has to divide his profits with makers and promoters and, in the end, with all of us.

It is a strange thing how quickly profits escape from the one who seems to own them to the public at large. Sooner or later all discoveries enure to the benefit of us all. Even when Bessemer took more than one million of toll for his invention of a way of making steel in large quantities, it was not a tenth of one per cent. of what the whole world made out of it in his own lifetime.

VAST CORPORATIONS A RESULT OF GROWING CIVILIZATION

But all this is but preliminary to what ought to be said about monopolies, or rather what are called such in popular parlance. What are for the most part called monopolies to-day are simply corporations formed for the transaction of business, and which seem likely in popular estimation, by reason of their great size and large capitalization, to become a menace, first, to the liberty of trade, and secondly to our personal liberties. To study the probable effect of these companies in these directions, perhaps the best way is to understand what they are in their very nature. In speaking of them I shall not speak of railroad corporations except to show that they and their history throw very little light upon the questions of which we are seeking the solution. Railroads are not only corporations; they are something more. In some States they are not monopolies, for rivals may have the same rights. In other States they are monopolies, subject to the possibility of the Legislature or Railroad Commissioners granting a rival charter. But whether they are strictly monopolies or not the people are too much concerned in their business and all other affairs of life to give up due and proper control of their relations with the communities through which they pass. At present there is little discussion about them, though there is still on the part of the people a demand for lower freights, and on the part of the railroads a struggle for lower net cost of doing their work to meet the claim for lower freights. Of course I am aware that a rush of business enables from time to time higher prices to be made for all things, but in the long run nothing but wages increase. All other things go down.

Outside of railroad corporations, and perhaps some others performing public or quasi-public functions, it sums up corporations in a broad way to say that they are merely methods of doing business. They were the natural invention of the growing complication of human affairs, the result of growing civilization. In the first origin of things a man did business alone. He put out the labor and took the income, and when he died the business ended. By and by men acted in concert. They assumed partnership relations, and with larger capital assumed larger responsibilities. Partnership did its work well for a long time, but had great disadvantages. Death of one of the partners forced a settlement of all their affairs. In their business each one was liable not only for what he put in, but for all he had outside. There was no way of limiting liability. Partners were also, in the nature of things, practically limited in number. If there were a large number the danger of being wrecked by the imprudence of any one would be increased with the number, for each one was the agent of all. Moreover, there was much capital in the world which could not be obtained for a partnership because the owner did not wish to be a partner and look after the business, and did not desire to hazard in a business he was not looking after not only what he put in, but all he had in the world.

PRACTICAL ADVANTAGES OF CORPORATE METHODS

In this state of things a corporation naturally took the place of a partnership as a method of doing business. As stockholders in a corporation men could put in the money they wanted to risk and yet not imperil that which they refused to risk. Under this same class came the people who had small amounts, who wished to invest; a corporation could take in a stray hundred or thousand and a partnership could not. When a stockholder died nothing happened to the method of doing business. No probate court intervened. The heir took it or sold it and the change disturbed nothing. Instead of everybody, as in a partnership, having a right to involve everybody else in danger, the officers of the corporation alone had that right, and even their power was limited to the sum put in. Such were the great advantages of the corporate way of doing business that it is a great tribute to the conservative character of mankind that it is only in the last two decades that ordinary business has adopted that method.

Thus described—and the description seems to be a correct one—there is very little in a corporation to deserve the doubt and suspicion with which it has been so often treated, especially in the harangues of those who trade upon the weakness of mankind. Undoubtedly there are reasons for the feeling about corporations, arising from the fact that corporations in their dealings with mankind are less conciliatory and put themselves under general rules more closely than men who manage smaller things by the method of a partnership. It is often said that corporations have no souls. That is true, but the stockholders have, and the workmen also, and the latter are just beginning to find out that profits are the mother of wages. Singularly enough, none of the public talk which has been made about corporations on account of their having no souls has ever ventured a single sentence in favor of either the stockholder or the employee, both of whom undoubtedly have souls. The fact is, that arguments on this subject, like most arguments in this world, proceed by indirection.

COMMON METHODS OF ARGUMENT

In politics, if you want to defeat a man because he is a bad lot, a thief or a knave, don't say that. Explain how he comes from the wrong town, that he is a good man himself, but don't you think Smith has too much of his society, and you know what a blackguard Smith is. When people of skill come before Congress to get lower freights in order to make more money in their business, they never mention greed on their part at all, but talk about the heinousness of watering stock and the giving to railroads the power of taxation. Railroads in their turn never reply that stock-watering, while it may be deadly on investors, cannot create a cent of taxation on the people. They talk of their rights and of robbery, as if their rights could ever be in derogation of the people's rights, or they could ever be robbed by justice. Nobody, however, can complain of what advocates may say. They have to adapt themselves to their auditors; but when the people sit as judges they ought to know not arguments only, or epithets, but facts and sound reasons. They ought not to let themselves be misled by specious talk, but ought to rest upon the basis of real conditions.

THE DECEMBER FLOOD IN WALL STREET

The misdirection of energy against what is called watering of stock has led to false results. Watering stock, where stock really is watered, is a crime, not against the whole community, but a crime against investors. It is a species of assertion as to them that property is worth what the stock represents in figures. So far as the community at large is concerned, that deceit rectifies itself. If it is water, the first squeeze in the market takes it all out, and more, too. Last December Wall Street showed a practical and costly proof of what has been said. Water flowed down both sides of the Street.

The popular notion is that the proposed and nominal capital is the basis of earnings, that the company can tax the people to pay on any amount named, but in real life what the plant and good-will is worth is the sole basis of profits. Undoubtedly there are stocks issued above that value, but such stock issue is merely an anticipation of success if they are honestly valued, hoping if the success comes the modesty of the nominal dividend may avoid human envy and consequent unreasonable attack. Of course the owners could and ought to meet the future success by a larger per cent. of dividends on the real cost, but dodging behind bushes is not confined to savages. The amount that a private corporation may make ought not to be limited any more than the amount a private partnership may make. The idea that the amount a man should make should be limited to four per cent., the average value of capital, might perhaps be speciously defended if there were along with it the correlative idea that if he did not make four per cent. the people would furnish the balance. But nobody could even speciously defend the idea that a man should stop at four per cent. on his successes and lose without reimbursement on his failures. Business could not live that way.

Digitized by Google

THE ONE CONDITION OF SUCCESSFUL MONOPOLY

But would you leave us open to the rapacity of these money-makers? Not in the least. My notion is that though Providence and the higher laws which really govern the universe are in men's talk much inferior to the Revised Statutes before they are enacted, they are always found to be quite superior to them after they are enacted. In fact, Nature abhors a monopoly as much as it does a vacuum. But there are monopolies which have the power of survival. I am not now referring to patents or post-offices. There is one condition on which an established business can continue to exist, and, if it be big enough, can drive the others out, all of them. That condition is, that it can supply at a profit the whole market at all times with any article at a lower price than any and all others. Upon that statement you must decide whether such a monopoly is a monopoly at all. One thing seems certain. If such a monopoly is a crime, then you must give up your continued demand for lower and lower prices.

Private corporations have been already described—sufficiently, at least, for the purpose of this article—and their characteristics defined. They have so grown in practical favor that a great amount of business which from time immemorial used to be done by partnerships, is more and more being done by corporations. They seem to find favor in the eyes of all business men. What, then, is the difference between the private corporations of the past and those of to-day? Do they differ at all? Only in one respect—they are larger. Of course, size alone may contain an element of danger to liberty. But when we discover that they are the same thing we have always had, the problem is simplified. What is there in the size of the new corporations which threatens us? The usual reply is that they are so large, have such an enormous capital, that nothing can be created which can compete with them. Why not? How did they get this great capital? By the increase of the wealth of the whole world. That same increase will furnish the antidote.

THE FLUX OF CAPITAL AND COMPETITION

Let these agglomerations of wealth take one step in prices beyond what is warranted by the business condition of the world; just let it be known that there are huge profits being gained; then, as all history shows, not only will competition arise, but over-competition, which will make that business which appears the most profitable the least profitable on the list. Men are not now so short-sighted as they used to be; fewer geese are killed that lay golden eggs. Men understand that large profits mean over-competition soon to come. Take the sugar company, which from its size and entrenchments seemed impregnable. Even against that powerful combination rivals have made such headway as has reduced the price of a twelve per cent. stock to 114, which figure shows what has already been done, and the public estimate of what will be done in the way of competition. Even a capital of $75,000,000 is not relatively great.

A good many years ago a wise old manufacturer in my district told me the secret of success. I said to him: "You are the only man who makes these things. You can demand your own price." Said he, "I am trying every minute to make these goods cheaper and sell them cheaper." "Why so?" "I am the only man," he replid, "in this business, and I want to stay so. If I raised the price I would have a boom, but I'd lose a business. In the long run, business is better than boom."

The books do not make much mention of it, but there is a thing that wise men look out for, and that is potential competition. The capital of the whole world is ready to flow toward the best chances. Those who make too much are in the worst danger, for when capital starts to flow it overflows, and too much gets in, and what was already in shares the loss.

But it is said that there have been great unions of competing companies quite recently which are evidences of the designs of the rich to overwhelm the poor. It will be noted, first, that these combinations have already occurred; second, that they were not voluntary. It was like the consolidation of railroads—forced, not desired. Human nature has not changed. A man who has spent his whole life in building up a successful business never voluntarily hands it over to another. He is too proud of what he, and perhaps his father and grandfather, have done. So he has to overcome his personal pride and put himself out of business. So, too, he has to struggle with the idea that, compared with others, he is not getting what he ought to get. Then he has to see one of his business rivals put at the head of the new concern. Men in business are as proud of their positions, and justly so, as any soldier in a red uniform, or any Congressman who wants to be at the head of a committee. Yet in making these combinations men have given up their positions and their business. Why? Simply because they were forced so to do. The demand for lower prices had outstripped the inventive power, and to meet that demand the economy of freights from the nearest points of supply, the economy of large production at the cheapest places, and the economies of administration and distribution had all to be called in to help, as well as the brightest intellects and the most skillful business energy that money could buy. The demand for lower fares and freight invented consolidation for railroads long ago. The same demand invented steel rails and the Bessemer process. In like manner, the demand for lower prices invented and forced the use of large consolidated corporations and department stores.

In all these instances, the number of which could be increased without limit, the first hope of those most deeply and immediately interested was that the whole profit of the change would come to them. But it will not. Consolidated railroads have been the givers of lower fares, palaces to ride in, swifter and more frequent trains, cheaper freights, with greater accommodation and fuller facilities. All the economies of the steel rail go to the ultimate consumer, and the newly consolidated manufactories will finally pass over to the whole people the economies of the consolidation. If they have sense enough to do this, retaining to themselves only a reasonable profit, they will keep their places. If they do not, then competition will come in, and then over-competition, and then the downfall of the weaker, and the consolidation again, and so on, as it ever hath been.

Though what I have already described may be the outcome, nevertheless there have arisen from them very great personal evils involving poor and rich alike. Even if the future reconciles us to what has happened, the present has to suffer.

A PERIOD OF BUSINESS RECONSTRUCTION

These consolidations were many of them made on fictitious prices which were the result of hope and not of reason. For that stockholders have already paid the penalty. To the rest of the people this fall of stock prices makes no difference, if my view of it be correct. To another portion of the active men of the country it means discharge from their present and readjustment of their future employment. This was and is grievous to be borne. Mills placed in wrong places have to be abandoned, and loss comes to the town. In like manner department stores have so encroached on the profits of small dealers that rents have had to be lessened. Of course, if all this results in a better method of doing business, and by better method I mean one which is better for all the people, we shall be gainers, just as we are gainers by a labor-saving invention, though even those blessings are always disguised by immediate lessening of demand for labor, and sorrow comes while labor readjusts itself. So far there does not seem to be much daylight thrown upon the questions started. Only two really practical suggestions seem to have been made. One is that the utmost publicity, at least so far as stockholders are concerned, should be given to the business of corporations. It may be said, and is said, that this requirement in some cases, if exactly complied with, would be to fully inform rivals of details which lie at the base of successful competition. In that event the other suggestion is that, if no information is given, the directors should be made fully responsible for the losses of others caused by their action. Whether this last suggestion is worth much needs more full discussion.

THE OUTLOOK FOR EMPLOYER AND EMPLOYEE

These considerations, of course, only touch upon the subject, and do not in any way exhaust it. Time alone will show whether the evils which have happened from the forming of large corporations will pass away, or whether those predicted will actually come. Some of the evils specified are not real ones. That real evils will come we can hardly doubt, any more than we can doubt the right and power of the people or their ability to meet them when they do come. What I mean can best be taught by an example. In the old days, before factories, each man controlled his own actions. When factories started a large inroad was made upon the liberty of labor. A man found himself part of an organization. He was controlled by it. He had to work to the full measure of his strength each and every day. In time he began to realize that organization, which was his weakness, was also his strength. He organized also. The result, after long struggle, is that to-day, after many mistakes and blunders on both sides, he is recognized as a potent factor, has in due measure dictated his hours of labor, and largely influences his own pay. The owners of large plants are beginning to understand that they are trustees as well as employers, and that the value of what they own depends not solely upon the capital even judiciously put in, but also upon the relations they have with those who do the work. This example gives great hope for the future of the race to us who have watched the struggles of the last twenty years. Of course, there has been much misdirected energy and temper on both sides. The capitalist said: "This is my property. I have a right, the sole right, to say how and when or for what hours and what wages men shall work for me"; and the laborer said: "This mill cannot go on without me, and I will say how, when or for what hours and what wages I shall work." Between these two statements lay the truth, and men have slowly gravitated toward it. Fights have largely ceased, and reasoning and mutual information have taken their place.

Upon the people who have managed such discussion to such sensible conclusions we may depend for the solution of this question of the hour. Of course there will be wild propositions, like the closing of the post-office to obnoxious corporations, the repeal of the tariff as to them, and such like things, but as we watch the workings of the new method of business those who feel its evils as they develop will find the remedy.

One of the best ways to meet this or any other evil, and especially the wild discussion of it, is to sit down and reduce to details what we propose to remedy and how in detail we propose to enact the remedy. This will reduce the evil to its just terms, and reduce also the proposed remedy to actual practical life. When men have thus coolly set down in detail the grievance and then the proposed remedy, it has not seldom happened that the grievance was found to be preferable to the remedy. Declamation and generalities are easy. Lawmaking for a nation twenty-five hundred miles square is not easy.

SOME CURIOUS NAVAL STORES

By John Edward Jenks

ANY of the vessels of the United States Navy, if stranded on an island, would find almost enough material in her general stores to establish and maintain a community on shore. Each ship is so well equipped with a mass of diversified material that she is able to go on a three-years' cruise without replenishing supplies, except of provisions and clothing. A vessel of the battle-ship class carries fully one hundred tons of stores, the value of which would be half a million dollars.

The list of naval stores for each ship is prepared in the Navy Department, where the experience of many years determines the needs of the service. The weight of different articles is carefully ascertained and the record faithfully preserved. The books of the department show, for instance, the weight of the crank-pin bolt of the forward starboard engine of the Oregon, or the weight of the safety valve of No. 1 auxiliary boiler. It is possible for a naval engineer to take the diameter of a smoke-pipe and to trace out the dimensions and general characteristics of the ship, just as the scientists will take a fossil bone of an extinct animal and furnish a picture or build a skeleton of it.

For convenience in ledger accounts the naval stores are divided into thirty-two classes, and they embrace every conceivable article likely to be needed during a three-years' term on board a ship of war destined to visit strange ports and to encounter unusual conditions. The possible needs of a naval ship have been very aptly anticipated, although the list will show many articles which will strike an outsider as curious. For instance, a man on the farm, who knows a vessel only as a thing of masts and ropes, would hardly expect to encounter on shipboard plows, pitchforks, rakes, spades, chicken coops, carriages and wagons, carriage whips, currycombs, horse collars, and mules and oxen.

Some idea of the diversity of various articles classed under one head is afforded by the item of brushes, of which these varieties are required: artist's dabble, badger, bench, blacking, blender, blind, bristle, camel's-hair, cattle, chisel, clamp, coach-painter's, coir, color, dust, fan, factory, feather, feather dusting, fitch, floor, flue, foundry, frescoe, gilder's tips, glue, graining-combs, hair, hand, hearth, horse, kalsomine, lacquering, lamp chimney, lettering, marking, mottler, moulder's, painter's, painter's dust, paste, pencil, roofing, sable, sash-tool, scrub, shaving, ship's seaming, shore, stencil, steel wire, stove, streaking, sweeping, tar, tooth, tube, varnish, wall, whitewash, window, wire.

Another subject with many sides is that of oil, of which the different kinds are armorer's tool, belt, boiled and raw linseed, cleaning, carboline, carbon, castor, clock, cocoanut, cottonseed, carne, cylinder, engine, fish, gargling, gasoline, hard finish, kerosene, lard, liquid cooler, lubricating, machine, Mecca, mineral, naphtha, natural, neat's-foot, olive, paraffin, petroleum, polishing, sperm, spindle, sweet, synovial, tea, vacuum, valve, whale.

Articles with quite widely separated utility are closely associated in the alphabetical classification, sometimes to an interesting degree, as when we find that coffins, clothespins, clarinets and clapboards are together, or gravel, gravy-boats, Greek fire and gridirons are grouped in another place. The other curious items which help make up a ship's equipment are andirons, drums, earrings (rigging), letter boxes, rags, razors, lap robes, umbrellas, bread boxes, box openers, cat meat, coal breakers, cravats, corset lacing, diamond-tools, devil's claws, dog vanes, dynamite, fireworks, hour glasses, jewsharps (pertaining to the anchor), Jacob's ladders, pedometers and rat traps.

Digitized by Google

The Argument for DOTY

By Octave Thanet

THE Flying Fisherman had left the marshes and the factories of Boston behind and was flashing through stone-walled pastures and stunted woodlands, and glimpses of gabled green roofs and stately columned piazzas on hillsides overlooking little curves and triangles of the ocean. It was a day in August, warm in Boston, but cooler with every vanishing mile on the train. Only six persons sat in the rear car—three elderly gentlemen with gray mustaches, who read their newspapers; two smoothly shaven young gentlemen who were talking with more interest in their subject than young gentlemen with crimson ribbons on their straw hats usually show, and a man who was not a gentleman.

The man who was not a gentleman wore a new tweed suit—a check suit of a most accurate fit, if his shoulders would not stoop so much—but his linen was not quite fresh. He combined this undress business suit with a shining black silk hat, for reasons best known to himself. He wore a crimson tie and a big diamond ring; and he repaired his finger-nails carefully with a knife. Then he turned his face to the window. It was not a handsome face; the nose was finished with a bulb, and was too short for the other features; or else the upper lip was too long. Certainly the stubbed, sandy mustache was too big. Yet common as the face was, it was not commonplace; the bullet head of close-cropped, coarse, sandy hair had a fine back brain; and there was indomitable determination in the square jaw. As the man looked out of the window he set his mouth and frowned; but any one close behind would have seen him wink repeatedly, and finally dash his hand across his eyes.

❧

The young men leaned forward toward each other; their voices were low. One was a slim, bright-eyed young fellow, with quick motions and a trick of gesture as he talked; the other was tall, with fair hair which fell over his handsome brow; he had the muscles of an athlete. He listened very quietly to a rather vehement speech.

"Yes, I'm afraid he was a mucker," he said in a slow, pleasant voice which had lost its Western burr without losing its leisurely Western cadences. "There are mucker gentlemen and mucker cads——"

"And he was a mucker cad," the other broke in; "but now, what about Ronny? Where will he pay the money? Doty's dead, and I shouldn't think it would be cheerful for his father, who is rich as mud, to have his son's gambling loot turned over to him. Anyhow, you know he told Ronny he needn't pay."

"Yes, I was there," said the fair man dryly. "He had raked in the last pile of chips when I arrived with the rescue party. Ronny was white as chalk and looked drawn about his eyes; but he's a dead sport. 'I guess I've had enough,' says he. 'How do we stand, Mr. Doty?' Doty grinned as he named the sum; and poor Ronny grinned, too, and said he would send it around to-morrow. Poor Ronny! he's been paying back the loans he got that next morning ever since, and it was only half, too."

"I think it was meaner than plucking him, the way he offered not to take the money; it was insufferable!"

❧

"Well, I'm not so sure," said the fair man. "It was rather like dancing on the body of his victim when he told him he could put up the pencil, for he didn't want his money; and the next time he'd better not play poker with a mucker. And it was pretty bad rubbing it in, the way he did; he swelled out his shirt-front and swaggered and squeaked, 'And, what's more, sonny, you haven't any business to play at all, for you haven't got the price. And you haven't got any business to refuse now, either; for you'll have to borrow from your friends until you can get it out of your sister; and she is skinning herself alive to keep you in Harvard, anyhow.'"

"That was atrocious!" said the other.

"Well, it was true. But it was a dirty trick, hitting a man that was down, and I told Doty so; but Ronny said, 'I'm not going to have any scraps on my account; you'll see every cent of your money, Mr. Doty, and it won't come out of my sister, either.' Ronny was great! He toddled over with all the money he could raise, and left it and his note for the rest in Doty's rooms.

"I heard that Doty said if the young fool wouldn't take a favor he could sweat; if he'd ask him to let him off he'd let him off, and he knew it. It was pretty bad; but it's made a man of Ronny; he was going the pace badly."

"I happen to know that," said Georgy, looking away.

"I am sure you get your information from the inside, Georgy," said Frank, "and I rather think that you passed on the hint that Miss Edith gave you; and—just between you and me—I'm thinking the Dean finds a daughter convenient sometimes as a kind of unofficial——"

❧

"Look here, Frank, drop that; and if you're going to be witty, I won't tell you another bit of information."

"Tell away," said Frank; "you know you want to."

"The Dean has sent a letter to Doty's father that won't be nice reading."

"The Dean hadn't got on to that?"

"Oh, no; it was general worthlessness; he was always flinging his money around and treating the world. Do you suppose he had been drinking—yesterday?"

"The other boys had. He brought them down to Manchester in his spread-eagle style; they had more than enough in the hotel; then they took a lot of stuff on board the boat; and you saw the sail they were carrying!"

The young fellow shuddered. "I can't get it out of my mind," he cried, "the way they looked in the water! The girls were bad enough, but his—it simply jumped at me, swashing on that big, green wave, when he pushed the girl toward you, the way he did, with the black hair plastered over his forehead. Uh-r-r! I see it all the time!"

"So do I," answered Frank gloomily; "and I wonder—— Do you suppose he meant to push her to me? It was really getting her saved instead of himself, you know. And he certainly had his arm about her, holding her on."

"N—ah!" sniffed Georgy, tossing his head as if to toss away an ugly vision. "The poor old boy wasn't the sort of man to give up his show of life for a girl. Who were the girls, anyhow? Becky Crowe, and who else?"

"Waitresses in the hotel; there wasn't any harm in them; they knew one of the other fellows."

"All Harvard men, and a tough lot, weren't they?"

"I don't know them; they were warm and grateful, but they were all more or less befuddled. The girls cried and went to pieces; I don't know how much for Doty, who was such 'a noble young gentleman,' as one of them who was a school-teacher said—Beckie, you know, waits on the next table—or how much because they were afraid the lark would cost them their jobs. The ways of women are mysterious."

Georgy shrugged his shoulders. "The ways of One Woman are, I know," said he. "Look here, Frank; I can't seem to get away from the subject; did they get his father? They were telegraphing and telephoning when I left, and he wasn't at home."

"I don't know, I'm sure. Poor man; I'm sorry for him."

"Why, he's a big boss, I heard; owns pretty much the whole city, and rose from the ranks to having a house like a palace and voting several thousand American citizens."

"Maybe; but Doty was his only child, and Ronny says that the old boy simply poured money on Doty. His heart was set on having him know all the best set and get into the Dickey, of which he had about as much chance as he had of getting honors."

❧

"Didn't he have a mother, too?"

"Yes; started life as a cook; a good soul, whom the reporters who write up the old man describe as a 'lady of lovely nature, devoted to her domestic duties.' She never goes out except to church."

"How did you ever find out all that?"

"Ronny. He used to butter Ronny up all the time, and was trying to be chummy with him; and he showed him the picture of his father's house and pictures of the rooms in it, and told him how much everything cost, and showed him a Biography of Prominent Citizens of—wherever he lives; the sort of book you pay $25 for and get your picture in. This one had them all—his father, his mother, and him. Ronny laughed over it; but I was rather sorry for the fellow. I never made up my mind just why he was after Ronny until Ronny got tired of dodging his attentions, and unluckily made that bad break about his being a mucker. It was when we were chaffing him on Doty's admiration; and Ronny cut loose on his mucker friend—which was not just nice of Ronny, if he was annoyed. Doty heard of it somehow, and he had it in for Ronny ever after."

"Well, I shouldn't like to be called a mucker, myself. But I guess Doty was a bad lot, and he followed around after Ronny because he was a big man, and he thought he could use him. I don't suppose he'll see it that way, but it was a piece of luck for his father, losing him. Well"—his voice, which had been low, rose to a higher key—"how far are we from Manchester?"

❧

At the word the man who was not a gentleman turned his head from the window. He looked fixedly at the two young men, at their handsome, clean-cut profiles, at the two hats with the crimson bands. Some emotion, which the habit of repressing all emotion made it hard to detect, twitched his features. He arose and walked over to the young men's chairs. "Beg pardon," said he, "but did I hear this young gentleman"—he inclined his head in Georgy's direction—"say something about Manchester?"

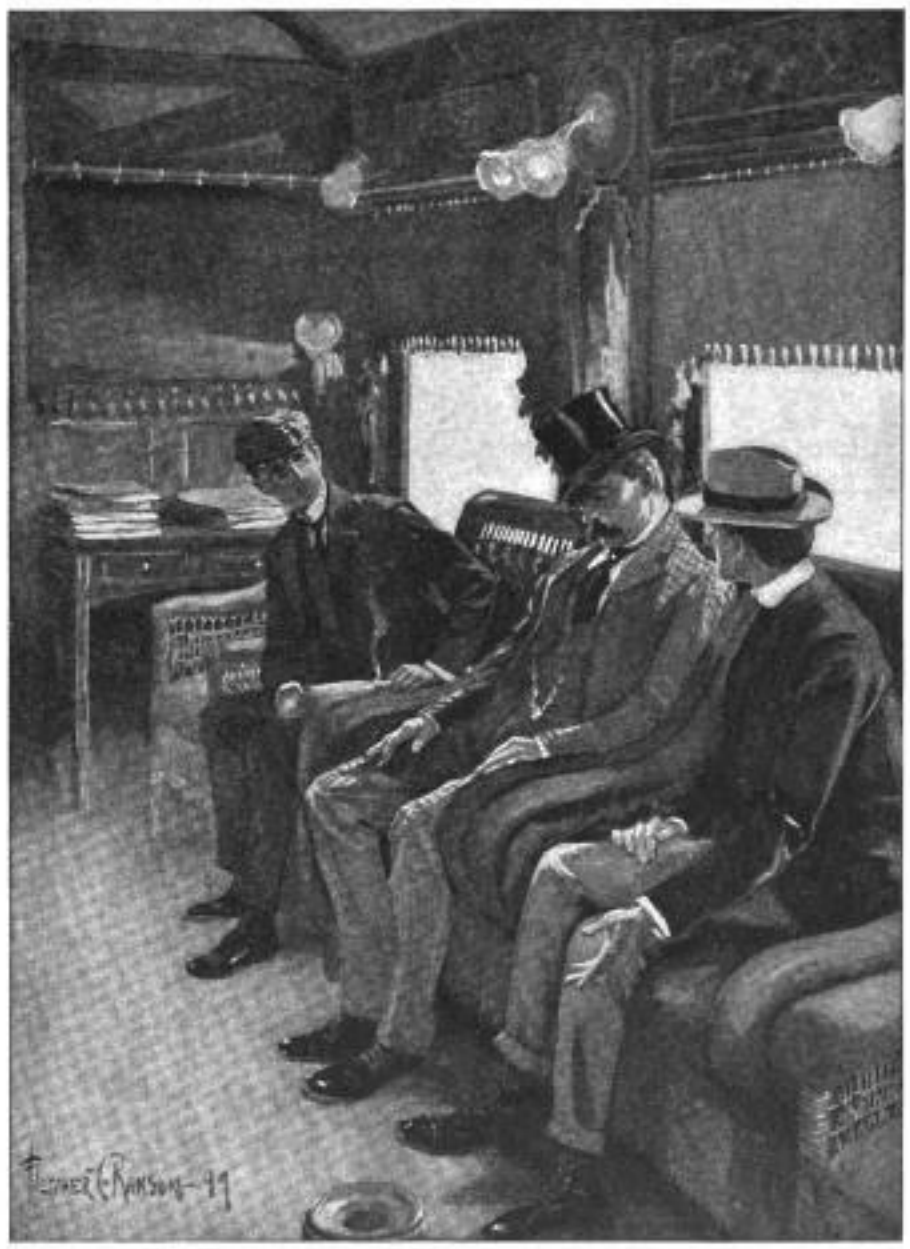
"I spoke of Manchester," said Georgy distantly; he thought that the man looked as if he had been drinking, with his red eyes and nose; there was something shaky about him; and it was evident that he was not a gentleman. "Did you want to stop at Manchester?"

"Yes," said the man. "You boys are Harvard boys?"

Georgy assented—rather stiffly.

"Maybe you know about the—the accident? My name's Doty, and——"

Frank was on his feet before the sentence was ended, and Georgy almost as quickly, both offering their chairs. The man who was not a gentleman was accustomed to weighing men and to watching slight changes of manner; he did not fail to observe the change here, although his father's heart mistook its meaning.



"Thank you, thank you, boys," he said; "yes, I will set down if you'll let me. I want to ask you. I haven't had anything but the wire. I was away from home, and being Sunday in between made it hard."

"We were afraid you would have trouble getting here; I don't know how you got here so soon," said Frank, casting about for a properly expurgated account of the accident.

"I got an engine," said Doty.

"But did they let you come?"

"Oh, yes. I found it was a private train, but the Superintendent fixed it." He spoke wearily, as if getting special engines and going on private trains were common

DRAWN BY FLETCHER C. RANSOM

THE FATHER NODDED, AND SWALLOWED SOMETHING IN HIS THROAT

Digitized by Google

matters with him—as, indeed, they were. Then he added: "Could you boys tell me anything about how it happened?"

Frank spoke while Georgy was struggling with his wits.

"There was a squall," he began. "Doty and two other fellows and some girls were out in a little yacht; and the squall struck it, and it capsized. We, my friend, Mr. Wendell"—indicating Georgy—"and I had put to shore, and were just getting out when we heard the shouts and saw them; we put about and went to them. I don't know a man on the coast except the old skippers who could have got up to them and handled the boat so I could pull them in, except my friend here. Just as we came alongside, some one—your son, it must have been—called, 'Take the girls first!' But they were all clinging to the side of the boat, and we had to take them as they came. Your son and one of the girls were the last ones. He pushed the girl over to me—she had short hair—I didn't know it was a girl; I should have hauled him over the stern first, but he pushed her toward me; and I took her; he must have known he was giving up his chance, for he was too weak even to cling."

"And you didn't get him in?" said the father.

"We did get him in," cried Georgy. "In that wind, Atherton"—tapping Frank's shoulder—"jumped in and got him, and we got him on board after a while, but it was too late. We did all we could."

Doty looked from one young and glowing face to the other. His own face worked; but he had had a long experience in mastering his feelings; he held out his hand to Frank and gripped the Westerner's strong hand hard; then, in the same silence, he caught Georgy's slender fingers. "I'm not going to tell you boys how I think about what you done," said he in the same dry, small voice, "but——" He let the last word limp into silence, leaving the sentence unfinished, adding directly: "I've heard Fred talk of you; he said you were good fellows, but he didn't know you very well. I could see he thought a sight of you. He knew what he was about, I guess. Would you mind telling me again, Mr. Atherton? He was hanging to the boat, and——"

"And holding the girl," interrupted Georgy.

"And he pushed her toward you, didn't he?"

"He pushed her toward me," Frank repeated; "and then I saw it was a girl and pulled her in."

"He couldn't do no otherwise," said the father, "no matter what it cost. But it's an awful cost to us. I don't know what his mother will say. I told her not to come. I got a niece of hers that's got sense to go on to her and stay with her; I got her by the long-distance 'phone, while they were getting the engine ready; I got her to go on and break the news herself to her; I couldn't bear her to just get a wire, and it would be 'most as bad with the 'phone; it kinder rattles her hearing the buzz. I couldn't have her told that way, so poor Johanna had to try; I can git her here, and find out, I guess, when I git to the hotel. I'd like to arrange to"—he held his voice steadier with an effort—"to take him right home."

"We thought so," said Frank, "and the Dean, who is visiting my friend's mother, took charge of the arrangements."

"It was him wired me?"

"Yes, sir."

The grave kindness and respect of Frank's manner increased all the time; Georgy picked up the tall hat which had fallen to the floor and replaced it gently on the back of the chair where its owner had absently hung it.

"The young lady—did she git off all right?" asked Doty.

"She is all right, poor girl; she didn't realize anything at the time; she was almost insensible——"

"She would have been washed away if he hadn't held her on," interrupted Georgy. "He used up all his strength supporting her."

"He couldn't do no otherwise," said the father again. "Has she got a mother and father? Is it a young lady lives 'round here?"

Georgy cast a swift glance of appeal on Frank's serious, sympathetic face; the Westerner did not return it; he answered in the same even, compassionate tone: "No, she is a school-teacher in Vermont; there were three of them; they are waitresses here in the hotel, and one of the boys suggested to your son that the girls never had any sails and good times, and Doty, who was awfully generous and kind, you know——"

The father nodded and swallowed something in his throat. "I know better'n you, I guess," said he. "When he was a little chap he was always fetching stray dogs home; of course he wanted to give the girls a good time."

"She knew Doty a little; she was telling me what a noble fellow he was," said Frank. Georgy looked at him with deep admiration. "She has a mother living, she said; but I think her father is dead. And one of the other girls told me there were four or five little ones, and she didn't know what they would do without this girl's help."

"I'm glad she's that kind of a girl," said Doty. "Do you know her name? I want to find her."

"Her name's Beck—Rebecca," Georgy put in. "We'll send her to see you. And—Mr. Doty, won't you allow me to see about getting you a room at the hotel? A friend of mine is to be away and you'd be quieter in his room."

DRAWN BY FLETCHER C. RANSOM

THE DEAN TAPPED HIS FINGERS TOGETHER AND FROWNED

"If it won't put you to too much trouble. Pay the hotel whatever they want. You boys are certainly good to me—I never expected—it kinder bowls a man over to meet kindness like that. I'm glad to take it from Freddy's friends. I'd like to see Freddy's teacher, or whatever you call him."

"I'll fetch him around to see you as soon as I get to Manchester," said Georgy eagerly, "and the girls and the other boys, if they haven't gone back to Boston."

"I'll be obliged to you. There's a friend Freddy had at Harvard I'd like you to see. He's wired about it. Maybe you know him; his name is Ronald Danforth——"

"I dare say he'll have heard and will be in Manchester," said Frank. Georgy caught his breath at his friend's unexpected wealth of resource and daring invention. "He'll be here this evening, anyhow."

"You boys know him?"

"We know him, yes; he's a splendid fellow."

"Freddy said he was just out of sight. One of his last letters he wanted me to get a Gordon setter for him to give him. They'd had some kind of a tiff, and he was trying to make up, I guess; that's like Freddy."

Georgy had his own inspiration at this point; he struck in quickly: "That is just what did happen, Mr. Doty. They had some kind of misunderstanding, and, unfortunately, at the time Danforth was owing your son money, and he was stiff about paying it, and Doty didn't want to take it; but Danforth got about half of it together and was nasty the way he insisted on paying. He still owes the other half, I think, but he was arranging to pay that. I dare say he'll say something——"

"No he won't," said Doty. "You tell him to drop it. He can take it as a present from Freddy; that's what Freddy would want, and his mother and me, too."

"But—it's quite a large——"

"I don't give a—I don't care how large it is—if it's ten thousand! Freddy was fond of him. He's welcome."

"I'm pretty sure he'll be down on the six o'clock train," said Frank. "I'll fetch him over. Now, Mr. Doty, the next station is Manchester; you'll let us take care of you. There'll be a trap there for us, and if you'll let me get your bag——"

"I'll git it," said Doty. "I chucked all my mail into it; I don't know what difference it makes now whether I attend to things or not; but it might ball up some good friends of mine, so I'll try to git at it. I don't suppose you've got a typewriter girl here handy?"

"I have a typewriter, Mr. Doty, if you'll try me for secretary."

Doty looked a little less haggard; he smiled faintly. "I guess I'm imposing on you; but I can't bear to let go of you boys. If you will, then, Mr. Wendell. I got to write to his mother. I don't know what she'll say. But he couldn't have done no otherwise. She'll see that, too. But she was so set on Freddy's growing up to be a gentleman——"

"He died like a noble gentleman," said Frank. "No mother could help being proud of him, and that's something——"

"It's a lot. You boys understand; you——" But, with his features quivering, he shook his head and jumped up to go for his bag.

The young men exchanged glances. "We seem to have changed our views," said Frank a little grimly.

Georgy, however, saw no irony in the situation. He was fidgeting on his seat with excitement. "Oh, isn't he pathetic!" cried he; "and so sandy, too!"

"If we say much more in praise of poor Doty we'll get to believing in him ourselves," said Frank. "But I guess we were too hard on him."

"We were beasts!" muttered Georgy. "I say, Frank, how are you going to get Ronny?"

"He's in Boston; I heard so yesterday; and I'll send him a telegram that'll fetch him. What bothers me is the Dean's letter. I hate him to get that now."

"That's my fix," said Georgy. "Poor Doty, he had such a good heart, I wish we'd said a kind word to him before."

The idea of the letter did not worry Georgy long. Three hours later the two met in the hotel hall.

"Well?" said Frank, who had come.

"All right; you drilled 'em well. The girls were lovely, especially the school-teacher. I don't know what he said to her, but she came out crying, and said she was going to write to Mrs. Doty, and she was sobbing something about his great goodness. I tell you, Frank, the old boy mayn't be a gentleman, but he's taking this like one. So fair all around, and so sandy! I think everything is moving our way all right. I've got seven telegrams of sympathy. Good ones, too. The boys answered right off. I got in about his saving the girl in the long-distance, you know, and explained. But I'm downright rattled about that letter—the Dean's. It was in his mail. I saw it, and I was going to put it in a safe place, but when I got a chance it was gone——"

"Not so loud, Georgy! Monkeying with mail is a penitentiary offense——"

"Tommy-rot! I say! Do you suppose he's opened it?"

"N-o," said Frank slowly; "I don't think he got it; in fact, I know he didn't, for I took it myself—unopened. And I propose to give it back to the Dean."

Georgy flung himself on the football player and hugged him, crying: "You precious old hypocrite! Come on! I propose to make myself an accessory and go to the Dean, too."

The Dean tapped his fingers together and frowned thoughtfully into the triangle. Then he looked up with a veiled twinkle in his eyes. He took the letter which Frank was holding—Georgy had told the whole story, omitting only their earlier and immature opinions of young Doty. "Of course," said the Dean, "you cannot expect me to approve of your robbing the United States mail——"

"It was not the mail, but Mr. Doty," said Georgy.

"Of robbing Mr. Doty, then; but as I have the letter back I will say that under the circumstances"—he threw the unopened envelope into the open fire—"I am glad he didn't get it. I shall call on Mr. Doty this evening."

"It will be a comfort to him, sir," said Georgy.

"I wonder how they will hit it off; but they've both got the right stuff in them, and that's what tells when a man's in trouble; it shows right out then!" So Georgy discoursed to Frank a few moments later, and secretly he thought, "I'm afraid I've dished myself with the old boy now."

The Dean watched them as they swung around the curve of the driveway. "They seem to have changed their opinion," he thought. "It is easy to see why. That is how youth forms its opinions. They are just as sure to-day that Doty was a misunderstood hero as they were yesterday that he was a vulgar cad. They have convinced themselves with their own arguments. Ah, youth! Dear youth!"

Digitized by Google

How WE make Presidents

Recollections of Lincoln's Two Campaigns

By Colonel A. K. McCLURE

Drawings by CARL KLEINSCHMIDT

THE election of Lincoln in 1860 gave birth to a new political epoch in the history of the Republic. The Government was organized under Federal rule by the inauguration of Washington. He was a thorough Federalist; he believed in a strong government with the most effective restraints upon the mutations of popular expression, and but for Jefferson, who was the exponent of the broadest features of popular government, the new Republic would have had many elements of monarchy interwoven with it. Washington's impregnable strength with the people prevented any serious agitation for a new political departure during his eight years of Presidential service, and he was sufficiently powerful to transmit the government to Federal authority in John Adams, his successor, who defeated Jefferson by a small majority in 1796.

In the second battle between Jefferson and Adams Washington was dead and Federalism had developed some of its most offensive features, especially in the alien and sedition law, and Jefferson's triumphant election in 1800 inaugurated the second political epoch of the nation. Political control departed from Federalism to Democracy under Jefferson—under the title of Republicanism—and for sixty years the Democrats ruled the policy of the Republic.

In 1860 the nation proclaimed the third great political epoch of its history by an aggressive departure from Democracy to the Republicanism that has since ruled without material interruption. There have been two Democratic Administrations since the Republican epoch of 1860, but though they, for the time, halted and modified the Republican policy, they never had the power to make a decisive reversal of Republican mastery. Thus an epoch of twelve years of Federalism, another of sixty years of Democracy, and another of forty years of Republicanism tell the story of the political revolutions of the Republic during a period of one hundred and twelve years.

When Fremont made his brilliant campaign of 1856 and narrowly escaped election to the Presidency, it was generally accepted by all the varied phases of politics opposed to radical Republicanism that the Republican movement was like a bee—biggest at its birth—and that it never could win a national victory; but all the chief events affecting the political sentiment of the country from 1856 until 1860 tended to strengthen Republican sentiment and to alienate a large portion of the intelligent elements of Democracy. The significant elections of 1858 and 1859, with the Kansas-Nebraska war convulsing the country from centre to circumference, steadily strengthened Republican lines, and when the leaders of the party came to face the great battle of 1860 they well understood that success was within their reach, and never did a party exhibit greater sagacity in leadership than was displayed in the convention that nominated Lincoln.

THE APPARENT CERTAINTY OF SEWARD'S NOMINATION

William H. Seward was the confessed Republican leader of the nation. He was admittedly its ablest champion and was among its earliest supporters. He had been long in the Senate, and was the peer of any in the discussion of all the grave questions which then agitated our National Legislature. He was not only the ablest of his party, but he was one of the most exemplary and courteous of men. Two-thirds of all the delegates elected to that convention were friends of Seward and expected to vote for him, and his nomination would have been inevitable on the first ballot had not the convention been restrained by considerations of expediency which were most reluctantly accepted. Lincoln's own delegation from Illinois embraced one-third of positive Seward men. They were instructed for Lincoln without hope of his nomination at the time, and most of them expected to perform a mere perfunctory duty by voting for him on one or more ballots.

Horace Greeley had sounded the first note of warning against the nomination of Seward, and his paper, the New York Tribune, was then the most influential journal ever published in this country. It was the Republican Bible, and its weekly edition was more read in the West than all other papers combined. He startled the party by a series of dignified and masterly articles in favor of Edward Bates, of Missouri, for President, on the ground that Seward was not available, and that a man of the great ability and conservative attitude of Bates alone could win in that contest. But though the conservative element of the opposition to the Democracy was not enthusiastic for Seward and his "irrepressible conflict," the true reason of Seward's defeat was not presented either by Mr. Greeley or by any public discussion before the meeting of the convention.

I saw several rural delegates from New England States shed tears

WHY SEWARD WAS SET ASIDE FOR LINCOLN

I have read many romances about how, why and by whom Abraham Lincoln was nominated for President at Chicago, but the explanation is very simple, and when presented must be accepted by all as conclusive. Henry S. Lane had been nominated as the Republican candidate for Governor of Indiana, and Andrew G. Curtin had been nominated by the Republicans for Governor of Pennsylvania. These States voted for Governor and other State officers on the second Tuesday of October, and they were the pivotal States of the national contest. It was an absolute necessity to carry them in October to assure the election of a Republican President, and the first inquiry of the Republican leaders at Chicago, outside of those who were blindly devoted to Seward, was "Who can carry Indiana and Pennsylvania?"

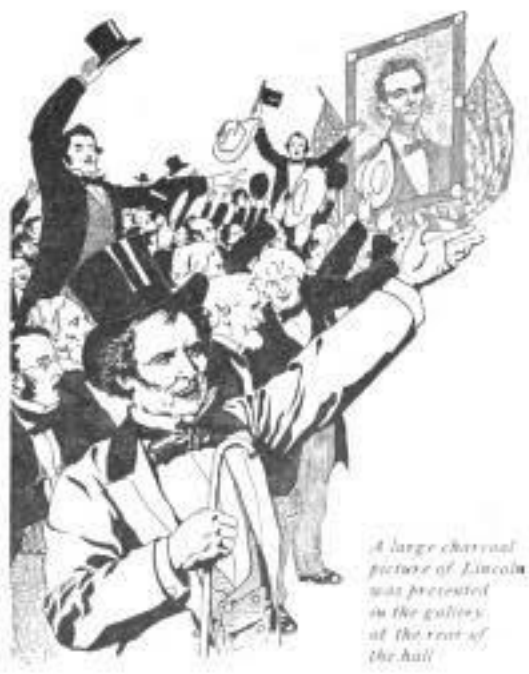
Lane and Curtin were there solely for the purpose of getting the strongest possible national ticket nominated to aid them in their State contests. With Lane was John D. Defrees, as Chairman of the Republican State Committee of Indiana, and I was with Curtin, as he had charged me with the same responsible duty in Pennsylvania. Curtin and Lane decided that they could not be elected if Seward were nominated for President. They were not personally or politically hostile to him; they had but one thing in view, and that was their own election, which was essential to elect a Republican President.

THE ROCK THAT SPLIT THE SEWARD DELEGATION

Prior to 1860 the Republican party had never carried either Pennsylvania or Indiana. Opposition to the pro-slavery policy of the Buchanan Administration had crystallized anti-slavery Democrats, Whigs and Americans into the support of Union State tickets, and had elected them; but in Pennsylvania the Republican name was omitted from necessity, and the organization was entitled the People's Party. In both of these States there was an organized and powerful American party yet in existence, without which the Republicans could not succeed. It was the remnant of the American or Know-Nothing revolution of 1854, and they cherished their own faith with great fidelity and would not support any candidate especially friendly to the Catholics.

When Seward was elected Governor of New York in 1838 it was largely by the influence of Archbishop Hughes, one of the ablest Catholic prelates this country has ever had; and Seward, not only because of his gratitude to his Catholic friends, but because of his broad and liberal views generally, in a message to the Legislature urged a division of the school fund between the Catholics and Protestants. That was the rock on which Seward was wrecked. Had he been nominated, the entire American element of the opposition would have been aggressively against him, and Pennsylvania and Indiana would have been lost not only by the defeat of Curtin and Lane in October, but by the defeat of Seward in November.

The situation was earnestly presented by Curtin and Lane, and Mr. Defrees and I accompanied them in their conferences with various delegations which were devoted to Seward, but were willing to abandon him—not because they loved Seward less, but because they loved Republican success more. I saw several rural delegates from New England States shed tears as they confessed that they must abandon Seward because he could not carry Pennsylvania and Indiana, and certainly more than one-third of all the delegates who voted for Lincoln in that convention did it in sincerest sorrow because compelled to abandon their great leader for the sake of victory.



Under such conditions the Seward lines were steadily weakening, but never was a movement so ably led as was the Seward movement at Chicago. It was literally a battle of giants. Thurlow Weed, the master of masters in politics, led the fight for Seward, and he had around him Governor Morgan, Chairman of the National Committee; Raymond, of the Times, and many others of distinguished ability in such struggles. Weed invited Lane to drive with him, and, in the course of their conversation, assured him that if his delegation would support Seward all the money needed to carry his election in Indiana would be generously furnished; but Lane knew that no amount of money could give him victory in October with Seward as the national candidate.

THE CLEVER STRATEGY OF THE LINCOLN MANAGERS

The convention met on Wednesday, May 16. The first day was devoted to routine duties, and the second to the adoption of a platform and rules to govern the convention. The convention adjourned on Thursday evening profoundly impressed with the great battle that was to be fought on the following day, and both sides exhausted political strategy to gain the advantage. Weed organized a most imposing street parade of the Seward people. They had thousands of Seward spectators outside of the delegates, and it was one of the most impressive public displays I have ever witnessed. They paraded the streets for an hour or more before the meeting of the convention.

The friends of Lincoln had been tireless in their efforts, and they displayed wonderful ability in handling their forces. The leaders in immediate charge of the Lincoln people were Colonel Medill, of the Chicago Tribune; David Davis, afterward Judge of the Supreme Court; Norman B. Judd, Chairman of the Republican State Committee, and Leonard Swett, who was almost a copy of Lincoln physically, and who was Lincoln's closest friend until the day of his death. When they found that the Seward parade was to come off, they counseled how to meet it, and they finally decided that while the Seward men were parading they would fill the immense temporary wigwam—erected for the convention, and capable of holding five thousand spectators—with men who should go there solely for the purpose of hurrahing for Lincoln. They carried this plan into very successful operation, and when the Seward procession attempted to march into the convention hall they found it filled to overflowing, and very few Seward men outside the delegation could obtain admission.

Just before the convention opened I saw the New York delegation file in and fill the only vacant place in the immense building. They were appalled when they saw how they had been outgeneraled. Almost immediately behind the New York men, who were under the lead of Evarts as Chairman of the delegation, sat Horace Greeley at the head of the Oregon delegation. That new State, just admitted into the Union, was so far from civilization, as the iron horse had not yet been heard in either the Rockies or the Sierra Nevadas, that the Republican convention selected a number of prominent men in the East, including Greeley, to represent the State. I never saw a more benignant face than that of Greeley's when the nomination of Lincoln was declared. It was known by the supporters of Seward that Pennsylvania and Indiana had both decided to support Lincoln, the Pennsylvanians having declared for Lincoln by four majority over Bates, after giving a complimentary ballot to Cameron.

A large charcoal picture of Lincoln was presented in the gallery at the rear of the hall

MR. LINCOLN'S TRIUMPHANT NOMINATION

With very little preliminary movement the ballot began, and Seward's two-thirds vote of the convention dwindled down to 173½ when 234 were necessary to a choice. Lincoln, with Pennsylvania and Ohio giving complimentary ballots to Cameron and

---

Editor's Note—This is the second paper in Colonel McClure's series, How We Make Presidents. The series began in the Post of January 6.

Digitized by Google

Chase, had 102 votes. As the ballots were announced, every vote for Lincoln was cheered to the echo, while there were but few cheers for Seward except from the delegates themselves. When the second ballot was called the Seward people felt that they must increase their strength or fall behind in the race. As Lincoln gained most of the vote of Pennsylvania, with important gains from other States, the wildest cheering greeted the announcements, and when the ballot was given with only 10 votes gained by Seward and 75 votes gained by Lincoln, it became evident to all that Seward's strength was exhausted and that Lincoln was the coming man. The next and last ballot soon showed Lincoln as leading Seward, and from that time on it was difficult to announce the votes of the States because of the frenzied cheers for "Abe Lincoln."

When the last State was called it was known that Lincoln was either nominated or very close to it. The vote as recorded was 231½ for Lincoln, being 2½ votes short of a majority, and 180 for Seward, with some 50 scattering. Before the result was announced Chairman Carter, of Ohio, got up on his chair to assure the attention of the President, and said:

"I rise to announce the change of four votes from Ohio from Mr. Chase to Abraham Lincoln."

It was known then that this gave Lincoln the majority, and I have never before nor since witnessed such a scene as was made by the great mass of the Lincoln people who were in the hall. A large charcoal picture of Lincoln was presented in the gallery at the rear of the hall, and the whole vast audience, with few exceptions outside of the New York delegation, rose to indulge in the wildest enthusiasm for some minutes.

HOW THE TAIL OF THE TICKET WENT BEGGING

When order was finally restored, Maine, Massachusetts and Missouri changed a number of votes to Lincoln, giving him a total of 354, being 120 odd votes more than he needed. When the vote was announced by the President cheers broke out afresh, but they soon quieted down to await the action of the New York delegation that was expected to move the unanimous nomination. There was certainly fully five minutes of dead silence in the body as the New York delegates were mortified beyond expression at their discomfiture; but after a long wait that seemed to be vastly longer than it was the tall form of William M. Evarts arose, and with reluctance that was unconcealed said:

"Mr. President, I move that the nomination of Abraham Lincoln be made unanimous."

Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, rose as soon as he saw Evarts rise, and when Evarts' motion was made Andrew seconded it, and with the unanimous vote of the convention and the heartiest huzzas from the many thousands who witnessed the proceedings, Abraham Lincoln was declared the Republican candidate for President. The convention adjourned to meet again in the evening to nominate a candidate for Vice-President.

So keen were the disappointments of the New York delegation, and Mr. Weed, who was the Seward leader, that when earnestly urged to name a candidate for Vice-President who would have been accepted by a nearly unanimous vote they churlishly refused to do so. Governor Morgan would have been taken as the candidate to emphasize the desire of the friends of Lincoln to recognize the friends of Seward, but he peremptorily refused to accept it, and the convention then nominated Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, as a representative of the Democratic-Republican element, but New York divided her vote between five candidates, giving a bare majority to Hamlin from personal choice.

"Well, McClure, I don't quite forget that I was nominated in a convention that was two-thirds for the other fellow"

The Chicago convention that nominated Lincoln for President was not only the ablest national political body that ever met in the country up to that time, but it exhibited the highest type of political strategy. It has never since then been equaled in ability and leadership, with the single exception of the Republican convention of 1880, in which the friends of Grant made their last stand to give their chieftain a third term. As compared with these two conventions, all subsequent ones were tame.

THE NOMINATION OF DOUGLAS BY THE DEMOCRATS

The Democratic National Convention of 1860 met at Charleston, South Carolina, on April 23, with full delegations from every State, and after a desperate wrangle of many days, which resulted in the withdrawal of a number of the Southern delegations, 57 ballots were had for President. Stephen A. Douglas started at 145½ and ended at 151½, the highest vote he received being 152½. The two-thirds rule was adopted, requiring not only two-thirds of the vote but two-thirds of the full convention, being 202, to make a nomination, and on the tenth day of the session a resolution was adopted to adjourn the convention to meet in Baltimore on June 18. A number of Southern delegates seceded and decided to meet in Richmond on the second Monday in June. The regular convention met according to adjournment, and after various severe skirmishes and votes on preliminary propositions and the withdrawal of a number of Southern delegates, two ballots were had for President. On the first, Douglas received 173½, to 15 scattering; on the second, 181½, to 13 scattering, and the convention declared that as Douglas had received two-thirds of all the votes present he was therefore the nominee for President. Senator Fitzpatrick, of Alabama, was nominated for Vice-President.

The delegates who had withdrawn from the regular convention immediately convened, 105 in number, and they gave a unanimous nomination to John C. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, for President, and General Joseph Lane, of Oregon, for Vice-President. Had the Democrats accepted Douglas and his liberal slavery platform they could have elected him triumphantly, as a very large preponderance of the Democrats who voted for Lincoln were Douglas men, and would have supported him had there been any prospect of his election. Had he been elected, slavery would have had a new lease of life, and might have been extinguished by peaceful means rather than by the arbitrament of the sword. Curtin and Lane were elected by decided majorities in October, and that ended the contest. Lincoln received 180 electoral votes, with 72 for Breckinridge, 39 for John Bell, and 12 for Douglas. Bell had been nominated as a Union candidate for President, with Edward Everett for Vice-President.

—met the people at every city and village cheering to the echo over the capture of Atlanta

THE UNCERTAINTIES OF MR. LINCOLN'S SECOND CAMPAIGN

The average intelligent student of our Civil War a generation after the conflict ended, with Lincoln's achievements in the grateful remembrance of every patriot, would naturally assume that Lincoln's reelection to the Presidency in 1864 was never in any measure doubtful; but, in fact, his defeat by General McClellan was generally apprehended. On August 23, 1864, Lincoln wrote the following with his signature appended:

> "This morning, as for some days past, it seems exceedingly probable that this Administration will not be reelected. Then it will be my duty to cooperate with the President-elect so as to save the Union between the election and the inauguration, as he will have secured his election on such grounds that he cannot possibly save it afterward."

This paper he sealed and delivered to Secretary Welles with notice not to open it until after the election.

There was very earnest opposition to Lincoln's renomination by men of eminent ability and influential leadership in the Republican party. Chase, Wade, Henry Winter Davis and Horace Greeley were bitterly opposed to accepting him as the Republican candidate for the second contest, as they believed that he could not be elected. In addition to these, Sumner was not heartily for him; Stevens was earnestly opposed to the President because he had not pressed confiscation and other punishments against the South, and the extreme radical wing of the Republican party was aggressive in its hostility. Lincoln's strength was with the people, and they overwhelmed the leaders who sought his overthrow.

LINCOLN'S SOLE EXHIBITION OF WEAKNESS

The only exhibition of weakness I ever saw in Lincoln was displayed during what might be called the contest for his renomination. There was, in point of fact, no contest at all, as after all the efforts of the opposing leaders had been exhausted the Republican people rallied to his support and asserted their mastery. He was painfully impressed with the apprehension that he might be defeated in the convention, and on a number of occasions I heard him discuss the question with a degree of interest that was painful. Even after a majority of all the delegates to the convention had been positively instructed for him, and certainly two-thirds of the remainder were publicly pledged to his support, he could not dismiss the fears of defeat.

I visited him several times within a month of the convention in obedience to his telegrams, when he discussed only the political dangers which beset him. He told me that his name would go into history darkly shadowed by a fraternal war that he would be held responsible for inaugurating if he were unable to continue in office to conquer the Rebellion and restore the Union.

Lincoln was human, as are all men, and a more anxious candidate I have never known. The last time I conferred with him on the subject was within two weeks of the meeting of the convention, and I could hardly treat with respect his anxiety about his renomination. He had given close attention to the election of delegates, and I called his attention to the fact that a decided majority were positively instructed for him, and that he certainly knew that a majority of the others could not be diverted from him. He had to admit that there seemed to be no plausible reason for doubting the result, but, with a merry twinkle of the eye, he said:

"Well, McClure, I don't quite forget that I was nominated in a convention that was two-thirds for the other fellow."

I had to admit that he had been nominated by a convention that was two-thirds for Seward, but no such conditions could arise as presented themselves in the Seward fight to swerve the convention from its purpose.

So anxious was he about the situation that he made the very unreasonable request to me to become a delegate-at-large from Pennsylvania when I had already been unanimously elected a delegate from my Congressional district. I vainly attempted to convince him that it mattered not whether I was a delegate-at-large or a district delegate, as my power to serve him would be just the same, and he persisted in urging me to go before the State convention with the ungracious request to elect me a delegate-at-large—a position that was sought as one of honor—when I was already a member of the delegation from my district.

The only possible explanation I could conceive was that, as Cameron was certain to be a delegate-at-large, he desired me to be one with Cameron and thus have both the Cameron and Curtin wings of the party equally represented at the head of the delegation. Fortunately, as it so happened, political conditions enabled me to carry out his wish, and Cameron and I were elected on the first ballot by a nearly unanimous vote.

WHY MR. LINCOLN SUPPORTED JOHNSON

I never suspected Lincoln's purpose in asking me to change my position as a delegate until three days before the meeting of the convention, when I went to Washington in obedience to his summons. He then asked me to vote for the nomination of Andrew Johnson for Vice-President. He had Cameron already committed to the nomination of Johnson as a War Democrat to succeed Hamlin, but he gave me no intimation of Cameron's position. I was favorable to the renomination of Hamlin, but, after hearing Mr. Lincoln's reasons for the request he made, I would have voted for Johnson in obedience to a sense of public duty, although Lincoln was not wrong in assuming that I was likely to vote for any candidate for Vice-President he especially desired. He was not opposed to Hamlin, but he knew that the success of the party depended upon bringing into the Republican fold a large body of War Democrats who had never become Republicans.

But the conclusive reason why he desired the nomination of Johnson was that it would most effectually prevent the recognition of the Confederacy by England and France. That was the great peril in the last year of the war, and Lincoln believed that in no way could the success of the Government in the suppression of the Rebellion be so clearly presented to the world as by taking Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, who had filled every important position within the gift of his State, and elect him to the Vice-Presidency from a reorganized rebellious State in the heart of the Confederacy. It is needless to say that, notwithstanding my prejudice against Johnson, I agreed to support him; but Lincoln's caution prevented him from giving me any intimation as to the attitude of Cameron, who was equally pledged to Lincoln in the Johnson cause. Cameron and I met at the convention in Baltimore on June 7 without either knowing the position of the other, and as our political relations were not of the confidential order, although our personal intercourse was always pleasant, it required some diplomacy for us to reach an understanding. Cameron had been committed to Hamlin, with whom he had served in the Senate, and was somewhat embarrassed, and he suggested that though he was friendly to Hamlin he did not believe that he could be nominated, to which I agreed. He then proposed that we should line up the two factions of the State in the delegation and cast a unanimous vote for Hamlin when the State was first called, and change it to a unanimous vote for Johnson when the roll-call ended, to which I readily assented; and with some effort we had a harmonious delegation on that line with the exception of Thaddeus Stevens. The vote of the State was, however, recorded unanimously for Johnson, and it was the like efforts of Lincoln in his very quiet and earnest way that made Andrew Johnson Vice-President and President.

GENERAL McCLELLAN OPPOSED TO MR. LINCOLN

The Democratic convention met in Chicago on August 29 and nominated General George B. McClellan for President, with George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, for Vice-President. It was on the twenty-third of the same month that Lincoln had written the paper before referred to expressing his settled belief that he would be defeated. Grant had been hammering away between the Wilderness and the James with appalling sacrifice of life and without visible substantial results. Sherman had been fighting his way toward Atlanta and had never won anything approaching a victory over Johnson. Thus the summer was well nigh ended without the inspiration of victory, and the long, fearful strain and sacrifice suffered by the people made many patriotic hearts inclined to accept peace on any reasonable terms.

Digitized by Google

The Democratic convention thus met just when the country was most profoundly impressed with the terrible sacrifices of war and the apprehension that the military power of the Confederacy could not be conquered. It was this condition that made the Democrats commit the fatal blunder of declaring in their national platform, "as the sense of the American people that, after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war, under the pretense of a military necessity of a war power higher than the Constitution," considerations of humanity, liberty and the public welfare demand "that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities with a view to an ultimate convention of all the States." Had the election been held at that time McClellan would have been elected.

The two things which turned the tide overwhelmingly against McClellan and in favor of Lincoln were Sherman's dispatch from Atlanta telling that it had been captured and fairly won, and Sheridan's dispatches from the Valley, reporting his brilliant victories over Early. Those were the campaign documents which saved Lincoln from reasonably apprehended defeat and made McClellan figure as one of the lowest Presidential candidates in the electoral vote.

THE CAMPAIGN IN PENNSYLVANIA

Pennsylvania was the only State that faltered in the October election of 1864. There was no State ticket to be chosen, and the Republicans assumed that Lincoln would carry the State without extraordinary efforts.

Our October election was practically a stand-off, and Lincoln telegraphed me on the morning after the election to come to Washington. He was much distressed at the attitude of our State, and apprehensive that New York, with Horatio Seymour as Governor, one of the ablest Democrats of the country, might vote for McClellan, as Tammany was then in the very zenith of its power. I had been Chairman of the State Committee when Lincoln was elected in 1860, and General Cameron was my successor in 1864. He was thoroughly competent for the task, but evidently did not appreciate the perils which confronted him. Lincoln asked me to join Cameron and devote the intervening month between the October and November elections to assure a victory. I answered that I could not make the suggestion to Cameron, as our political relations were not especially friendly, to which he replied by asking me whether I would do it if so requested by Cameron. I of course assented, and the following day I received a letter from Cameron requesting me to join him, where I found Honorable Wayne MacVeagh, who had been the Republican Chairman the year before and who was then not more friendly to Cameron than myself. We all united in an earnest effort to win the State.

HOW THE ARMY VOTE SAVED THE DAY

I had private quarters at the Continental, and Cameron's quarters were at the Girard. As requested, I advised Lincoln each day of the apparent progress of the battle. My reports were not so assuring as he desired, for the friends of McClellan, inspired by the partial victory of October, renewed their energies for the November fight. Postmaster-General Dennison came to see me on a special mission from Lincoln about two weeks before the election, to learn the situation as precisely as possible, and I had to tell him that I saw but little hope of carrying the State on the home vote. The Army vote would doubtless be largely for Lincoln and give him the State, but it would be declared a "bayonet election," and the moral power of the new Administration to prosecute the war and attain peace would be greatly impaired. My answer to Lincoln was that I would go to Washington within a few days if it should appear necessary to take extreme measures to save the State by the home vote.

As the political conditions did not improve, I telegraphed to Lincoln that I would meet him at nine o'clock in the evening to discuss the campaign. I found him nervously anxious about Pennsylvania, although not doubting his reëlection. He knew that New York was trembling in the balance and might be lost, and his fears were fully warranted, as he had but little over 6000 majority in a million votes. I told him that I had not confidence in the State being carried by the home vote, but that it could be done without interfering with the military operations of the Army, as Grant was then besieging Petersburg and Sheridan had whipped the Confederates clear out of the Valley. I suggested that he should in some way have Grant furlough five thousand Pennsylvania soldiers home for twenty days, and that Sheridan should do the same, as that vote cast at home would insure a home majority. He hesitated about making the request of Grant, and I suggested that General Meade was a soldier and a gentleman, and that he could safely send an order to him as Commander of the Army of the Potomac, and that Meade would obey it and permit the order to be returned.

A messenger from the War Office, who went the next morning to Meade bearing the order from Lincoln, brought it back with him, and fully five thousand Pennsylvania soldiers were furloughed to return home. I said: "How about Sheridan?" Lincoln's face brightened and with great enthusiasm he said: "Oh, Phil; he's all right."

The same order went to Sheridan, and he sent five thousand of his veterans home to vote as they shot, and Lincoln's majority on the home vote was 5712, to which the Army vote added 14,363, making a total majority in the State of 20,075.

Famous Feats of Journalism

The Capture of Patsy Early

By William Vincent Byars

ON THE evening of August 9, 1881, William E. Louderman was murdered on one of the leading thoroughfares of St. Louis. Many people were standing or passing within a few feet of him, and one of the best detectives in America, a former chief of the St. Louis department, heard the shot, hastened to the side of the dying man, and in a few minutes formed as nearly a correct theory of the crime as it is possible for the human intellect to form of the unknown from a priori reasoning. Yet the murderer escaped unsuspected. The crime became a notable "police mystery," and in the attempts to clear it up one of the best police departments in the country almost succeeded in hanging an innocent man in order to vindicate its own earnestness and effectiveness. So little has the theory of detecting crime popularized by Émile Gaboriau and A. Conan Doyle to do with the reality!

At the time the murder was committed, electric lights were still a novelty, and as a rule the newspaper reports opened something like this:

> "Under the full glare of the electric light which shines from the front and sides of the Laclede Hotel, a murder was committed last night which promises to be one of the most mysterious ever committed in the city. The victim was William E. Louderman, son of John J. Louderman, one of the wealthiest men of the city, now spending the summer with his family at Brighton Beach."

The wealth of the family, the peculiarities of the murdered man, the ease with which the murderer escaped without leaving a trace, and the fact that there was a general desire at that particular time to hold the police department responsible for anything and everything, gave "the Louderman murder" precedence in St. Louis over all other topics, local, national or international; and day after day the electric lights of the Laclede Hotel "glared" in the St. Louis newspapers in a way which caused keen anguish at police headquarters—anguish which was undoubtedly accentuated and not successfully concealed by the general attempt to appear at once unconcerned and well-informed. Human nature at best has its deplorable weaknesses, from which even police reporters for the leading dailies are not wholly exempt, and in the great crises of the department there is an element of diabolism in the mild persistence with which newspaper men apply for news to the Captain, the Chief or other great man who has none to give, though he feels his reputation, and perhaps his place, may depend on satisfying the public.

Like a sensible woman, she at once consulted Mr. Serviere as to her duty in the premises

DRAWN BY ELIZABETH SHIPMAN GREEN

HOW THE POLICE KEPT UP APPEARANCES

A Chief of Police who has been thus disciplined in adversity, after having towered in his pride of place during prosperity, knows as nearly as any modern man can know how Saul felt on waking and finding the skirt of his robe cut off. This may seem irrelevant, but it was really the most important part of the connection in which Charles Wolf, truthful, dazed and finally desperate, found himself virtually convicted of murdering a friend with whom he had no shadow of a quarrel.

Wolf was an ex-policeman, and the friendship between him and the heir of the wealthy Louderman family was a result of young Louderman's belief in his own genius as a detective. Having a considerable allowance from his family and no compelling attachment to business of any kind, he became possessed by the idea that he had in him the making of a detective as great as Vidocq. Having one suite of rooms at the Southern Hotel and another on Spruce Street in the slums of the city, he cultivated the police, frequented detective headquarters, and studied the criminal life of the slums with a persistence which would have yielded admirable results if applied to a worthier object.

The police and detectives grew fond of him and often took him with them when visiting the resorts of criminals, that he might indulge what they looked upon as his harmless fancy. He was a representative of the class to which Mr. Toots in David Copperfield belonged in the days when he was sowing his wild oats, and his friends of the police department felt much the same regard for him which Mr. Toots never failed to inspire among his acquaintances.

On the evening of August 9, 1881, the young man and ex-policeman Wolf, one of his tutors in the great art of logical detecting, had gone to make a study of life in a Sixth Street wine-room, then known as the Canterbury Theatre. Returning from it at 10:45 o'clock, they reached the corner of Sixth and Chestnut Streets, on which was situated the Laclede Hotel, one of the principal hotels of the city. Here a shot was fired and Louderman fell, dying. The bullet had severed the carotid artery and death was almost instantaneous.

The police were on the ground at once. Wolf's mind was in a state of great confusion, and he admitted having his hand on the murdered man's shoulder when the shot was fired. He was accordingly arrested and, during the progress of the subsequent police investigation, held as either the principal in the murder or an accomplice.

THE THEORY OF THE OPPOSITION

John C. Chapman, ex-Chief of the St. Louis detective force, who had recently been removed, went into strong opposition to the official theory.

"I was standing in the door of Number 10 North Sixth Street, not far away, when I heard a shot," he said. "The explosion was not louder than that of a fire-cracker, and the revolver must have been a 22-100 calibre. When I reached the corner I saw a man running as hard as he could to the north side of the street. Poor Louderman was lying twelve or fourteen feet west of Sixth Street. There were three hundred and fifty people there in less than twenty seconds, and a perfect swarm of policemen. I never saw officers get to a shooting so quickly. It looked as if they rose out of the ground. When I came to where the body was lying, I found ex-police officer Wolf bending over it. Now this is my theory of how it occurred. Louderman, though as good-hearted a young fellow as ever lived, was a crank on the detective business. He had left his rooms last night and, going along Sixth Street to some low resort, had 'detected' some rough or criminal and followed him to Sixth and Chestnut, where, as a result, the shooting occurred."

This is a condensation of a long and carefully worked out theory—so nearly correct in its general idea that it could hardly have been improved, and yet, through its very artistic and logical completeness, so misleading that even if the regular detectives had adopted it, it would have given them nothing but the artistic satisfaction of being logically in accord with all the known facts. Of course they could not adopt it officially. It represented the opposition, and its success would have been accepted as equivalent to a demonstration of the incompetency of the administration.

Poor Wolf was accordingly taken before the Coroner under guard. Judgment day had come for him. Ex-policemen are not necessarily angels, and subjected to the intelligent suspicion of several hundred policemen and detectives, working to vindicate themselves by convicting him, he himself must have wondered why he had not been hanged long ago. His only defense was that though he had his hand on Louderman's shoulder when the shot was fired, he did not know who did it and could not identify the murderer. This in itself was regarded as the gravest evidence of guilt and he was locked up, while from day to day the persistent and finally menacing newspapers were supplied with fresh proof that he must have committed the crime.

A NEWS TRUST IN MINIATURE

There was at this time among the Criminal Court reporters at "the Four Courts" in St. Louis a combination consisting of Mr. Gaston Serviere, afterward city editor of the Westliche Post; Mr. John Mueller, of the Daily Amerika, afterward editor of the Shoe and Leather Gazette; and a third newsgatherer, the representative of the Daily Republican (now the Republic). The two German reporters were accustomed

---

Editor's Note—This is the first in a series of articles on Famous Feats in American Journalism, told by the reporters and correspondents who did the work. The next article will be by C. E. Harrington, who will tell how he went to London at a moment's notice to secure for his paper a copy of the carefully guarded Revised Version of the New Testament and first gave it to the world.

Digitized by Google

to bring their "tips" to their English associate who had a much greater amount of what is technically known as "leg-talent" than either of them. While one of them watched the police headquarters and the other the criminal courts, the Republican reporter went out into the city to "work up the tips"—that is, to get facts for a connected and reliable history of events of the day concerning which his associates had heard reports more or less vague.

On his return he divided with them loyally, as professionally he had a right to do, since their papers, printed in German, did not compete with his own. The result of this combination was a dreadful sacrifice of the efficient young men on other English dailies who looked down on "the Dutch" and knew nothing of the beauties of cooperation. They were "scooped" out of their situations week after week until, finally, the climax of the system came in the "Solution of the Louderman Murder Mystery."

WHAT DOCTOR DOYLE MIGHT HAVE LEARNED

If Doctor Doyle had ever reported the criminal courts of a great city he would have learned that at least in nine hundred and ninety cases out of a given thousand the mysteries of crime are solved not through the logical processes of detectives, prosecuting attorneys, grand juries—or even of the "detective press," if such a thing ever existed—but through the workings of the self-consciousness of the criminal. The most astute criminal, the greatest diplomat, the most admired statesman cannot successfully resist the moral forces of human nature, in himself and in all organized society, ceaselessly working to force him at last to disclose his realities, whatever they are.

After losing sleep for two weeks under the operations of this law, an accomplice after the fact in the Louderman murder, a young man hardly over eighteen, told his mother—a very worthy woman who took a highly respectable class of lodgers, one of whom was Mr. Gaston Serviere, able journalist and member of the combination above-mentioned. Like a sensible woman, she at once consulted Mr. Serviere as to her duty in the premises, and, like an able journalist, he advised her to postpone action and say nothing until he could take advice on it himself. He called in the Republican reporter at once and a council of war was held—from which Mr. Mueller was excluded on the ground that it was "too big an item"—a conclusion which, as it fully justified Mr. Mueller in withdrawing from the combination subsequently, suggests the necessary human limitations of what otherwise might be the unlimited benefits of efficient cooperation.

THE FIRST VAGUE HINT OF THE TRUTH

The story told by Mr. Serviere's landlady was vague in the extreme. It lacked detail, the names given were unreliable, and it left much unexplained, but it was evidently in the line of the facts, and a brief and comparatively commonplace investigation showed what the facts were. Louderman and Wolf on the evening of the murder had visited the Canterbury Theatre, and while there Louderman had spoken authoritatively, if not harshly, to a number of young men who were making an unnecessary noise. The oldest of them was under twenty-one, and though they were not necessarily very wicked, they belonged to the "tough element," which makes it a point of honor to resent what it construes as an insult.

After having complained to the proprietor of the theatre of the noise, Louderman left, accompanied by Wolf and followed by the young men—"Patsy" Early and four others—who expected to see Early "get satisfaction." On the corner of Sixth and Chestnut Streets, perhaps an eighth of a mile from the theatre, two of them pressed in front of Louderman, and Early demanded an explanation.

Louderman attempted to push by them, and either shoved or struck one of them. Early immediately fired one shot from a small revolver and then ran without waiting to see the result. The murder had been committed, and the principal in it had disappeared in less time than it takes to tell it. One of the young men, however, who had been threatened with death if he told, remained and helped to carry the body of the murdered man into the neighboring drug store. He was never suspected, but it was through his confession that the facts finally came out.

It is a remarkable part of the case that this story had been communicated to the police immediately after the commission of the crime, but its simplicity led to its rejection. After investigation had convinced the two newspaper men of its reliability, they had to face the only real problem—that of keeping the other newspapers from getting the sensation. It is easily possible to hear the most sensational news, but to prevent other newspapers from hearing it also—that, during the latter half of the nineteenth century in American journalism, has called for intelligent selfishness of the highest order.

In this case, the problem was solved by a resort to the simplicities. The two newspaper men knew well that they could not go to their offices without taking an air of mystery with them which would soon pervade the entire building.

They resolved accordingly to disappear, without leave, taking all necessary and unnecessary risks, leaving their own papers and all the rest to go on hanging Mr. Wolf, to satisfy the public's sense of justice, until such time as the manuscript of a complete report of the murder, fully substantiated, could be handed in, between midnight and two o'clock on the morning before the report was to appear. This program was carefully carried out. At about one o'clock on Monday morning, August 15, 1881, the Republican reporter returned to his office and, without waiting to be asked to explain, placed on the city editor's desk in the neighborhood of half a ream of paper, with the facts of the murder "padded" to the last extremity, and arranged for double leads, "scare heads," and all the other paraphernalia of a "sensation."

Mr. Frank R. O'Niel, then city editor and afterward editor-in-chief of the paper, made a notable but only partly successful attempt to appear perfectly self-possessed as he read the first page of the manuscript. Failing, he abandoned the attempt and took the manuscript to Mr. William Hyde, the editor-in-chief.

Mr. Hyde promptly ordered the doors of the office locked, with orders that no one should leave the building until the paper had gone to press. The report asserted in positive terms that men until then unsuspected of crime were guilty of murder. It gave their names and residences, and made the charge so specific in every case that a mistake would have rendered the paper liable for crippling damages, certain to be collected. On the other hand, to leave out such an item or to hold it over with the certainty that it would cease to be exclusive was almost too painful to be thought of.

THE VISIT TO THE CHIEF OF POLICE

The event depended on the young man who had brought in the sensation, and when he was called into final consultation he professed himself prepared to resign in either of two contingencies—first, if the report were found unreliable; second, if it did not appear in the next morning's paper with as many double leads as could conveniently be crowded into it.

Nothing more was said. The editor-in-chief wrote on the margin of the first page of the copy, "O. K.—W. H.," and the city editor wrote the headlines. It went to the composing-room after the names and addresses of the murderer and his accomplices had been written on a slip of paper.

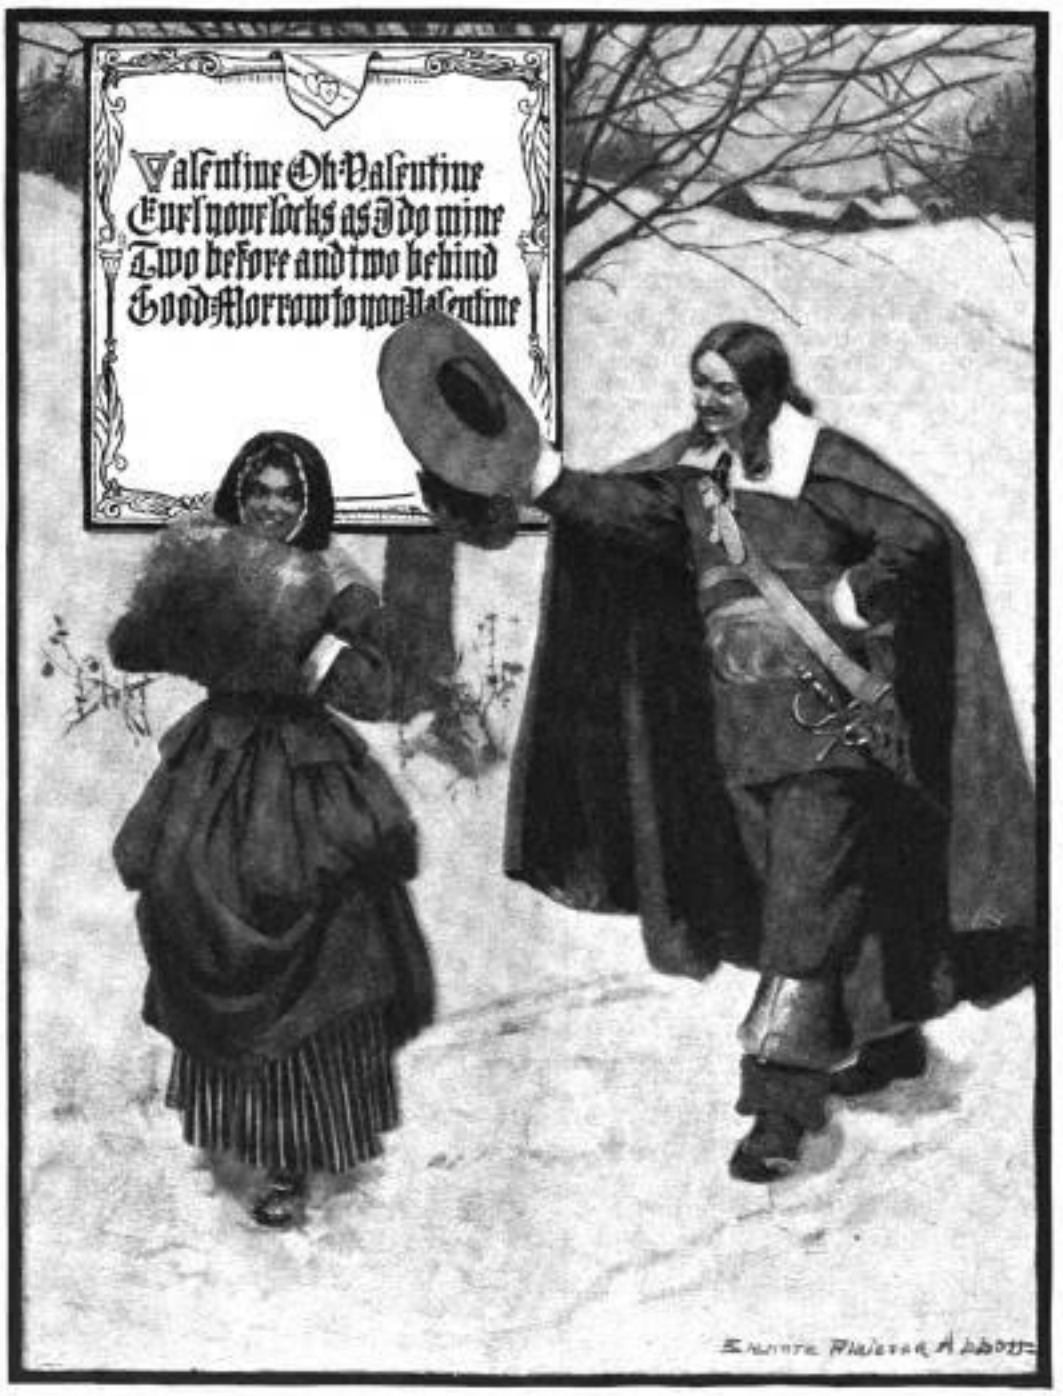
As soon as it was reasonably certain that the first edition of the paper with the report in it would get on the street without the other papers suspecting it, Mr. O'Niel and the Four Courts reporter drove to the house of Captain Anton Heubler, then acting chief of police, who, when they had made noise enough to arouse him, came to the front door in his nightshirt.

"Chief," said Mr. O'Niel with marked calmness, "here is a list of the names and addresses of the Louderman murderers, and as the paper which contains a full account of the murder will not be on the street for an hour, you will have a chance to arrest them, if you like."

It is hard to tell exactly what great men say on great occasions, but it is reported that Captain Heubler said simply, "Wait until I get my coat."

When a moment later he came down the stairs with the list of names in his hand he said quietly, but in a tone of intense disgust:

"I had these names days ago in an anonymous letter which I threw into the fire."



QUICK ARRESTS AND PROMPT CONFESSIONS

In the next hour the St. Louis police did work which in rapidity and thoroughness has never been equaled perhaps in the history of the country. The acting chief telephoned the central station to summon the sergeants for the district, and the whole business portion of the city sounded with the emergency signal. When Captain Heubler drove at full speed to the central station he found all the force he needed to work with, and he soon had the houses of Early and his accomplices surrounded front and rear by details of policemen. With each squad of police went a reporter for the Republican, and as soon as an arrest was made the prisoner was "interviewed" for the second edition of the paper.

Oppressed by the consciousness of guilt, and frightened out of their small senses by being dragged from bed at four A. M., the poor fellows confessed everything connected with the crime except their own responsibility for it. Before daylight all were arrested, and the city edition of the Republican contained a complete authentication of it in the confession of three of the parties to the crime.

In the gray of the morning a group of suspicious characters intercepted a Globe-Democrat carrier and persuaded him to give up one of the first copies of the paper. The headline over the murder mystery read: "The Louderman Murder; Unsuccessful Attempts of the Police to Find a Clew; Wolf the Only Man Who Knows the Murderer."

"We'll go home now," said the city editor, and they went accordingly. Next day the business office of the Republican sent the local rooms a hundred dollars with its compliments, and Colonel George Knapp, President of the Republican Company, told the Four Courts reporter that he was in the line of promotion to succeed Mr. Hyde as editor-in-chief.

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN
Close-Range Studies

PHOTO BY BOWNESS & CO., QUEBEC

SIR WILFRED LAURIER

In College with Senator Frye

My old friend and classmate, Senator Frye, has always been climbing to higher and higher positions. Once, some years ago, when I met him at the Hamilton, where he always lives when in Washington, he said to me jocosely that he was in a dilemma, being uncertain whether to accept a Senatorship or a higher position. He did not tell me what he regarded as a higher position than that of United States Senator—it may have been the office of Secretary of State; but his choice fell to the Senatorship. Now he touches, I think, the acme of his ambition, if in these days he really has any ambition—to occupy the chair of the Vice-President of the United States. Probably no better presiding officer of the Senate could be found.

The first time I saw Frye was in our Livy classroom at the beginning of our first term in Bowdoin College. I was not quite sixteen and he was about the same age. He appeared to me self-reliant and jolly. He hadn't yet come to his full size, but he was a very presentable youth. He had a perfectly shaped head and a fine forehead. His hair was darkish brown with light shades, and his eyes were just as they are now, large and noticeably blue—eyes that brighten immensely under excitement. As a Freshman, he roomed in Massachusetts Hall (North End) with Webster Pickard, a Junior. This chumming with a Junior cut him off considerably from his more humble classmates of the North College, where P. S. Perley and I enjoyed the fun and teasing of the Sophomores. I doubt if Frye ever had his proper share of the old discipline of hazing, though I saw him at football, once, considerably animated and indignant when Sophs mistook Freshmen's shins for the ball. He and I used to meet out of study hours at the gymnasium in the edge of the Pine Wood and practice jumping with the swing-rope for developing our muscles.

The remarkable thing about Frye at that time was his voice. It had a clear ring and demanded—commanded—attention. His memory was seldom at fault, and his recitation was excellent when he had previously studied. Boys of our age did not always have good lessons, because there were sometimes distractions that were dominating, and poor work was not always our fault. Think of that old-fashioned "hold-in" by the Sophomores at the chapel door, and of those "smoke-outs" in one's room! If one had studied, such disturbances always for a time acted unfavorably on the nerves and naturally troubled the reciting. There were suppers, society meetings, games and novels, which, indulged in over night, would at times occasion a poor rendering of language before Professor Packard in the early morning; or a noonday nap would bring on difficulty with Professor Smyth at his blackboard in the afternoon.

But Frye was better defended than I by having a Junior roommate and a conservative example, so that his recitations were generally good. It was my fortune, or rather the want of one, to teach school winters, and during my course of four years to stay out of college one whole fall term. But Frye came from Lewiston, where the falls of the Androscoggin by a storage of power enabled the people to have large factories; he himself belonged to the family of a manufacturer of ample means, so that he was not obliged to teach winter school, or do double work in term time. He retained his youth and elasticity all through the course, was very fond of his secret society, the Psi. U., and had many boon companions. Really, I do not know what would have become of him if he had not struck two important epochs after his graduation. One was the meeting with a charming and accomplished young lady, whom he married; after which, life to my classmate naturally became more serious.

The other important event was his public confession of the Great Master; there resulted what we in New England used to call a "change of mind."

In 1881, while I was commanding the Department of West Point, Frye called me to the unveiling of the Soldiers' Monument at Auburn, Maine. When I arrived, Frye was on hand to meet me. A vast multitude had gathered about the covered monument and the nicely constructed platform; among them were families from far and near, his friends and mine. Frye presided and, after an invocation by the Chaplain and a patriotic piece by the Auburn band, made the introductory address. In the evening we had a Soldiers' Rally and Campfire with speeches. His addresses on both occasions so impressed me that I shall never forget either the substance of them or the manner of their delivery. His evening address was a fine summary of the events of the great war and a tribute to the veterans who had participated in it. His voice was so strong and resonant that the large crowd became silent at his first utterance, and he held their attention fixed to the close. I had heard that he could bring the noisy House of Representatives to silence and stop the talk of the lobby during his first three minutes on the floor.

As a lawyer, as an officer on the Governor's staff in war-time, as a public speaker of pronounced and peculiar eloquence, as a member of the House of Representatives faithful to his constituents, and finally as a United States Senator, William Pierce Frye has always played a distinguished part. Every subject he touches he masters, and for every opinion he entertains he can give a wholesome reason. Admiral Dewey, at Manila, gave us the entrance to an Empire in the Orient; Frye and his colleagues at Paris formulated and carried through treaty stipulations which secured it.

—OLIVER OTIS HOWARD,
Major-General United States Army (Retired).

The Secret of Sir Wilfred Laurier's Popularity

Sir Wilfred Laurier, the Canadian Premier, is one of the most approachable of men, and in his days of prosperity does not forget his humble friends and associates of earlier days. A gentleman who presented letters of introduction to Sir Wilfred, while he was in Quebec last summer, relates an incident that displays this side of the Premier's character.

The business of the call having been transacted, Laurier asked:

"How would you like to take a trip about the old town?"

His visitor responded that he would enjoy it very much, and the start was made. Objects of interest were pointed out from the carriage, but not until the quarters of the old habitants were reached did Laurier display much enthusiasm. Once among the old French people his eyes lighted up, and soon a torrent of the patois was pouring forth.

"Ah, Uncle Basil," to an old man standing in the doorway, "it is some time since we met. How is that rheumatism? Still troubling you? And petite Anne, where is she? What, married! But no, that is not possible. Her child, that little one on the doorstep? Eh bien! How time does fly!" And Laurier left the carriage, took the little one in his arms, kissed it, and then, leaving some silver with Uncle Basil, he resumed his seat in the carriage, and was slowly driven down the street.

"These are my children," he said. "I love them dearly."

Wasted Instruction

The University of Chicago, like its great rivals in the East, has a department of Provençal and the other Romance languages, which was lately filled by the appointment of Professor F. M. Warren, formerly of Adelbert College. A day or so after his appointment a good old lady friend said:

"I was very much surprised to hear that Doctor Warren had left professing to become a romancer and to teach boys and girls how to romance. They know enough of it already without any teaching."

PHOTO BY GILBERT & BACON, PHILADELPHIA

MAY IRWIN

May Irwin Off the Stage

Jolly May Irwin has serious moments when she plans out the future of her two big sons, Walter and Harry, or, with a foresight remarkable in a woman, looks out for the days to come by shrewd investments of the money earned in "coon" songs, or unctuous spontaneity which may be at strong variance with her true feelings when the curtain is rung down. Of all the women of the stage she is the most serious.

Persons who have an idea that the actress lives in an atmosphere of diamond showers and late suppers would gasp in astonishment to see this popular favorite engrossed in the composition of a pudding or worried over the vagaries of a crochet pattern. Sarah, the colored maid, who has for fourteen years ruled the Irwin kitchen, quite delights in these lessons, and she is always ready to testify that her mistress would make a far better cook than actress.

On Irwin Island Miss Irwin is queen. Here she revels in a library of rare books. Here she chums with her sons and the many friends who enjoy her freehanded hospitality. Here she goes bareheaded and light-hearted from June to September, putting the artificial life behind her.

Tom Donahu and the Wild Elephants

There is a man in New York who could give Ernest Seton Thompson points on wild animals he has known. He is Tom Donahu, and for more than thirty years he has been night watchman in the Central Park Zoo. Before that he was in the United States Navy. That is where his courage was first put to the test, during the Civil War, but it has had plenty of chance for exercise since. The night watchman's arms are a lantern, a stout stick and a shotgun, which he does not carry with him. His attendants are two bull-terriers who will fight anything from runaway elephants to rats.

Once Camp and Barnum left seventeen wild elephants in Central Park all summer. They were apparently playful, amusing beasts, well-behaved and amiable, but in reality they were, as a rule, so disobedient that they could not be trusted with the shows on the road. Most of them were man-killers. They were kept in a paddock now converted into the hippopotami preserve. Each pachyderm was chained to a peg driven into the earth, and during the day they were watched by Snyder, now head keeper of the Zoo, and "Frenchy," an itinerant elephant man, whose present residence is unknown. At night, Donahu, with his stick and his dogs, was in sole command.

One night old Samson, a sullen, surly brute, scarred with white-hot irons, dented with blows from crowbars, an unsubduable beast who had killed half a score of keepers, broke loose and started browsing around the paddock, jostling other elephants and stirring up revolt. His trumpeting, and the shrill cries of the smaller beasts he had excited, soon brought Donahu to the scene. A newspaper reporter was with him, luckily, and to him the watchman handed his lantern. Then vaulting the paddock fence, he leaped in among the now thoroughly aroused elephants. In an instant he was in front of Samson and was beating his trunk.

Before the brute realized what was being done he was driven back to his place and the chain around his hind leg was fastened securely to the peg. Then the watchman gave him a few more lusty blows on his tender trunk, which finally elicited a cry of submission, and he darted through the maze and was back on the pavement.

"Risky thing to do, Tom," observed the reporter when the herd had quieted down.

"Indeed it was," honestly commented the watchman. "Do you know I've got my Sunday clothes on? I wonder who'd have paid for them if that old beast had ripped them."

Digitized by Google

OF THE HOUR
of Contemporaries

How Admiral Selfridge Lost His Ship

There is an officer in the American Navy who has the distinction of having lost his ship and escaped both court of inquiry and court martial. He was never reprimanded, nor, officially, was he notified by the Navy Department that as commander of a warship he was responsible for its loss and must explain. This officer is Rear-Admiral Selfridge the second, recently retired from the service, whose father is the senior ranking Rear-Admiral on the retired list, with another son now a Commander in the Navy.

It was back in the early seventies that Admiral Selfridge, then a Lieutenant-Commander in charge of the sloop-of-war Saganaw, cruising in the Pacific, was ordered by the Department to proceed to an almost unexplored part of the ocean and there to look for an island little known on the charts. The precise location was not definitely known, and Lieutenant Selfridge was told to hunt up the island, make a survey of it, and plot on charts the currents and rocks near shore.

It was a long trip, but Lieutenant Selfridge carried out the essential part of his instructions; he found the unknown land. Unfortunately, he underestimated its length, and, during a dark night, the old Saganaw piled up on the rocks and broke her back. Two hundred men were cast ashore on an island where there was no fresh water and little to eat. Lieutenant Selfridge was a strict disciplinarian, and maintained the same severe observance of the regulations that would be expected of a ship's company on shore. He held two courts-martial, sentenced men to hard work, and all the time kept the crew busy catching fish and securing what food was obtainable. He knew the nearest civilized country was Hawaii, many miles away, and being out of the line of commerce, it was necessary that this land must be reached to secure relief. A whaleboat was patched up and dispatched on the long trip, only to meet disaster in the surf as she entered the harbor of Hawaii. There is a tablet now at the Naval Academy commemorating the heroic conduct of the young officer who lost his life. Of the crew of four, but one man reached the shore.

Lieutenant Selfridge's party after many months was rescued, and when he reached Washington he was congratulated by the Secretary of the Navy for his strict attention to duty while on shore and the care he had taken of his men. Never a word was said about the loss of the Saganaw, and to-day Admiral Selfridge stands alone as the only officer perhaps in any navy who has lost his ship without being held to account for it. In the British service the Captain who loses his vessel never gets another command.

PHOTO BY NORMAN PHOTO CO., BOSTON

RT. REV. WILLIAM LAWRENCE

The Dead Man Who Was Much Alive

Nicholas D. Bragaw, now a staid commercial man in New York, was a citizen many years of Colorado and other mining regions. His brother Robert was heavily interested in mines, and was Postmaster and Mayor of Ouray. One winter, what with busy times in the camp and such unexpected accidents as premature blasts and lynching bees, there was a dearth of men, and to help his brother in the post-office Mr. Bragaw took charge of the railway postal service for the Government in that district.

"It was not an unpleasant life after you once got used to it," he said recently in describing it. "The grandeur of the scenery, the bracing air of the mountains and forest, the ice-cold water of the streams, and the good nature of the people more than offset the accidental bullet and the occasional bowie knife. One day, in 1882, we started from Leadville out at the top of a long incline which followed the meanderings of the California Gulch. We were fifteen minutes late on account of a blizzard and wanted to make up lost time. The day was a very dark one in January; my lamps were burning and my little stove blazing fiercely. I noticed the train was going very fast, but supposed we were making up lost time. As the velocity increased I suddenly realized that the train had run away. Nothing was to be done. If we were going to smash no power could prevent it, and if we were not my mail-bags would have to be ready for delivery. I worked hard it seemed for hours. As a matter of fact, however, it was only a few minutes. Then the front of the car, the ash-pan and the mail-bags seemed to rush at me and I became unconscious. When I came to I found myself thumping the floor with my head and struggling with imaginary foes. I then recalled where I was, and slowly and painfully extricated myself from the mountain of letters, papers and mail-bags which had providentially served as safety buffers for my body.

"We had run into a train ahead of us, and the mail car had been crushed at both ends while the middle had been left intact. We were not far from a telegraph station, and in a few minutes the news had been carried in every direction. Now here comes the queer part: a locomotive and a wrecking car were not far away and were sent promptly to our relief; the track was cleared, the mails were transferred, and I had the pleasure that evening of alighting at my destination on time with all of my mail. I was received with a wild welcome by the population of the place, who had come prepared to receive the dead."

President Eliot's Left-Handed Compliment

Bishop Lawrence, of Massachusetts, the successor of the lamented Phillips Brooks, tells this little joke upon himself with keen relish.

It was at the time when there was a vacancy in the bishopric, and Doctor Brooks was the most prominent candidate. Mr. Lawrence, then Dean of the Theological School in Cambridge, was walking with President Eliot, of Harvard University, and the two were discussing the situation.

"Don't you hope Brooks will be elected?" asked the Dean.

"No," said Doctor Eliot; "a second or third rate man would do just as well; and we need Brooks in Boston and Cambridge."

Phillips Brooks was elected, and a little later Doctor Eliot and Mr. Lawrence again discussed the matter.

"Aren't you glad Brooks was elected?" queried the Dean.

"Yes, I suppose so," said Doctor Eliot, "if he wanted it; but to tell the truth, Lawrence, you were my man."

Why He Did Not Coöperate

To Mrs. Imogene C. Fales, of Bensonhurst, New York, belongs much of the credit of establishing the coöperative movement in the United States. She had been impressed with the success of the system in Great Britain while traveling there in the seventies, and on her return began an active campaign to establish it in this country. Possessing great wealth and marked literary and forensic ability, she gradually built up a large organization. Among those who aided her in the beginning of the work were Rev. Dr. Heber Newton, Rev. Dr. de Costa, the Honorable Charles Codman, of Boston, and Professor Bjerregaard. The brunt of the work, however, was sustained by Mrs. Fales, who spoke in more than two hundred cities, wrote and distributed leaflets, circulars and books, and published the Sociologic News.

Once there was a call from a man whose hair and beard ran riotously about his face. He asked anxiously: "Is this scheme a new religion?" "Oh, no," said Mrs. Fales. "Is it a new politics?" "Not in the least." "Is it against the Government?" "Not at all," answered Mrs. Fales. "Then I don't want nothing to do with it."

Señor Pacheco's Malay Creeses

The beautiful weapons which have been sent home as trophies from the Philippines have brought into prominence the artistic skill of the Malays in this kind of metal work. The finest specimen exhibited thus far is a bolo presented recently to Adjutant-General Corbin by Brigadier-General Schwan, now with General Otis in Luzon.

Señor A. Antonio Pacheco, the ex-Administrator of Macao, who is a visitor to the United States, has the most famous collection of these Malay arms in the far East.

"The bolo," he says, "is a straight, flat-bladed weapon, used for both cutting and thrusting. It is widest at a point about one-third from the hilt, and tapers in a graceful curve to the point and in converging lines toward the handle. In size it varies from that of a dirk knife to that of a short sword. The creese, on the other hand, has a waved or serpentine edge and a channeled surface. These channels at one time were poisoned. Few of the Malays poison their blades to-day, the practice being confined to three or four small tribes in the interior of Borneo and Mindanao. The creese ranges from a small dagger scarce four inches long to a sword three feet long. It is used almost exclusively for thrusting. Both creese and bolo have a handle shaped like a pistol grip, but the extreme end is carved into graceful finials that suggest the prow of a Venetian gondola. The prices depend upon the steel, the workmanship and the silver and gold ornaments upon the handle, and range all the way from ten cents up to forty and fifty dollars."

PHOTO BY C. M. BELL, WASHINGTON

WILLIAM P. FRYE

PHOTO BY GEMPERLE & VAN BRUNT, NEW YORK

MRS. ISOBEL STRONG

Mrs. Strong's Story of Samoa

Mrs. Isobel Strong, for years the faithful amanuensis of Robert Louis Stevenson, possesses a unique vocabulary which may be likened to a mosaic of picture words. Once when questioned about this she said:

"I suppose if I have anything peculiar in my speech it is because I am easily influenced by travel and association. I sometimes think I have been verbally infected by every land I have visited." And, of course, she has been all over the world.

Mrs. Strong has written of her travels very entertainingly and her fame as an author is a growing one. It is when she talks of Samoa that she is most interesting to those who have the good fortune to hear her descriptions and reminiscences of the far-away island and its people.

"I shall never forget one incident," said she, "which is a lesson in patriotism. My mother and myself welcomed all the men-of-war that came into Samoan waters, and gave little social affairs in honor of the visitors, which we thoroughly enjoyed.

"There were ships from Germany, France, England, and I don't know how many countries, and, oh! how we longed for ships from our own beloved United States.

"One day they came, and their coming will not soon be forgotten. Certainly we are not likely to forget it. The first thing they did was to shell our city and send their shots right through our house."

Misunderstood Patriotism

Professor Alfred B. Adams, of New York, was a soldier in the Civil War, and took part in the Red River campaign under Major-General Nathaniel T. Banks.

"At one place," he said recently to one of his classes, "we surprised a Southern garrison and took many prisoners. They were guarding a mountain of cotton bales which were intended for shipment to Europe on account of the Southern Government. General Banks promptly confiscated the cotton and transferred it to his flotilla. Each bale was stenciled C. S. A., and over this the Northern soldiers with marking brushes wrote in huge characters U. S. A. I was on guard at the time, and one of my prisoners, a handsome, bright-eyed young Southern officer, said: 'Yank, what's that writing there?'

"I looked proudly at him as I replied, 'The United States of America over the Confederate States of America. Can't you read U. S. A. over C. S. A.?'

"He looked at me quizzically. 'Thank you,' he said. 'Do you know, I thought it was United States of America Cotton Stealing Association.'

"The next question he put to me I didn't answer."

Digitized by Google

The Fitting of the Peats

By S. R. Crockett

Author of The Secret Ministry, The Raiders, The Lilac Sunbonnet, The Grey Man, The Red Axe, etc., etc.

Copyright, 1910, by S. R. Crockett. Copyright in Great Britain

Part II—Fifth Chapter

THE trio arrived at the little loaning shaded with irregular alders and birches which led between the two "parks" pertaining to the house of Millwharchar. The two first acquainted were maintaining a brisk conversation on the merits of various wild flowers, Bell preferring the wild white rose and Adam Home holding out for the modest gowan, while a step behind them, Hector Faa, with his hand in the flap of his right pistol-pocket, listened with a smile as incredulous as it was contemptuous.

Suddenly a turn of the loaning brought them face to face with a startling apparition.

"Halt there where ye stand, or prepare forthwith to meet your Maker!" exclaimed a voice stern as the law and all the prophets.

The young people looked up from their pleasant converse of word with word and glance with glance. Close to them, and elevated a little on the broad stone step of the farm-house, stood a striking and almost tremendous figure. Coat of blue, ancient steeple-crowned Puritan hat towering above, steel breastplate winking beneath, buff knee-breeches covering limbs sturdy as an average man's body, shoon buckled with huge clasps of hammered iron—thus before them, instant and minatory, stood Ninian MacLurg. His long-stocked, brown "Queen Anne" musket was leveled directly at Adam Home, a second piece stood contiguous to his hand, and the bare blade of an Andrea Ferrara glittered against the wall of rough harled masonry whereon it leaned hilt upward.

Six foot six in height stood Ninian MacLurg, tough as an ancient oak, keen-eyed as an eagle, irascible and indomitable as in all Scotland only he could be.

"Oh, father," cried Bell, "put down your gun. These gentlemen are in trouble and have come to beg your assistance."

"Out of my gate, lassie," cried her father, glancing down the barrel of his piece; "gentlemen, forsooth! They are rebels, cave-lurkers, sheep-stealers. Make your peace with God, gentlemen. It was an ill day that you thought to cozen Ninian MacLurg with your traitorous speeches."

Then Bell, with terror, threw herself in front of Adam Home, and cried to her father: "Do not shoot; it was my fault. I brought him here. He hath a sick companion who needs your help. You would not refuse it, for your heart is kind. Oh, father, be forbearing with him!"

The eye of Ninian MacLurg never wavered along the leveled tube.

"Take your hand out of your pocket-hole, little ugly gipsy man—one, two, three—out with it! I thank you. Now, long man with the tashed coat, say after me, with your hands held up to Heaven, 'God save King George and confound Jamie the Pretender!' You have till I count thirty to save your life."

Hector Faa's hand, which, obedient to the first invitation, had been reluctantly withdrawn from the vicinity of his pistol, now began to return stealthily. But he reckoned without his host.

"Your hands above your head, little man—so!—as you hope for life, keep them there. Now, sir, to your catechism. Say after me, 'God save King George.'"

Up to this moment Adam Home's fingers had been busy with the gowan which he had pulled to illustrate his argument with Bell. But he turned to that maiden now, as her father began to count slowly, "One—two—three"; in an audible voice he said: "Mistress Bell, you were right; will you give me that rose from your neck in exchange for my gowan? I think, after all, it is the finer and fairer flower. At least, I love the better to wear it."

"Fourteen—fifteen—sixteen," came the steady count.

"Oh, take it," cried Bell; "take it, and say what he tells you; for my sake say it. My father is a man of his word. I will never be saucy again; I will do anything you wish if only this once you will say 'God save King George.'"

"For your sake I would if I could at all, sweetest maid," the young man said, "but the true King is more to me than life—more, even, than love!"

"Twenty-three—twenty-four—twenty-five."

Adam Home instinctively put his petitioner at arm's length from him, and with a quiet and assured mien fitted the white rose to his buttonhole, first reverently kissing the emblem of the Stuart race, which was now also a lady's favor.

He was adjusting it to his satisfaction, and giving a little pat to the lapel of his coat, when the inexorable voice from the doorstep counted on, level and monotonous, "Twenty-eight—twenty-nine——"

"Crash!" went the Queen Anne musket.

The young man, Adam Home, stood for a moment after the report in his ordinary attitude of careless ease. Then, all suddenly, he swayed, clasped his hand on his right side, gripped himself, as it were, and, turning to Bell, with his other hand he raised his hat.

"I fear that I need not trouble you any longer," he said courteously, "but I am infinitely indebted to you—indebted to you—indebted——"

And the hand that had held the hat aloft sinking heavily down, its owner slowly pitched forward, rather than fell, and lay motionless on his face among the straw which cumbered the yard.

DRAWN BY HENRY C. EDMONDS

BELL, OVERWHELMED WITH SHAME AND PITY, WAS LEFT ALONE WITH THE WOUNDED MAN

Sixth Chapter

AT THE first pull of Ninian MacLurg's finger on the trigger Hector Faa had dodged like a weasel behind a red-bodied mountain cart, and now his pistol-barrel glanced over the back bar with the sharp eye of the hill-gipsy twinkling small and bright behind it like the eye of a bird.

The Laird of Millwharchar had not, however, expended his whole magazine at one shot. He seized the gun, which stood against the wall, by the barrel and, cocking it, advanced toward the fugitive entrenched behind the trail-cart.

Hector Faa's teeth gradually uncovered, and he waited till his assailant was within a dozen paces and then fired, the bullet, being well aimed, struck the second musket upon the side of the lock, glancing off, however, and flattening itself against the wall without doing any damage.

"The God of battles hath delivered the wicked into my hands!" cried Ninian MacLurg as he caught the trail-cart suddenly by the pole and turned it over, almost but not quite upon the top of Hector Faa, for that active man of the hills, seeing his position and acknowledging defeat as readily as victory, instantly fled, leaving his discarded pistol on the ground, so anxious was he to avoid underlying the tender mercies of the Laird of Millwharchar. He sped across the courtyard, almost bowed to the ground, and ran with all his power for the heather.

Ninian turned about for his Ferrara blade. He had a score of steps to go back to recover it, which gave the nimble fugitive a considerable start. But in a moment it was in his hand, and, with his great body thrown forward and every nerve strained, the laird took up the chase as eagerly and determinedly as if twenty-six instead of sixty-two had been the number of his years. But Hector Faa had a long start, and strain as he would, Ninian could not overtake him nor reduce by an appreciable inch the distance between them.

Bell, overwhelmed with shame and pity, was left alone with the wounded man. With a great effort of strength she turned him over till his head rested on her shoulder. She was surprised to feel how light and supple he was. She thought that she could almost carry him in her arms.

At this moment her two brothers, Alec and John, came into the courtyard, and stood astonished to find their eldest sister with the head of a wounded man on her shoulder.

"Bell," the two lads cried simultaneously, "what in the world are you doing with the man?"

"Come and help this instant, great gomerels," replied that acrid maiden; "think you that I am playing 'Jook-my-Joe' about the stacks on Hallowe'en?"

Alec and John approached gingerly, looking around for their father as they did so with a glance which told much of the Spartan nature of their up-bringing.

"Who is he, and what are you going to do with him?"

"He is a young lord who came to ask a favor of my father," said Bell, "and he has shotten him. And, oh! if he dies our father will hang. Come; help me with him to the old stable-loft of Larbrax. Will Begbie will hide him there, or I shall know the reason why."

The lads demurred. It was a good half mile to the deserted steading of Larbrax. Their father might return. What would they say to him when he came back and found the wounded man gone?

"Leave all that to me," cried Bell; "say not a word to the other lasses. Take hold of him, I say."

And so, with their imperious sister at the head, Alec in the midst, and John at the feet, they laid Adam Home on a dismounted door which stood at the back of the byre, and prepared to carry him to the stable-loft of Larbrax.

Alec and John soon tired of their burden, and Bell had to threaten and cajole them to turn about to make them keep to their work. At last, to shame them, she took a turn at the foot of the door, relieving John, who sulked along after them. Her arms were almost dragged from their sockets, and there was a tearing stitch in her side which threatened to deprive her of breath altogether.

As she looked at the young man he appeared to wear the selfsame smile with which he had thanked her for the white rose, and her heart prayed that he might not be dead, and the dishonor forever laid upon her father's head that he had shot down an unarmed and unresisting man upon his own doorstep.

Even as she stumbled along, biting her lips with the effort not to cry out and drop the board on which Adam Home lay stretched out, the eyes of the wounded man were slowly opened. Consciousness struggled back into them. Seeing Bell at his feet, he strove to raise himself, but with a determined shake of the head she motioned him to lie still where he was.

Then John, who had been gradually growing ashamed of himself, craved that she should let him back to his place.

Editor's Note—This is the second part of a four-part romance by [illegible] Post of February 3.

Digitized by Google

but Bell, with a new strength in her veins from the knowledge that he was alive, would not surrender her post, and permitted him only to help in Alec's place at the side.

In this wise came the procession into the silent courtyard of the old farm town of Larbrax. Now, the "stable-laft" into which Bell proposed to convey Adam Home was of peculiar construction, and had obviously been built to suit the needs of difficult and dangerous times.

It was, in fact, not upon the top of the stable at all, but over the barn. That store house of fodder and sheaves had been originally built with a double roof, the inner being of less steep slant than the outer, leaving a space of some five feet high all along the length of the barn. This was entered from the real stable-loft by a wall-press of which the back was composed of wood roughly plastered over to imitate stone.

It was with some pain and no small difficulty that Adam Home was carried up the narrow ladder which led to the outer loft. From thence the road was easier, but the wounded man had to endure many a pang before he found himself deposited on a bed of clean straw, with the little green skylight carefully extracted and placed among the thatch in order to let in the air and a glimpse of the blue sky.

Then, at last, sending off the lads, Alec and John, lest her father should have arrived home before them, Bell kneeled beside Adam Home and cut away the waistcoat and fine shirt from the wound, the locality of which was all too easily discoverable by the oozing red which dyed with a fresher scarlet the faded red of his military undercoat.

"This is kind of you," he said; but she could only answer him with her tears as she bent tenderly to bathe the wound.

The bullet, she found, had made a long, tearing cut, glancing along the rib, but not reaching the backbone.

"Will you tell me exactly what it looks like?" said Adam Home. "I am enough of a surgeon to know whether or not it is dangerous."

Bell checked her sobs in order to obey him.

"That is well," he said cheerfully, "yet I fear much I shall be a trouble to you for some time. But where am I at this moment?"

The girl told him that he was at the old and deserted farm steading of Larbrax and in perfect safety—that no one but the owner, Will Begbie, ever came there.

The wounded man took a swift glance at her as she attentively bound up the wound with strips of her kirtle, till she had extemporized as good a dressing as was possible.

Then, leaving the last strip of cloth she could spare wet upon his brow, and promising soon to return, Bell tripped down the ladder and carefully closed the door behind her.

Seventh Chapter

ARRIVED at the outer air, Bell went in search of Will Begbie. She would find him, she was sure, at the New Farmtown, where he resided with an old housekeeper, by name Tibby Lee, and a shepherd or two, whose duties kept them all day on the hill. But upon her arrival there she found silence in the wide spaces of the yard, broken only by the "chunnering" of the hens in their dustbaths under the bank. Silence dominated the house when Bell stood on the steps and called "Will!" Then, when at last she mustered courage to open the door by lifting the iron latch with its new-fangled broad thumb-piece, her call of "Will, I want you!" was answered only by the pushing back of a wooden chair as Yarrow, his half-blind old collie, rose from beneath the kitchen table and came inquiringly to the door.

But Yarrow could not inform Bell where his master was, though he thrust a moist nose of sympathy into her hand, so she had to seek farther. On a bench in the new barn was a tankard from which the ale had been so recently drained that the yellow froth bubbles had not yet had time to reach the bottom. The girl's voice rang through the wide, dusky spaces from threshing-floor to rafters.

"Will! Will! Oh, Will—I want you!" But Will Begbie was not to be seen.

The girl was heartsick and distressed. She thought with a sharp self-reproach mingled with a wild pleasure of how the young man in the tarnished officer's dress had helped her with the peat-fitting. She recounted to herself (after the manner of women) how often their hands had touched each other, and especially she recalled again that quick, backward fling of the head as often as she broke the crust of his formality with her daring pleasantries.

"It is all Will Begbie's fault. He ought to be here when I want him. He is often enough in the way when I don't!"

"Will Begbie is here, Mistress Isobel!" said a tall, fresh-complexioned youth. "In what can I serve you?"

"Indeed, Will Begbie, there is much that you can do," said Bell, dashing into her explanation before she lost courage. "My father shot a rebel, and I have had him carried to the old barn over there. He lies in the secret laft. You do not mind, do you?"

Bell lifted up beseeching eyes, wet with recent tears, to the youth who stood before her. He in his turn set his fingers underneath his bonnet sideways and, tilting it a little, scratched his head with a quaint perplexity.

"A dead man—a murdered man in my barn, and your father did it?" he said, with an appreciable interval.

"Neither a dead man, nor yet, even if he had been dead, a man murdered by my father. He is a rebel officer, and came to ask succor and safe conduct. It was my fault. I brought him. But my father, being an angry, hot man, would not listen to a word, and gave him only half a minute to cry "God save King George." Then when he would not thus be hurried into loyalty my father shot him down."

Will Begbie shifted from one foot to the other uneasily. "Bell," he said doubtfully, "you know not what you ask. It is rank treason to conceal a rebel, and it might go against my neck were it known. Besides, I am a good King George's man, and so was my father before me."

Bell flashed a small key from her pocket, and leaping to her feet and thrusting it under his nose, she cried out indignantly: "Here, take it; there is the key of the secret laft. Go and betray the man that trusted you; betray me that thought better of you than of any of her own folk. But never from this day forth look the road Bell MacLurg is on till the day you die the death of a traitor and a spy!"

"Nay, Bell," he stammered, "I meant nothing of the kind. I was just a little taken aback at the first go off. I will never betray any that trusted me. I will go and see the man now. Will you accompany me?"

"Thank you, Will; I knew you would see reason. You always can be convinced. But, before you go, can you think of any kindly, silent man with the skill of a surgeon? There is none that I can remember but Dominie Duncan Robison over at the clachan. He has the name of great skill. Can you advise me if with his official position we could count on his holding his tongue in the matter of the rebel?"

The slower wits of Will Begbie revolved the problem a while and looked at it from all points. "I think it would do," he said. "They whisper cannily that Duncan, being a Highlandman himself, hath a warm side to the King over the water. I am sure he would deal kindly with the old man."

"I said not that the rebel was an old man, Will," said Bell quickly; "he is not so very old."

"I will go and see him," said the farmer of Larbrax with less exuberance of spirits than he had hitherto shown. And this time he did not invite Bell to accompany him.

They walked together, however, to the old farm town, and then Will Begbie went up alone. When he came down ten minutes after his face was altered. It was sterner and older.

"I will do it, Bell," he said; "but mind, it is for your sake I will help this man to escape out of the country.

"And partly for my own!" he added to himself.

Eighth Chapter

BELL'S father did not return to Millwharchar till late at night, and when he came in none dared ask a question of him as he set himself down by the fire, now gloomily staring at the sullen glow of the peat ashes, and now rubbing briskly at the blade of his Andrea.

Suddenly he flung a question at Bell, and the lads, who sat by the slender illumination of a candle pretending to read, trembled till their chap-books shook like willow leaves in a westerly wind.

"What came of the young rebel that I shot?"

Bell had been expecting the question ever since she had heard her father's step on the threshold, and she had been prepared for it long before that.

"Some ill-looking gangrel lads came down from the hills and carried him off, we knew not where," she answered, looking at Alec and John, daring them to say a word.

"Some of Hector Faa's crew of rascals, I doubt not," grumbled her father. "Hark ye, Mistress Bell; never let me hear of you passing word of mouth with any belonging to that gang, or I will banish you from my fireside, never to return."

Under the skillful leechdom of the dominie, who proved as silent and willing as Will Begbie had foretold, and the bright, occasional visits of Bell to his lonely garret, the wounded man recovered quickly. But Will Begbie never went from home to kirk or market all the time that Adam Home lay in the secret loft above the old barn. And only on one occasion did Bell see her invalid alone. So anxious was Will to preserve him from intrusion and guard him from all excitement that he frequented the old farm town more than he had done in twenty years.

The solitary exception to Will Begbie's unsleeping watchfulness chanced on the afternoon of the day before Adam Home and his friend Glenmorrison were to sail, as castaway foreign sailors of no particular nationality, in a lugger which was putting out from the Ferry Port of Cree. Will had been called away suddenly by a message that one of his horses had fallen into a moss-hole on the march between Larbrax and Millwharchar Moor. The message was brought by John MacLurg, and its genuineness was somewhat suspect, owing to the fact that John was seen to spend one silver crown on a new thistle buckle for his bonnet and another on particolored ribands for the lasses over at the clachan that night, where, as it happened, a traveling chapman was displaying his wares and driving a brisk trade.

At any rate, the horse was definitely and indubitably in the bog, and had to be extricated with ropes. Nevertheless, so strange is chance that before Will was over the hill Bell MacLurg had set John to guard the approaches of the old farm steading and had gone up to say farewell to Adam.

She found him wearing a coat of Will Begbie's, while his own, carefully mended and brushed, hung on a nail behind him. He was pale, but was able to rise, so far as the low rafters would allow him, to greet her entrance.

"You are going to leave us to-morrow," said Bell after the pause that follows most salutations; "how glad you must be!"

"I shall indeed be glad that I am again to see the sky and breathe the unconditioned air," he said, dropping into his old, ornate diction; "but I grieve that I can receive no more such angel visits as this. I can never repay that which you have done for me. But neither will I ever forget. In happier times I shall return. There are even now good friends in high place who urge me to make my peace with the Government. Also I think that they themselves will soon have had enough of the ax to satisfy even Hanoverian tastes."

Bell and Adam Home sat on two stools, looking at each other, awkward as school children left alone when the master is out, and they know not when he will return.

A light, quizzical smile came over Adam's face.

"If I come back next year in time for the peat-fitting will you give me the rest of my lesson?"

Bell was silent, but a deep flush slowly covered her face.

"Here, take it; there is the key of the secret laft!"

"Do not——" she said; "be a little generous. You are a great man. I heard Hector Faa call you 'My lord.' And though after a fashion you explained his words, yet I have not seen you so much without knowing that you belong to a different world from that in which we simple folk of Galloway dwell. Leave us alone to our dull lives. We have done our best to help you to life again, as one Christian should help another. But do not come back. I pray you do not come back!"

There were tears in her eyes now, and Adam Home thought he had never seen them so large and beautiful, deep as the cloudless zenith before the sunrising. He came forward and took both her hands.

There was a whistle.

"Haste ye—haste ye, Bell," cried her brother; "they have shifted the horse beast out of the mire!"

Adam Home stood by the plastered door. He held Bell's hands a moment in his. "I have not the right now," he said, looking down at her lips and blushful face, "but when the roses bloom and the peats are fitted I will come again and ask for what I dare not take."

"Ah, do not——" she began, but could get no further. For, with a courtesy such as she had only dreamed of, he lifted the fingers of the Bonnet Laird's daughter to his lips and respectfully kissed them. Then with a resolute hand he shut the door after her.

Next day at the fair at Cree Bridge, as Bell stood by the little jetty which protruded into the brown tidal water, a tanned foreign sailor with a red knitted cap on his head came limping past.

"Will you buy a purse, pretty lady?" he said in broken English.

Bell knew the voice at once. It was that of Adam Home. But she could not find a word with which to answer him.

"I thank you," he said aloud, as if he had received a price; and, touching his cap, he moved away. She saw him get on board the lugger, which looked so slight and frail a craft in which to cross the wide seas to France, yet had proved herself capable by many a successful voyage to Fécamp and Le Havre.

The tide being full, the rope was immediately cast off, and with a favorable wind the boat moved off.

Bell stood on the quay and watched. The foreign sailor took off his cap and swung it about his head. Bell's hand wavered piteously up in reply, but dropped again in a moment as if ashamed of its own daring. Then, as she turned away, she eagerly opened the purse. It contained nothing but a withered white rose.

"What have you got there in that old purse, Bell?" said Will Begbie cheerily in her ear.

He had rid himself of the rebel officer, and since he knew nothing of John MacLurg's vigil, his heart pulsed light and secure within his bosom.

"Tell me—what have you stowed away so secretly and anxiously in that old purse?" he cried again.

"Nothing but a seed for next year's garden," answered Mistress Isobel MacLurg.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

421 TO 427 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA

February 10, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription

5 Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

The Decline of Conviction

PRESIDENT HADLEY, of Yale, recently threw some incidental light on the decline of oratory in this country. He pointed out the fact that the disappearance of the forum from our legislative halls was coincident with a change in the legislators themselves, from men of earnest convictions, desirous of educating public opinion, to men of practical bent desiring only to subserve in the most direct way the special and local interests which were confided to them. To do this expeditiously they resort to compromise and adjustment. Such a change of legislative action, it must be plain to all of us, sooner or later renders mere eloquence superfluous and narrows the field of operation from the educational to the merely executive. What may now be called "close attention to business" in the Halls of Congress leaves little room or time for those broad views and patriotic sentiments which appeal to the people themselves. Anything like a forensic effort is very apt to be regarded as a diversion or an interruption, and to be called "talk" by the newspapers.

President Hadley distinctly declares that the country has suffered a positive loss in this change, and there is no doubt that he is right, because it is not only the duty of legislators to act, but also to give the people the very best reasons that are in them for their acts, and to bring to the statesmanship of law-making elemental principles in the loftiest utterance. It is to the intellect, the sagacity and the experience of such men that we must look for guidance in all those questions which affect the permanent well-being of the commonwealth. Some of the noblest precedents of our history have passed into literature, no less than into the code, and it is because they have been there preserved with the flash and glow of eloquence that the personal conviction of the Congressman has outlived his time and his work. The once superb challenge of the tribune wears in our day, it must be acknowledged, an apologetic and abbreviated air. And yet we are constantly reminded that it is the men of conviction and not the mere men of assiduity who give a sort of personal impact to opinions and convert ideas into eloquence. Earnestness of belief still holds our attention as if there were some authority in the very enthusiasm of a man, quite aside from his intellectual equipment.

No better example of this can be found than is furnished by the late Mr. Moody, the evangelist. Probably no religious teacher of our times was so oblivious of all the minor distinctions which creed and mere ecclesiasticism have given to the various bodies of Christian workers, and certainly no popular preacher so persistently ignored the rationalism, the estheticism and the higher criticism of the intellectual church of to-day. And yet his simple faith, his unswerving adherence to two or three fundamental principles that were as broad as Christianity itself, and his valiant simple-mindedness and coercive love of mankind not only brought about him in reverent respect the most antagonistic workers, but gave him an efficacy of utterance with the people which it is not too much to say has not been equaled in our generation by any other man.

Eloquence in its final definition is only earnestness, whether it be set in the words of a Peter Cartwright or flash in the elegant diction of a Cardinal Newman. It is the announcement that a man has arrived at certain convictions and that he cannot rest until he has brought all men abreast of them.

—A. C. WHEELER.

The Neglected Inclosure

DEAR READERS: You may be my superiors in a thousand ways; you may be sweeter tempered, possessed of better memories or wider learning or finer spirituality, but we have a common weakness—we always forget to inclose a clipping, or money, or a handkerchief, or whatever it is that we say "I inclose herewith." Don't we? Now, why is this, gentle readers? You have good memories for faces or for figures or for stories; why do you fall down on so simple a thing as inclosing an article when you say you're going to?

Think of how it vexes you when you are the recipient of a letter that says, "I am inclosing herewith a little embroidered handkerchief as a birthday gift. I worked it myself and feel sure that you will like it." Only that and nothing more—no handkerchief. Or else it is, "I am sure that you will enjoy as much as I did the droll story which I have cut out and inclose. Please write me at once what you think of it, as to-morrow I am going to India to be gone seven years and I want to get your opinion before I go." But the clipping is not in the envelope. And you are vexed, because you value your opinion of stories and would like above all things to tell your friend what you thought of his tale.

Or worst form of all is the last: "I am sending you a check for twenty-five dollars in payment for that picture you sent me. Please acknowledge receipt." Of course you never needed a twenty-five-dollar bill as you need that one, but equally, of course, your friend forgot to inclose it. Don't blame him, however, for you would have forgotten it yourself.

The art of inclosing is a lost art. Here and there there may be a man who can inclose when he says he is going to, but he is mighty scarce.

The most exasperating form of neglected inclosure is when your correspondent says, "It is vastly important that you should know about the inclosed at once, so instead of copying it out myself I send you a cutting which I wish returned immediately. I hope it will reach you in time."

There is nothing else in the envelope at first sight, and you open it to its widest extent, feeling all the while as if you had been cut off at the telephone just after some one has said, "Your uncle has died and left——" You are in an agony of curiosity, but you must possess your soul in patience until your friend finds the clipping and sends it in a later mail.

Make up your minds, then, dear readers, while it is yet early in the year, that hereafter you will be inclosers. Put your inclosure in, even if you forget to write the letter. The inclosure is the raison d'être of the matter. Don't leave it out.

I am too old to learn this new trick, but with you there is yet time. Inclose.

—CHARLES BATTELL LOOMIS.

He is a very great and a very distinguished man who can afford in this period of the world's civilization to wear bad clothes.

Diverse Paths to Divers Ends

IT WOULD be hard to find two men or two women who should receive the same education. Education should be adjusted to the one to be educated. For both men and women education should aid in securing a healthy body, in training the mind to think, in nurturing a pure moral nature, and in making a strong will. Education should not train women to become wives and mothers. Education should not train men to become husbands and fathers. Education is broader than either the nuptial or parental relationship. Education should be so broad and so high that one can enter into these domestic and other relations with fitness and with ease. The highest training fits best for the performance of every task.

One can trust a woman to select those studies which will make of her the best woman. She is to get herself ready for her work; God will find her work. Once ready for her work, she is fitted to be the head of a home or of a school or of a hospital, as the home or the school or the hospital may open itself to her service. The college is not a professional school. It is not designed to make lawyers, or doctors, or housekeepers, or candlestick makers. It is not designed to teach anything in particular. It is designed to give the student himself—at his best.

A woman and a man may receive the same education, but they receive it, not on the ground that one is a man and the other a woman, but on the ground that the comprehensive qualities of each demand the same training. Two women may receive different training for the reason that they are unlike. Two men may receive unlike training also on the ground that they are different. There is something larger than sexuality; there is humanity. Humanity is to be educated into the largest character and noblest doing.

—CHARLES F. THWING.

Lots of people grow poor buying bargains.

A Good Thing to Let Alone

THERE are various schemes before Congress to amend the Constitution. Many good people would, if possible, engraft forever their facts and ideas upon this venerable and imperishable instrument of free government. In order to make any amendment there must be a two-thirds vote of Congress, and the vote must be ratified by three-fourths of the State Legislatures. An alternative allows the calling of conventions to do the work, but that is no longer feasible. It is well that our forefathers protected the Constitution so thoroughly; but it is like the other work they did in establishing this Republic. The Constitution was the product of four months of secret and heroic work by the best men of the new nation, presided over by Washington. Many a time results were despaired of, and even Franklin came near giving up hope, but, in the end, the matchless document was adopted. Then it had another trial before the States, and it was with the greatest difficulty that it was finally ratified.

Two years afterward there were added ten amendments, largely the work of James Madison, and intended to guard the rights of the Constitution and prohibit dangerous exercises of authority. Seven years later, in 1798, the eleventh amendment, referring to suits against the Government, was agreed upon. In 1804 came the twelfth amendment, referring to the work of the Presidential Electors. For over sixty years from that date the Constitution remained untouched. Then came the thirteenth amendment, in 1865, confirming the Proclamation of Emancipation. In 1868 followed the fourteenth amendment, making the negroes citizens of the United States, and in 1870 the fifteenth amendment gave these Freedmen the right to vote.

This, in brief, is the history of the grandest plan of government the world has ever known. It is not at all necessary to question for a moment the perfect sincerity and good faith of those who would add to it their ideas and convictions. The very fact that such amendments would last through the centuries makes the effort all the more stimulating to the zealous reformers who want the world to move upon their lines. But after we have investigated all the suggestions and weighed all the propositions, there seems to be nothing to change the fact that, as the Constitution is to-day unequaled and supreme, it would not be wise to endanger it by "improvements." Let us hold it sacred!

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

It costs Uncle Sam nearly two millions of dollars per day to run his Government, but, honestly, it is worth it.

The Humorist and the Philosopher

IN TAKING ourselves and life too seriously we not only miss a lot of fun but defeat the very ends we are apparently seeking. There is no one so blind to the world about him or so little capable of understanding its essential commonplaceness as the man without a sense of humor.

It is a whimsical quality not to be set down in harsh definition and by no means to be spoken of in the same breath as wit. Its possessor is invariably a kindly looker-on at life's comedy and tragedy, and he finds more to smile at than to condemn. The wit laughs. Humor is a sympathetic quality; it helps us to interpret others through a knowledge of ourselves and our various big and little weaknesses and meanderings.

The humorist has time to observe and to listen to his fellow human beings with an open eye and a willing ear. He is the true philosopher, for he deals not with theories and abstractions of the study, but with the facts of the market-place. Life is to him a pageant for his amusement and instruction, not a weary way or a vale of tears to a doubtful finish.

Humor is not shallowness; it is not a belittling of realities. it penetrates the depths, and is never far removed from the fount of tears. The tears it shed, however, are those that afford a gentle stirring of the pleasurable emotions, never those of bitterness and hate.

Humor is genial at all times. It is nearly always shown in combination with far-seeing shrewdness and knowledge of others that makes its manifestations at times embarrassingly surprising to the less gifted. Our pet follies and most admired and persistently cultivated self-deceptions are often illuminated with the flashlight gleam from a friendly humorist, to our chagrin and profit if we are not utterly lost.

We are too apt to get in a rut with the oncoming of the years and the growth of responsibilities, too ready to fix our eyes on a wall-lined, narrow way ahead, and to hurry by the things that make the going easier. That life is real and earnest goes without saying, but the man who is in closest touch with his fellow-men tempers the reality and takes his earnestness without too much insistence. Smoothest going is on ball-bearings that roll along and take their places with just as little noise and friction as possible. The humorist is willing to go his way rejoicing and to let the other fellow set the pace or to trail him as he will.

It is this element of humor that has made David Harum one of the most popular of public characters. He is an embodiment of humor that appeals to all. There is no misunderstanding his shrewd yet kindly personality. He is the man of the world in the rough who sees life as it is and has a lot of fun living his life and watching others live.

It is the "humor of it" that makes Mark Twain's recent comments and criticisms so entertaining, and so free from offense and the common prejudices that are so often found in writing of this kind. Mercutio was a very prince of humorists. Thackeray had the gift. Charles Lamb—Elia of kindly memory—is read for this quality, and its richness in the books of that small bit of a Scot, Barrie, has brought laughter and tears for thousands.

—JAMES B. CARRINGTON.

There are various ways of killing popularity, but after you have delivered a long speech to a tired audience you need not bother about the others.

Digitized by Google

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

Where the Postman Succeeded the Priest

There was a time once when priests sought to regulate the customs of St. Valentine's Day, and through their efforts the saint was supposed to incline the hearts of the young folks away from each other to more spiritual things. They did very well until a new influence balked their excellent endeavors. The reduction of postal charges gave a new direction to the exchanges of sentiments, and these unholy tendencies have since continued. Instead of the priest we now have the postman as the chief figure of the day. On his shoulders the burdens descend. We hear a great deal about the custom falling into disuse, but if we should question the men who carry the mails we should find that there will be millions of these tender missives delivered on February 14. Incidentally, there will be another million or so of the comic valentine, which is a nuisance in itself and an insult to the general meanings of the day. Nowadays it has sadly departed from its spiritual significance.

The Growth of Postage in Cheapness

A hundred years ago it would have cost eight cents each to send valentines or letters any distance under forty miles, and twenty-five cents each any distance between three and five hundred miles. It was less than forty years ago that a single charge took a letter to any point in the United States, and then the rate was three cents for half an ounce. On March 3, 1883, this was reduced to two cents per half ounce, and exactly two years later it was made two cents per ounce; so that now for two cents the valentine may be sent all the way to the Philippines, or to any other of our new colonies. At the rate of one hundred years ago the cost would have been several dollars, and now not only is it two cents, but the movement is under way to reduce this one-half. For several years the Presidential conventions have adopted measures calling for one-cent postage, and the idea is backed by a strong sentiment, although many seemed to think that a first-class mail service for two cents a letter is better than a large deficit at one cent. At any rate, it is only a question of time when the one-cent basis will be adopted. The sender of the valentine does not miss it so very much anyhow, for as a rule he mails it as printed matter and gets it through for the lowest possible sum.

The Greatest Business of the World

The growth of postage in this country is amazing. In 1800 there were 903 post-offices, 20,817 miles of mail routes, and revenues of $280,804. To-day the post-offices number over 70,000. There are nearly half a million miles of mail routes, and to use the words of the President's message, "the expenditures and the revenues will much exceed one hundred millions during the current year." The last Congress was obliged to increase the postal appropriations sixteen millions of dollars, and it is more than likely that the present Congress will have to add millions more to these extraordinary figures. The growth of the postal work goes on, and so far this year is ahead of all previous periods.

PHOTO BY C. M. STAEE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

W. S. SHALLENBERGER
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL

The postal service of the United States is the greatest business concern of the world. In the course of a year it handles from four to five billion pieces of matter—over fifty per cent. more than the postal service of Great Britain—about one hundred per cent. more than the postal service of Germany, and over one hundred per cent. more than the postal service of France. There are two reasons why it is not self-supporting: It does an enormous business for the Government and its departments, and for Congress and the different branches of the service, for which it does not receive a penny. The franking privilege which was voted to the Presidents as an exceptional honor one hundred years ago is now exercised by thousands of Congressmen and office-holders, and the result is tens of thousands of tons of mail matter carried free.

But even with this gratuitous service the department might show a profit were it not for the fact that it loses a great deal of money on certain classes of mail which it carries. Mr. F. C. Madden, Third Assistant Postmaster-General, declares that a proper classification last year would have made an increase of fourteen millions in the revenues of the department, and the President in his message stated that if the wrong exercise of the privilege of the pound rate could have been corrected there would have been last year, instead of a deficit of $6,610,000, a surplus on one basis of $17,637,570, and on another of $5,733,836. Postmaster-General Smith places the loss on second-class matter at over $20,000,000 a year. Thus we see that instead of losing money the department could be earning a very great profit.

How the Service Will be Quickened

It seems strange to us that the free delivery system has been in cities of ten thousand population less than thirteen years, and that the special delivery even in large cities is less than fifteen years old, but in that time the postal progress has really almost equaled that of all the previous part of the century. Two very important things are now being done. The best of these is the expediting of the mail delivery in cities. Mr. Shallenberger, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, recently said:

"Every month, every day, the department is figuring and working to cut the time of railway transportation a minute or ten minutes or the furthest limit to expedite delivery. Railroads cooperate, special service is inaugurated and conducted with the right of way over regular passenger traffic, and what is the result? An express bearing mail, run at a mile a minute, tears into a great city on time, with the President of the road in his private car sidetracked to let it pass. The mail is ready, is rushed off the postal cars into the contractor's mail wagon, and the mule takes it to the city post-office at the rate of three miles an hour."

Now the problem is to get these mails to the post-office with less loss of time, and thus the automobile will come into use, and there will be a wider employment of the pneumatic tubes.

CHARLES EMORY SMITH
POSTMASTER-GENERAL

There is another change in the same direction which must produce good results. It is nothing more nor less than to have the mails in large cities fully sorted out on the train, so that by the time the destination is reached each bag can be sent directly to the proper section of the city, instead of unloading the whole mass in the general post-office.

The other reform is in an almost opposite direction. It is the extension of the rural delivery. Several trials of this have been made with varying success. It involved, first, the abolition of sundry cross-road post-offices, with the result that the postmaster and his friends at the cross-roads decidedly objected, and some of the farmers declared that they did not want to surrender the pleasure of going to the post-office for their mail. It seems inexplicable, but in one case the sentiment was so strong that it almost upset the department's plans. New rural delivery routes are being established in different parts of the country. Thus the department is striving to please both city and country, and its efforts ought to have excellent results in the way of better streets for the cities and good roads for the counties.

The main objection to a rural delivery is that the cost exceeds the revenue, and until the country is more thickly settled it cannot be made universal as it is in the tight little island of England.

Protecting the Foolish

Not only is this good postal service a method of speed, enterprise and safety—for instance, the Registry Division last year handled for the Treasury and Post-Office Departments alone $1,800,000,000 without the loss of a single penny—but it is an alert watcher for all sorts of swindling, and it literally saves millions of dollars every year to the credulous people of the country. It stands between the robbers and their victims. It is to the credit of the Post-Office Department that it did more to kill the Louisiana Lottery Company and the whole lottery evil than all other agencies and influences combined. And recently when one of the new Napoleons of finance in New York was filching hundreds of thousands of dollars from the foolish on promises of 520 per cent. annually, it was the Post-Office Department that saved what could be saved for the victims and put a stop to the other schemes of that kind. In the petty swindles of the day it is about the only means we have for protecting the people.

The Parcel Post and the Postal Savings Bank

There are two practical additions which probably will be made to the present postal service. Both are in full operation in other countries and their success is undisputed. It is rather curious that while we have no parcels post in our domestic service, we have conventions with several countries for international arrangements of that kind. The first of these was signed by the present Postmaster-General and the special German Envoy on the twenty-sixth of last August, and went into operation on the first of last October. It limited the weight in packages to eleven pounds, fixed the rate at twelve cents for each pound or fraction of a pound, and made due provision for the customs declaration and payment. This is the first convention with a European country, but as England, France and others are seeking the same conveniences, the service will become general, especially as this country has also parcel post conventions with several of the South American countries.

Naturally any movement for a parcel post arouses the opposition of the express companies, with whose lucrative business it would more or less interfere. For the same reason the influence that retards the establishment of the postal savings bank system comes from the savings banks. No institutions are better managed, and in none is the average of integrity and safety higher. They have made a splendid record, and naturally they oppose any Government scheme along the same lines. In them are five million depositors who have nearly two billions of dollars to their credit, and they wield an enormous influence.

But there is another side to the question, and it is very well summed up by Mr. Cornelius VanCott, Postmaster of New York. He says: "There are thousands upon thousands of hard-working people who are either too far from savings banks to avail themselves of their privileges, or who have no confidence in banks of any kind, and who hoard their savings in some convenient hiding place where they are liable to be robbed, or perhaps even murdered in defense of their own. This dead capital amounts to millions. Not only a great burden of anxiety, it is, moreover, locked up out of the reach of circulation. If the Government provided an investment at a low rate of interest, say two and one-half per cent., where the question of security would be all in all, it would serve to encourage thrift and better citizenship, and bring millions into circulation. Great Britain has about eight million depositors who have intrusted to their Government $600,000,000. A shilling can be deposited, or stamps can be bought and deposited from a penny upward."

He points out further that there are more than twice as many money-order offices as banks and every one of these offices could become a bank. He thinks that the system would not interfere with other banks, but would aid them by keeping the money in circulation. He emphasizes the fact that in France the profit is fully two hundred thousand dollars.

The Postal Service as an Educational Force

A history of modern civilization could almost be written from the facts about postage. It combines and uses every method of communication and transportation. When it has no railroads or horses, it uses men, and to-day if you should send a letter beyond the village of Kolghur in the Himalayas, the farthest point of the regular service in India, a native runner would place it in the split end of a stick and deliver it hundreds of miles away as clean as when he received it. The thing that has astonished the people of interior Cuba and Puerto Rico has not been so much the American Army, or the guns, or the machinery of war, but the fact that they can send letters and get answers promptly.

The first great step in civilizing and modernizing these people was in sending trained men from our Post-Office Department to organize the postal service. The quickness and the completeness with which they did the work stand forth as one of the best chapters of enterprise in American history. And to-day the Cubans and the Puerto Ricans and many of the Filipinos are being educated and broadened and made better by the postal service. Fancy the merchant in the interior towns of Cuba, who could never tell whether or not his letter would arrive, now enjoying the blessings of free delivery with the money order and registered letter systems in full operation. It is a contrast that must greatly increase his appreciation of his new rulers!

Digitized by Google

Three MEN on Four Wheels

By Jerome K. Jerome

Copyright, 1899, by Jerome K. Jerome. Copyright in Great Britain

—a man with a hose, watering the roads

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS:

The three men—George, Harris and the author—having decided that a change of scene may avert a period of "brain-fag," have started upon a bicycle tour. Their destination is the Black Forest, in Germany, which they propose to reach by easy stages. A tandem and a safety are the mounts.

An Aquatic Adventure at Hanover

WE ARRIVED at Hamburg on Friday, after a smooth and uneventful voyage; and from Hamburg we traveled to Berlin by way of Hanover. It is not the most direct route. I can only account for our visit to Hanover as the darky accounted to the magistrate for his appearance in the Deacon's poultry yard.

"Yes, sah, what the constable sez is quite true, sah; I wuz dar, sah."

"Oh, so you admit it? And what were you doing with a sack, pray, in Deacon Abraham's poultry yard at twelve o'clock at night?"

"I's gwine ter tell yer, sah; yes, sah. I'd been ter Massa Jordan's wid a sack of melons. Yes, sah; an' Massa Jordan he wuz very 'greeable, an' ax'd me fer ter come in."

"Well?"

"Yes, sah, very 'greeable man is Massa Jordan. An' dar we sat a-talkin' an' a-talkin'——"

"Very likely. What we want to know is what you were doing in the Deacon's poultry yard."

"Yes, sah, dat's what I's comin' ter. It wuz very late 'fore I lef' Massa Jordan's, an' den I sez ter mysel', sez I, now yer jest step out wid yer best leg foremost, Ulysses, case yer gets inter trouble wid de ole woman. Very talkative woman she is, sah, very——"

"Yes, never mind her; there are other people very talkative in this town besides your wife. Deacon Abraham's house is half a mile out of your way home from Mr. Jordan's. How did you get there?"

"Dat's what I'm a-gwine ter explain, sah."

"I am glad of that. And how do you propose to do it?"

"Well, I's thinkin', sah, I must ha' digressed."

I take it we digressed a little.

At first, from some reason or other, Hanover strikes you as an uninteresting town, but it grows upon you. It is in reality two towns: a place of broad, modern, handsome streets and tasteful gardens, side by side with a sixteenth-century town, where old timbered houses overhang the narrow lanes; where through low archways one catches glimpses of galleried courtyards, once often thronged, no doubt, with troops of horse, or blocked with lumbering coach and six, waiting its rich merchant owner and his fat, placid Frau; but where now children and chickens scuttle at their will, while over the carved balconies hang dingy clothes a-drying.

A singularly English atmosphere hangs over Hanover, especially on Sundays, when its shuttered shops and clanging bells give to it the suggestion of a sunnier London. Nor was this British Sunday atmosphere apparent only to myself, else I might have attributed it to imagination; even George felt it. Harris and I, returning from a short stroll with our cigars after lunch on the Sunday afternoon, found him placidly slumbering in the smoke-room's easiest chair.

"After all," said Harris, "there is something about the British Sunday that appeals to the man with English blood in his veins. I should be sorry to see it altogether done away with, let the new generation say what it will."

And each taking one end of the ample settee, we kept George company.

To Hanover one should go, they say, to learn the best German. The disadvantage is that outside Hanover, which is only a small province, nobody understands this best German. Thus you have to decide whether to speak good German and remain in Hanover or bad German and travel about. Germany being separated so many centuries into a dozen principalities is unfortunate in possessing a variety of dialects. Germans from Posen wishful to converse with men of Würtemberg have to talk as often as not in French or English; and young ladies who have received an expensive education in Westphalia surprise and disappoint their parents by being unable to understand a word said to them in Mecklenburg. An English-speaking foreigner, it is true, would find himself equally nonplussed among the Yorkshire wolds, or in the purlieus of Whitechapel; but the cases are not on all fours. Throughout Germany it is not only in the country districts and among the uneducated that dialects are maintained. Every province has practically its own language, of which it is proud and retentive. An educated Bavarian will admit to you that, academically speaking, the North German is more correct; but he will continue to speak South German, and to teach it to his children.

In the course of the century I am inclined to think that Germany will solve her difficulty in this respect by speaking English. Every boy and girl in Germany, above the peasant class, speaks English. Were English pronunciation less arbitrary there is not the slightest doubt but that in the course of a very few years, comparatively speaking, it would become the language of the world. All foreigners agree that grammatically it is the easiest language of any to learn. A German, comparing it with his own language, where every word in every sentence is governed by at least four distinct and separate rules, tells you that the English language has no grammar. A good many English people would seem to have come to the same conclusion; but they are wrong. As a matter of fact, there is an English grammar, and one of these days our schools will recognize the fact, and it will be taught to our children, penetrating maybe even into literary and journalistic circles. But at present we appear to agree with the foreigner that it is a quantity neglectable.

Pronunciation is the stumbling-block to our progress. Spelling would seem to have been designed chiefly as a disguise to pronunciation. It is a clever idea, calculated to check presumption on the part of the foreigner; but for that he would learn it in a year.

For they have a way of teaching languages in Germany that is not our way; and the consequence is that when the German youth or maiden leaves the gymnasium or high school at fifteen, it (as in German one conveniently may say) can understand and speak the tongue it has been learning. In England we have a method that for obtaining the least possible result at the greatest possible expenditure of time and money is perhaps unequaled. An English boy who has been through a good middle-class school in England can talk to a Frenchman, slowly and with difficulty, about female gardeners and aunts—conversation which, to a man possessed perhaps of neither, is liable to pall. Possibly, if he be a bright exception, he may be able to tell the time, or make a few guarded observations concerning the weather. No doubt he could repeat a goodly number of irregular verbs by heart, only, as a matter of fact, few foreigners care to listen to their own irregular verbs recited by young Englishmen. Likewise he might be able to remember a choice selection of grotesquely involved French idioms, such as no modern Frenchman has ever heard or understands when he does hear.

The explanation is that, in nine cases out of ten, he has learned French from an Ahn's First Course. The history of this famous work is remarkable and instructive. The book was originally written for a joke by a witty Frenchman who had resided for some years in England. He intended it as a satire upon the conversational powers of British society. From this point of view it was distinctly good. He submitted it to a London publishing firm. The manager was a shrewd man. He read the book through. Then he sent for the author.

"This book of yours," said he to the author, "is very clever. I have laughed over it myself till the tears came."

"I am delighted to hear you say so," replied the pleased Frenchman. "I tried to be truthful without being unnecessarily offensive."

"It is most amusing," concurred the manager; "and yet, published as a harmless joke I feel it would fail."

The author's face fell.

"Its humor," proceeded the manager, "would be denounced as forced and extravagant. It would amuse the thoughtful and intelligent, but from a business point of view that portion of the public is never worth consideration.

"But I have an idea," continued the manager. He glanced around the room to be sure they were alone and, leaning forward, sunk his voice to a whisper.

"My notion is to publish it as a serious work for the use of schools!"

The author stared, speechless.

"I know the English schoolman," said the manager; "this book will appeal to him. It will exactly fit in with his method. Nothing sillier, nothing more useless for the purpose will he ever discover. He will smack his lips over the book, as a puppy licks up blacking."

The author, sacrificing art to greed, consented. They altered the title and added a vocabulary, but left the book otherwise as it was.

The result is known to every schoolboy. "Ahn" became the palladium of English philological education. If it no longer retains its ubiquity it is because something even less adaptable to the object in view has since been invented.

Lest, in spite of all, the British schoolboy should obtain, even from the like of Ahn, some glimmering of French, the British educational method further handicaps him by bestowing upon him the assistance of what is termed in the prospectus A Native Professor. This native French gentleman, who, by the by, is generally a Belgian, is no doubt a most worthy person, and can, it is true, understand and speak his own language with tolerable fluency. There his qualifications cease. Invariably he is a man with a quite remarkable inability to teach anybody anything. Indeed, he would seem to be chosen not so much as an instructor as an amuser of youth. He is always a comic figure. No Frenchman of a dignified appearance would be engaged for any English school. If he possess by nature a few harmless peculiarities, calculated to cause merriment, so much the more is he esteemed by his employers. The class naturally regards him as an animated joke. The two to four hours a week that are deliberately wasted on this philological farce are looked forward to by the boys as a comic interlude in an otherwise monotonous existence. And then, when the proud parent takes his son and heir to Dieppe merely to discover that the lad does not know enough to call a cab, he abuses not the system but its innocent victim.

I confine my remarks to French, because that is the only language we attempt to teach our youth. An English boy who could speak German would be looked down upon as

The horse gave one look at him

Editor's Note—This is the sixth of a series of humorous papers which began in the Post of January 6. Each of these papers is practically complete in itself, and may be read with enjoyment independently of those that precede and follow it.

Digitized by Google

unpatriotic. Why we waste time in teaching even French according to this method I have never been able to understand. A perfect unacquaintance with a language is respectable. But putting aside comic journalists and lady novelists, for whom it is a business necessity, this smattering of French which we are so proud to possess only serves to render us ridiculous.

In the German school the method of study is somewhat different. One hour every day is devoted to the same language. The idea is not to give the lad time between lessons to forget what he learned at the last; the idea is for him to get on. There is no comic foreigner provided for his amusement. The desired language is taught by a German schoolmaster who knows it inside and out as thoroughly as he knows his own. Maybe this system does not provide the German youth with that perfection of foreign accent for which the British tourist is in every land remarkable, but it has other advantages. The boy does not call his master "Froggy," or "Sausage," nor prepare for the French or English hour any exhibition of homely wit whatever. He just sits there, and for his own sake tries to learn that foreign tongue with as little trouble to everybody concerned as possible. When he has left school he can talk, not about penknives and gardener's aunts merely, but about European politics, history, Shakespeare, or the musical glasses, according to the turn the conversation may take.

Viewing the German people from an Anglo-Saxon standpoint, it may be that in these papers I shall find occasion to criticise them; but on the other hand, there is much that we might learn from them; and in the matter of common-sense as applied to education they can give us ninety-nine in a hundred and beat us with one hand.

The beautiful wood of the Eilenriede bounds Hanover on the south and west, and here occurred a sad drama in which Harris took a prominent part. We were riding our machines through this wood on the Monday afternoon in company with many other cyclists, for it is a favorite resort with Hanoverians on a sunny afternoon, and its shady pathways are then filled with happy, thoughtless folk. Among them rode a young and beautiful girl on a machine that was new. She was evidently a novice on the bicycle. One felt instinctively that there would come a moment when she would require help, and Harris with his accustomed chivalry suggested we should keep near her. Harris, as he occasionally explains to George and to myself, has daughters of his own—or to speak more correctly, a daughter who as the years progress will no doubt cease practicing Catherine wheels in the front garden, and will grow up into a beautiful and respectable young lady. This naturally gives Harris an interest in all beautiful girls up to the age of thirty-five or thereabouts; they remind him, so he says, of home.

We had ridden for about two miles, when we noticed, a little ahead of us in a space where five ways met, a man with a hose, watering the roads. The pipe, supported at each joint by a pair of tiny wheels, writhed after him as he moved, suggesting a gigantic worm, from whose open neck, as the man, gripping it firmly in both hands, pointed it now this way and now that, now elevating it, now depressing it, poured a strong stream of water at the rate of about a gallon a second.

"What a much better method than ours," observed Harris enthusiastically. Harris is inclined to be chronically severe on all British institutions. "How much simpler, quicker, and more economical! You see, one man by this method can in five minutes water a stretch of road that would take us with our clumsy lumbering cart half an hour to cover."

George, who was riding behind me on the tandem, said: "Yes, and it is also a method by which with a little carelessness a man could cover a good many people in a good deal less time than they could get out of the way." George, the opposite to Harris, is British to the core. I remember George quite patriotically indignant with Harris once for suggesting the introduction of the guillotine into England.

"It is so much neater," said Harris enthusiastically.

"I don't care if it is," said George; "I'm an Englishman; hanging is good enough for me."

"Our water-cart may have its disadvantages," continued George, "but it can only make you uncomfortable about the legs, and you can avoid it. With this machine a man could follow you around the corner and upstairs."

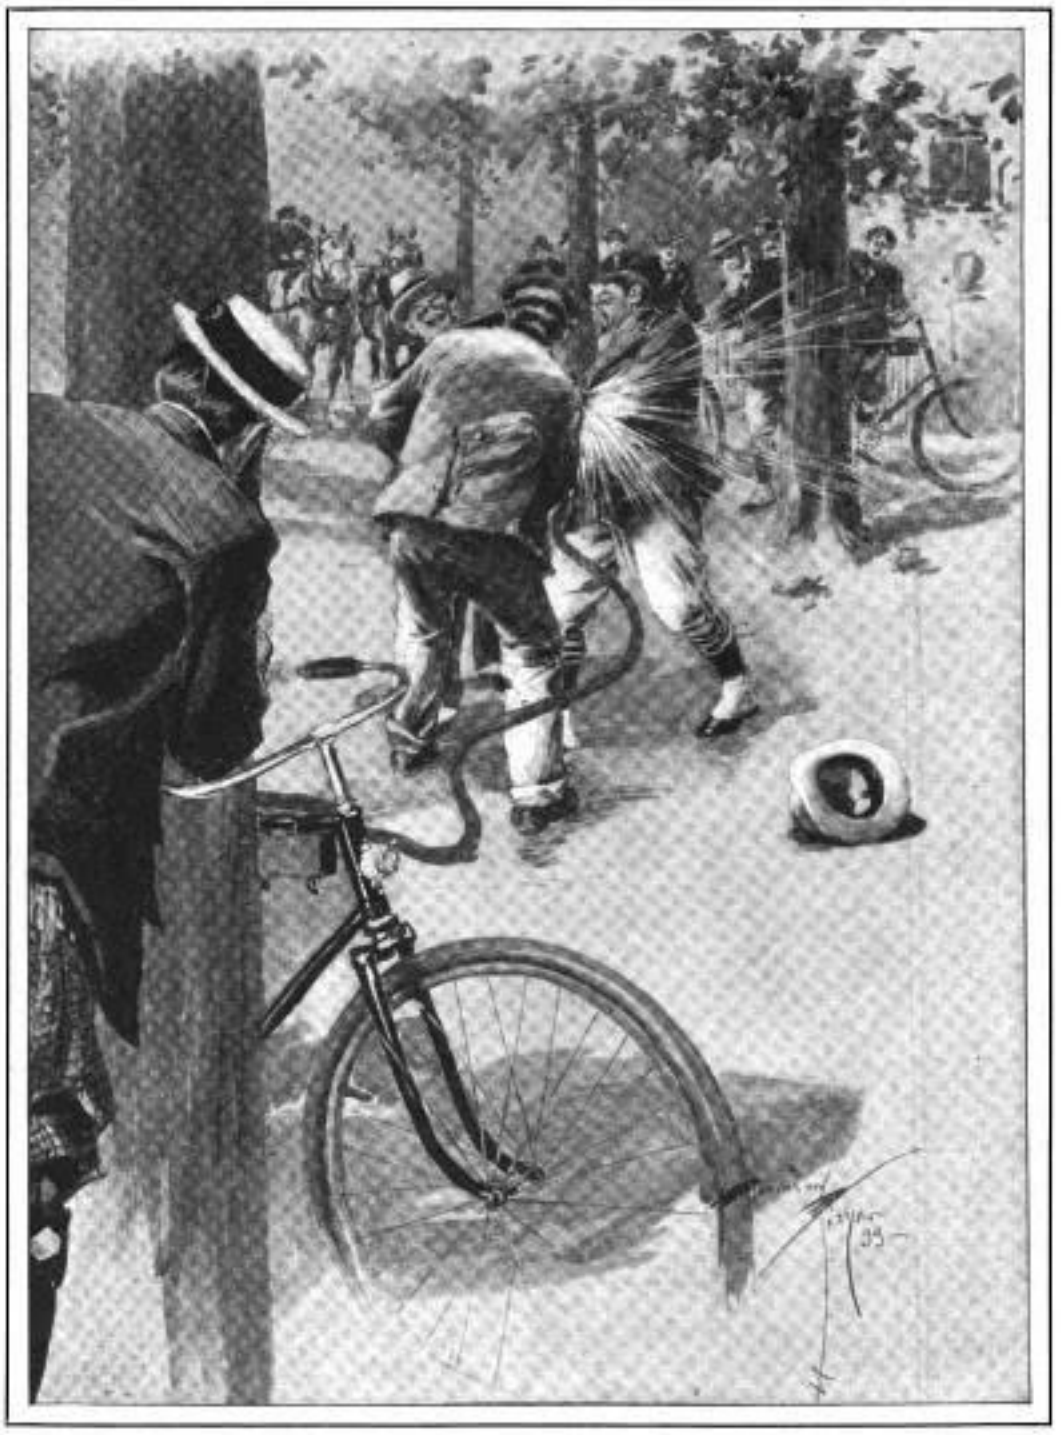
"It fascinates me to watch them," said Harris. "They are so skillful; I have seen a man from the corner of a crowded square in Strasburg cover every inch of ground and not so much as wet an apron-string. It is marvelous how they judge their distance. They will send the water up to your toes, and then bring it over your head so that it falls around your heels. They can——"

"Ease up a minute," said George.

I said: "Why?"

He said: "I am going to get off and watch the rest of this show from behind a tree. There may be great performers in this line, as Harris says; this particular artist appears to me to lack something. He has just soused a dog, and now he's busy watering a sign-post. I shall wait till he has finished."

"Nonsense," said Harris; "he won't wet you."



"That is precisely what I am going to make sure of," answered George; saying which he jumped off and, taking up a position behind a remarkably fine elm, pulled out and commenced filling his pipe.

I did not care to take the tandem on by myself, so I stepped off and joined him, leaving the machine against a tree. Harris shouted something or other about our being a disgrace to the land that gave us birth, and rode on.

The next moment I heard a woman's cry of distress. Glancing around the stem of the tree, I perceived that it proceeded from the young and elegant lady before mentioned, whom in our interest concerning the road-waterer we had forgotten. She was riding her machine steadily and straightly through a drenching shower of water from the hose. She appeared to be too paralyzed either to get off or turn her wheel aside. Every instant she was becoming wetter, while the man with the hose, who was either drunk or blind, continued to pour water upon her with utter indifference. A dozen voices yelled imprecations upon him, but he took no heed whatever.

Harris, his fatherly nature stirred to its depths, did at this point what under the circumstances was quite the right and proper thing to do. Had he acted throughout with the same coolness and judgment he then displayed he would have emerged from that incident the hero of the hour, instead of, as happened, riding away followed by insult and imprecation. Without a moment's hesitation he spurted at the man, sprang to the ground, and seizing the hose by the nozzle, attempted to wrest it from him.

What he ought to have done—what any man retaining his common-sense would have done the moment he got his hands upon the thing—was to turn off the tap. Then he might have played football with the man, or battledore and shuttlecock as he pleased; and the twenty or thirty people who had rushed forward to assist would have only applauded. His idea, however, so he explained to us afterward, was to take the hose away from the man and for punishment turn it upon the fool himself. The waterman's idea appeared to be the same—namely, to retain the hose as a weapon with which to soak Harris. Of course, the result was that between them they soused every dead and living thing within fifty yards, except themselves. One furious man, too drenched to care what more happened to him, leaped into the arena and also took a hand. The three among them proceeded to sweep the compass with that hose. They pointed it to Heaven, and the water descended upon the people in the form of an equinoctial storm. They pointed it downward, and sent the water in rushing streams that took people off their feet, or caught them about the waist-line and doubled them up.

DRAWN BY HARRISON FISHER

THE THREE AMONG THEM PROCEEDED TO SWEEP THE COMPASS WITH THAT HOSE

Not one of the three would loosen his grip upon the hose; not one of them thought to turn the water off. You might have thought they were struggling with some primeval force of nature. In forty-five seconds, so George said, who was timing it, they had swept that circus bare of every living thing except one dog, who, dripping like a water nymph, rolled over by the force of water, now on this side, now on that, still gallantly staggered again and again to its feet to bark defiance at what it evidently regarded as all the furies let loose.

Men and women left their machines upon the ground and flew into the woods. From behind every tree of importance peeped wet, angry heads.

At last there arrived upon the scene one man of sense. Braving all things, he crept to the hydrant where still stood the iron key, and screwed it down. And then from forty trees began to creep more or less soaked human beings, each one with something to say.

At first I fell to wondering whether a stretcher or a clothes-basket would be the more useful for the conveyance of Harris' remains back to the hotel. I consider that George's promptness on that occasion saved Harris' life. Being dry, and therefore able to run quicker, he was there before the crowd. Harris was for explaining things, but George cut him short.

"You get on that," said George, handing him his bicycle, "and go. They don't know we belong to you, and you may trust to us implicitly not to reveal the secret. We'll hang about behind and get in their way. Ride zigzag in case they shoot."

I wish these papers to be strict records of fact, unmarred by exaggeration, and therefore I have shown my description of this incident to Harris, lest anything beyond bald narrative may have crept into it. Harris maintains it is exaggerated; he admits that one or two people may have been "sprinkled." I have offered to turn a street hose on him at a distance of five and twenty feet and take his opinion afterward as to whether "sprinkled" is the adequate term; but he has declined the test. Again, he insists there could not have been more than half a dozen people, at the outside, involved in the catastrophe—that forty is a ridiculous misstatement. I have offered to return with him to Hanover and make strict inquiry into the matter, and this offer he has likewise declined. Under these circumstances I maintain that mine is a true and restrained narrative of an event that is, by a certain number of Hanoverians, remembered with bitterness unto this very day.

Digitized by Google

We left Hanover that same evening and arrived at Berlin in time for supper and an evening stroll. Berlin is a disappointing town: its centre overcrowded, its outlying parts lifeless; its one famous street, Unter den Linden, an attempt to combine Oxford Street with the Champs Élysées; singularly unimposing, and much too wide for its size; its theatres dainty and charming, where acting is considered of more importance than scenery or dress, where long runs are unknown, successful pieces being played again and again but never consecutively, so that for a week running you may go to the same Berlin theatre and see a fresh play every night; its Opera House unworthy of it; its two music halls, with an unnecessary suggestion of vulgarity and commonness about them, ill-arranged and much too large for comfort. In the Berlin cafés and restaurants the busy time is from midnight on till three. Yet most of the people who frequent them are up again at seven. Either the Berliner has solved the great problem of modern life, how to do without sleep, or, with Carlyle, he must be looking forward to eternity.

Personally, I know of no other town where such late hours are the vogue, except St. Petersburg. But your St. Petersburger does not get up early in the morning. At St. Petersburg the music halls, which it is the fashionable thing to attend after the theatre—a drive to them taking half an hour in a swift sleigh—do not practically begin till twelve. Through the Neva at four o'clock in the morning you have to literally push your way; and the favorite trains for travelers are those starting about five o'clock in the morning. These trains save the Russian the trouble of getting up early. He wishes his friends "Good-night," and drives down to the station comfortably after supper, without putting the house to any inconvenience.

Potsdam, the Versailles to Berlin, is a beautiful little town, situated among lakes and woods. Here in the shady ways of its quiet, far-stretching park of Sans Souci it is easy to imagine lean, snuffy Frederick "hummeling" with shrill Voltaire.

Acting on my advice, George and Harris consented not to stay long in Berlin, but to push on to Dresden. Most that Berlin has to show can be seen better elsewhere, and we decided to be content with a drive through the town. The hotel porter introduced us to a droshky driver, under whose guidance, so he assured us, we should see everything worth seeing in the shortest possible time. The man himself, who called for us at nine o'clock in the morning, was all that could be desired. He was bright, intelligent and well-informed; his German was easy to understand, and he knew a little English with which to eke it out on occasion. With the man himself there was no fault to be found, but his horse was the most unsympathetic brute I have ever sat behind.

He took a dislike to us the moment he saw us. I was the first to come out of the hotel. He turned his head, and looked me up and down with a cold, glassy eye; and then he looked across at another horse, a friend of his, that was standing facing him. I knew what he said. He had an expressive head, and he made no attempt to disguise his thoughts. He said:

"Funny things one does come across in the summer time, doesn't one?"

George followed me out the next moment and stood behind me. The horse again turned his head and looked. I have never known a horse that could twist himself as this horse did. I have—[illegible] a cameleopard do tricks with his neck that compelled one's attention, but this animal was more like the thing one dreams of after a dusty day at Ascot, followed by a dinner with six old chums. If I had seen his eyes looking at me from between his own hind legs I doubt if I should have been surprised. He seemed more amused with George, if anything, than with myself. He turned to his friend again.

"Extraordinary, isn't it?" he remarked. "I suppose there must be some place where they grow them," and then he commenced licking flies off his shoulder. I wondered whether he had lost his mother when young, and had been brought up by a cat.

George and I climbed in and sat waiting for Harris. He came a moment later. Myself, I thought he looked rather neat. He wore a white flannel knickerbocker suit, which he had had made especially for bicycling in hot weather; his hat may have been out of the common, but it did keep the sun off.

The horse gave one look at him, said "Gott in Himmel!" as plainly as ever a horse spoke, and started off down Friedrich Strasse at a brisk walk, leaving Harris and the driver standing on the pavement. His owner called to him to stop, but he took no notice. They ran after us, and overtook us at the corner of the Dorotheen Strasse. I could not catch what the man said to the horse; he spoke quickly and excitedly, but I gathered a few phrases, such as:

"Got to earn my living somehow, haven't I?" "Who asked for your opinion?" "Ay, little you care."

The horse cut the conversation short by turning up the Dorotheen Strasse on his own account. I think what he said was:

"Come on, then; don't talk so much. Let's get the job over, and where possible let's keep to the back streets."

Opposite the Brandenburger Thor our driver hitched the reins to the whip, climbed down and came around to explain things to us. He pointed out to us the Thiergarten, and then descanted to us of the Reichstag House. Then he turned his attention to the Gate. He said it was constructed of sandstone in imitation of the "Propeleer" in Athens.

Here the horse proceeded up the Linden, and nothing would persuade him not to proceed up the Linden. His owner expostulated with him, but he continued to trot on. From the way he hitched his shoulders as he moved I somehow felt he was saying:

"They've seen the Gate, haven't they? Very well, that's enough. As for the rest, you don't know what you're talking about, and they wouldn't understand you if you did. You talk German."

It was the same throughout the length of the Linden. The horse consented to stand still sufficiently long to enable us to have a good look at each sight and to hear the name of it. All explanation and description he cut short by the simple process of moving on.

"What these fellows want," he seemed to say to himself, "is to go home and tell people they have seen these things. If I am doing them an injustice, if they are more intelligent than they look, they can get better information than this old fool of mine is giving them from the guide-book. Who wants to know how high a steeple is? You don't remember it the next five minutes when you are told, and if you do it is because you have got nothing else in your head. He just tires me with his talk. Why doesn't he hurry up, and let us all get home to lunch?"

Upon reflection, I am not sure that that wall-eyed old brute had not sense on its side. Anyhow, I know there have been occasions, with a guide, when I would have been glad of its interference.

A Suppliant to Saint Valentine

By Clinton Scollard

OH, SWEET and most beloved Saint
Whom limners old were wont to paint
As blessing lovers and their love,
I prithee, hear a suppliant's plaint!

2

I know a witching damosel
Whose eyes are like the rathe harebell,
Whose cheeks are like the wilding rose,
Whose voice is like a ritornelle.

3

She bids me come—but never stay;
I go; she questions, "Why away?"
She is a cruel dream by night;
She is a dear despair by day.

4

In vain I sue with timid sighs;
In vain I woo in ardent wise;
In vain I try the happy mean
That 'twixt the lamb and lion lies.

5

Behold, I have no hope unless
Thou succorest my sore distress!
Oh, wilt thou not the art reveal
To win her heart to tenderness?

6

If thou wilt light this barren gloom,
If thou wilt cause for me to bloom
The flower of love, upon thy shrine
Shall burn the choicest hecatomb!

7

So, ere my wounded spirit faint,
Grant thou the measure of my plaint!
From dole to joy, from bale to bliss,
Raise me, oh, most beloved Saint!

Tastes like "More"

The children say, and the more you give them the more healthy, chubby and strong they will be.

WHEATLET

For breakfast, dinner or supper is liked by all classes, young and old, because of

Its delicious, nutty, full flavor—
The variety of ways it can be prepared—
Its strength-giving qualities—
Its inexpensiveness.

It is easy of digestion, easy to cook and makes the task of pleasing an epicure easy also. As a breakfast food, pudding cereal, pancake or muffin flour it is unsurpassed. Try it.

If your grocer does not have it, send us his name and your order—we will see that you are supplied. GENUINE MADE ONLY BY

Franklin Mills Co., Lockport, N. Y.
Booklet Free

Warm Extremities, Warm all Over

Warm, Strong, Durable, Handsome are our $1 Large Gauntlet Black Fur Gloves, by mail prepaid. The same may be said of our Dollar-quarter Genuine Mocha Kid Gloves in all colors for Women, and our Dollar-half, Seventy-five and Two-dollar Unlined Silk-Lined Mocha and Reindeer Gloves for Men.

Our illustrated booklet, "Glove Pointers," may be had free by mentioning this magazine. It will give you a lot of information about Dress, Driving and Work Gloves and Mittens. We also buy raw furs.

In Black Galloway and Frisian Fur Coats and Robes we are headquarters. Get our "Moth Proof" booklet. Also Goat, Dog, Woombat, Russian Calf Coats. In Custom Fur Tanning of all kinds of Hides and skins, Rug and Robe Work; Taxidermy and Head Mounting we are at home. Get our Custom Tan "Guider."

THE CROSBY FRISIAN FUR COMPANY
116 Mill Street, Rochester, N. Y.

Value your time.

EDUCATE YOURSELF

By securing a thorough technical training in your profession. Systematic Home Study will increase your efficiency and ADVANCE YOUR SALARY. Steam, Electrical and Mechanical ENGINEERING taught by mail.

Write for "Handbook 1"

AMERICAN SCHOOL OF CORRESPONDENCE
Chartered by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts
Boston, Mass., U. S. A.

TEACH YOURSELF MUSIC
DURING LEISURE MOMENTS AT HOME
Piano, Organ, Guitar and Voice

Any one can learn ALL TUNES, NOTES, CHORDS, ACCOMPANIMENTS and the LAWS OF HARMONY in a short time. If you CHERISH, DESIRE and LOVE MUSIC and CONCERT you should investigate. Over 60,000 delighted PUPILS of all ages and conditions in every part of the world, many of whom we have taught by mail, testify to the pleasure and profit they have derived from our lessons. A Lecture for music lovers, you cannot help but be interested in it. A few days practice and you play perfect ACCOMPANIMENTS IN ALL KEYS. CIRCULARS FREE. Write to-day. With hundreds of letters to any one interested in MUSIC. SAMPLE LESSONS, 20 CENTS.

U. S. HOME MUSIC CO., 8281 Wabash Avenue, CHICAGO

Write for sample copy of "ANTIQUES"

A weekly illustrated journal for collectors of all kinds. The only one printed in the U. S. It contains much reliable information of various orders.

Office, 9 East Eighth Street, New York

Wanta Manicure File?

Real emeries. Two dozen by mail, 25 cents.
WANTA FILE COMPANY, Downers Grove, Ill.

100 Cards in Morocco Cover 50c

Printed with Name and Address
SAMPLES SENT IF DESIRED
ROSENTHAL BROS., 146 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill.

Digitized by Google

At the American Capital

THE new members of the House are already appearing in the forum of debate. The discussion of the Gold bill gave them an opportunity rarely presented at the opening of a Congress. The gate was up for six days and all were at liberty to enter. Some dropped into the discussion modestly and gracefully, and produced favorable impressions. Others were more energetic. They jumped into the mêlée cap-à-pie, and handled themselves with the skill of professional gladiators. The majority, following the example of some of the older members, had carefully prepared their speeches and read them to the House. Not one man in a hundred can read a speech with éclat. John J. Ingalls, when a Senator, did it so deftly and acceptably that very few of his listeners discovered it. The manuscript occupied a conspicuous place on his desk. Apparently he paid no attention to it, moving it unconsciously when applauded and taking entire sentences in at a glance. In emphasis, tone, gesture and deliberation he was perfect. Far different is the effect when a Representative holds his manuscript in his hand and reads the speech as he would from a newspaper.

Some Congressmen commit their speeches to memory. Senator Wolcott did this when he first faced the incrusted wisdom of his compeers. He sailed along gracefully and eloquently until interrupted by a question. It distracted his memory. He lost his cue and became disconcerted, but only for an instant. His reserve power was summoned. His training as a lawyer served him well. There was no more brilliant advocate in the courts of Colorado. His thoughts began to flow temperately and equably, and his facility of expression asserted itself. He made a speech attracting the attention of the nation, giving him a reputation as an orator second to none. To-day an announcement that Wolcott will speak packs the galleries of the Senate. From that day to the present he has never committed a speech to memory.

A DANGEROUS MAN TO HAVE AT LARGE

INSPIRATION, after all, is the secret of success in public discussion. There was little of it in the debate over the Gold bill. The extemporaneous speaker was heard with the delight of the traveler on a desert approaching an oasis. One new member who bore away laurels came from the Pacific Coast. He was Francis W. Cushman, the reputed successor of James Hamilton Lewis. The fact is that both Congressmen from Washington were elected at large. It was a scrub race, with two Republicans and two Fusionists as candidates. Lewis was third in the race, and Wesley L. Jones polled sixteen more votes than Cushman. Lewis polled 2482 more votes than his colleague on the Fusion ticket.

Whether Cushman or Jones is the successor of Lewis is immaterial; certain it is that Cushman is the antithesis of his predecessor. Cushman was born in Virginia and entered active business as a section hand on a railroad. He has a smooth-shaven face, dark hair with an inclination to baldness, and high cheekbones. His features are sharp and angular, but not so sharp as his eyes. They are china blue in color, the pupils glinting with light. He has the legs of Abraham Lincoln, and the face and torso of Alexander H. Stephens. In manner he is plain and unassuming, and walks with a loose-jointed gait. There is nothing exquisite about his raiment. He wears a soft felt hat, a light brown overcoat and loosely fitting clothes. A pair of gold-rimmed eye-glasses dangle from a clasp on his waistcoat. Nor is he a conspicuous figure on the floor, although tall, lank and thin-legged. He appears perfectly at home, but his voice at times is harsh and inclined to shrillness. Its upper notes recall the high-C of the Honorable Lafe Pence. He lacks the marvelous redundancy of adjectives so characteristic of Lewis, but his language is so quaint and original that it would attract attention anywhere—in the city, on the farm, or in the mine. He bubbles with humor, and tells a story in a way peculiarly his own. His appearance in the House was heralded as a newspaper event. The old story of the Congressman-at-large was credited to him. It was alleged that he was approaching a town where he was billed to make a speech. He stopped at a house on the outskirts to get some water. The farmer's wife stood at the well. Cushman asked after the political sentiment in the settlement.

"I do not know what it is," said the woman. "I don't go to political meetings. I heard there was a Congressman at large, and I am a little timid; I think the best thing for me to do is to stick close to home." The same story was told of Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, when he first came to Congress. It has probably been told of every Congressman-at-large since the foundation of the Government.

THE WISE MAN WHO WOULD NOT

MR. CUSHMAN was the first of the new orators to appear in debate. His preface was too long. It was some time before he got the ear of the House. The first sentence to attract attention was this:

"There would be no greater inconsistency to me in hearing a man talk of biyardism, biquartism or bibushelism, than to hear any one discourse on the beauties of bimetallism in the sense of using both metals as a standard."

A moment afterward he added:

"I had rather go down to the bottomless ocean of irretrievable political disaster, battling for an immortal principle, than to ride into the haven of political safety under the flag of repudiation and at the expense of the honor of my country."

The sentence sounds strangely like J. Hamilton Lewis. It drew applause from both sides of the House.

The orator afterward alluded to the financial despondency characterizing the days of the Cleveland Administration by saying:

"I remember—every member on this floor remembers—the pitiful condition of affairs then that was everywhere apparent to the human eye. In fact, you did not have to see it; if you were similarly situated with me you could feel it."

Later on came an allusion to the political surprises in the Chicago platform.

"The Democratic party," he said, "immediately furnished the American voter with a brand-new soap-bubble, filled with Nebraska wind, and asked them to chase that off over another financial and industrial precipice."

The laughter and applause had hardly subsided before he turned toward the Democratic side of the House, saying:

"Everything you said was going to happen in 1896 failed to happen. Everything you said would not happen did happen. If I were in your place to-day I would be keeping still in six different languages, and praying to a just and merciful God that the American people might forget my promises and prophesies of two years ago."

After saying that he had lived away out in the boundless West, far from the throne of grace and the mighty Congressional reservoirs of distilled financial wisdom, he said:

"When you pay a debt with a dollar, that destroys the debt; but the dollar is left like the old gourd at the spring around which I played in childhood; every one who came along took a drink out of it, but they didn't eat the gourd. The American people have come to understand from actual experience that they are not so much interested in the amount of money in this country per capita as in the amount of money per pocketa."

DIOGENES ON THE NEBRASKA PLAINS

MR. CUSHMAN said that he had once lived in Nebraska and he knew William Jennings Bryan. "I know him as well as if I had been through him with a lantern. The trouble with Bryan, and with most of you gentlemen on the other side, is that in your arguments you are so crooked you cannot walk around the block without meeting yourself on the other side."

This caused prolonged laughter, during which time was called, the gavel fell, and Cushman's speech was ended. It was great in quaintness. The metaphors and similes were telling and original. Mr. Cushman himself, however, correctly criticised it. "What I wanted to do," he said afterward, "was to make a speech of more seriousness, with more substantial reasoning; it was in too light a vein. It was more fitted for the stump than for the House."

Whether more fitted for the stump than the House, the speech was answered on the next day in a five-minutes' talk by the Honorable John F. Robinson, a Nebraska Democrat. He alluded to "the brand-new soap-bubble filled with Nebraska wind," and said that the soap out of which the bubble was formed came out of the Republican Congressional campaign fund. The wind came from everywhere. The bubble touched the earth for the first time at Tacoma, Washington, and from there rebounded and soared eastward until it landed in the Capitol and exploded in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday afternoon, when the gentleman from Washington spoke. "That gentleman," said he, "is so small compared with the man whom he has assailed with his 'going through Mr. Bryan with a lantern,' from an intellectual standpoint, that he could be likened only to a lightning-bug wandering through the vast recesses of the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky."

Of course Mr. Robinson was warmly applauded at each of these hits. The minority crowded around him and heartily congratulated him.

SAM JONES AND THE BABBLING OYSTER

HENRY CASSORTE SMITH, of Adrian, Michigan, culled similar laurels. Unlike Cushman, he attracted the attention of the House in his very first sentence. He began by saying that he thought the House the only place on earth where a man was permitted to talk about silver. "Up in my State," said he, "the man who would attempt to discuss the money question would empty the hall as quickly as if a smallpox sign were hung over the stage."

He admitted that the real opposition have many times been right, but "the trouble is," he added, "that they are never right at the right time. They are like the boy who saw an elephant for the first time. 'Oh, mother,' he cried, 'he is going in the wrong direction.'"

It was a five-minutes' speech, and ended with an anecdote credited to Sam Jones. The Rev. Mr. Jones says that he met an old free-silver mollusk the other day in one of his walks.

"Jones," said the mollusk, "where is all that prosperity that you were going to give us?"

"Why," replied the clergyman, "it is everywhere. Labor is employed; capital is active; the railroads are overburdened; there is prosperity everywhere."

"It has not struck me yet," the mollusk observed.

"Well, you know," Jones answered, "it is pretty hard to hit nothing."

Mr. Smith is the successor to General Spaulding. He is a man of intense activity, has an intellectual face, and is said to be an unusually able lawyer. There are three Smiths in the House from Michigan, and Henry C. modestly takes his position as Smith No. 3. He has had a fairly active life since entering politics, for the University of Michigan is within his bailiwick, and the most of its professors are Free-Traders. Mr. Smith recently began a suit against the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad to force them to sell mileage tickets at two cents a mile as required by the laws of the State. This lawsuit is attracting attention throughout the country. It has not yet been reached on the docket. If it is decided against the railroad company it will undoubtedly be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that such a law is unconstitutional.

A PLURALITY OF SMITHS

AT THE beginning of the present session there were six Smiths in the House. One advanced to higher honors on January 1, 1900. He is John Walter Smith, of Maryland. He comes from the Eastern Shore and succeeded Honorable Isaac A. Barber. Mr. Smith was a State Senator when elected to Congress; he was a Congressman when elected Governor, and it is possible that he may be Governor when elected United States Senator. There were four Smiths among the new members, but Henry Cassorte Smith is the only one of the four who ventured into the arena while the Gold bill was under consideration.

Altogether it was a lively debate, and one that attracted much interest, but it will hardly become memorable. The discussion that will probably arise from the consideration of measures reported from the new Committee on Insular Affairs will undoubtedly prove far more entertaining and instructive.

—AMOS J. CUMMINGS.

Most people are denied the luxury of a good cup of coffee because good coffee is hard to get at any price, and many persons find that the ordinary brands of even the best coffee have an injurious effect on them

Royal Dutch Coffee

IS COFFEE PERFECTION

It is not only the best grade of coffee grown but can be drunk by anybody, no matter how nervous or delicate, without harmful effect. It is roasted and refined by the

BEACH PROCESS (controlled by us)

Which extracts the tannic acid, removing the direct causes of the harmful effects of coffee drinking, and leaves Royal Dutch a pure, healthful and wholesome coffee, unequalled for flavor, smoothness or aroma. Insist on getting it at your grocer's.

You should have our free booklet, which tells an interesting and convincing story. Send for it.

WALTER McEWAN, Albany, N. Y.
Importer and Roaster of High-Grade Coffees

WILLIAMS' SHAVING STICK

SOLD EVERYWHERE — BY MAIL 25c. IF YOUR DEALER DOES NOT SUPPLY YOU
THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO.
GLASTONBURY, CONN.
LONDON - PARIS - DRESDEN - SYDNEY

Is something different from the ordinary run of silks. Every thread is absolutely pure silk fibre. It looks better, wears better and costs less in the long run than any other. It combines the best with the greatest economy. In black we make Taffeta, Gros-Grain, Peau de Soie and Satin, also all the fashionable colors in Taffeta. Full information and samples sent on request.

JOHN D. CUTTER & CO., 1 Union Sq., New York City

AD SENSE

Goes to business men once a month and carries suggestions for the betterment of business. It's only one dollar a year, or 50 cents for six months' trial subscription. Send a dime for sample copy to

THE AD SENSE COMPANY, 80 Fifth Avenue, Chicago

The Lloyd Muffler

Cotton, 25 cts.; Worsted, 50 cts.

Made in colors—White, Blue, Black and Garnet. A perfect protection for the throat and chest against the wind and cold. For Men, Women, Boys or Girls. Easily put on and taken off; button to back with clasp. Ask your dealer for them or send us price—we will send on approval.

STRATFORD KNITTING MILLS
510 Cherry Street, Philadelphia

ADMIRAL SCHLEY Secret Cipher and Signal Code.

The very best method of conducting private or business correspondence; also wonderfully interesting and instructive for adults or children. Send 25 cents, silver or stamps, to T. E. LEE, M. D., 1222 16th St., N. W., Washington, D. C. (Reduction of price to clubs.)

Digitized by Google

Home Gymnastics for the Business Man

By Dudley A. Sargent, M.D.

Director of Physical Culture at Harvard College

Fig. 1

WE ARE living in an age of rapid transit. The telegraph, the telephone, and the swift-flying mail train and ocean liner have quickened the pulses of life and revolutionized the methods of doing business. How to keep pace with this rapid method of doing things is getting to be a very serious problem with a great many people. Unfortunately, the human organism cannot be too suddenly changed to meet the new requirements to which it may be subjected. A sudden rise or fall in the temperature may bring on a fit of sickness in many persons, and the difficulty in adjusting one's self to a new climate is familiar to all.

The difficulty of adapting one's self to new methods of thinking and acting are no less trying and severe, and a host of persons are breaking down annually in their efforts to do so. It would be the height of folly for a young man to enter an athletic contest at the present day without taking a course of preparatory training to get himself in condition. But the pursuit of a trade, business or profession is no less a struggle, in which those who are best prepared and keep themselves in the best working condition win success, while those who are poorly prepared through lack of a good inheritance or education, or who neglect to keep themselves in fine physical condition, drop out of the contest and give up the race. Surely it must be apparent to every one that in order not only to attain eminence, but even to hold one's own in the struggles of the business world, a man must always be at his best.

Fig. 2

How to keep one's self physically fit to meet the duties and responsibilities of every-day life is a question worthy of consideration. When bicycles are so cheap, gymnasiums so accessible, and boat, golf, riding, tennis, baseball, bowling and other athletic organizations are so numerous, there is no excuse for not attending to the body's needs on the ground that some particular form of exercise is not in itself interesting or attractive. But there are many who do find a ready excuse—usually lack of time or money—for not availing themselves of those golden opportunities to keep strong and well. To this large class of individuals who find themselves for one reason or another unattached to any of the numerous athletic organizations, I offer a few hints and suggestions on home exercise. If these are faithfully carried out they will meet the condition of the average man, and render him better fitted in every way to meet the daily wear and tear of a mentally active, though physically inactive, life.

Fig. 3

Fig. 5

These exercises which I am about to recommend are exceedingly simple, and the only requirement on the part of the individual is courage and persistency enough to do them. If these qualities are present—and but little can be accomplished without them—good results are sure to follow. This is the course:

Arise in the morning in time to allow yourself about one hour before breakfast. Do not bathe even the hands or face, but put on at once a loose pair of flannel drawers, a flannel shirt and a pair of woolen golf stockings. Do not wear garters or slippers for this occasion, as the garters interfere with the free circulation of the blood in the legs, and the slippers prevent the proper action of the toes, upon which a well-poised body depends. Open the windows in your sleeping-room, or, preferably, go into a room where the windows have been open all night and the air is as fresh and pure as possible.

First Exercise.—Stand between two chairs which you have placed back to back about thirty inches apart (see Figure 1). From this position bend the knees and the arms, allowing the body to sink between the chairs to a depth of about twelve inches; then extend both arms and legs energetically, bringing the body to an upright position. Be sure to keep the head and shoulders well back, and to lessen the resistance put upon the muscles of the arms and chest by doing the greater part of the work with the legs. In no case is it advisable to try to lift the weight of the body between the chairs by the use of the arms alone. Repeat this exercise from twenty to one hundred times.

Second Exercise.—Stand with the feet about twelve inches apart, with the arms extended outward from the sides in a horizontal position (see Figure 2). From this position turn as far round as possible to the left, keeping the left arm fully extended, but allowing the right arm to fold across the chest until the fingers touch the left shoulder (see Figure 2A); now reverse the movement, turning quickly to the right, swinging the right arm well back in a horizontal plane, and allowing the left arm to fold across the chest until the fingers touch the right shoulder.

Fig. 3A

In doing this exercise concentrate the attention about the muscles of the waist and loins, but use the arms and legs in swaying from side to side in such a way as to modify or intensify the strain put upon the centre of the body. Repeat from twenty to one hundred times in each direction.

Third Exercise.—Stand with feet about twenty inches apart, with the arms held in a vertical position above the head with the backs of the hands touching (see Figure 3). From this position bring the arms downward and sideward, turning the body slightly to the right and bending both the trunk and knees until the hands can be clapped between the legs (see Figure 3A); then raise the arms upward and sideward, extending at the same time both the trunk and legs, until the hands are placed back to back again over the head as in the original position. Now do the same exercise turning to the left side, and repeat alternately from right to left from twenty to one hundred times.

Fig. 6

Fig. 4

Fourth Exercise.—Stand with feet about twenty inches apart, with tips of the fingers placed upon the shoulders (see Figure 4). From this position thrust the hands and arms downward, bending the knees and rising on the toes until the fingers touch the floor midway between the feet (see Figure 4A). Now come to an upright position, bringing the fingers to the shoulders, and thrust the hands and arms upward to a vertical position above the head. Bring the fingers again to the shoulders, thrust downward to the floor, and return again to the thrust over the head. Repeat from ten to fifty times.

Fig. 5A

Fifth Exercise.—Stand in a natural position with elbows at the sides and finger-points touching just under the chin. Raise the elbows out from the sides as high as possible, keeping the fingers of both hands in contact under the chin, and elevate the right knee to a horizontal position in front of the body (see Figure 5). Return to the original standing position with elbows at the sides and raise the elbows and left knee. Repeat alternately from forty to one hundred times.

Sixth Exercise.—Stand with the right foot advanced diagonally forward about thirty inches, with the left arm folded across the small of the back and the right arm extended upward over the head as far as possible (see Figure 6). From this position incline forward, pivoting at the hips, and touch the floor in front of the right foot with the fingers of the right hand (see Figure 6A). Return again to the original position, keeping the right arm rigidly extended and carry it backward as far as possible. Repeat from ten to fifty times, then try the same movement with the left foot advanced, the right arm behind the back and the left arm extended upward and backward.

Fig. 4A

Seventh Exercise.—Stand with the feet about twenty-four inches apart, with the weight thrown on the right leg and the right arm extended upward and the left arm down by the left side (see Figure 7). From this position bring the left arm sideways and upward and carry the right arm sideways and downward, throwing the weight of the body at the same time on to the left foot (see Figure 7A). Continue the exercise, throwing the weight of the body first on one leg and then on the other, bending the right knee and swaying the hips to the right and the shoulders to the

Fig. 6A

Special Trial Offer—New and GRAND PANSIES

Did you ever see 7 straight or circular rows of Pansies, side by side, each a different color? If so you know that the effect is charming beyond conception. Did you ever see Childs' Giant Pansies, marvels in beauty and true to color? If not, you have not seen the beauty and perfection now attained.

As a trial offer, we will mail for 25c:

50 seeds Pansy Giant, Pure Snow White,
50 " " " Coal Black,
50 " " " Cardinal Red,
50 " " " Bright Yellow,
50 " " " Azure Blue,
50 " " " Bright Violet,
50 " " " Striped, Variegated.

A little book on Pansies, telling all about culture, etc.
A Booklet of 96 pages on House Plants; tells just how to care for every kind of window plant.
THE MAYFLOWER magazine 3 months; finest publication on Flowers and Gardening. And our Catalogue of 156 pages and 9 Colored Plates.

The 7 Pansies, 2 Books, Mayflower and Catalogue, 25c

Our Catalogue for 1900—Fifth Anniversary Edition—greatest Book of Flowers and Vegetable Seeds, 300 Pages, Plants of New Fruits, 196 pages, 500 Illustrations, 8 colored plates, all for mailed free to any who anticipate purchasing. Gem Novelties in Sweet-Scented and Tuberous Rex Begonias, Generous Fragrant Calla, Treasure Vine, Gooseflower, Caladium, Everblooming Tritoma, Cannas, Gladiolus, Roses, Phlox, Giant Pansy, Lilies, Palms, Carnations, Primroses, Asters, Pinks, Sweet Peas, Verbenas, Tomatoes, Strawberries, etc.

JOHN LEWIS CHILDS, Floral Park, N.Y.

REGISTERED VAB TRADE MARK

Burpee's Trade-Mark

On any package is a guarantee that it contains the Best Seeds that Grow

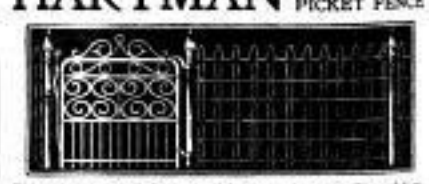
EXACTLY AS DESCRIBED IN

Burpee's Farm Annual

"Leading American Seed Catalogue," which is mailed free to all. It will pay you to write TO-DAY.

W. ATLEE BURPEE & CO., Philadelphia

HOPPER'S CAN OPENER



Does perfect work
Easy to operate
No jagged edge
Turns edge of can down
Price, postpaid, 25 cents
Money refunded if not satisfactory

CHAS. G. HOPPER, Manufacturer, Germantown, Pa.

An Open Fireplace and a hardwood mantel means comfort, beauty and health at home. Write for illustrated catalogue. ALCOTT, ROSS & SCULLY CO. 2046 North Broad Street, Philadelphia

HARTMAN STEEL ROD PICKET FENCE

Fills completely all fence requisites as to beauty, utility and durability. Specially designed for lawns, parks, cemeteries, playgrounds, etc. Looks best and is best when built with our steel posts. Illustrated catalogue free.

HARTMAN MFG. CO., Box 126, Ellwood City, Pa.
Or 101 Broadway, New York City

DON'T SET HENS THE SURE OLD WAY

THE NATL HEN INCUBATOR hatches all eggs 8 to 1. Little in price but big money maker. Agts. wanted. Send for cat. telling how to get one free. Natural Hen Incubator Co., B 28, Columbus, Neb.

Are You Deaf?

We have 25 kinds of Instruments to Assist Hearing. Sent on approval. Write for catalogue.

WM. F. WILLIS & CO., 134 South 11th Street, Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

Fig. 7

left as the right arm swings upward and the left arm downward, and reversing the action of hips, legs and shoulders as the left arm swings upward and the right arm downward. Repeat from thirty to one hundred and twenty times.

Eighth Exercise.—Stand with the feet about twenty-four inches apart and the hands placed together over the right shoulder (see Figure 8). From this position swing the hands down between the legs forcibly, bending the knees slightly at the same time (see Figure 8A). Now bring the hands up over the left shoulder, bending the body backward. Continue the movement by swinging the hands downward again and up over the right shoulder. Repeat alternately from twenty to one hundred times.

Fig. 8

Ninth Exercise.—Stand with the feet together in a natural position with the left hand on the hips and the right arm by the side. Raise the right arm upward and sideward to an extended position above the head; at the same time raise the left leg outward and sideward as far as possible, being careful to keep the moving arm and leg rigidly straight (see Figure 9). Repeat from twenty to one hundred times; then try the same movement with the left arm and right leg.

Tenth Exercise.—Stand with the right leg advanced diagonally forward about thirty inches, and the hands held clenched about the height of the hips (see Figure 10). From this position swing the body forward, pivoting at the hips and throwing the weight well on to the right leg. Extend the arms downward until the fingers touch the floor just beyond the right foot (see Figure 10A). Bring the body to an upright position, pulling the arms upward and backward until the hands are again on a level with the hips. The movement is a little like that employed in rowing a boat, and the action may be greatly intensified by leaning well back at the end of each stroke so that the body is on a line with the advanced leg and the weight is shifted from the right to the left foot. Repeat from ten to sixty times, then place the left leg in the advanced position and try the same movement on the left side.

Fig. 9

Fig. 10A

Eleventh Exercise.—Stand with the right foot advanced about thirty inches in front of the left, with the left arm held upward and forward at an angle of about forty-five degrees, and the right arm held backward and downward parallel with the left leg (see Figure 11). From this position swing the left arm downward and backward, and the right arm forward and upward; at the same time bring the left leg forward and carry the right leg backward until the position is just the reverse of that shown in Figure 11. Now change back again to the first position, and keep changing from the one to the other from thirty to one hundred and fifty times. By hopping twice on each foot between each forward and back movement, and by making the leg and arm movements simultaneous and rhythmical one soon gets into the swing of the exercise and can keep it up for quite a while.

Twelfth Exercise.—Stand with the heels together in a natural position, and with the backs of the fingers touching in front of the body (see Figure 12). Now raise the arms forward slowly and upward, keeping the arms straight and the backs of the hands touching until they pass an imaginary point about the height of the eyes; then begin to separate the hands and carry them upward and backward in a great circle until they pass over the head, when they may be returned again slowly sideways and downward to the first position. In lifting the arms upward from the initiatory position begin to take in a full breath, and so regulate the movement and the breathing that the lungs are not fully inflated until the arms are carried well upward and backward over the head. Then let the breath out quickly and forcibly as the arms are brought downward to the sides. This exercise should be repeated from eight to twenty-four times at the rate of six to eight times a minute.

Fig. 11

IN THE above list of exercises the aim has been to make use of a few movements that tend to bring the large muscles of the trunk, arms and legs into gentle activity. If taken in the order in which they are given one may easily pass from one to another without fatigue, as they are arranged to bring one group of muscles into action while the others are resting. Some of the exercises are especially designed to assist the organs of digestion, others to increase the capacity of the lungs, and others to stimulate the action of the heart, but the less one thinks about these things the better. Enter into the exercise with interest and enthusiasm, and work persistently but not violently at them until you get thoroughly warmed up and begin to perspire. This condition should be attained by the time you get through the tenth exercise, and the eleventh exercise will tend slightly to prolong this delightful state of general organic activity. Now do not wait to cool off but, after taking a few of the breathing exercises, go at once to your bathroom and turn on the cold water. By previous arrangement you should see that your bathroom is warm. Having filled the tub about one-fourth full of cold water, take your sponge and while leaning over the tub bathe the arms first, then the chest, neck, shoulders and face freely with plenty of water.

Having done this, step into the tub with one foot and give the leg two or three spongefuls. Take this foot out after less than half a minute's exposure and put in the other foot and repeat the same process in the same time.

Now wring out the sponge partially and go rapidly over the abdomen, hips and back. Then take a linen towel and go over the whole body as quickly as possible, soaking up the water that may be left on the surface. As soon as this is accomplished, take your rough Turkish towel and go all over the body and limbs, rubbing gently but persistently until the whole surface of the skin is in a glow. This polishing off with the Turkish towel after the bath may be better done in a cooler room than the bathroom if it is accessible, as the reaction following the cold bath may start up the perspiration again if the room is too warm. Where bathrooms are not available the same process may be followed in one's sleeping-room.

Fig. 7A

A system of morning exercises such as I have described, if once earnestly entered upon, will soon get to be a matter of habit, and instead of being irksome will be thoroughly enjoyed. If the reader has any doubts on this matter let him try it a month and see.

The foregoing exercises may be thussummarized: 1, Stand between two chairs. 2, Twisting movement. 3, Clap hands under legs. 4, Touch floor. 5, Raise elbows and knees. 6, Touch toe right and left. 7, Steamboat movement. 8, Wood-chopping. 9, Right leg and left arm. 10, Rowing movement. 11, Two-step run. 12, Breathing exercise.

Fig. 8A

JOHN V. FARWELL'S START

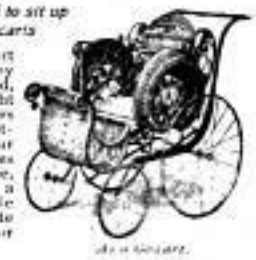
JOHN V. FARWELL is the founder of the great wholesale dry-goods house known as the John V. Farwell Company. Besides being a millionaire and a philanthropist, he is a leader in religious movements and is the founder of the Chicago Young Men's Christian Association.

"Strange as it may seem, I got on the track to business success through being discharged," says Mr. Farwell.

"I came to Chicago in 1845 with less than four dollars in my pocket. My resources consisted of an iron constitution, a fairly good education, and a strong religious belief.

"I at once set out earnestly to seek employment, and finally secured a position in the City Clerk's office. By virtue of the position I was soon assigned to make reports of the meetings of the City Council, securing for this work extra pay to the amount of two dollars the meeting. Soon, however, I ran against a snag that caused me to meet with shipwreck. In my office reports of the Council proceedings I narrated things exactly as they occurred and this did not please certain Aldermen. Although I received more than an inkling of this, I continued to make accurate reports, and the first thing I knew I was discharged from the employ of the city.

Fig. 10



"The blow was a severe one to me, as work was hard to find; and I was for a time deeply discouraged, but with the elasticity of youth I quickly rallied and soon found a position as bookkeeper for a dry-goods firm. It was in this place that I determined to become a merchant, and although my salary was very small, the work gave me an insight into the dry-goods business. After a time I was offered a position with another house at the magnificent salary of six hundred dollars the year, which enabled me to save a good deal of money. Within five years of my arrival in Chicago I was made a partner in this firm. Ten years later two young men, whose names are now generally familiar, were also admitted to the firm. These two men were Marshall Field and Levi Z. Leiter, and I do not go beyond the truth in claiming to have given them their primary education in business. I have sometimes wondered what would have been my lot if I had stayed in the City Clerk's office."

Fig. 12

Automatic Go-cart

Baby not compelled to sit up as in other go-carts

Handsome go-cart and inviting baby carriage combined, $5 to $25. A slight foot pressure lowers back, raises footrest, and your go-cart becomes a roomy carriage, comfortable as a cradle. So simple a child can operate it; no screws nor bolts.

As a Go-cart.

As a Baby Carriage.

As suitable for a child as for an infant. Overcomes every objection to the old style.

Also furnished with parasol. Write for catalogue.

We are builders of Baby Carriages, Invalid and Reclining Chairs. Write for Catalogue.

IF YOUR DEALER WON'T SUPPLY OUR GOODS, WE WILL SHIP DIRECTLY FROM FACTORY

Philadelphia Baby Carriage Factory

713 and 715 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia

You Pay But a SINGLE PROFIT

When you buy of us. We manufacture the latest style carriages, phaetons, surreys, buggies and harness, and sell direct from the factory to the buyer, with but a single profit added to the cost of making. No other factory can manufacture first-class vehicles at lower cost, nor sell to the dealer cheaper than we sell to you.

Our catalogue shows more styles than you will see at the dealer's. It accurately pictures and describes vehicles, harness, robes, blankets and all horse accessories. You absolutely run no risk when you order from us; if anything you buy should fail to satisfy you, return it and get your money back. Write for catalogue now.

* * *

THE COLUMBUS CARRIAGE AND HARNESS CO.

Columbus, Ohio

No. 2000 Phaeton price, $82.50

"Hebe herself could serve no daintier cup"

YERBA MATÉ TEA

This health-giving South American beverage was spoken of in the highest terms of praise at the recent International Commercial Congress in Philadelphia, not only by foreign delegates, but by representatives of the United States Government, who knew its good qualities from personal experience.

Hon. Eugene Seeger, United States Consul General at Rio, said: "The tea strengthens your body, brain and nerves, and enables you to endure all sorts of hardships. It has no unpleasant after effects, and I should like to see it given to our soldiers."

Captain da Gama, Government Delegate from Brazil, said: "Maté tea is a very strong aid to digestion and acts soothingly upon the nervous system. Maté will tend to lengthen the life of those who use it. I recommend this good article to Americans."

Senor Carlos R. Santos, Government Delegate from Paraguay, declared: "Maté tea is recommended for its hygienic, nutritious and invigorating properties by scientific journals and medical faculties, and that its general use in the United States depends solely upon its becoming more widely known is a fact beyond doubt."

Dr. W. P. Wilson, Founder and Director of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum, an institution which enjoys in the highest degree the confidence of the governments and business men of the entire world, gave orders for a careful analysis in the Museum laboratories, of Yerba Maté Tea. This analysis, which confirms those previously made in South America and Europe, will be published in these pages next month.

Send 5 two-cent stamps for sample of Yerba Maté Tea and illustrated booklet; or, better yet, send one dollar and receive, postpaid, with the booklet, a month's supply for several persons.

THE YERBA MATÉ TEA COMPANY

Sole Importers for the U. S. and Canada

257 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The "CHID" A Crackless Cuff

They are new, possibly not yet in the hands of your dealer; if not, we will supply you direct on receipt of price, 25c. the Pair

CHID CUFF COMPANY, Lippincott Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

BE AN ACTOR OR ACTRESS

Learn this noble profession at home, through the Desberger Method, also Elocution, Oratory and the Memory to retain volumes. "The Art of Acting," with fifty portraits of leading actors and actresses, sent free to all addressing

The Educational Institute of Drama

Dept. D, St. Louis, Mo.

Digitized by Google

WHAT to READ

At the Court of the Caliph*

HERE we have an exceedingly clever tale of the reign of Haroun-al-Raschid. Great was that Caliph, and ever wonderful must remain his splendid city of Bagdad.

The character celebrated in the title was the famous astrologer and physician, Geber, who dwelt in Tarsus and who was summoned to Bagdad to cure the Caliph's wife. Zobeide, loveliest and most-cherished of Queens, was singularly afflicted. One of her arms projected rigidly at right angles from her body, and nobody could move it until Geber took the sufferer in hand. He treated her most rudely, giving her a great shock—whereupon she moved it herself.

Geber had been to Alexandria, had studied the phenomenon of the tides, and had seen flying-fish. The wisdom of Bagdad did not include a distinguished knowledge of the operations of Nature. It expended itself for the most part in the subtleties of pure philosophy. In the best opinion of Bagdad, a flying-fish was an insect, and the tides occurred every six months and were caused by subterranean fires. It can be imagined that the Caliph, a ruler of practical inclinations, was strongly attracted by the specific knowledge of a traveler and observer like Geber. He had just bestowed upon one of the Bagdad wise men a purse of money and a gold chain for some apparently valuable observations upon a flying-fish which had been caught in the Tigris by a falcon, when Geber presented himself and exposed the fraudulency and worthlessness of the same. Thereupon the pretender groveled at the Caliph's feet, but Haroun took from him the purse and chain and caused him to be set in the stocks and branded across the forehead with the word "Liar!"

In this book, by means of its anecdotes and descriptions, one gets a vivid idea of the great Caliph and his city; and there is, besides, a story of pure romance, full of incident and passion, with intrigues and difficulties a-plenty, and it is all admirably told. We hear the gossip in the baths; we listen to the secrets of the Caliph's harem—secrets that would mean the taking off of a number of very pretty heads if the Caliph himself knew them; we roam the streets with Haroun and sit with him in his court of capricious and astonishing justice; we wander by the hundred mosques, and stifle and shudder in the Caliph's merciless, great prison; we follow poets and soldiers in their love-making; and always there is Geber, strongest of all the characters, stronger even than Haroun himself, for the Caliph could not bend the Queen's arm, and he knew nothing about flying-fish or the tides until Geber told him.

We notice on page 59: "I fear not death, nor thou, nor any man." Here, of course, "thou" should be "thee." We have noticed also two instances of the split infinitive, and in one case "transpire" is used in the sense of "occur." But there are few flaws to pick in the story; it is a remarkably good piece of writing. —E. D. Beach.

The Critic's Office

NOTHING is more alluring to the average book-buyer than a "set" of volumes, a series of publications bound alike, and presenting in their uniformity a pleasant aspect to any order-loving eye. Nothing is more agreeable to the average reader than to have these "sets" cover a great deal of ground in a rapid and desultory fashion, so that by their aid much information can be easily acquired and forgotten. Our library shelves are accordingly burdened with rows of little books about Men of Letters, and English Worthies and Great Statesmen, and gentlemen who have distinguished themselves in any walk of life; and now a new series is projected by Messrs. Blackwood & Sons, the initial volume of which has already been given to the public.

*Geber. By Kate A. Benton. The F. A. Stokes Co.

Modern English Writers—by which is meant writers recently deceased, like Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson, Mr. Browning, Mr. Froude and Mr. Ruskin, or, not to mention names, writers not yet deceased, but equally incapable of protest—are to furnish themes for these brief biographies. Mr. George Saintsbury, who leads the way with a life of Mr. Matthew Arnold, has been apparently selected for the difficult task because of his cold hostility to Mr. Arnold's cherished convictions, his distaste for the bulk of Mr. Arnold's work. He tells us, indeed, in a preface, that it is his endeavor to "help the reader who wants criticism"; but we doubt if any reader wants quite so much criticism on quite these lines.

It is easy to point out the inadequacy of Mr. Arnold's arguments on political and religious subjects; it is easier still to find occasional flaws in his verse; but a helpful critic might be better employed in showing a stupid world how the author of Culture and Anarchy and The Study of Celtic Literature upheld by precept and by example the dignity of letters and of life.

To dwell tediously upon Mr. Arnold's "false rhymes," "imperfect phrases" and "sham simplicities and pedantries" is as little real aid as to make enigmatic remarks about "the equivalenced octosyllables of the Coleridgean stamp," or "trochaic decasyllables of a rococo kind." Even sham pedantry might be better than this, and sham simplicity a genuine relief.

Mr. Saintsbury is of the opinion that Mr. Arnold was less "a man of ideas"—which it seems was his not unnatural ambition—than "a man of theories or crotchets." He wrote "respectable" verse—"respectable" is Mr. Saintsbury's favorite adjective in describing it—and agreeable prose, but his taste was often "hopelessly bad," and he was unfamiliar with "literary history." As a consequence, it would appear, of this lamentable unfamiliarity, he penned a "disparaging passage" on M. Gautier, "of whom," says his biographer severely, "I suspect Mr. Arnold knew little, and whom he was not quite fitted to judge, had he known more."

This is staggering. Whether Mr. Arnold had or had not read M. Gautier it would now be a trifle difficult to discover; but why, if he had read him, should he be "not quite fitted" to offer a criticism upon this charming but fallible Frenchman? It is true the disparaging passage indicated a lack of sympathy, a distaste, not wholly unreasonable, for M. Gautier's mental attitude, a limited appreciation of his power. Because Mr. Saintsbury's little volume is brimful of such disparaging passages, because disparagement chills every page, it may be that he is "not quite fitted" to assign to Mr. Arnold his place in the literature of England.

—Agnes Repplier.

THE FOUR-MASTED CATBOAT

Driven by a strong wind from two quarters

A Nautical Paradox*

CHARLES BATTELL LOOMIS, the author of this treatise on navigation, deserves recognition, if nothing worse. His writing is wholly mechanical, because he prefers the typewriter—an it, not a she.

It is long since Mr. Loomis has given so important a work to the public; he isn't giving books away, as a rule. But we recall the unfortunate history of his previous venture. We refer, of course, to the Surprising Adventures of Baron Munchausen, which, since its first appearance in 1732, has been rather discredited as a serious contribution to meteorology. In fact, we recall this unfortunate incident in our author's career merely to assert that he has lived it down. He is now qualified to write essays upon Descartes that would not be approached by those who knew what was in them, and his opinion upon Chaldaic grammar would have as much dead weight as that of any man of his inches.

Still, excepting his well-known poem, Beautiful Snow, Mr. Loomis has produced few masterpieces of eminent value—such as Trilby, Ben-Hur, David Harum, Robert Elsmere and Janice Meredith, and some of these, we believe, still find purchasers. But the Four-Masted Catboat is of course superior to them all in its clear-sighted psychological analysis of the Wagnerian Trilogy, though less succinct in epigrammatic conservatism of etymology. Besides, it is cheaper and quite as well illustrated.

Mr. Loomis (we give the statement for what it is worth) has no objection to the sale of this book at the retail price, as he is quite at ease in the presence of royalties. The volume costs no more than others of the same price, and is sold complete, with two covers and numbered pages. We understand that the proceeds of the book will contribute to the author's support, and that he is willing to keep right on writing on reasonable terms. A generous public should ask no more.

To sum up—the book is one of clean, bright American humor, and as funny as it is individual. I wish it had been written by —Tudor Jenks.

*The Four-Masted Catboat and Other Truthful Tales. By Charles Battell Loomis. The Century Company.

A Blast on My Own Horn

ONE must needs be a good musician to blow his own horn so that it shall not jar other folks' sensibilities—and I never studied music. If I praise the book people will say, "He is prejudiced in favor of it because he wrote it." Whereas if I say it is poor the same people will cry out: "That is merely a pose of his; he likes the book but thinks it not politic to say so."

The Four-Masted Catboat must be a good book or it would not bear the imprint of the company that publishes it. Papers like the Springfield Republican and the New York Mail and Express have said awfully nice things about it, so there we have a big publishing company and some leading critics who agree that the book is worth buying. It is full of very good pictures—pictures that are funny and that really illustrate the text, and that show that Miss Florence Scovel read the book and presumably liked it, or else she would have fallen down on her pictures. Publishers, critics, artist—unanimous.

I can testify to one thing: the stories that make up the book were not ground out—they were all written con amore.

Indeed, they were all written to amuse me. I need to be amused, and, as I live a hundred miles from any library and cannot afford to buy other peoples' books, I simply had to amuse myself. If the public finds them amusing also, what more can I ask?

But to the criticism. If you want to know what are the best things in the book, turn to those gathered under the heading At the Literary Counter. But they're all goo—no, I mean they're not so bad, any of them. They won't teach you to be better. I can't do that. But they won't teach you to be any worse—Heaven forbid.

I find them sadly lacking in continuity of thought. No sooner is one finished than another entirely different is begun, and that is irritating. I really don't believe that I'd care to read them through again in their entirety—I've done it so often, you know—but it's different with you, reader, dear reader. That you haven't read the Four-Masted Catboat and Other Truthful Tales, and that that pleasure may be in store for you is the earnest wish of the reviewer,

—Charles Battell Loomis.

"Twelve Months With the SOCIAL TRUST"

A Monthly Satire on Society, By A. PAUL GARDINER

The Combined Social Interests, represented by types carefully selected from Metropolitan Swelldom, seen at the prominent society functions for twelve months of the year.

For a Few Weeks Only this Folio of Beautifully Engraved Illustrations, size 8x12 inches, will be clubbed with a year's subscription to MODES AND FABRICS at $1.00. Folio alone, $1.50. Magazine, 50c. per year.

Types Included in the Social Trust

Departments in MODES AND FABRICS for 1909 conducted by Margaret Sangster, Harriet Spofford, Eben Rexford, Helen Watterson Moody, Virginia Van de Water.

FICTION from the pens of Julia Magruder, A. Conan Doyle, Justin McCarthy, I. Zangwill, Grant Allen, A. Paul Gardiner.

MODES AND FABRICS PUB. CO., Dept. A, 150 Fourth St., New York

Royal Stationery

Your Monogram or Initial engraved in any style shown or choice of three others, on Two quires finest Writing Paper (white or tinted) with 50 envelopes.

Stamped	Initial	Monogram
In Plain Colors,	$ .75	$1.25
In Gold, Silver or Bronze,	.85	1.35
Illuminated in Two Colors,	1.00	1.50

Send 2c. for handsome sample book and sheet of monograms.

Royal Engraved Visiting Cards Including Plate—

Finest Quality—Correct Forms—50 cards, 75c. 100 cards, $1.00 Samples Free.

Royal Wedding Invitations and Announcements Engraved. Samples Free. All charges prepaid.

ROYAL ENGRAVING CO. 18 S. 9th St., Phila.

TO GET AHEAD in the business world you must have a thorough knowledge of your work. Study at home in leisure hours, and we guarantee to fit you for a responsible, high-salaried position through the best course in the world of

EDUCATION BY MAIL

In Electrical, Mechanical, Steam, Mining and Civil Engineering, Metallurgy, Art, Architecture, Practical Newspaper Work, English Branches, Stenography, Machine Design and Mechanical Drawing. Low price; easy terms. Send free to those who enroll now, a complete drawing outfit worth $11.50, or other premiums. Mention subjects interested in when writing to

The Unified Correspondence Schools 154 5th Avenue, N. Y., for catalogue 88.

Uncle Sam's Examinations

for Civil Service appointments will soon be held in every State. 10,000 appointments last year! Chances even better for appointment this year. The National Correspondence Institute has prepared hundreds of applicants who have received early appointments. Instruction exclusively by mail. Particulars about all Government positions, salaries, dates of examinations, etc., free. Write to-day.

NAT'L CORRESPONDENCE INST. (Inc.) 20-41 24 National Bank Bldg., Washington, D. C.

Remington Typewriters render Reliable Service

STUDY GERMAN AT HOME

Send 25 cents for 3 months' trial subscription to

"Germania"

(Established 1888.) A monthly magazine for the study of the German language and literature. The only publication of its kind in the Union. Heartily indorsed by schools and colleges throughout the United States. Appeals to all progressive Americans and Germans. Each number contains a Business' Column, an Advertising Column, and a Column for Business Men. $1.00 a year.

NEW ENGLAND COLLEGE OF LANGUAGES 118-120 Boylston Street, Boston

Why Not Get Up a Play?

Descriptive Catalogue sent for the asking

WE CAN FURNISH ANY TITLE THAT IS IN PRINT

THE PENN PUBLISHING CO., 923 Arch St., Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

I have been investigating the matter of municipal ownership of public utilities and, among many interesting points, find that very many places have demonstrated by practical test that three-cent street-car fare will pay interest on a fair investment, and pay five per cent. sinking fund; which will pay off the purchase money in twenty years. In addition to this it will pay better wages and give shorter hours of labor. So a five-cent fare for a twenty-year franchise, taking four cents the day needlessly from the poor to give to the speculator, amounts to $249.60 from each man, woman and child that has to ride to work. That is a heavy tax on the poor, and is cruel because needless. About the same proportion applies to other things—gas, telephone service, etc. If the people will use their heads a little more they will get much more from the use of their hands.

Chicago, Illinois. ALLEN HERBEY SMITH.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

In this free and independent country of ours young America is taught from boyhood that he is the equal of any and all.

Now, though this may be true in the abstract, practically it is all false and one of the greatest detriments to a young man's success in life. He is free, to be sure—free to lay out his own life work, free to take advantage of the thousand and one opportunities that present themselves in this country as in no other, but he is not independent, nor will he ever be.

The richest and most successful American of to-day is dependent on some one to carry out plans which he may devise. There is not a prominent man of the present time who does not admit this dependence.

The young man who in a humble position takes pleasure in making himself agreeable to those with whom he comes in contact has, in my mind, made a long step on the road to success, and if he puts himself to some inconvenience his chances are all the better. If he is diplomatic and is eagerly watching the chance to advance the interests of his employer he is advancing his own chances.

So many young men feel that when they have put a sum in their employer's pocket equal to what they receive for their work that their duty is done. To any young man who feels this way let me say his day of usefulness is over. A young man's loyalty to his employer is only loyalty to himself and is sure to be repaid in time.

Honesty of purpose, devotion to that which your hand finds to do, a determination to win the good-will of people, backed by true politeness, will win for any young man an enviable position in life.

Detroit, Michigan. A. H. GRIFFITH.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Supplementary to Major-General O. O. Howard's article on The Elements of Success, permit me to relate an incident which in a large measure indicates the care with which General Howard laid the foundation of his successes.

At the time I speak of General Howard was in command of the Army of the Tennessee, comprising three Grand Army corps, and held the right of General Sherman's Army closing in on the City of Atlanta, then valiantly defended by General Hood with his ragged veterans who, though ragged as to uniforms, always seemed to have their guns in good working order.

The flanking movement which ended in the capture of Atlanta was about to begin, when two regiments of cavalry, the Seventh Ohio and Ninth Michigan, commanded by Colonel Israel Garrard, were ordered by General Howard to reconnoitre the dense forests in front of Howard's flanking column of nearly 40,000 infantry. Owing to the dense undergrowth in the Southern forest our cavalry was not able to operate mounted, and we went into the forest on foot as skirmishers at intervals of about thirty paces. We had an alert enemy somewhere in front of us, and it was our duty to locate this wide-a-wake foe. We advanced with the utmost caution, and every cavalryman had his finger on the trigger of his gun. Our line of skirmishers extended the distance of nearly a mile in Howard's front, and forty thousand men of the Army of the Tennessee were concealed behind our thin blue line.

We had advanced nearly a mile on the beginning of the grand flanking movement to the right when that part of the skirmish line, of which I was a part, was startled by hearing the breaking of twigs in our rear, indicating the presence of a possible enemy in exactly the wrong place. The undergrowth in the forest was so dense that it was impossible to see beyond thirty paces, and our advancing line instinctively halted to develop the cause of the unexpected noises. The veteran cavalrymen stood prepared to meet what might come, and their seven-shooting Spencer carbines were ready for quick action. The noise in our rear was slight, but enough to put us on our guard. We waited a few seconds, when we observed a moving of the bushes, indicating that some one was coming toward us.

Soon we made out two officers in the United States Army uniforms, and as they came nearer I observed that one of the officers wore a hat out of which the crown had been torn, and that his black hair rose above the place where the crown of his hat should have been. By this time the officers were near by, and, much to my surprise, one of them—the one whose hair stuck out of the top of his hat—wore the shoulder-straps of a Major-General, and in my next quick glance I noticed that he had only one arm. It was Major-General O. O. Howard, Commander of the Army of the Tennessee, and one of his aides.

The General explained his presence on the line of skirmishers by saying that he wanted to see the "lay of the land," and I add that, judging from after events, he was laying the foundation of the success which was justly his in the grand flanking movement then in progress.

Never before during the Civil War had I seen a Major-General on the cavalry skirmish line, and this one incident gave me an exalted regard for General Howard. THEODORE F. ALLEN, Formerly Captain Seventh Ohio Cavalry, Brevet-Colonel United States Volunteers, Wilson's Cavalry Corps.

Cincinnati, Ohio.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

I have read with much interest the articles published in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST on Why Young Men Fail. A writer who deals with the question from the standpoint of the young man attributes the lack of success in the majority of cases to the fact that the young man is not "in love with his work"—is not doing the work for which he is fitted. In other words, he is not able to subject his natural inclinations to his environment. This covers the matter very thoroughly with one exception: he does not consider the question of remuneration, which, after all, is the main question.

Every merchant requires help in some form. It may be a bookkeeper, a salesman, a stenographer, a clerk. He may require one man or one hundred.

Let us suppose the case of a boy fifteen years old who is starting out to work for the first time. After a few efforts—and in some cases, many efforts—he succeeds in getting a position as clerk in a store. It matters not what they sell; he must have work. There are perhaps two or three other employees in the same place. Every one is familiar with the type of establishment to which I refer.

When he calls to see the proprietor he is received pleasantly, and after the usual preliminaries he is told that there is a wide field for that particular business; that he will have a splendid chance to learn the business, etc. The young man then timidly approaches the subject of salary.

"Well," the employer answers, "we don't pay very high salaries at the beginning. We will give you three dollars and raise you as we go along."

The young man, filled with the bright promises which have been made to him, grasps at the "opportunity" and accepts the position. He does not mind the small salary. "Oh, that's all right; I will be raised soon," he says to himself. Alas! for his hopes.

He works very hard and steadily. At the end of six months he supposes he knows a little about the business and expects the promised increase. With eager face and trembling hands he receives the pay envelope. One glance at the figures on it and his heart falls within him. The raise is there. Yes, on the yellow envelope appears—$5.50.

After the first disappointment is over he says to himself: "Well, I'll do better next time." Another long wait, with a similar result. Still he hopes, and keeps on working.

At the end of two years he complains to the employer. That worthy laughs and says: "More money? Why, we can get all the boys we want for less than you are getting. No; we cannot do any better just now."

The result is that the young man sees how he has been deceived, and leaves.

Time goes on and he reaches his majority. He has changed from one business to another and consequently is master of none. Yet there he is, discouraged, disheartened. What can he do?

He is ambitious and willing. He dare not leave his ten-dollar position, fearing that he may not get another as good. What will become of him? Who knows? Who cares?

The thought will at once present itself to the reader: "Why doesn't he get another position? Why doesn't he get work in some place where his services will be appreciated? In some of the larger stores or offices?"

Yes. Why doesn't he?

We cannot all work in large stores or offices.

If he had been paid living wages in the beginning he would no doubt have remained in the original position, and would then have had an opportunity to become master of the business.

I want it understood that I do not refer to the listless, lethargic clock-workers, but to the ordinary, ambitious young man, without influence, with nothing but himself to depend on. I might also add that what I have said is not a mere supposition, but the facts of an actual case. D. J. GREEN.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

The Singer Cabinet Table

"MOTHER'S HELPER"

[Copyright 1899]

THE HANDY EXTENSION LEAF

Sold on Instalments. Old Machines Taken in Exchange

The Singer Manufacturing Co.

"Sewing-Machine Makers for the World"

NO SMOKE NO SMELL

THE ANGLE LAMP

"The light that never fails"

All the bother and fuss of the ordinary oil lamps that make life a burden is done away with in The Angle Lamp. It is a positive luxury in every respect. While more brilliant than gas or electricity it gives no more heat, never smokes, smells or gets out of order, is lighted and extinguished as easily as gas, and requires almost no care, none in fact when compared with any other lamp. Its economy is truly wonderful.

EIGHTEEN CENTS'

Worth of ordinary kerosene burns for one month, which is less than any other light, good or bad. The remarkable feature

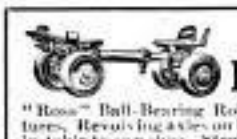
"NO-UNDER-SHADOW"

Insures all the light falling directly downward and outward. Thousands are in use in homes, stores, churches, offices, halls, etc., and are indorsed without reserve. If you wish to free yourself once and for all of the source of much worry and expense, send for our Catalogue "K," showing all styles from $1.80 up.

THE ANGLE LAMP CO., 76 Park Place, NEW YORK

NO FUSS NO DANGER

Alois P. Swoboda Teaches by mail, with perfect success, his original and scientific method of Physiological Exercise, without any apparatus whatever, and requiring but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring. By this condensed system more exercise can be obtained in ten minutes than by any other in two hours, and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart.



It is the only natural, easy and speedy method for obtaining perfect health, physical development, and elasticity of mind and body.

Perfect Health means an absolute freedom from those ailments which a well-informed mind knows are directly or indirectly due to a lack of properly arranged exercise.

Pupils are of both sexes, ranging in age from fifteen to eighty-six, and all recommend the system. Since no two people are in the same physical condition individual instructions are given in each case.

Write at once for full information and Booklet, containing indorsements from many of America's leading citizens, to ALOIS P. SWOBODA, Chicago, Ills.

A New Roller Skate

"Ross" Ball-Bearing Roller Skate. Special features, Revolving axles on ball bearings. Skate adjustable to any shoe. Steel tired, rubber-cushioned wheels. Indestructible. Send for catalogue.

NATIONAL SEWING MACHINE CO., Belvidere, Ills.

Geo. Andrew Lewis.

DO YOU STAMMER

Write at once for our new 200-page book, The Origin and Treatment of Stammering. The largest and most instructive book of its kind ever published. Sent free to any address for 6c. in stamps to cover postage. Ask also for a free sample copy of The Phono Meter, a monthly paper exclusively for persons who stammer. Address

The Lewis School for Stammerers
110 Adelaide Street, Detroit, Mich.

Digitized by Google

The New Mother Goose
By Guy Wetmore Carryl

The Singular Sang-Froid Displayed By Baby Bunting

BARTHOLOMEW BENJAMIN BUNTING had only three passions in life,
And one of the trio was hunting, and two were his babe and his wife;
And therefore, so rigid his habits, he frolicked at home until two,
And then began hunting for rabbits, and hunted till fall of the dew.

Belinda Bellonia Bunting, thus widowed for half of the day,
Her duty maternal confronting, with young Baby Bunting would play.
When thus was her energy wasted, a patented food she'd dispense.
(She had bought it the day that they pasted the posters all over her fence.)

But Bonaparte Buckingham Bunting (the infant thus blindly adored)
Replied to her worship by grunting, which showed he was brutally bored.
'T'was little he cared for the troubles of life. Like a crab on the sands
He blew a profusion of bubbles, and threatened the air with his hands.

Bartholomew Benjamin Bunting one night when his wife let him in,
Displayed as the fruit of his hunting a cottontail's velvety skin,
Which, seeing young Bonaparte wriggle, he gave him without a demur,
And the babe with an aqueous giggle soon swallowed the whole of the fur!

Belinda Bellonia Bunting behaved like a consummate loon;
Her infant in frenzy confronting, she screamed herself mottled maroon;
She felt of his vertebrae spinal, expecting the babe to succumb,
And gave him one vigorous final hard prod in the pit of his tum.

But Bonaparte Buckingham Bunting, at first but a trifle perplexed,
By a change in his manner of grunting soon showed he was terribly vexed;
He displayed not a sign of repentance, but spoke in a dignified tone,
The only consecutive sentence he'd uttered. 'T'was, "Lemme alone!"

THE MORAL: The parent that uses precaution his folly regrets.
An infant gets all that he chooses, an infant chews all that he gets:
And colics? He constantly has 'em so long as his food is the best;
But he swallows with never a spasm what ostriches couldn't digest.

Masterpieces of American Art

THE AMERICAN ART PUBLISHING CO. recently succeeded in making arrangements with AMERICA'S GREATEST ARTISTS for the reproduction of their MASTERPIECES in the finest photogravure process.

These photogravures represent paintings that have been sold for thousands of dollars, and others that are fresh from the artist's brush.

These reproductions would sell rapidly at any art store at $5.00 each, but they cannot be purchased except directly from us, as we absolutely control the copyrights.

BEAUTIFY YOUR HOME

You have read about many of these paintings and the enormous prices paid for them, but, doubtless, never even dreamed that you could obtain a perfect fac-simile in elegant form and at a nominal price to adorn your parlor or drawing-room.

These photogravures are printed from the finest plates that modern workmanship can produce, on extra heavy paper made expressly for this work, size 18x24 inches. Twenty-five of them are placed in a beautiful Portfolio, and so arranged that they can be conveniently removed for framing without injury to either the picture or Portfolio.

The masterpieces of twenty-five of America's Greatest Artists are now for the first time available in a single collection.

AN ART EDUCATOR

This Portfolio, besides being a beautiful ornament to any home, is also an Art Educator, and will at once stimulate a desire for the artistic.

Accompanying each picture is given a description of the painting, also a portrait and biographical sketch of the artist, an interesting account of his early studies, how he was led to take up art as a profession, in what schools and under what masters he received his instruction. It describes his trips and sojourns abroad, where and when his paintings were first exhibited and the honors they received both in Europe and America. The titles of the artist's most notable paintings are also given and where they now are. All of this information is not only interesting but exceedingly instructive.

Our Special Proposition

To all who make application this month the price will be less than one-third the regular price, and on very easy monthly payments. The Portfolio will be sent on examination, with the privilege of returning if not entirely satisfactory.

WRITE AT ONCE FOR FULL PARTICULARS TO American Art Publishing Co., No. 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City

GOODFORM CLOSET SETS

Keep clothes shapely, closets orderly and take only half the room you now use for the same garments. Money back if you want it.

MEN'S SETS—$3.00 each, express paid—12 garment yokes, 6 trousers hangers, 2 shelf bars, 1 loop.

WOMEN'S SETS—same price. Two sets one shipment, $5.50.

If your dealer hasn't them, remit to us. Booklet free.

SELLING AGENTS

Boston—R. H. White & Co.
Hartford—Brown, Thomson & Co.
Providence—Callender McAuslan & Troup Co.
Brooklyn—Frederick Loeser & Co.
Buffalo—Wm. Hengerer Co.
Washington, D.C.—E. H. Morsell.
Pittsburg—James Phelan.
Detroit—Hunter & Hunter.
Chicago—Marshall Field & Co. Browning, King & Co.
Omaha—Hayden Bros.
New Orleans—A. Shwartz & Son.
Denver—Daniels & Fisher.
San Francisco—Palace Hardware Co.
Los Angeles—The Hub.
Butte, Mon.—D. J. Hennessy Mer. Co.

CHICAGO FORM CO., 96-125 La Salle Street, Chicago, U. S. A.

Redfern Corsets

FRENCH GORED-SOLID WHALEBONE SOLD BY FIRST CLASS DEALERS

STARK TREES BEAR FRUIT

Best by Test—74 YEARS. Largest annual sale. We bud 4 millions Apple, whole-root graft 5 millions. WE PAY FREIGHT box and pack free, ask no money until safe arrival—Guarantee SATISFACTION. High quality—not high price. Fruit Book free. Visit us. 1400 acres Nursery. 43,000 acres Orchards. WE PAY CASH each WEEK and want MORE salesmen. STARK BRO'S LOUISIANA, MO. Dansville, N. Y. Stark, Mo., etc.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded Aº Dⁱ 1728 by Benj. Franklin

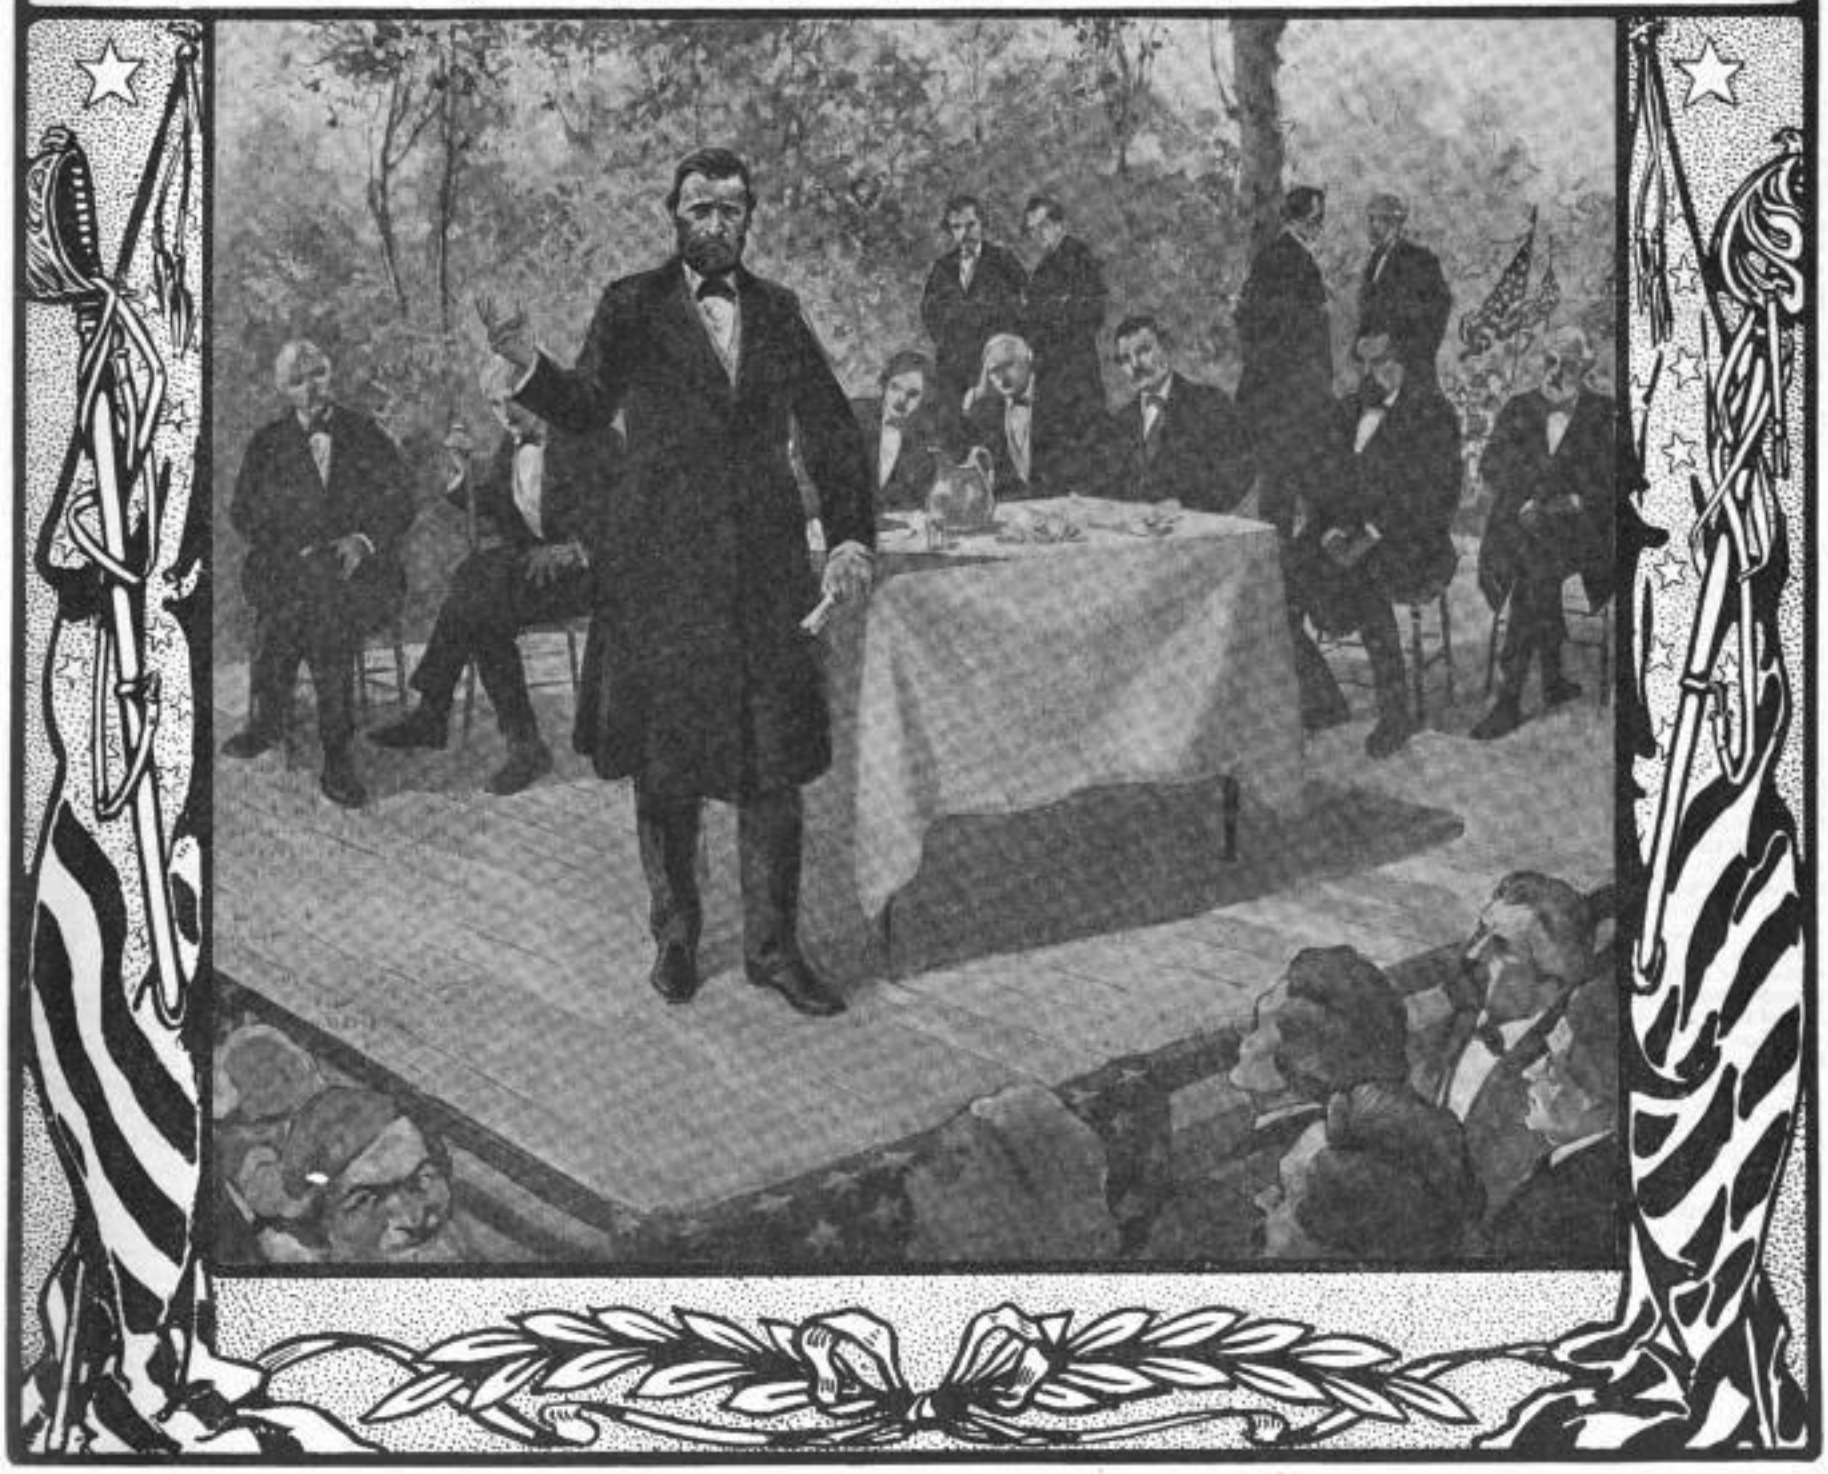
Volume 172, No. 34 — Philadelphia, February 17, 1900 — 5 Cents the Copy: $2.50 the Year



Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 421 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post Office as Second-Class Matter

GRANT'S Two Campaigns

By Colonel A. K. McCLURE

Digitized by Google

How WE make Presidents

Grant's Two Campaigns

By Colonel A. K. Mc CLURE

Drawings by CARL KLEINSCHMIDT

TO THE casual reader of our political history, the election and reëlection of Grant to the Presidency, immediately after the close of the war, would seem to be a result at once logical and inevitable; but there are few of the present day who have any knowledge of the many obstacles which confronted Grant in his transfer from the highest military to the highest civil duties of the nation.

It is noted that Grant, the Great Captain of the Age, was elected and reëlected by large majorities; that General Hayes, another soldier of national fame, succeeded him; that General Garfield, a soldier-statesman, succeeded Hayes, defeating Hancock, the most brilliant Democratic soldier of the war, by only a few thousand on the popular vote; that Blaine, the first civilian candidate of the party, was the first Republican to suffer defeat after the political revolution of 1860; that General Harrison, another honored soldier, was successful as the Republican candidate in 1888, and that Major McKinley, now Chief Magistrate of the Republic, carried his musket as a private in the flame of battle, and came out of the war an officer promoted for gallantry. With such a line of military Presidents the natural assumption of the student of our political history would be that General Grant's election came about because none could question its fitness?

There were many and very serious obstacles to Grant's nomination for the Presidency by the Republicans in 1868. First, he was not a Republican and never had been. He never voted a Republican ticket nor cast a Republican ballot until after he had been eight years a Republican President. His last vote before he entered the Army was cast for a radical pro-slavery Democrat, and he did not even sympathize with Stephen A. Douglas in 1860, although he lived in Illinois, the home of the great Democratic leader of that day. Second, he was resolutely averse to being a candidate for the Presidency. He was General of the Army, with freedom to retire without diminution of pay; he had no political training, and felt himself unfitted for a political career. He was honest and apparently fixed in his purpose not to become a candidate. These objections at first appeared to be insuperable obstacles to Grant's nomination, but he was human, and had he declined the Presidency when it was apparently within his reach he would have stood as the only man in the history of the Republic who had refused its crown.

WHY GRANT BECAME A REPUBLICAN

The Democrats were in a hopeless condition, and they at once began a systematic movement to make him their candidate. This alarmed the Republicans, and they made equally earnest and methodical efforts to make him their leader. It is doubtful upon which side General Grant would have fallen had it not been for the early estrangement between President Johnson and himself. Johnson made repeated attempts to overslaugh him either directly or indirectly. He ordered him to Mexico to get him out of the country, but Grant refused to go, and he afterward made an earnest effort to supersede Grant by calling General Thomas to the command of the Army, but Thomas stubbornly refused to consider the call. As the Republicans were then in bitter warfare against Johnson, Grant logically found sympathy in Republican circles, and finally, with visible reluctance, he agreed to become the candidate of the Republicans. Had he been nominated by the Democrats he would have been elected, but his Administration would have greatly conserved and liberalized the Democratic teachings of that day. His final assent to become the Republican candidate for President was obtained by the late Colonel Forney.

I was a delegate to the Republican National Convention of 1868, held in Chicago on May 21, and as Chairman of the Pennsylvania delegation cast the vote of the State for Grant for President and for Curtin for Vice-President. There was not a dissent to Grant's nomination in the entire convention. The Republicans did not stop to inquire what his political record had been; they knew that he was the implacable foe of President Johnson, and that was enough. Most of the Republican politicians would have preferred a more tractable man, but none had the courage to cast a vote against him.

When notified of his nomination, Grant electrified the country by his very brief letter of acceptance, ending with the sentence, "Let us have peace." Such an expression coming from the great hero of the war, whose whole distinction had been won in the field, was welcomed throughout the entire country, North and South, and he at once stood before the nation as an invincible candidate.

THE POLITICAL DEATH OF SENATOR WADE

The swift mutations in American politics were strangely illustrated in the nomination for Vice-President at that convention. Senator Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, who was about closing a term of eighteen years in the service of the Senate; who was then President pro tem. of that body, and who was expected to reach the Presidency for a period of eight months by the impeachment and dismissal of President Johnson, was the prominent candidate for Vice-President before the meeting of the convention. It was generally believed that Johnson would be successfully impeached; that Wade would become President for the remainder of the term, with illimitable patronage, and that his nomination for the Vice-Presidency was apparently assured. But when the delegates were on their way to Chicago the trained lightning sped the message westward that Johnson had been acquitted by a single vote in the Senate, and that ended Wade's candidacy. He had many friends independent of the prospective power that had made him formidable, and they made a stubborn battle for him, but though he was highest of all on the first ballot, on the fifth and final vote he had but 38 votes, to 541 for Schuyler Colfax, and 69 for Senator Fenton, of New York. Thus two crushing disasters had befallen Wade in a single week. He had the Presidency apparently within his grasp—and this would have carried the Vice-Presidency for another term—but he was smitten in both efforts, and the crowning disaster came soon after, when he was defeated for reëlection to the Senate. He was the sturdy, bluff, uncompromising patriot of the Senate during the war, and after these three disasters came upon him in quick succession the old man groped his way along for a few years in solitude and then slept the dreamless sleep of the dead.

HOW TILDEN BROKE THE DEMOCRATIC SLATE

The Democratic National Convention met in New York on July 4, and the Democratic leaders had planned to take a Republican for President, to offset the nomination of a Democrat by the Republican convention. It was regarded as settled by a confidential circle of leaders when the convention met in New York that Salmon P. Chase, who had become estranged from the Republican party, and who as Chief Justice had presided over the impeachment trial and aided in the acquittal of Johnson, would be nominated. Horatio Seymour, the ablest Democrat of that day, was President of the convention, and he had no more idea of being nominated for President than he had of becoming the Czar of Russia. He expected Chase to be nominated, and Chase would have been nominated but for the subtle and masterly strategy of Samuel J. Tilden, who decided that Chase must be defeated.

A conference of the leading friends of Davis and Greeley was held the night before the convention met

Tilden was a master leader, as cunning as he was able, and he quietly but thoroughly organized the plan to nominate Seymour. It had been arranged that Seymour was to leave the chair to nominate Chase, and therefore when Seymour called another to preside the Tilden strategy completed its purpose by an able delegate demanding the nomination of Horatio Seymour, and delivering a most eloquent and impressive eulogy upon the confessed leader of the Democracy. In vain did Seymour give a peremptory declination. The convention had been organized for its work, and men in nearly every delegation who had been assigned to their task rose and swelled the hurrah for Seymour. When he found the tide was likely to be overwhelming, he declared with equal earnestness and pathos, "Your candidate I cannot be"; but the wave sped on and Seymour was made the candidate by a practically unanimous vote.

He was prevailed upon to consider the subject, and that meant, of course, that he could not decline. There had been twenty-one ballots before the nomination of Seymour, in which Pendleton, Hancock and Hendricks were the leading competitors. It was then that the nomination of Chase was expected to be made just as the nomination of Seymour was made, and Tilden's was the master hand that shaped the action of the convention. Failing to nominate an old Republican for the Presidency, the convention then nominated General Frank P. Blair, the Republican leader in Congress when the war began, and one of the most successful and brilliant of our volunteer corps commanders in Sherman's march to the sea.

HOW MRS. SPRAGUE AVENGED HER FATHER

This action of Tilden defeating Chase in the Democratic convention of 1868 had its sequel with mingled romance and reality in the defeat of Tilden for the Presidency in 1877, when the vote of Louisiana was passed upon by the Senate. Kate Chase Sprague was the most brilliant woman in Washington society during the war period, and in every way one of the most attractive. Her home in Washington was the centre of the most accomplished men in public life, and among them was Roscoe Conkling, the ablest of the Republican Senators. The contest for the Presidency before the electoral commission in 1876–7 turned on the vote of Louisiana, and it required the approving vote of the Senate to give the electoral vote of that State to Hayes. Had it been given to Tilden he would have been the President. Many believed that Hayes had not been elected and should not be declared elected, and among those who shared that conviction was Mr. Conkling, although he did not publicly express it.

The Senate was carefully canvassed, and enough Republican votes were marshaled to throw the vote of the Senate in favor of Tilden on the Louisiana issue if Conkling would lead in support of that policy, and it was understood that he had agreed to do so. When the crucial time came Conkling did not appear at all, and the anti-Hayes Republicans, being without a leader, fell back to their party lines and gave the vote of the State and the Presidential certificate to Hayes. It is an open secret that Conkling was influenced by Mrs. Sprague, who thereby avenged the defeat of her father in the Democratic nomination of 1868, that had been accomplished by Tilden; and thus Tilden lost the Presidency to which he had been elected by a popular majority of over 250,000.

The contest of 1868 was very animated, though hopeless for Seymour, from the start. He took the stump after the October elections, which were adverse to him, and delivered speeches of great ability, but he was overwhelmingly defeated, receiving but 80 votes in the electoral college, to 214 for Grant, and of the 80 votes he received the 33 given to him in New York were of very questionable integrity.

In 1872 Grant was reëlected President over Horace Greeley, the candidate of the Democrats and Liberal Republicans, by a popular majority of 762,991, and in the electoral college received 300 votes, to 42 for Hendricks, 18 for B. Gratz Brown and six scattering. Greeley had died soon after the Presidential election in November and before the electoral colleges met in their respective States.

General Grant had not been eminently successful as a political leader, and before the close of his term he had arrayed against him a number of the ablest men of the party, including such Senatorial leaders as Trumbull, Fenton and Schurz, with Horace Greeley, the ablest Republican editor; Charles Francis Adams, Swett and Davis, of Illinois, the closest friends of Lincoln; General Frank P. Blair, Representative Grow, of Pennsylvania, and many others.

THE REACTIONARY MOVEMENT AGAINST GRANT

The Administration of Grant had become intensely sectional and intensely factional. It was intolerant of criticism, and Grant's disregard of Republican sentiment in sustaining many of his favorites who brought scandals upon his Administration aroused the opposition to revolutionary action. The first movement in the campaign was a call issued by a large number of prominent Republicans throughout the country for a Liberal Republican Convention to meet at Cincinnati on May 1, to nominate candidates for President and Vice-President. I was a member of that convention and Chairman of the Pennsylvania delegation, and had charge of the campaign in this State as Chairman of the State Committee. The convention was a remarkable assembly of very able independents in politics. The movement was supported by such able Republican journals as the New York

---

Editor's Note—This is the third paper in Colonel McClure's series, How We Make Presidents. The series was begun in the Post of January 6. Each paper is complete in itself.

Digitized by Google

Tribune, the Springfield Republican, the Philadelphia Press, the Cincinnati Commercial and the Chicago Tribune, and had the deliberations of the convention been wisely directed Grant would have been defeated for reelection.

Such an assertion will doubtless be questioned at this day by those who remember only what is commonly called the Greeley political fiasco of 1872; but at the time the Cincinnati convention met an overwhelming majority of the American people would have voted to defeat Grant had it been possible to do so without apprehension of disturbed financial conditions as the inevitable result.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ASPIRATIONS OF HORACE GREELEY

I had known Mr. Greeley for many years and cherished the sincerest affection and veneration for him. I first met him in Philadelphia at the Whig convention that nominated Taylor in 1848 when I was a boy editor, and his kind treatment made me his devoted friend thereafter. I always visited him when in New York, and was ever subject to his call for any service to his journal. When the Liberal agitation began, the prominent candidates discussed were Horace Greeley, Charles Francis Adams, David Davis, and B. Gratz Brown, of Missouri. Greeley became intensely interested in his own nomination. He felt that he had devoted his life to the best efforts for his country, and especially for the lowly. He was the foremost of all in the great battle for the overthrow of slavery, and he craved the recognition of his work by an election to the Presidency. Before the convention met he made an appointment to meet me at the Colonnade Hotel in Philadelphia. He felt that he could speak with entire freedom to me, and he opened his heart to the full extent of saying how much he desired the nomination and what it meant to him.

Could I have made him President I would gladly have done so, but I knew that he could not be elected, and told him so with frankness that he appreciated. He yielded to my judgment as to his availability, and accepted the suggestion that had then been made generally by the more conservative of the Liberal Republicans, that David Davis would be the only candidate who could certainly defeat Grant. He was the trusted friend and executor of Lincoln. He was conservative, able and clear-headed, and the business interests of the country would have had entire confidence in him. In answer to my statement that the Democrats certainly could not be united in Greeley's favor and without which an election could not be accomplished, he said: "Well, if they won't take me head foremost they might take me boots foremost," meaning for Vice-President. I said I did not doubt that his nomination for the second place could be accomplished with every prospect of success at the election. We parted with the distinct understanding that his friends should move unitedly to nominate David Davis for President and Greeley for Vice-President.

When we reached Cincinnati a conference of the leading friends of Davis and Greeley was held the night before the convention met, Senator Fenton being present as the leader of the Greeley forces. Leonard Swett, the immediate representative of Davis, was present, along with John D. Defrees, of Indiana, and a number of others. The plan of operation was agreed upon, and when we adjourned to enjoy a late supper we regarded it as settled that Davis and Greeley would be nominated on the next day.

THE NOMINATION OF GREELEY AND BROWN

About midnight it was whispered that General Frank P. Blair, as the representative of B. Gratz Brown, of Missouri, and others had held a secret conference to unite the Greeley and Brown forces to make Greeley the candidate for President and Brown second on the ticket. We soon discovered that the movement had been thoroughly organized, and many Greeley men who were much more zealous than discreet at once accepted the new situation and forced even Fenton to fall back to the support of Greeley. Fenton was one of Greeley's most sincere and devoted friends, and it was with great reluctance that he joined in the effort to nominate Greeley when he felt that it could result only in crucifying him. The withdrawal of the Greeley men from the Davis-Greeley combination left Davis a hopeless candidate, as the convention was largely radical and little inclined to consider questions of expediency.

I was greatly disappointed, for I could see nothing but disaster for Greeley's nomination, and a most unmerited and overwhelming defeat for him, but with all my personal affection for him I steadily voted against him, and for Charles Francis Adams, with whom I had little sympathy, and three-fourths of the Pennsylvania delegation voted with me. On the sixth ballot Greeley's nomination was accomplished, and I did not change the vote of Pennsylvania until he received a majority of the votes of the convention. The nomination of B. Gratz Brown for Vice-President followed, practically without a contest.

—"you ought to know that I would appoint no Cabinet officer from your section without your approval"

GREELEY'S WEAKNESS

When the convention adjourned I regarded the opportunity to make a successful contest against Grant as wholly lost. Greeley had been hammering the Democrats in his pungent paragraphs for thirty years and they could have little sympathy with him, and the business interests of the country could not accept a President whose financial policy was expressed in the single sentence, "The way to resume is to resume," referring of course to the resumption of specie payments, then the most vital issue. There were a number of prominent Democrats at the convention as spectators, and I was surprised to learn before midnight that many of them had decided to favor the nomination of the Cincinnati ticket by the Democratic convention. Soon after the Democrats of Indiana held their State convention and nominated Hendricks for Governor and declared in favor of the Cincinnati ticket and platform. This was the bugle-call that made the Democratic convention that met in Baltimore in July give practically unanimous votes in favor of Greeley and Brown, and also adopt the Liberal platform without any change whatever. The Democratic National Convention was a purely perfunctory affair, as it was settled before it met that the only hope for Democracy was to fall in with the Liberal Republicans.

Grant was renominated in the Philadelphia Academy of Music, where the Republican National Convention met on June 5. As the opponents of Grant had deserted the Republican standard, his nomination was unanimous. A bitter contest arose for the Vice-Presidency. Colfax would have been renominated without a struggle along with Grant had he not suffered from disordered health during the preceding session of Congress and announced that he would not be a candidate.

Later, Colfax changed his views on the subject and made a desperate battle to win what he had thrown away, but the tide was turned against him by the Washington correspondents, who had become estranged from him, although he had once been a great favorite in newspaper row. They made a most aggressive battle against him, and really accomplished his defeat and made Henry Wilson Vice-President.

From the time that Greeley was nominated, on the first of May, until probably a month after the meeting of the Democratic convention in July, everything pointed to his triumphant election. Leading men of the party were daily announcing themselves as his supporters, and a tidal wave that would sweep Greeley into the Presidency seemed certain. But in August the great business interests of the country, then rocked in the tempest of inflation created by the war, became appalled at the prospect of the election of Greeley, whose financial and business policy would be but an experiment. All knew that the business of the country was dangerously inflated and that a disaster must come sooner or later, but they felt that it would be delayed by the reelection of Grant, and in the brief period of one month the Greeley tide began its ebb, which doomed him to a most humiliating defeat. Had David Davis been the candidate there would have been no such apprehension in business and monetary circles, and I have never doubted that he would have been elected as the logical successor of Abraham Lincoln.

Although I had opposed the nomination of Greeley, he well understood that it was solely because I felt that I was thus a better friend to him than he was to himself, and I devoted my time to tireless effort to give him success. Outside his editorial duties, in which he was a master of masters, he was as guileless and unsophisticated as a child, and even his closest friends trembled when they regarded his election to the Presidency as more than probable. About the first of August, before the revulsion had become visible, I was sent for by Waldo Hutchings to meet the friends of Greeley in conference at the Astor House. Among those present were Mr. Hutchings, Whitelaw Reid, ex-Congressman Cochran, and several others, and they informed me that I had been sent for to call upon Greeley and earnestly admonish him against making any pledges or promises whatever, before the election, as to his Cabinet appointments. They said that if elected President his safety would be in having about him an able, faithful and discreet Cabinet, and they feared that in the kindness of his heart he would become complicated with those who sought to importune him for preferment. In order to keep him from visitors he was then hidden away in a private upstairs room in Brooklyn, where I was directed to call on my mission.

A MEMORABLE INTERVIEW WITH MR. GREELEY

I never saw a happier face than that of Greeley when I met him, as he was then entirely confident of success, and in a very kind and facetious way he reminded me that I had underestimated his strength with the people. When opportunity came in the conversation I suggested to him that a man who was elected President by a combination of opposing political interests would have very grave and complicated political duties to perform, and that he should especially avoid any Cabinet complications. With the simplicity and confidence of a child his answer was: "Don't misunderstand me; you ought to know that I would appoint no Cabinet officer from your section without your approval." He was surprised to find that I was not there to obtain promises, but to warn him against the peril of saying to others just what he had said to me, and after reviewing the conditions he agreed that his only safety was in avoiding all obligations relating to appointments until the duty confronted him.

He asked me to go to North Carolina and give a week to the campaign in that State, and to this I agreed. That was the last time that I saw the face of Horace Greeley. After the disastrous elections of October which clearly foreshadowed his defeat, he made New England and Western tours, and delivered speeches which well compare with the grandest utterances of our best statesmanship. But the tide against him was resistless, and while nursing a dying wife, and worn out by his ceaseless offices of affection, the blow came that clouded one of the noblest, purest and ablest of the great men of the land.

—stood at the tomb of Horace Greeley to pay the last tribute

On the last day that he put pen to paper he wrote me a brief letter stating that he was "a man of many sorrows," but that he "could not forget the gallant though luckless struggle" I had made in his behalf. Broken in health, bereaved in his affections, and disappointed in his greatest ambition, his reason toppled from its throne and he died an inmate of an asylum. The two chieftains of the political contest of 1872 were brought together soon after the victor and vanquished were declared; as President, Grant stood at the tomb of Horace Greeley to pay the last tribute of himself and the nation to the fallen philanthropist.

Where Woolf Learned Poverty

MICHAEL ANGELO WOOLF, whose black and white sketches of street waifs endowed with most of the ambitions of more favored children have given him a lasting place in the hearts of the people, knew what it was to be poor himself. For many years he was an actor. Once his company was stranded as far away from civilization as they could possibly get. Weeks afterward Mr. Woolf walked into New York an artistic wreck. He was seedy, polished with wear, but clean. He was unshaven and wore no shirt. His boots consisted entirely of soles held to his feet by fragments of uppers, and his toes were painted black so that from a short distance he looked like a man with the gout to whom his shoemaker had been uncommonly kind.

It appeared that Woolf was the only man in the company who had received his salary in full. He had spent every cent of it in paying the railroad fares home of the women of the company, and had walked back every step of the way.

Digitized by Google

The Haunted Inheritance

By E. Nesbit

THE most extraordinary thing that ever happened to me was my going back to town on that day. I am a reasonable being: I do not do such things. I was on a bicycling tour with another man—we were far from the mean cares of an unremunerative profession; we were men unfettered by any given address, any pledged date, any preconcerted route. I went to bed weary and cheerful, fell asleep a mere animal—a tired dog after a day's hunting—and woke at four in the morning that creature of nerves and fancies which is my other self, and which has driven me to all the follies I have ever kept company with. But even that second self of mine, whining beast and traitor as it is, has never played me such a trick as it played me then. Indeed, something in the result of that day's rash act sets me wondering whether after all it could have been I or even my other self who moved in the adventure: whether it was not rather some power outside both of us—but this is a speculation as idle in me as uninteresting to you, and so enough of it.

From four to seven I lay awake, the prey of a growing detestation of bicycling tours, friends, scenery, physical exertion, holidays. By seven o'clock I felt that I would rather perish than spend another day in the society of the other man—an excellent fellow, by the way, and the best of company. At half-past seven the postman came. I saw him through my window as I shaved. I went down to get my letters—there were none, naturally.

At breakfast I said:

"Edmundson, my dear fellow, I am extremely sorry, but my letters this morning compel me to return to town at once."

"But I thought——" said Edmundson. Then he stopped, and I saw that he had perceived in time that this was no moment for reminding me of the fact that, having given no address, I could have had no letters.

He looked sympathetic, and gave me what there was left of the bacon. I suppose that he thought that it was a love affair or some such folly. I let him think so; after all, no love affair but would have seemed wise compared with the blank folly of this sudden determination to cut short a delightful holiday—and go back to those dusty, stuffy rooms in Gray's Inn.

After that first and almost pardonable lapse Edmundson behaved beautifully. I caught the 9:17 train, and by half-past eleven I was climbing my dirty staircase.

I let myself in and waded through a heap of envelopes and wrappered circulars that had drifted in through the letter-box as dead leaves drift in through the areas of houses in squares. All the windows were shut. Dust lay thick on everything. My laundress had evidently chosen this as a good time for her holiday. I wondered idly where she spent it, and how, and the close, musty smell of the rooms caught at my senses, and I remembered with a positive pang the sweet scent of the earth and the dead leaves in that wood through which, at this very moment, the sensible and fortunate Edmundson would be riding.

The thought of dead leaves reminded me of the heap of correspondence. I went through it. Only one of all those letters interested me in the least. It was from my mother.

"ELLIOT'S BAY, NORFOLK, August 17.

"My Dear Lawrence: I have great news for you. Your great-uncle Sefton has died and left you half his immense property. The other half is left to your second cousin, Selwyn. You must come home at once. There are heaps of letters here for you, but I dare not send them on, as goodness only knows where you may be. I do wish you would remember to leave an address. I send this to your rooms in case you have had the forethought to instruct your charwoman to send your letters on to you. It is a most handsome fortune, and I am too happy about your accession to it to scold you as you deserve—but I hope this will be a lesson to you to leave an address when next you go away. Come home at once. Your loving mother,

"MARGARET SEFTON.

"P. S.—It is the maddest will. Everything divided evenly between you two, except the house and estate. The will says you and your cousin Selwyn are to meet there on September 1, following his death, in the presence of the family, and decide which one of you is to have the house. If you can't agree, it's to be presented to the county for a lunatic asylum. I should think so. He was always so eccentric. The one who doesn't have the house gets £20,000. Of course you'll choose that.

"P. P. S.—Be sure to bring your undershirts with you. The air here is very keen of an evening."

I opened both the windows and lit a pipe. Sefton Manor! that gorgeous old place! I knew its picture in Hasted—cradle of our race and so on—and a big fortune! I hoped my cousin Selwyn would want the £20,000 more than he wanted the house. If he didn't—well, perhaps my fortune might be large enough to increase that £20,000 to a sum that he would want.

And then suddenly I became aware that this was the thirty-first of August, and that to-morrow was the day on which I was to meet my cousin Selwyn and the family and come to a decision about the house. I had never to my knowledge heard of my cousin Selwyn; we were a family rich in collateral branches. I hoped he would be a reasonable young man. Also, I had never seen Sefton Manor House except in a print. It occurred to me that I would rather see the house before I saw the cousin.

I caught the next train to Sefton.

"It's but a mile by the field way," said the railway porter. "You take the stile—the first on the left—and follow the path till you come to the wood. Then skirt along the left of it and cater across the meadow at the end. You'll see the place right below you in the vale."

"Sefton Manor is a fine old place, I hear?" said I.

"All to pieces, though," said he. "I shouldn't wonder if it cost a couple of hundreds to put it to rights. Water coming through the roof and all."

"But surely the owner——"

"Oh, he never lived there—not since his son was taken. He lived in the lodge; it's on the brow of the hill looking down on the Manor House."

"Is the house empty?"

"As empty as a rotten nut-shell except for the old sticks and furniture. Any one who likes," added the porter, "can lie there o' nights—but it wouldn't be me!"

"Do you mean there's a ghost?" I hope I kept any note of undue elation out of my voice.

"I don't hold with ghosts," said the porter, grinning, "but my aunt was in service at the lodge, and there's no doubt but something walks there."

"Come," I said, "this is very interesting." I gave the man a shilling and he told me about the ghost at Sefton Manor House. Indeed, about the ghosts, for there were two, it seemed: a lady in white and a gentleman in a slouch hat and riding-cloak.

"They do say," said my porter, "as how one of the young ladies, once on a time, was wishful to elope, and started so to do—not getting farther than the hall door—her father, thinking it to be burglars, fired out of the window, and the happy pair fell on the doorstep, corpses."

"Is it true, do you think?"

The porter did not know. At any rate, there was a tablet in the church to Maria Sefton and George Ballard—and "something about in their death them not being divided."

I took the stile, I skirted the wood, I tramped across the meadows, and I came out on a chalky ridge held in a net of pine roots where dog violets grew. Below stretched the green park, dotted with trees. The lodge, stuccoed but solid, lay below me. Smoke came from its chimneys. Lower still lay the Manor House—red brick with gray lichened mullions—a house in a thousand—Elizabethan—and from its twisted, beautiful chimneys no smoke arose. I hurried across the short turf toward the Manor House. I had no difficulty in getting into the great garden. The bricks of the wall were everywhere displaced or crumbling. The ivy had forced the coping-stones away; each red buttress offered a dozen spots for foothold. I climbed the wall, and found myself in a garden—oh, but such a garden! There are not half a dozen such in England. Clipped box hedges, rosaries, fountains, yew-tree avenues, bowers of clematis, now feathery in its seeding time, great trees, gray-grown marble balustrades and steps, terraces, green lawns—one green lawn in special, girt around with a sweet-briar hedge, and in the middle of this lawn a sun-dial. All this was mine—or, to be more exact, might be mine, should my cousin Selwyn prove to be a person of sense. How I prayed that he might not be a person of taste! That he might be a person who liked yachts, or race-horses, or diamonds—or anything that money can buy—not a person who liked beautiful Elizabethan houses, and gardens old beyond belief.

The sun-dial stood on a mass of masonry—too low and wide to be called a pillar. I mounted the two brick steps and leaned over to read the date and the motto:

"TEMPVS FVGIT MANET AMOR"

The date was 1617; the initials S. S. surmounted it. The face of the dial was unusually ornate—a wreath of stiffly drawn roses was traced outside the circle of the numbers. As I leaned there a sudden movement on the other side of the pedestal compelled my attention. I leaned over a little farther to see what had rustled. A rat? A rabbit? A flash of pink struck at my eyes—a lady in a pink dress was sitting on the step at the other side of the sun-dial.

I suppose some exclamation escaped me—the lady looked up. Her hair was dark—and her eyes! her face was pink and white, with a few little gold-colored freckles on nose and on cheekbones. Her dress was of pink cotton stuff, thin and soft. She looked like a beautiful pink rose.

Our eyes met.

"I beg your pardon," said I. "I had no idea——" There I stopped, and tried to crawl back to firm ground. Graceful explanations are not best given by one sprawling on his stomach across a sun-dial.

By the time I was once more on my feet she too was standing.

"It is a beautiful old place," she said gently, or, as it seemed, with a kindly wish to relieve my embarrassment. She made a movement as if to turn away.

"Quite a show place," said I, stupidly enough, but I was still a little embarrassed, and I wanted to say something—anything

MY LAUNDRESS HAD EVIDENTLY CHOSEN THIS AS A GOOD TIME FOR HER HOLIDAY

Digitized by Google

to arrest her departure. You have no idea how pretty she was. She had a straw hat in her hand, dangling by soft black ribbons. Her hair was all fluffy—soft, like a child's.

"I suppose you have seen the house?" I asked.

She paused, one foot still on the lower step of the sun-dial, and her face seemed to brighten at the touch of some idea, as sudden as welcome.

"Well, no," she said; "the fact is—I wanted frightfully to see the house. In fact, I've come miles and miles on purpose—but there's no one to let me in."

"The people at the lodge?" I suggested.

"Oh, no," she said. "I—the fact is, I—I don't want to be shown around—I want to explore!" She looked at me critically. Her eyes dwelt on my right hand, which lay on the sun-dial.

I have always taken reasonable care of my hands, and I wore a good ring—a sapphire cut with the Sefton arms: an heirloom, by the way. Her glance at my hand preluded a longer glance at my face. Then she shrugged her pretty shoulders.

"Oh, well," she said, and it was as if she had said plainly, "I see that you are a gentleman and a decent fellow—why should I not look over a house in your company? Introductions? Bah!"

All this her shrug said without mistake, as without words.

"Perhaps," I hazarded, "I could get the keys."

"Do you really care very much for old houses?"

"I do," said I; "and you?"

"I care so much that I nearly broke into this one. I should have if the windows had been an inch or two lower."

"I am an inch or two higher," said I, standing squarely so as to make the most of my six feet two beside her five feet four, or thereabouts.

"Oh, if you only would," said she.

"Why not?" said I.

She led the way past the marble basin of the fountain, and along the historic yew avenue, planted like all old yew avenues by that industrious gardener, our Eighth Henry; then across a lawn and through a winding, grassy, shrubbery path that ended at a green door in the garden wall.

"You can lift this latch with a hairpin," said she, and I therewith lifted it.

We walked into a courtyard. Young grass grew green between the gray flags on which our steps echoed.

"This is the window," said she; "you see, there's a pane broken. If you could get on to the window-sill you could get your hand in and undo the hasp—and——"

"And you?"

"Oh, you'll let me in by the kitchen door."

I did it. My conscience called me a burglar in vain. Was it not my house, or as good as my own house?

I let her in at the back door. We walked through the great dark kitchen, where the old three-legged pot towered large on the hearth, and the old spits and fire-dogs still kept their ancient place. Then through another kitchen, where red rust was making its full meal of a comparatively modern range.

Then into the great hall where the old armor and the buff-coats and round caps hung on the walls, and where the carved stone staircases ran at each side up to the gallery above.

The long tables that ran down the hall were scored by the knives of the many who had eaten meat there—initials and dates were cut into them. The roof was groined, the windows were low-arched.

"Oh, but what a place!" said she. "This must be much older than the rest of it."

"Evidently; about 1300, I should say."

"Oh, let us explore the rest," she cried; "it is really a comfort not to have a guide, but only a person like you who just guesses comfortably at dates. I should hate to be told exactly when this place was built."

We explored ballroom and picture gallery, white parlor and library. Most of the rooms were furnished—all heavily, some magnificently—but everything was dusty and faded.

It was in the white parlor, a spacious paneled room on the first floor, that she told me the ghost story, substantially the same as my porter's tale, only in one respect different.

"And so, just as she was leaving this very room—yes, I'm sure it was this room, because the woman at the inn pointed out this double window and told me so—just as the poor lovers were creeping out of the door the cruel father came quickly out of some dark place and killed them both. So now they haunt it."

"It's a terrible thought," said I gravely; "and how would you like to live in a haunted house?"

"I couldn't," said she quickly.

"Nor I. It would be too——" My speech would have ended flippantly but for the grave set of her features.

"I wonder who will live here," she said; "the owner is just dead, they say. It is an awful house, full of ghosts. Of course one is not afraid now." The sunlight lay golden and soft on the dusty parquet of the floor. "But at night, when the wind wails and doors creak—oh, it must be awful!"

"I hear the house has been left to two people—or rather, one is to have the house and the other a sum of money," said I. "It's a beautiful house, full of beautiful things, but I should think at least one of the heirs would rather have the money."

"Oh, yes, I should think so, certainly. I wonder whether the heirs know about the ghost. The lights can be seen from the inn, you know, at twelve o'clock. They can see the ghost in white at the window."

"Never the black one?"

"Oh, yes, I suppose so."

"The ghosts don't appear together?"

"No."

"I suppose," said I, "whatever it is that manages such things knows that the poor ghosts would like to be together, so it won't let them."

She shivered.

"Come," she said, "we have seen all over the house; let us get back into the sunshine. Now I will go out and you shall bolt the door after me, and then you can come out by the window. Thank you so much for all the trouble you have taken. It has really been quite an adventure."

I rather liked that expression—and she hastened to spoil it.

"Quite an adventure, going all over this glorious old place, and looking at everything one wanted to see, and not just at what the housekeeper didn't mind your looking at."

She passed through the door, but when I had closed it and prepared to lock it I found that the key was no longer in the lock. I looked on the floor, I felt in my pockets, and at last, wandering back into the kitchen, discovered it on the table, where I'm sure I never put it.

DRAWN BY JNO. CASSEL

"DEAR," SAID I, AND WE WERE NEITHER OF US LAUGHING THEN, "CAN'T IT BE OUR HOUSE?"

When I had fitted that key into the lock and turned it and got out of the window and made that fast, I dropped into the yard. No one shared its solitude with me. I searched garden and pleasure grounds, but never a glimpse of pink rewarded my anxious eyes. I found the sun-dial again and stretched myself along the warm brick of the wide step where she had sat, and called myself a fool.

I had let her go—I did not know her name—I did not know where she lived. She had been at the inn, but probably only for lunch. I should never see her again, and certainly in that event I should never see again such dark, soft eyes, such hair, such a contour of cheek and chin, such a frank smile—in a word, a girl with whom it would be so delightfully natural for me to fall in love. In all the time she had been talking to me of architecture and archæology, of dates and periods, of carvings and mouldings, I had been recklessly falling in love with the idea of falling in love with her. I had cherished and adored this delightful possibility, and now my chance was over. Even I could not definitely fall in love after one interview with a girl I was never to see again! And falling in love is so pleasant! I cursed my lost chance, and went back to the inn. I talked to the waiter.

"Yes, a lady in pink had lunched there—with a party—had gone on to the Castle—a party from Tonbridge, it was."

Barnhurst Castle is close to Sefton Manor. The inn lays itself out to entertain persons who come in brakes and carve their names on the walls of the Castle keep. The inn has a visitors' book. I examined it. Some twenty feminine names! Any one might be hers. The waiter looked over my shoulder. I turned the pages.

"Only parties staying in the house in this end of the book," said the waiter.

My eye caught one name.

"Selwyn Sefton," in a clear, round, black handwriting.

"Staying here?" I pointed to the name.

"Yes, sir. Came to-day, sir."

"Can I have a private sitting-room?"

I had one. I ordered my dinner to be served in it, and I sat down and considered my course of action.

Should I invite my cousin Selwyn to dinner and ply him with wine and exact promises? Honor forbade! Should I seek him out and try to establish friendly relations? To what end?

Then I saw from my window a young man in a light checked suit, with a face at once pallid and coarse. He strolled along the gravel path, and a woman's voice in the garden called, "Selwyn."

He disappeared in the direction of the voice. I don't think I ever disliked a man so much at first sight.

"Brute!" said I; "why should he have the house? He'd stucco it all over, as likely as not; perhaps let it. He'd never stand the ghost, either——"

Then the inexcusable darling idea of my life came to me—striking me rigid—a blow from my other self. It must have been a minute or more before my muscles relaxed, and my arms fell at my sides.

"I'll do it," I said.

I dined. I told the people of the house not to sit up for me—I was going to see friends in the neighborhood and might stay the night with them. I took my Inverness cape with me on my arm, and my soft felt hat in my pocket. I wore a light suit and a straw hat.

Before I started I leaned cautiously from my window. The lamp at the bow window next to mine showed me the pallid young man smoking a fat, reeking cigar. I hoped he would continue to sit there smoking. His window looked the right way. And if he didn't see what I wanted him to see some one else in the inn would. The landlady had assured me that I should disturb no one if I came in at half-past twelve.

I bought candles in the village, and as I went down across the park in the soft darkness I turned again and again to be sure that the light and the pallid young man were still at that window. It was now past eleven.

I got into the house. I lighted a candle and crept through the dark kitchens, whose windows, I knew, did not look toward the inn. When I came to the hall I blew out my candle. I dared not show light prematurely in the unhaunted part of the house.

I gave myself a nasty knock against one of the long tables, but it helped me to get my bearings, and presently I laid my hands on the stone balustrade of the great staircase. You would hardly believe me if I were to tell you truly of my sensations as I began to grope these stairs. I am not a coward—at least, I had never thought so till then—but the absolute darkness unmanned me. I had to go slowly, or I should have lost my head and blundered up the steps three at a time, so strong was the feeling of something—something uncanny just behind me.

Digitized by Google

I set my teeth—I reached the top of the stairs, felt along the walls, and after a false start, which landed me in the great picture gallery, I found the white parlor, entered it, closed the door, and felt my way to a little room without a window, which must have been a powdering-room.

Here I ventured to relight my candle.

Then I closed the powdering-room door behind me. I felt my way to the mantelpiece and took down the two brass twenty-light candelabra. I placed these on a table a yard or two from the window, and in them set up my candles.

Then I went back into my little room, put on the Inverness cape and the slouch hat, and looked at my watch. Eleven-thirty. I must wait. I sat down and waited. The chill of the night and of the damp, unused house made me shiver.

Finally I opened the door, crept on hands and knees to the table, and keeping myself below the level of the windows, I reached up a trembling arm and lighted one by one my forty candles. The room was a blaze of light. My courage came back to me with the retreat of the darkness. I was far too excited to know what a fool I was making of myself. I rose boldly and struck an attitude over against one window where the candlelight shone upon as well as behind me. My Inverness was flung jauntily over my shoulder. My soft black felt twisted and slouched over my eyes.

There I stood for the world—and particularly for my cousin Selwyn—to see; the very spit and image of the ghost that haunted that chamber. And from my window I could see the light in that other window, and indistinctly the lounging figure there. Then I heard deep down in the house a sound, very slight, very faint.

Then came silence. I drew a deep breath. The silence endured. And I stood by my lighted window. After a very long time, as it seemed, I heard a board creak, and then a soft, rustling sound that drew near and seemed to pause outside the very door of my parlor.

Again I held my breath, and now I thought of the most horrible story Poe ever wrote—The Fall of the House of Usher—and I fancied that I saw the handle of that door move. The fancy passed and returned.

Then again there was silence. And then the door opened with a soft, silent suddenness, and I saw in the doorway a figure in trailing white. Its eyes blazed in a death-white face. It made two ghostly, gliding steps forward, and my heart stood still. I had not thought it possible for a man to experience so sharp a pang of sheer terror. I had masqueraded as one of the ghosts in this accursed house. Well, the other ghost, the real one, had come to meet me.

The ghost, I say, took two steps forward, then it threw up its arms—the lighted taper it carried fell on the floor, and it reeled back against the door with its arms across its face.

The fall of the candle woke me as from a nightmare. I perceived that my ghost was human; I cried incoherently: "Don't! It's all right!"

The ghost dropped its hands and turned agonized eyes on me. I tore off my cloak and hat.

"I—didn't—scream," she said, and with that I sprang forward and caught her in my arms—my poor, pink lady—white now as a white rose!

I carried her into the powdering-room, left one candle with her, extinguishing the others hastily, for now I saw what, in my extravagant folly, had escaped me before—that my ghost exhibition might bring the whole village down on the house. How, in the madness of that night's folly, I had thought to bring a flask passes my understanding. But I had done it. Now I rubbed her hands with some of the contents. I rubbed her temples and tried to force some between her lips. At last she sighed and opened her eyes.

"Are you better?"

She moved her head on my arm. Again she sighed, and her eyes closed. I gave her more brandy.

"I'm all right now," she said faintly. "It served me right. How silly it all is." Then she began to laugh, and then she began to cry.

It was at this moment that we heard voices on the terrace below. She clutched at my arm in a frenzy of terror, the bright tears glistening on her cheeks.

"Oh, not any more!" she cried. "I can't bear it."

"Hush!" I said, taking her hand strongly in mine; "I've played the fool, so have you—we must play the man now. The people in the village have seen the lights, that's all. They think we're burglars. They can't get in. Keep quiet, and they'll go away."

But when they did go away they left the local constable on guard. He kept guard like a man till daylight began to creep over the hill, and then he crawled into the hayloft and fell asleep; small blame to him.

But through those long hours I sat beside her and held her hand. At first she clung to me as a frightened child clings, and her tears were the prettiest, saddest things to see.

As we grew calmer we talked.

"I did it to frighten my cousin," I owned. "I am Laurence Sefton, and the place is to go either to me or to my cousin Selwyn. And I wanted to frighten him off it."

She looked at me.

"I don't know how I ever could have thought I was brave enough to do it—but I did want the house so—and I wanted to frighten you," my pink lady said at last.

"To frighten me? Why?"

"Because I am your cousin Selwyn," she said, hiding her face in her hands.

"And you knew me?" I asked.

"By your ring," she said. "I saw your father wear it when I was a little girl. Can't we go back to the inn now?"

"Not unless you want every one to know how silly we have been."

"And who is to have the house?" she said.

"Why, you, of course!"

"I never will."

"Why?"

"Oh—because!"

"Can't we put off the decision?" I asked.

"Impossible. We must decide to-morrow—to-day."

"Well—when we meet to-morrow—I mean to-day—with lawyers and chaperons and mothers and relations, give me one word alone with you."

"Yes," she said with docility.

"Do you know," she said presently, "I can never respect myself again. To undertake a thing like that—then be so frightened—oh, I thought you really were the other ghost."

"I will tell you a secret," said I. "I thought you were—and I was much more frightened than you."

"Oh, well," she said, leaning against my shoulder as a tired child might have done, "if you were frightened, too, Cousin Laurence, I don't mind so very, very much."

It was then that, cautiously looking out of the parlor window for the twentieth time, I had the happiness of seeing the local police disappear into the stable, rubbing his eyes.

We got out of a window on the other side of the house, and went back to the inn across the dewy park. The French window of the sitting-room which had let her out let us both in. No one was stirring, so no one, save she and I, was any the wiser as to that night's work.

It was like a garden-party next day, when lawyers and executors and aunts and relatives met on the terrace in front of Sefton Manor House.

"Your decision," said my great-uncle's solicitor, "has to be given within the hour."

"My cousin and I will announce it within that time," I said, and gave her my arm.

Arrived at the sun-dial, we stopped.

"This is my proposal," I said; "we will say that we decide that the house is yours—we will spend the £20,000 in restoring it and the grounds. By the time that's done we can decide who is to have it."

"But how?"

"Oh—we'll draw lots—or toss a halfpenny."

"I'd rather decide now," she said. "You take it."

"No—you shall."

"I'd rather you had it. I—I don't feel so greedy as I did yesterday," she said.

"Neither do I. Or, at any rate, not in the same way."

"Do—do take the house," she said very earnestly.

Then I said: "My cousin Selwyn, unless you take the house I shall make you an offer of marriage."

"Oh!" she breathed.

"And when you have declined it on the very proper grounds of our too slight acquaintance, I will take my turn at declining. I will decline the house. Then if you are obdurate, it will become an asylum. Don't be obdurate. Pretend to take the house, and——"

"Very well," she said, "I will pretend to take the house, and when it is restored——"

"We'll spin the penny."

So, before the waiting relatives, the house was adjudged to my cousin Selwyn.

When the restoration was complete I met Selwyn at the sun-dial. We had met there often in the course of the restoration, in which business we both took an extravagant interest.

"Now," I said, "we'll spin the penny. Heads, you win."

I spun the coin. It fell on the brick steps of the sun-dial, and stuck upright there, wedged between two bricks.

She laughed. I laughed.

"It's not my house," I said.

"It's not my house," said she.

"Dear," said I, and we were neither of us laughing then, "can't it be our house?"

And, thank God, our house it is!

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

LORD PAUNCEFOTE, WHO IS THE DEAN OF THE CORPS

WASHINGTON,
January, 1900.

I REMEMBER somewhere in my reading a saying of Bulwer's to this effect: "Society is a wall of strong masonry; it may be snapped in the course of a thousand years, but stormed in a day—No!" And I am beginning to find this out. Here I have been for several weeks knocking steadily at society's inner door and it still remains closed to me, though I am cheered by the light which shines through the keyhole. I have been careful that my knocking should be gentle and persuasive rather than loud or aggressive, so that those within may perhaps be tempted to open a crevice just to find out whose is the velvet hand.

The outer door has already swung wide open, and I have crossed the door-sill almost with a bound. In consequence, there have been so many happenings and I have met so many brilliant people and heard so much gossip that I scarcely know where to begin my chronicle.

I have not dared to let any one, not even Robert, nor yet Page, know how utterly impressed I have been by some events, notably by that of the New Year reception at the White House. I have been afraid that if I did they would say, "Poor thing! No wonder she is impressed; she is a new Congressman's wife; she comes from Spruce City."

But others were as much impressed by the spectacle at the White House as I. In the first place, the official set had just emerged from the mourning period of thirty days imposed out of respect to the memory of the Vice-President, and the last of December had been given over to the débutantes, who bloomed into society by dozens. Congress had adjourned, and there was little going on. I had had one or two teas and one delightful breakfast given by Mrs. Frye, wife of the President of the Senate pro tem. This breakfast was unique for the reason that it was given in the Senator's committee-room at the Capitol, and the mingling of official and resident women made it informal and charming, like the hostess herself. Notwithstanding these pleasant events, December was dull; therefore, when New Year's Day came around every one who had the right to go to the White House was glad enough of the privilege.

I was one of the lucky ones bidden on that day behind the receiving line in the Blue Room. I dreaded to face the ordeal alone, for Robert could not join me until he had paid his respects to the great Chief. But you may be sure that I did not miss any feature of the whole pageant. I was astonished to find that no way has ever been devised to mark the line in the Blue Room where the receiving party stands save the very primitive fashion of drawing out across the room the blue upholstered sofas and chairs, with their backs turned outward to form a barrier to the crowd. In front of this barrier the receiving party stands; behind it are those bidden as guests.

THE WIFE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

What with the decorations, the uniforms, the military band, the buglers, the etiquette and the official atmosphere pervading everything, the occasion was more like that of a foreign court than anything American. I had only a few minutes in which to gaze around, and it seemed to me that the entire crowd was made up of people, particularly of women, known all over the land. There were young girls and old girls, wives and widows of Generals, Admirals, Judges and Cabinet officers. Some with bonnets and some without, but one and all in festal array.

I saw two or three representatives of former White House dynasties in the persons of Mrs. Harriett Lane Johnston, Mrs. Fred. Grant and Mrs. Stanley Brown. The latter, more familiarly known as Molly Garfield, is a perfect picture of the best type of young American womanhood.

I saw Mrs. Miles, wife of the General of the Army, and Mrs. Philip Sheridan, and Mrs. Henderson, wife of the new Speaker, who is a demure, quiet-looking woman about whom there is some speculation as to the part she will play in the social world. Time was, I am told, when the wife of the Speaker was a brilliant figure in Washington life, but it must have been years ago. Last but not least in all the throng was Mrs. George Dewey. Of course Mrs. Dewey was the centre of attention, and she was most exquisitely gowned in white brocaded satin. As I stared around I could not help a sigh of relief. If I did come from Spruce City, and if I should even be called a "wild and woolly" Westerner, my gown was as handsome and as chic as any in the room, not even excepting that of Mrs. Dewey. Robert had thought that I was terribly overdressed when we started from home.

Editor's Note—This is the second paper in the series, The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife. The series will run through twelve numbers. Each paper is complete in itself.

Digitized by Google

He even demurred at going with me "rigged out" in white, as he styled it, and I was only waiting for him to see these other women. I was thinking this when a blast from the buglers announced the coming of the Presidential party.

Mrs. McKinley never looked so well as in the mauve brocade, with its spangles and flounces of point lace, which she wore. She sat in her half-upright chair, next to the President, for she does not stand on these occasions.

Mrs. Hay, who was next in rank, stood beside Mrs. McKinley, and right here I should like to know whether or not there is a secret understanding among all stout women which pledges them always to wear besprigged and bestriped material? I do not believe I ever saw a woman of generous proportions who was not thus attired. Mrs. Hay wore a black lace gown, of which the very large pattern was well defined and stood out clearly from the bright canary silk slip underneath.

Next to Mrs. Hay stood Mrs. Gage, a lovely looking woman. Next to her was Mrs. Root; then came respectively Mrs. Hitchcock, Mrs. Smith, Miss Long and Miss Wilson. Taking them all in all, they seemed rather uninteresting, though perhaps a Spruce City denizen would not be esteemed much of a judge.

Almost as soon as they were all in their places, Colonel Bingham and his two aides, in gorgeous uniforms, announced the diplomatic corps, and Mr. Hay began the presentations to the President.

The diplomatic corps, which consists of six Ambassadors and twenty-two Ministers, together with their respective staffs, was headed by Lord Pauncefote, who is the dean of the corps. He was in full court dress, and his coat was a mass of gold embroidery. At his side he carried a small jeweled sword, and on his breast was a row of decorations, while around his neck on a scarlet ribbon hung the Order of K. C. B. His wife and daughters were with him. They are comfortable, buxom-looking women, with about as much style as belongs to the true Britisher. Of course the staff of the Embassy was with him, including Mr. Bromley, the new son-in-law-to-be.

After the British Ambassador, the other Ambassadors and Ministers crowded in quick succession, and a showy lot they were. I never saw anything more picturesque than was the Austria-Hungary Minister. He was a whole scene out of grand opera in himself. He wore a red velvet mantle, edged with sable, which was flung over one shoulder. A pair of shiny top-boots of patent leather were finished off with red velvet breeches. He carried a pointed hat and wore a begemmed sword. I fully expected him to pull out from under his cloak a guitar or mandolin and trill out a troubadour song.

—THE LAST OF THE FOREIGNERS HAD MADE THEIR BOWS

The next figure that caught my attention was the Spanish Minister, the Duke of Arcos. He wore across his breast the red and yellow sash of his country, which was quite covered with jeweled orders. With him was his American wife, who was Miss Lowery, of Washington, and who, I am told, was a great belle. Their wooing was a pretty romance in its day. He was, twenty years ago, only poor Count Brunetti, and far too impecunious to marry, but happily a considerately dying uncle made him a Duke with plenty of money. He came back; "they lived happy ever after."

But the most remarkable personages of the day were the Chinese Minister, Mr. Wu, and his wife. Mr. Wu Ting-fang is said to be far and away the most learned, the wisest, and the most scholarly man in the diplomatic corps. He speaks all modern languages, and is so keen an English scholar that there is no meaning so fine, no wit so far-fetched, that he cannot answer it with a wit and meaning equally fine and to the point. He is simply wonderful. To be sure, he possesses considerable curiosity, and asks embarrassing questions, but he is delightful to talk to. His get-up was of course brilliant, though the blending of his rich brocades was perfect. He wore on his head a bright red cap with a gold tuft on the top of it and a jewel in the front. On his thumb was a jade ring the size of a silver half-dollar.

Madame Wu was equally wonderful, and far more interesting. My eyes never left her face. Upon her elaborately cushioned pomaded hair she wore a sort of birdcage affair, with queer dangling things, which fell over the ears. Above each ear was a bunch of artificial flowers. Her face was enameled so stiffly from the edge of her hair to the curve of her chin that it was like a mask, which prevented her from smiling, or even winking an eyelid, while on each cheek was a round, hard daub of red paint. Her neck and hands were left to their natural tint, and the contrast was startling. She, of course, could only hobble about, for her feet were bent and bandaged after the fashion of Chinese nobility. She can barely say "yes" and "no," and as she says "yes" and "no" indiscriminately conversation is rather haphazard for any one brave enough to attempt it with her.

When the last of the foreigners had made their bows our Army, Navy and Marine Corps were announced; and be it observed that General Miles preceded Admiral Dewey. But here comes in a fine point which has just been explained to me: General Miles will only take precedence when the Army and Navy make their appearance in a body, for since the birth of our nation the Army has always come first. On all private occasions Admiral Dewey will take precedence. Admiral Dewey is full Admiral, while General Miles is only a Major-General, which fact is the flaw in his diamond.

There can be no sort of doubt that General Miles, in full uniform, with his yellow sash and decorations, is the handsomest military man who has been seen at the Capitol in many years; there is also no doubt but that General Miles is quite well aware of it. The Army was small in numbers, owing to so many fighters being in Manila and Cuba.

When the Army had passed, the Navy appeared with the Admiral at its head, and behind him came scores of Rear-Admirals, more than I ever dreamed Uncle Sam could find use for, and not many of whom have ever hoisted or ever will hoist an Admiral's flag.

As soon as the naval ceremony was over and the Judiciary appeared, my sense of humor, which some one says is the next best thing to an abiding faith in Providence, came into play at the sight of the tiny Chief Justice with his flowing white hair. He is almost a veritable Hop-o'-my-Thumb as to stature, and he was followed and completely overshadowed by two of the biggest men in the District of Columbia.

These were Justice Gray and Justice Harlan.

I did not see much more of the reception, for I was distracted, first by the withdrawal of Mrs. McKinley, on account of fatigue; then Mrs. Hay returned home in order to receive the diplomatic corps at breakfast—for it is the custom with all Secretaries of State and their wives to receive the diplomatic corps after their presentation at the White House—and finally Mrs. Dewey hurriedly withdrew in order to receive the Navy in her mother's home.

When Robert came along in the wake of Senators and Congressmen I suggested that when we left the White House he should call on the Admiral, as nearly every other man was likely to do, but he emphatically said he'd "be hanged if he would."

They say that John R. McLean, the Admiral's brother-in-law, is a good fellow, but to me he is rather unprepossessing in appearance. Mr. McLean is a short, round, red-faced, gentleman, who bears the marks of much good eating, though I must do him the justice to add that there is a look about him of a man who can occasionally do some pretty shrewd thinking, but whether it will ever be shrewd enough to bring him to his goal I do not know. Certain it is that he knows men and has been wonderfully successful.

ADMIRAL DEWEY IS FULL ADMIRAL, WHILE GENERAL MILES IS ONLY A MAJOR-GENERAL

The entire McLean family is in the very most fashionable social set here, and their house is a rendezvous for all people who are smart. They give the most "swagger" entertainments in town. (This word "swagger" Page has just taught me to use; I don't altogether like it, and shall use it sparingly before Robert.) The John R. McLeans have given a beautiful dinner to the Admiral and his wife, and also a musicale at which Madame Schumann-Heink and other grand opera stars sang for a fabulous sum. Page went to this affair, and said that the whole thing was beautifully done and in exquisite taste. She says that the gossip is that the Admiral's fate was sealed long before he came home this fall. In fact, it was pretty well sealed before he took command of the Asiatic squadron, which would account for the forty-dollar cable message sent him after the battle of Manila.

After we left the White House and were about to enter the carriage, two foreigners pulled off their hats to Page and approached us bareheaded. They were presented to me, and I was suddenly struck with the curious change which came over Page's face. The elder man was Mr. Morelos, of the Spanish Legation; the younger and handsomer man was Alain de Courcelles, of the French Embassy, and I remembered that I had heard him presented at the White House as the Marquis de Courcelles. Both men were charmingly empressé in their manner, but the younger one drew Page apart, and I caught one or two low-toned words of reproach from him and a reference to "last night."

I was seized with a strange misgiving; it was almost as though something had gripped my heart. I made a move toward the carriage. Both men attended us, and both begged permission of me to be allowed to call upon me on my reception day. The carriage door had scarcely closed when I turned to Page, and, feeling that I had the right of an elder woman and tried friend, asked:

"Page, who is this De Courcelles?"

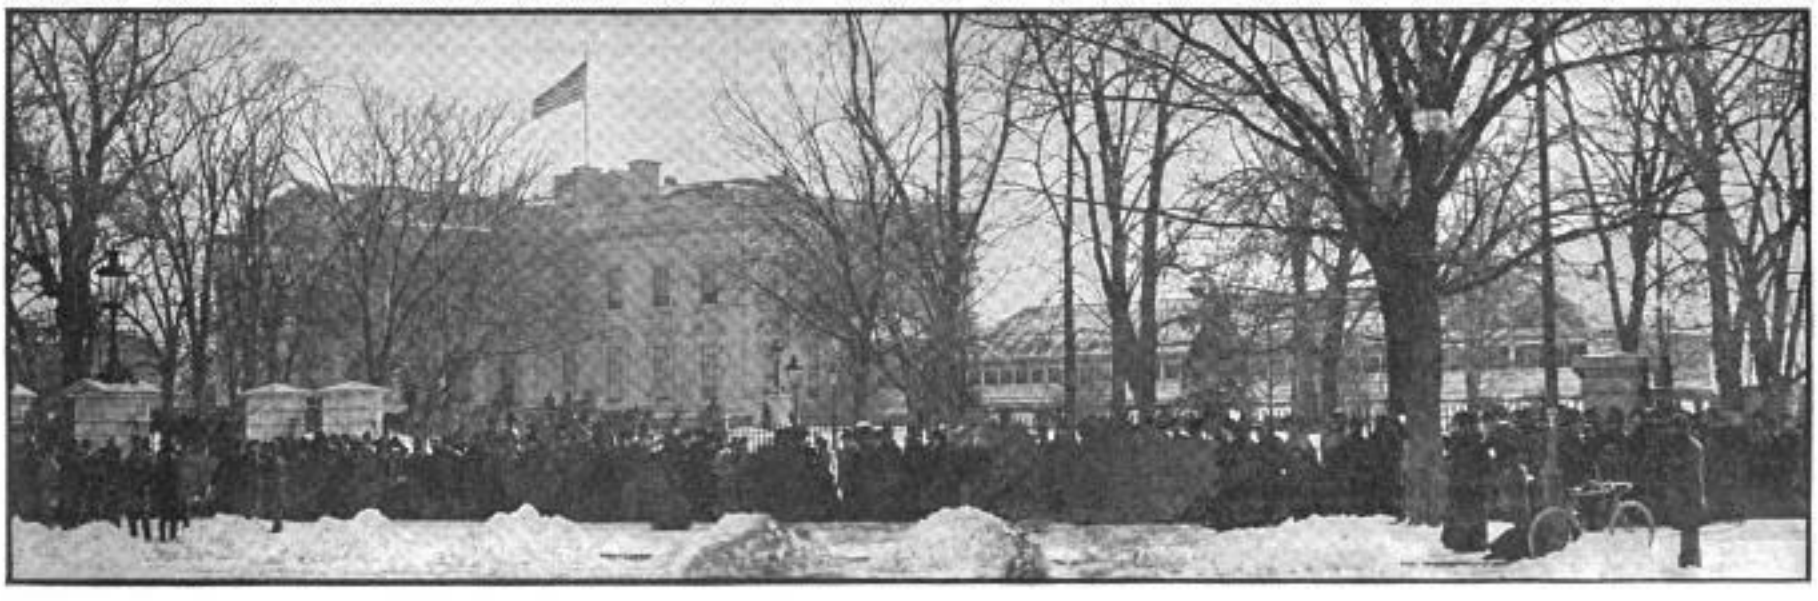
"An attaché of the French Embassy. His father was a fo'mer Chancellor of the Embassy, an' the son has been here since he was a boy, an' is almost an Ame'ican."

"But, Page, the fellow is in love with you!" I blurted out.

A great wave of scarlet flashed over her face. Suddenly she turned a pair of mischievous eyes upon me and answered:

"Ah never heard that it hurt a fo'eigner to fall in love with an Ame'ican gyirl."

"But you, Page; how about you?"



"Ah can take care of myself right well, Mrs. Slocum. Ah danced with Mr. de Cou'celles las' night out at Chevy Chase; you know that Gen'al Co'bin gave a dance to all the gyirls at the club-house. Gen'ral Co'bin's got quite a notion lately to go into society, an' he's jollyin' the gyirls, an' even goin' to the Germans an'——"

"Never mind General Corbin; what about this De Courcelles and you?"

"Oh! Well, Mr. de Cou'celles danced with me, an'—an'—Oh! Mrs. Slocum, Mr. de Cou'celles hasn' a cent to his name, an' goodness knows I haven' got a cent to mine, an' who ever heard of a sum in arithmetic bein' made of two naughts?"

This seemed conclusive, and we drove on in silence. There was a chill at my heart, and a dismal foreboding for the future of my little Southern friend whom I had learned to love as though she were my daughter.

WHEN NEW YEAR'S DAY CAME AROUND EVERY ONE WHO HAD THE RIGHT TO GO TO THE WHITE HOUSE WAS GLAD ENOUGH OF THE PRIVILEGE

Digitized by Google

Three MEN on Four Wheels

By Jerome K. Jerome

Copyright, 1899, by Jerome K. Jerome. Copyright in Great Britain

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS: The three men—George, Harris and the author—have started on a bicycle tour through Germany. A tandem and a safety are the mounts.

George Goes Shopping

AT A POINT between Berlin and Dresden, George, who had for the last quarter of an hour or so been looking very attentively out of the window, said:

"Why, in Germany, is it the custom to put the letter-box up a tree; why do they not fix it to the front door, as we do? I should hate having to climb up a tree to get my letters. Besides, it is not fair to the postman. In addition to being most exhausting, the delivery of letters must to a heavy man, on windy nights, be positively dangerous work. If they must fix it to a tree, why not fix it lower down—why always among the topmost branches?

"But maybe I am misjudging the country," he continued, a new idea occurring to him. "Possibly the Germans, who in many matters are ahead of us, have perfected a pigeon post. Even so, I cannot help thinking they would have been wiser to train the birds, while they were about it, to deliver the letters nearer the ground. Getting your letters out of those boxes must be tricky work even to the average middle-aged German."

I followed his gaze out of the window. I said:

"Those are not letter-boxes; they are birds' nests. You must understand this nation. The German loves birds, but he likes them tidy. A bird, left to himself, builds his nest just anywhere. It is not a pretty object, according to the German notion of prettiness. There is not a bit of paint on it anywhere, not a plaster image all around, not even a flag. The nest finished, the bird proceeds to live outside it. He drops things on to the grass: twigs, ends of worms, all sorts of things. He is indelicate. He makes love, quarrels with his wife, and feeds the children quite in public. The German householder is shocked. He says to the bird:

"'For many things I like you. I like to look at you. I like to hear you sing. But I don't like your ways. Take this little box, and put your rubbish inside where I can't see it. Come out when you want to sing; but let your domestic arrangements be confined to the interior.'"

In Germany one breathes in love of order with the air; in Germany the babies beat time with their rattles—and the German bird has come to prefer the box, and to regard with contempt the few uncivilized outcasts who continue to build their nests in trees and hedges. In course of time every German bird, one is confident, will have his proper place in a full chorus. This promiscuous and desultory warbling of his must, one feels, be irritating to the precise German mind; there is no method in it. The music-loving German will organize him. Some stout bird with a specially well-developed crop will be trained to conduct him; and, instead of wasting himself in a wood at four o'clock in the morning, he will, at the advertised time sing in a beer garden. Things are drifting that way.

Your German likes Nature, but his idea of Nature is a glorified Welsh harp. He takes great interest in his garden. He plants seven rose trees on the north side and seven on the south, and if they do not grow up all the same size and shape it worries him so that he cannot sleep of nights. Every flower he ties to a stick. This interferes with his view of the flower, but he has the satisfaction of knowing that it is there and that it is behaving itself. The lake is lined with zinc, and once a week he takes it up, carries it into the kitchen and scours it. In the geometrical centre of the grass plot, which is sometimes as large as a tablecloth, and is generally railed around, he places a china dog. The Germans are very fond of dogs, but, as a rule, they prefer them of china. The china dog never digs holes in the lawn to bury bones, and never scatters a flower-bed to the winds with his hind legs. From the German point of view, he is the ideal dog. He stays where you put him, and he is never where you do not want him. You can have him perfect in all points, according to the latest requirements of the Kennel Club, or you can indulge your own fancy and have something unique. You are not, as with other dogs, limited to breed. In china, you can have a blue dog or a pink dog. For a little extra, you can have a double-headed dog.

The Germans are very fond of dogs, but, as a rule, they prefer them of china

On a certain fixed date in the autumn the German stakes his flowers and bushes to the earth, and covers them with Chinese matting; and on a certain fixed date in the spring he uncovers them, and stands them up again; if it happen to be an exceptionally fine autumn or an exceptionally late spring, so much the worse for the unfortunate vegetable; no true German would allow his arrangements to be interfered with by so unruly a thing as the solar system. Unable to regulate the weather, he ignores it.

Among trees, your German's favorite is the poplar. Disorderly nations may sing the charms of the rugged oak, the spreading chestnut or the waving elm. To the German, all such, with their willful, untidy ways, are eyesores. The poplar grows where it is planted and as it is planted. It has no improper rugged ideas of its own. It does not want to wave or to spread itself. It just grows straight and upright as a German tree should grow; and so the German is gradually rooting out all other trees and replacing them with poplars.

Your German likes the country, but he prefers it as the lady thought she would the noble savage, more dressed. He likes his walk through the wood—to a restaurant. But the pathway must not be too steep; it must have a brick gutter running down one side of it to drain it, and every twenty yards or so it must have its seat on which he can rest and mop his brow; for your German would no more think of sitting on the grass than would an English Bishop dream of rolling down One Tree Hill. He likes his view from the summit of the hill, but he likes to find there a stone tablet telling him what to look at, and a table and bench at which he can sit to partake of the frugal beer and "belegte Semmel" he has been careful to bring with him. If, in addition, he can find a police notice posted on a tree forbidding him to do something or other, that gives him an extra sense of comfort and security.

Your German is not averse even to wild scenery, provided it be not too wild. But if he consider it too savage, he sets to work to tame it. I remember discovering in the neighborhood of Dresden a picturesque and narrow valley leading down toward the Elbe. The winding roadway ran beside a mountain torrent, which for a mile or so fretted and foamed over rocks and boulders between wood-covered banks. I followed it enchanted until, turning a corner, I suddenly came across a gang of eighty or a hundred workmen. They were busy tidying up that valley and making that stream respectable. All the stones that were impeding the course of the water they were carefully picking out and carting away. The bank on either side they were bricking up and cementing. The overhanging bushes and trees, tangled vines and creepers they were rooting up and trimming down. A little farther I came upon the finished work—the mountain valley as it ought to be, according to German ideas. The water, now a broad, sluggish stream, flowed over a level, gravelly bed, between two walls crowned with stone coping. At every hundred yards it gently descended over three shallow wooden platforms. For a space on either side the ground had been cleared, and at regular intervals young poplars planted. Each sapling was protected by a shield of wickerwork, and bossed by an iron rod. In the course of a couple of years it is the hope of the local council to have "finished" that valley throughout its entire length. There will be a seat every fifty yards, a police notice every hundred, and a restaurant every half-mile.

—"maybe I am misjudging the country"

They are doing the same from the Memel to the Rhine. They are just tidying up the country. I remember well the Wehrthal. It was once the most romantic ravine to be found in the Black Forest. The last time I walked down it some hundreds of Italian workmen were encamped there, hard at work training the wild little Wehr the way it should go, bricking the banks for it here, blasting the rocks for it there, making cement steps for it down which it can travel soberly and without fuss.

For in Germany there is no nonsense talked about untrammeled Nature. In Germany Nature has got to behave herself, and not set a bad example to the children. A German poet, noticing waters coming down as Southey describes, somewhat inexactly, the waters coming down at Lodore, would be too shocked to stop and write alliterative verse about them. He would hurry away and at once report them to the police. Then their foaming and their shrieking would be of short duration.

"Now then, now then, what's all this about?" the voice of German authority would say severely to the waters: "we can't have this sort of thing, you know. Come down quietly, can't you? Where do you think you are?"

And the local German council would provide those waters with zinc pipes and wooden troughs and a corkscrew staircase, and show them how to come down sensibly, in the German manner.

It is a tidy land, is Germany.

We reached Dresden on the Wednesday evening, and stayed there over the Sunday.

Taking one consideration with another, Dresden is, perhaps, the most attractive town in Germany; but it is a place to be lived in for a while, rather than visited. Its museums and galleries, its palaces and gardens, its beautiful and historically rich environment, provide pleasure for a winter but bewilder for a week. It has not the gayety of Paris or Vienna, which quickly palls; its charms are more solidly German, and more lasting. It is the Mecca of the musician. For five shillings in Dresden you can purchase a stall at the opera, together, unfortunately, with a strong disinclination ever again to take the trouble of sitting out a performance in any English, French or American opera house.

The chief scandal of Dresden still centres around August the Strong, "the Man of Sin," as Carlyle always called him. His life-sized portrait hangs in the fine Zwinger, which he built as an arena for his wild-beast fights when the people grew tired of them in the market-place; a beetle-browed, frankly animal man, but with a culture and taste that so often wait upon animalism. Modern Dresden undoubtedly owes much to him.

But what the stranger in Dresden stares at most are, perhaps, its electric trams. These huge vehicles flash through the streets at from ten to twenty miles an hour, taking curves and corners after the manner of an Irish car-driver. Everybody travels by them excepting only officers in uniform, who must not. Ladies in evening dress, going to balls or opera,

Editor's Note—This is the seventh of a series of humorous papers which began in the Post of January 6. Each of these papers is practically complete in itself, and may be read with enjoyment independently of those that precede and follow it.

Digitized by Google

porters with their baskets, sit side by side. They are all-important in the streets, and everything and everybody make haste to get out of their way. If you do not get out of their way, and you still happen to be alive when picked up, then on your recovery you are fined for having been in their way. This teaches you to be wary of them.

One afternoon Harris took a Bummel by himself. In the evening as we sat listening to the band at the Belvedere, Harris said, apropos of nothing in particular:

"These Germans have no sense of humor."

"What makes you think that?" I asked.

"Why, this afternoon," he answered, "I jumped on one of those electric tram-cars. I wanted to see the town, so I stood outside on the little platform—what do you call it?"

"The Stehplatz," I suggested.

"That's it," said Harris. "Well, you know the way they shake you about, and how you have to look out for the corners, and mind yourself when they stop and when they start?

"There were about half a dozen of us standing there," he continued, "and of course I am not experienced. The thing started suddenly, and that jerked me backward. I fell against a stout gentleman, just behind me. He could not have been standing very firmly himself, and he in his turn fell back against a boy who was carrying a trumpet in a green baize case. They never smiled, neither the man nor the boy with the trumpet; they just stood there and looked sulky. I was going to say I was sorry, but before I could get the words out the tram suddenly eased up, for some reason or other, and that, of course, shot me forward again, and I butted into a white-haired old chap, who looked to me like a professor. Well, he never smiled—never moved a muscle."

"Maybe he was thinking of something else," I suggested.

"That could not have been the case with them all," replied Harris; "and in the course of that journey I must have fallen against every one of them at least three times.

"You see," exclaimed Harris, "they knew when the corners were coming, and in which direction to brace themselves. I, as a stranger, was naturally at a disadvantage. The way I rolled and staggered about that platform, clutching wildly now at this man and now at that, must have been really comic. I don't say it was high-class humor, but it would have amused most people. Those Germans seemed to see no fun in it whatever—just seemed anxious, that was all. There was one man, a little man, who stood with his back against the brake; I fell against him five times: I counted them. You would have expected the fifth time would have dragged a laugh out of him, but it didn't; he merely looked tired. They are a dull lot."

George also had an adventure in Dresden. There was a shop near the Altmarkt in the window of which were exhibited some cushions for sale. The proper business of the shop was the handling of glass and china; the cushions appeared to be in the nature of an experiment. They were very beautiful cushions, hand-embroidered on satin. We often passed the shop, and every time George paused and examined those cushions. He said he thought his aunt would like one.

George has been very attentive to this aunt of his during this journey. He has written her quite a long letter every day, and from every town we stop at he sends her off a present. To my mind, he is overdoing the business, and more than once I have expostulated with him. His aunt will get meeting other aunts, and talking to them; the whole class will become disorganized and unruly. As a nephew, I object to the impossible standard that George is setting up. But he will not listen.

Therefore it was that on Saturday he left us after lunch, saying he would go around to that shop and get one of those cushions for his aunt. He said he would not be long, and suggested our waiting for him.

We waited for what seemed to me rather a long time. When he rejoined us he was empty-handed and looked worried. We asked him where his cushion was. He said he hadn't got a cushion; said he had changed his mind; said he didn't think his aunt would care for a cushion! Evidently something was amiss. We tried to get at the bottom of it, but he was not communicative. Indeed, his answers after our twentieth question or thereabouts became quite short.

In the evening, however, when he and I happened to be alone, he broached the subject himself. He said:

"They are somewhat peculiar in some things, these Germans."

I said: "What has happened?"

"Well," he answered, "there was that cushion I wanted."

"For your aunt?" I remarked.

"Why not?" he retorted. He was huffy in a moment; I never knew a man so touchy about an aunt. "Why shouldn't I send a cushion to my aunt?"

"Don't get excited," I replied. "I am not objecting; I respect you for it."

He recovered his temper and went on:

"There were four in the window, if you remember, all very much alike, and each one labeled in plain figures twenty marks. I don't pretend to speak German fluently, but I can generally make myself understood with a little effort, and gather the sense of what is said to me, provided they don't gabble. I went into the shop. A young girl came up to me; she was a pretty, quiet little soul, one might almost say demure; not at all the sort of girl from whom you would have expected such a thing. I was never more surprised in all my life."

"Surprised about what?" I said.

George always assumes you know the end of the story while he is telling you the beginning; it is an annoying method.

"At what happened," replied George; "at what I am telling you. She smiled and asked me what I wanted. I understood that all right; there could have been no mistake about that. I put down a twenty-mark piece on the counter and said:

"'Please give me a cushion!'"

"She stared at me as if I had asked for a feather bed. I thought maybe she had not heard, so I repeated it louder. If I had chucked her under the chin she could not have looked more surprised or indignant.

"She said she thought I must be making a mistake.

"I did not want to begin a long conversation and find myself stranded; I said there was no mistake. I pointed to my twenty-mark piece, and repeated for the third time that I wanted a cushion, 'a twenty-mark cushion.'

"Another girl came up, an older girl, and the first girl repeated to her what I had just said; she seemed quite excited about it. The second girl did not believe her—did not think I looked the man who would want a cushion. To make sure, she put the question to me herself:

"'Did you say you wanted a cushion?' she asked.

"'I have said it three times,' I answered; 'I will say it again: I want a cushion.'

"She said: 'Then you can't have one.'

"I was getting angry by this time. If I hadn't really wanted the thing I should have walked out of the shop; but there the cushions were in the window, evidently for sale. I didn't see why I couldn't have one.

"I said: 'I will have one!' It is a simple sentence. I said it with determination.

"A third girl came up at this point, the three representing, I fancy, the whole force of the shop. She was a bright-eyed, saucy-looking little damsel, this last one. On any other occasion I might have been pleased to see her; now, her coming only irritated me. I didn't see the need of three girls for this business.

"The first two girls started explaining the thing to the third girl, and before they were half way through the third girl began to giggle—she was the sort of girl who would giggle at anything. That done, they fell to chattering like Jenny Wrens, all three together; and between every half dozen words they looked across at me; and the more they looked at me the more the third girl giggled, and before they had finished they were all three giggling, the little idiots; you might have thought I was a clown, giving a private performance.

"When she was steady enough to move, the third girl came up to me; she was still giggling. She said:

"'If you get it, will you go?'

"I did not quite understand her at first, and she repeated it:

"'This cushion, when you've got it, will you go—away—at once?'

"I was only too anxious to go. I told her so. But I added I was not going without it. I had made up my mind to have that cushion then if I stopped in the shop all night for it.

"She rejoined the other two girls. I thought they were going to get me the cushion and have done with the business. Instead of that, the strangest thing possible happened. The two other girls got behind the first girl, all three still giggling. Heaven knows what about, and pushed her toward me. They pushed her close up to me, and then, before I knew what was happening, she put her hands on my shoulders, stood up on tiptoe, and kissed me. After which, burying her face in her apron, she ran off, followed by the second girl. The third girl opened the door for me, and so evidently expected me to go, that in my confusion, I went, leaving my twenty marks behind me. I don't say I minded the kiss, though I did not particularly want it, while I did want the cushion. I don't like to go back to the shop. I cannot understand the thing at all."

I said: "What did you ask for?"

He said: "A cushion."

I said: "That is what you wanted, I know. What I mean is, what was the actual German word you said?"

He replied: "A Kuss."

I said: "You have nothing to complain of. It is somewhat confusing. A 'Kuss' sounds as if it ought to be a cushion, but it is not; it is a kiss; while a Kissen is a cushion. You muddled up the two words—people have done it before. I don't know much about this sort of thing myself, but you asked for a twenty-mark kiss, and from your description of the girl some people might consider the price reasonable. Anyhow, I should not tell Harris. If I remember rightly, he also has an aunt."

George agreed with me it would be better not.

—"AND THEN, BEFORE I KNEW WHAT WAS HAPPENING, SHE PUT HER HANDS ON MY SHOULDERS, STOOD UP ON TIPTOE, AND KISSED ME"

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN of the HOUR

AMBASSADOR CHOATE

PHOTO COPYRIGHTED BY SANDER MEDIA, NEW YORK

Mr. Choate's Use of an Old Story

In this era of new ideas and startling inventions, old jokes still retain their youthful vigor. Nor are they confined to minstrel performers and monologue artists on the vaudeville stage. No less a wit than the Honorable Joseph Hodges Choate, the law partner of William Maxwell Evarts, and the present Ambassador from this country to the Court of St. James, recently found a very old joke useful and appropriate.

A reporter called to see him.

"Mr. Choate is a busy man," said the clerk.

"So am I," responded the reporter.

"Let me take in your card?"

"Never mind the card. He knows me."

Without further parley he opened the door and confronted Mr. Choate, who was talking with a visitor.

"Good-morning, Mr. Choate," said the reporter cheerily. "I am a reporter."

Mr. Choate looked at the intruder curiously. "Take a chair, sir," he said quietly.

"I want to see you about this story," showing a clipping from the Morning ——.

"Ah!" returned the lawyer with his peculiar, gentle chuckle, "I'm glad to see you. Please take two chairs."

It was an old, old story, but Mr. Choate did not hesitate to use it.

Mr. Campbell's Legal Adventure

Robert J. Campbell, of New York, had an odd and even awkward experience the other day which illustrates forcibly a peculiar phase in the practice of law in the metropolis. Returning home late at night, he was attacked and severely beaten by a drunken stranger. To allay the apprehension of his family Mr. Campbell explained that he had been struck by a street car. He was put to bed, and a maid sent out for liniment and bandages. She returned with a strange doctor who proceeded at once to make a minute examination.

The examination disclosed that the patient was suffering countless injuries, most of them incurable, to his spine, knees, thighs, shoulders and arms. Mr. Campbell, who knew how little he was hurt, was even alarmed by the result, and his family were thrown into almost senseless fear. The following day the doctor returned and announced that he was not a physician at all, but an "accident" lawyer—that is, one who sues corporations for damages resulting from physical injuries. He also brought with him several alleged witnesses to the street-car accident, all of whom were willing to swear to anything for a consideration.

Mr. Campbell was in double distress. He didn't know how to shut the lawyer off without disclosing his own well-meant duplicity. The next day, however, friends of the railroad company that had been mentioned called on him and persuaded him to drop the matter.

He did not settle so easily, however, with the lawyer, who had heard of the accident from the maid in the drug store and had taken up the case as a speculation.

Printed the Wrong Portrait

After Honorable Foster M. Voorhees was elected Governor of New Jersey the usual portraits of him were published in the newspapers. They made an interesting variety. In one instance an enterprising journal drew upon its cabinet and used a cut of the president of a small Western university, showing a young man with the hair carefully parted and curled, and with eyeglasses that stood forth prominently in the picture. He looked about twenty years of age and the face was smooth and smiling. The Governor had a good laugh over this particular picture as well as over some of the other interesting variations of his countenance. He is not an old man by any means, being only forty-three, but he has the look of a serious student and man of affairs. His home is in Elizabeth, New Jersey.

Doctor Kitasato's Heroic Experiment

The honors that have been showered upon Professor S. Kitasato, the eminent Japanese physician, are justified today by the spread of the bubonic plague and the realization of his recorded predictions. The story of his work has never before been told in full, as he is very modest and cannot be induced to talk about himself. When the plague broke out in Hongkong in February, 1894, Doctor Kitasato wrote a memoir in which he claimed that the new pestilence was the ancient disease known as the "black death." He said there was grave danger of the malady spreading rapidly to many lands. His assertions were laughed at by the European physicians in Japan. His own countrymen upheld him and brought the matter before the Government. It acted promptly, and selected the Professor, with two assistants, as a special commission to go to Hongkong and study the plague in action. The three men arrived and took rooms at the Hongkong Hotel. They carried with them a complete equipment of a bacteriologic laboratory, the first that had ever been seen in that part of the world. Many of the instruments had just been invented in the Koch or Pasteur school, and were unknown to the Chinese physicians.

Doctor Kitasato first demonstrated that the disease could be communicated to or from rats, rabbits, guinea-pigs and mice. His next demonstration was that the dust, and even the infected air in plague spots, could carry the disease. At this point he and his two assistants contracted the disorder, and were obliged to desist from their studies. Lest science should be the loser, each kept a careful record of the progress of the disease in the other two. The attacks were serious. The younger assistant died, but the elder one, Doctor Oyama, and Doctor Kitasato recovered. Shortly after this the Professor identified the bacillus of the plague, which he found to resemble that of the chicken cholera in its early stages, and lastly he published the results of his experiments. His recommendations were adopted by the Japanese Government the same year, and by the Board of Health in our new possession of Hawaii and other seaport cities thereafter.

PHOTO COPYRIGHTED BY FRANCES BENJAMIN JOHNSTON

MRS. McKEE

Another Spanish Excuse

A belated war story comes from Ponce, Puerto Rico, and is told by Lieutenant Juan Arato, of the Spanish Engineers.

"When the war broke out," said the Lieutenant, "we found that our supply of ammunition of all sorts was very low. Some was new and some old; some was black and some brown; some was old-fashioned and some was smokeless and mysterious. There was one lot of brown smokeless powder which was marked 'Use with care! Very powerful! Keep cool and dry!' and to it was attached a legend that it had burst a Krupp field gun.

"I determined to try it. I employed a small charge in a gun, and to my surprise it refused to go off. My gunners were very much disgusted, and one of them said: 'Bah, this is no good for war. I'll use it for cooking our supper.'

"We all jumped as he threw a double handful into a small campfire. Judge of our feelings when we saw the fire go out. I afterward learned that powder of this sort deteriorates with age, and that long before this case was opened it was as harmless as wet sand."

Harvard Defeated by a Bluff

Joseph M. Proskauer, of Mobile, Alabama, now a brilliant young lawyer of New York, was a notable figure in the undergraduate life of Columbia University several years ago. He was a member of the debating teams that defeated the teams of Harvard and Chicago Universities, and is at present the coach of the Columbia debaters. He found that the necessity for quick thought in the face of surprise in debating made his début into court practice comparatively easy.

He was on the debating team of Columbia which advocated the popular election of United States Senators, against Harvard. Each side agreed that the reëlection of Senators was often beneficial to the nation at large, but the Cambridge debaters claimed that popular elections would not accomplish this end. Columbia denied this, and brought to its support that particular form of sophistry called "statistics" to the effect that members of the House were as often reëlected as Senators.

The next Harvard speaker controverted this statement with more statistics, showing that Governors of States were seldom reëlected, and claiming that Governors and Senators would share the same fate if their elections were conducted the same way.

Mr. Proskauer followed, and his reply not only won the debate, but fixed his status forever in the affections of the Columbians. With an assurance born of daring he answered:

"The comparison of the opposition is worthless, because so many Governors, by reason of State constitutions, are debarred from reëlection."

The Harvard men were stunned. This was a view they had never taken. They had no statistics to cover this point, and therefore they ignored it, and the debate went against them.

This is where they were foolish, for Mr. Proskauer knew no more about State constitutions in fact than they did. It flashed across his mind that one or two Northwestern States did prohibit reëlection of Governors. How many more he did not know, and does not know even to this day.

It was simply a bluff, but it won.

Craig's Western Sketches

Charles Craig, the writer and painter of the Indians and the plains, whose canvases are the vogue just now in London and Paris, as well as New York and Boston, did not always realize the prices that he now receives.

In the early eighties he started for a Kansas Indian reservation to sketch and to hunt.

He met with several mishaps, and his capital was reduced to less than one dollar. Near the border the train he was on ran into a flood and he was forced to disembark and, with a little over fifty cents, to spend the day in a straggling village until something turned up. He had heard a great deal about Western barkeepers, and he wanted a characteristic sketch of one. So he went into a saloon and asked the proprietor, who was the barkeeper, to let him sketch him.

"Say, pard, that's the best picture I ever had took. I think that's worth a dollar."

Before night others posed for him. He made over $15.

Several years ago a knowing art dealer happened in that same hamlet, now a flourishing town, and created the impression that he was a wealthy escaped madman by offering ten dollars apiece for such of the sketches as he could find. It is almost needless to say that he reaped a very handsome profit on his investment.

When Baby McKee Ruled the White House

Mrs. McKee, the daughter of former President Harrison, occasionally revisits Washington and finds a cordial welcome in the social circles in which she was so popular during her father's four years in the White House. As the mother of Baby McKee, who has now outgrown his babyhood, she shared for years the honors of the abundant literature written about the White House.

It was said of Baby McKee that he was the most famous child in the world, and that his only rival was the little King of Spain.

A distinguished writer, who was visiting Washington, called one day by appointment to see the President and Mrs. Harrison. Afterward he said:

"Whilst we sat there awaiting our summons to the Presidential presence, a little light-haired boy, about four years old, came running into the hall, and, pulling at my coat-tails, said, 'Come and see my white rabbits,' which I accordingly did. This was the celebrated Baby McKee."

GOVERNOR VOORHEES

Digitized by Google

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

Two Years of Large Speculation

During the past two years there has been more speculation than the world had ever known in the same period of time. Two unexpected wars have provided the agitations which made the markets attractive to those who are always ready to wager their means when they believe that the opportunities promise profits.

The era of good times was already under way when the Maine was blown up in the harbor of Havana, but the events which followed gave those variations of price and probabilities which are so essential and so attractive in the great game of chance. Unprecedented prosperity followed upon victory, and thousands grew rich and radiant on the rising tides. Then, as events began to get nearer normal once more, the trouble in South Africa commenced.

It differed materially from our experience with Spain. Then the speculators here, although a bit timid at first, became confident that this country would win without much difficulty. A series of victories steadily raised their assurances, and thus prices and hopes went up together. Those who were buying for a rise saw their profits mounting up; and so continuous was the elevation that they began to believe that the profits were illimitable. In the case of Great Britain's war there was the same confidence. It was to be a picnic march to Pretoria, where the English army was to celebrate its Christmas dinner, and nowhere was the jubilation greater than upon the stock exchanges of several countries. Even with those people who did not sympathize with the war there was a conviction that Great Britain would win promptly and handily.

But when the Boers began to show their strength the markets responded, and groans of despair went up from thousands. Many who were counting their wealth saw themselves ruined, and the same people who sent an insulting cablegram to President Kruger when the war began faced their disasters with blanched faces. Upon the stock exchanges of Europe there were similar disappointments, including in many cases some highly interesting tumbles of people who were thought to be safe with their millions.

A hundred years ago there was more open risking of money, but all of it combined would have made only a fraction of the enormous speculation in these closing years of the century. It is difficult to define just what the word speculation should include. Everybody to a greater or less degree is a speculator. Business is a speculation. A cargo of goods upon an ocean vessel is a speculation. The street railway is a speculation. And some go so far as to say that matrimony is a speculation. At any rate, the laws of chance and the operations of society are apt at any moment to upset the existing conditions, and the fortunate man is he who escapes the misfortunes, and the unfortunate man is the one who misses the fortunes.

PHOTO COPYRIGHTED BY VANDER WEYDE, NEW YORK

ANDREW CARNEGIE IN HIS LIBRARY

The Meaning of Legitimate Speculation

Speculation is one of those words which modern uses have broadened beyond their original meanings. It is in its real significance a very respectable term; in its higher sense it means to consider carefully, to ponder and examine. In its secondary sense it means to make a purchase or investment that involves a risk or loss, and also offers a chance of considerable profit, and the speculator—it is important to remember this—really acquires a title to property in the expectation of disposing of it at a profit. Consequently the disposition to call speculation ordinary gambling is stretching the word beyond its legitimate usage.

When the Saxons introduced gaming into England the loser often became the slave of the winner, and the winner sold him in profit just as any other merchandise. The Louisiana Lottery in thirty years collected the enormous sum of three hundred millions of dollars, and this and the other forms of gambling are sometimes called varieties of speculation, but it is an abuse of the word.

Coming closer, the bucket shops claim that they speculate, whereas they do nothing of the sort; they are simply gambling-rooms in which the gamblers bet upon the rise or fall of stocks. The proprietor charges him a percentage for making his bet, besides taking equal chances for winning his money. No share of stock is really bought or delivered. It is pure betting, and it only needs a glance at the crowd which does this betting to see how much profit there is in it.

Speculation even of the riskiest kind is far above gambling. Where it more nearly approaches it is when the speculation is done on margins. For those who do not fully understand what this may be, an illustration may be cited: You place a thousand dollars in the hands of a broker for one hundred shares of stock, which makes a margin of $10 per share. If the stock should go up a point, representing a profit of $100, the broker would return to you $1100, minus his commission for buying and selling—$12.50 for each, or $25 for both—thus netting you $75; that is to say, you would receive back $1075. If your stock should go down and you should lose $100, the broker would return to you your difference, minus his commissions and your loss, which would be $25 for the commissions and $100 for the loss, leaving you $875.

Far safer than this is a buying outright of stock, or securities, expecting their value to increase. This more nearly approaches investment, although the real investor, to quote the dictionary, seeks "to promote the legitimate development of property, aiming to secure a regular and limited return for the money advanced."

The Trend of Recent Speculation

One of the richest men in the United States is Mr. Russell Sage, whose wealth has been estimated as high as a hundred millions of dollars, all of which he has accumulated in his lifetime. This is his counsel: "I would advise young men not to go into Wall Street. I would advise no man to speculate. If his business is speculation, he is sure to lose every dollar he has. I went into Wall Street in 1874 as a speculator, but I speedily gave it up when I realized what it meant to me. It seems to me now that I am the only man left of all who were with me at that time, and I am left because I knew that it was time to quit. I have seen hundreds of capable men lose fortunes dealing in chances." He advises young men to save money and invest it in business, or in good stocks and securities.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, another of the richest men of the country, says that saving is the only way to win wealth. He advises investment strictly, and disapproves of all speculation. Other experiences of the same sort come from the rich men of the country, and yet with some exceptions—Mr. Carnegie is probably one—most of them have speculated at some time in their careers, but the ones who have beat the game permanently are those who were able to stand the loss if the markets went against them. It was the careful surplus which Mr. Sage piled up that enabled him to lose several millions in one fateful week, and to recover from the blow.

The policy of the big speculations shows the tendency of modern speculation. It takes chances, but it prefers investments to any operations on margins. During the past few months there were thousands of men who risked all they had, and a great many of them lost much more than they had, although at one time in the contest with fate they felt that they were on the road to wealth. No better illustration of the fact that the stock market is a part of the history of the times could be found than its own daily history. Every condition and every contest has some effect upon it. The crops out West, the wars between nations, the floods and famines are all reflected in its prices.

When the Bottom Drops Out

But beyond all these forces and influences are things which cannot be foreseen and which are never adequately explained. For no reasonable causes the bottom drops out of the market. Stocks are sacrificed. Profits are lost. The little ones are wiped out and the big ones suffer. Such a thing has happened since the beginning of the year, and the slump in prices was peculiar in that the heaviest losers were the very rich men. Doubtless the same thing may occur again just as unexpectedly, just as dramatically. For weeks afterward there will be observations from those who make studies of stocks, but they will amount to little. Hindsight in speculation is about the most useless thing on earth.

Some of the men who have made the biggest fortunes recently have at several times in their lives lost all they had, and of course they may lose again. The exceptions to the rule of speculation—which, when persisted in, Mr. Sage says leads always to ruin—are indeed few, and some of the saddest sights in this world are the human derelicts who were once rich.

As a rule, the history of speculation shows that the optimist fares slightly better than the pessimist. The biggest profits have been made when men have had confidence in dark hours. Of course, thousands have been foolishly hopeful and have suffered for it, but even in speculation we find the note of the modern man and are glad that he is constantly expecting better things. Collis P. Huntington, who has accumulated many millions in his lifetime, recently said:

"To-day is better than yesterday, and to-morrow will be better than to-day."

RUSSELL SAGE

PHOTO COPYRIGHTED BY VANDER WEYDE, NEW YORK

Things the Speculators Generally Study

In spite of all that may be said against speculation by the men who have made money, the fever always breaks out when the conditions are ripe. It is in the blood of thousands to take risks, and although they may see and admit the danger of their efforts, they keep at it. Of course, this means a watching of every event or probability that offers a variation in prices. Thus, an impending battle almost stops the market. When peace was general and prosperity seemed certain and illimitable, the sales in Wall Street were more than 1,500,000 shares a day. A year afterward, when the world was waiting for the results of Buller's second battle, the sales were less than 200,000. This shows the effect of the greater happenings, but, as a matter of fact, everything counts. For instance, already in the present Congress over ten thousand bills have been introduced, and the effects of these, whether they become laws or not, are carefully studied. There are forty-five legislatures and more than a hundred city councils in the United States whose proceedings may bear more or less upon speculation. The great thing is to get the information first, to measure accurately its probable effects, to act without loss of time; and thus we have a new department of information, and thousands of keen-witted men who make or lose upon the turn of the tide.

Some of the most successful books on how to speculate successfully have been written by men who have lost in speculation, and the greatest speculators will tell you that no one can know exactly how the market will go. Rules, judgment and everything else are suspended in a moment, and prices may have as many moods as April days. For instance, stocks reached their lowest point, in 1899, the week before Christmas, and then they rose nearly five dollars a share before the first of January, because many people thought there would be a lot of enthusiastic buying after the New Year opened.

The differences and the quick variations tell no tale, and point no moral save to show what has been shown millions of times before, that speculation is a risk.

It seems to be the testimony of those who know, that the men who make money in Wall Street and keep it the longest make it not off of speculations, but off of the speculators.

More than three centuries ago John Heywood, in the earliest collection of English colloquial sayings, wrote: "Nought venter, nought have."

COLLIS P. HUNTINGTON AT HIS DESK

PHOTO COPYRIGHTED BY VANDER WEYDE, NEW YORK

Digitized by Google

Three Hundred Thousand Miles with Henry Ward Beecher

By Major J. B. Pond

FROM my earliest recollection, in our log cabin on the frontier of Wisconsin, the name of Dr. Lyman Beecher was a household word. One day—I think it was the summer of 1846—my mother was reading a paper that some friend had sent from the East containing a sermon by Henry Ward Beecher, a young son of Lyman Beecher, pastor of a new church in Indianapolis, in which the young man had dared to denounce slavery. Garrison, Thurlow Weed, Phillips, Beecher, Theodore Parker, Finney were names as familiar to me in boyhood as those of my own relatives. Then came the Kansas conflict, Captain John Brown and Sharp's Rifles (known as Beecher Bibles).

Educated, trained, and a participant in Kansas in those early conflicts as I was, with the name of Beecher as a beacon light, one may perhaps be able to realize my feelings of reverence and awe for this great man when I met him for the first time in Brooklyn, in his own house, in April, 1876. I never had experienced such a feeling before. My lips trembled, my tongue seemed paralyzed, my throat clogged, my eyes flooded. I was helpless; I was joyous; so filled to overflowing with something that I must have made a fool of myself. Holding fast to my hand, Mr. Beecher walked over to the sofa in the parlor, set me down, and began questioning me about James Redpath, who had owned the Redpath Lyceum Bureau, in Boston, and for whom Mr. Beecher had lectured. I told him that Mr. Redpath had gone out of the business and returned to journalism in New York, and that Mr. Hathaway and I had bought out the concern; that a number of engagements for him to lecture had been indefinitely postponed the season before, with a promise on his (Mr. Beecher's) part that new dates should be given the management as soon as he himself could forecast his own time. Nearly a year had passed, and these people were waiting.

To make a long story short, the time was arranged for, the new dates for New England to begin Monday, April 18, 1876, in New London, Connecticut. This was the first lecture given by Mr. Beecher under my auspices. From that time until February, 1887, three weeks before his death, Mr. Beecher and I traveled together nearly 300,000 miles. He lectured 1261 times for me.

On many of our lecture tours we were favored with Mrs. Beecher's companionship. Mr. and Mrs. Beecher were both good travelers—never the slightest trouble. They carried each their own hand baggage, and would allow no outsider to touch it. One little journey we made together, a sort of "vacation excursion." Mr. Beecher delivered seventy-five lectures on that little circuit of the continent, preached sixteen sermons, many of them in Plymouth churches, and traveled 17,000 miles.

I cannot undertake to give a connected, chronological account of even a part of my wonderful experiences with Mr. Beecher. I have simply selected here and there an episode which shall serve to illustrate some characteristic of the man I knew.

MR. BEECHER'S ACCOUNT OF HIS FIRST TOUR IN THE SOUTH

We had returned from Mr. Beecher's first visit to Nashville and Memphis, in May, 1879. It had been a short tour of unusual interest to him; he had never before been south of Mason and Dixon's line, except for a single night in Richmond, Virginia, in 1877. I accompanied him on the tour, and to his first Friday evening prayer-meeting in Plymouth Church after our return, for I was quite certain his people were to be treated to some interesting comments on our journey. I asked Mr. Ellinwood (Mr. Beecher's stenographer) to take down the "talk" and write it out for me privately, which he did, and here it is, the first time it has ever seen the light of day:

"After the war, for the first time in my life it seemed to me that it was possible for me to visit the Southern portion of my native land. There had always been a sting in the thought that I, a citizen of the United States, who if need be would lay down his life for his country, could not cross Mason and Dixon's line with any certainty of coming back, and that my name was a name to conjure with and bring up evil spirits. It had always hurt my pride of patriotism that I, a loyal and freedom-loving man, could not go where I pleased on this continent, that I could not go into any of thirteen or fourteen of these United States. I had feared that I should die without the sight.

"I did not know how the change was to be brought about, but I believed that there would be emancipation; that the conscience of mankind would slowly unfold and work in secret ways toward liberty, and that in the remote future free labor, applied to the raising of cotton and sugar, would compete in the market with slave labor and lead to abolition. That was my theory; but the Lord cut it short in righteousness; He severed the Gordian knot with the sword; this country was made free from end to end; and ever since I have said within myself, 'Before I die I hope to tread the soil of every State in this Union.' And now I have actually been 'away down South.'

MR. BEECHER'S RESPECT FOR COURAGE

"I went first to Nashville—a beautiful city. The Fisk University—one of the marvels of the world—is there. It is really a very remarkable building, and it is very nobly manned. The whole of it has been sung into existence by men and women that had been in slavery. And, do you know, they look upon you at this church as being the author of their success. For you will recollect that the 'Jubilee Singers' came here impoverished and discouraged, hoping that they might raise a little money by singing. They were hardly able to meet their expenses in getting here. In this lecture-room, on a Friday evening, they were asked to sing some of their songs; and you said, after hearing them, 'Those songs must be heard in the great church,'; and when Sunday came they sang there; the fire was kindled, and invitations came in to them to sing in other places. Doctor Cuyler opened his church for them, and other churches were opened. Then they began to have calls from New England; and finally they went abroad. The result was that they earned over $200,000 singing through America, England, Germany and France; and they have built with their breath that great collegiate institution, where five hundred of their kind are being instructed.

"Talk about old Rome, her achievements and her cathedrals! They are grand; but I will point to the rearing of the Fisk University by ex-slaves and their singing, and say, 'It is the most wonderful thing that has yet been done in architecture.'

AN ATTENTIVE AND SYMPATHETIC SOUTH

"I went the next day to Memphis. I shall never be President of the United States—I have made up my mind to that; but I had a taste of what it would be to be President, for they gave me twenty-one guns when I went into the town. I thought to myself, 'Am I on earth? and am I in Memphis, on the Mississippi River, clear down in the southwest corner of the State of Tennessee, and only twelve miles from the State of Mississippi? And are these twenty-one guns for the pastor of Plymouth Church? Well, things have turned around pretty lively!' I do not know how many people saw that spectacle; I only know that I saw it.

"I was taken about the city by the editor of the Memphis Appeal, one of the most stirring of the Southern papers. I could not ask for a more kind reception than I received at his hands. It was about six o'clock in the evening when I arrived, and the lecture was at eight. As there was no lecture-room large enough to hold the people that wanted to gather, Agricultural Hall was taken, and 4000 seats were put into it, and out from a gallery, looking down upon the people, I delivered my lecture, and I delivered it just as plump and as fair as I ever did anywhere else. I received just as cordial and respectful a hearing as ever I had, and I never desire to speak to a more thoughtful, cultivated, courteous, sympathetic and respectful audience than I had in Memphis. Yet they knew who I was, and they very well knew what my sentiments had been and were.

"I bless God that the day has come when a true heart, with kind and sympathetic feelings, will give a man entrance into every State of this Union to discuss any question that it is necessary to discuss before the people of the United States."

HOW MR. BEECHER MET AND CONQUERED OPPOSITION

It was on January 23, 1877, that I had arranged with W. T. Powell, of Richmond, Virginia, for Mr. Beecher to lecture in that city. Mr. Powell was manager of the Richmond Theatre. He was to pay $400 for the lecture. It was to be on Tuesday evening. Mr. Beecher lectured Monday evening in Baltimore, and we had arranged to take the sleeper immediately after the Baltimore lecture and be in Richmond early the following morning.

As we went aboard the sleeper at Baltimore a telegram was put into my hands which read as follows: "Richmond, Virginia, January 22, 1877. To J. B. Pond, Baltimore, Maryland. No use coming. Beecher will not be allowed to speak in Richmond. No tickets sold. Signed, W. T. Powell."

I at once replied: "Have started. Mr. Beecher will be on hand to keep his contract." I did not mention the incident to Mr. Beecher.

Just before our arrival in Richmond the following morning, Mr. Powell came to me on the train and told me that the feeling against Mr. Beecher was so bitter that it would not do for him to attempt to speak; that not a ticket had been sold, and he dared not advertise.

Mr. Beecher and I went direct to the Exchange Hotel, and as he registered our names I saw at once that there was a general disposition, from the hotel clerk down to the negro porter and bell-boy, to guy us.

We went down to breakfast, and the waiter and head waiter who seated us were distinctly uncivil. Mr. Beecher made no remarks. We ate our breakfast, and as we passed out of the dining-room into a long hall we met a pretty little golden-haired child. Mr. Beecher, in his characteristic manner, stopped and began talking to and caressing the child, taking some candy from his pocket (he never was without bait for children), offered it, and was just getting into the little girl's favor when the mother came along and snatched her away, as though she were rescuing her from a fierce beast of prey.

HOW RICHMOND WAS TAKEN BY STORM

Mr. Beecher walked quietly to his room. I left instructions at the hotel office that no one was to knock at his door. Mr. Powell called and assured me that it would be all Mr. Beecher's life was worth to attempt to speak in Richmond. I told him I would let him off that night from his contract if he would rent me the theatre. He consented, and I at once got out some bills and dodgers and advertised Mr. Beecher to speak that evening. The Legislature was in session and passed an informal vote that none of them would go near the theatre. The Tobacco Board did the same.

Evening arrived, and I could get no one to attend the door, so I did it myself. Mr. Powell applied for an extra force of a dozen police, which was of no account, as they were wholly in sympathy with the crowd.

The Rev. Dr. Grey, the principal Presbyterian minister, and the head of a leading institution of learning in Richmond, wrote the Chief of Police that though he distinctly wished it to be understood that he did not indorse or favor Mr. Beecher's speaking in Richmond, he sincerely hoped that the threat to egg Mr. Beecher would not be carried into effect.

As each member of the Legislature and Tobacco Board knew that none of the other members would attend the lecture, each embraced the opportunity to go; and there, to their surprise, they all met. It was a crowd of men who made the best of the joke they had played upon themselves. They were hilarious and disrespectful.

The time came for me to go after Mr. Beecher. I had no door-tender, but the theatre was full of men, and my pockets stuffed with dollars, so I left the door to take care of itself. I found him ready. While in the carriage on our way from the hotel to the theatre not a word passed between us. We had neither of us broached the situation during the day. When we arrived at the stage door of the theatre the dozen policemen were keeping the crowd back. As we alighted from the carriage, going into the door, a general yell went up. We met Mr. Powell on the stage. He called me to one side and said:

"Don't you introduce Mr. Beecher. The gallery is full of eggs. You will have trouble."

I stepped into the waiting-room. Mr. Beecher said: "Go ahead; I am ready."

Digitized by Google

I walked on the stage. He followed. As we sat down I saw the theatre full of men only. The crowd was disposed to be uncivil; canes began to rake the baluster of the balcony railing, and feet to pound the floor. In less than a minute a yell fairly shook the theatre. Mr. Beecher signaled me to proceed.

I stood a moment for them to get quiet, and then introduced him to his first Virginia audience.

HOW MR. BEECHER TOOK RICHMOND BY STORM

Mr. Beecher was to speak on Hard Times, but had decided to change the subject to the Ministry of Wealth. He arose and stepped toward the footlights. Another yell went up. He stood unmoved and waited for them some time. Finally a lull came and he began. He said that there was a natural law that brains and capital controlled the commercial world, and it could not be changed even by the Virginia Legislature, which opened with prayer and closed with benediction. The Legislature were all there, and the public, like any other public, were ready to accept any good-natured drive at the Legislature.

It was not many minutes before the audience was in full sympathy with the speaker, and for two and a half hours Mr. Beecher addressed that crowd, swaying them with his mighty eloquence and telling them such truths as they never before listened to. His peroration was a tribute to the Commonwealth of Virginia, the Mother of Presidents, her history and her people, and closed with a brief retrospect: how she had prospered when she set her mark high and bred her sons for Presidents and position, but how changed when she came to breed men for the market; how manfully and nobly her worthy sons had kissed the sod, and how sad had been her lot. But in all her prosperity and adversity God had not forsaken her. Industry brought prosperity, and soon, very soon Virginia was to be one of the brightest stars in the constellation of States.

Such applause and cheers as he got during that address I have never before or since witnessed.

He stepped off the stage and to the carriage, and we were in our rooms at the hotel before half the audience could get out of the theatre.

After getting to his room Mr. Beecher threw himself back in a large chair in front of a blazing wood fire and laughingly said:

"Don't you think we have captured Richmond?"

THE IMPROMPTU RECEPTION AT THE HOTEL

He had no more than spoken when the door opened and a crowd of men came rushing in. My first impression was that it was a mob, as it did not seem that there had been time for them to come from the theatre, but I was mistaken.

The foremost was a tall man with a slouch hat. (They were all in slouch hats.) He said:

"Mr. Beecher, this is our Lieutenant-Governor. We have come to thank you for that great speech. This is our Member for So-and-So, and this is Judge Harris," and so on—introducing a score or more of prominent Virginians.

"Mr. Beecher, we want you to stay and speak for us tomorrow evening. We want our women to hear you," etc.

Mr. Beecher was in his most happy humor. He shook the Virginians warmly by the hand. He told them he was announced for Washington the following evening, and his time was all booked for the season. They offered to raise $500 if he would remain over.

The following morning at seven o'clock many Virginians were at the station to see him off. All the morning papers contained extensive synopses of the lecture and favorable notices.

After that first appearance Mr. Beecher spoke twice in Richmond to the choicest audiences that old capital could turn out. I consider this the greatest lecture I ever knew Mr. Beecher to give.

WHY MR. BEECHER MADE SO MANY FRIENDS

Mr. Beecher had preached in Davenport, Iowa, Sunday, March 4, and lectured Monday evening. The crowds had been enormous on both occasions. People had come great distances from all directions.

While on the train from Iowa City, the morning of the sixth, a number of people in the same car were returning home from Davenport. Directly behind Mr. Beecher sat two very charming, refined ladies, dressed in black. I was seated directly opposite them, and noticed that they were amusing themselves by trying to gather up a number of Mr. Beecher's long, white, silky hairs which had fallen on the velvet collar of his overcoat and about his shoulders. The ladies were proceeding so delicately, and accumulating so fine a lock of his hair that it attracted the attention of quite a number of passengers, who seemed so intently interested in their success as to cause absolute silence all over the car. Mr. Beecher seemed interested in a book and unconscious as to what was going on about him. All of a sudden he quietly turned his head toward me. I noticed the twinkle in his eye, and at once knew something was coming.

"Pond, are there flies in this car?" he asked, as he quietly raised his hand to his shoulder as in the act of scaring away a fly.

The spectators at once burst into a general laugh. The two ladies were for a moment apparently paralyzed. Finally one of them plucked up courage to say:

"Mr. Beecher, we have been all the way to Davenport to hear you preach and lecture. We are Brooklyn people. We saw some loose hairs on your shoulders, and could not resist the temptation to secure them as souvenirs. We hope you will pardon us."

"Well," said Mr. Beecher, "my wife never could have been so careful as that."

Everybody in the car heard the conversation, and there was general merriment.

These ladies lived at Muscatine. They had once been members of Plymouth Church. Mr. Beecher entertained them until we reached the junction, where they left us for their home. He had given them all the late news from Plymouth and Brooklyn.

At Burlington, a week later, they came to the lecture with their husbands and families. They also came to the lecture in Washington, Iowa, and Monmouth, Illinois. We never made a Western tour that they did not appear in some of the audiences.

AN UNEXPECTED MEETING IN THE WEST

On August 18, 1883, Mr. Beecher lectured in Butte City, Montana. We arrived by an early train, went directly to the hotel, and Mr. Beecher to his room to lie down. We had left Mrs. Beecher for a day's rest at Deer Lodge, about forty miles from Butte, a sort of mountain watering-place, to join her on the following day on our way to Portland, Oregon.

While Mr. Beecher was sleeping in the forenoon the proprietor of the hotel told me there was a lady in the parlor who wished to see him. Answering the summons, I found a young woman with a child in her arms. I asked her what she wanted with Mr. Beecher. She replied that she and her husband were members of Plymouth Church; that she wanted him to baptize her baby. I knew very well that under these circumstances Mr. Beecher would be glad to be disturbed, so I called him, and he came to the parlor, shook hands with the woman, patted the baby on the cheek, and asked:

"What are you members of Plymouth Church doing here?"

"My husband is working in the mines."

"How long have you been here?"

"About two years, sir."

"Where is your husband?" asked Mr. Beecher.

"He hasn't any coat, and doesn't care to come in. He's down at the door."

THE OPEN HEART OF THE GREAT PREACHER

Mr. Beecher turned to me and said: "Pond, bring that man up here."

I found the hardy young miner and brought him up to the parlor. He was in his shirt-sleeves. He shook hands, saying: "Ah, Mr. Beecher, don't you remember me? I am a member of Plymouth Church. I was very unfortunate in Brooklyn. I am a better man now, thanks to you, sir."

It appeared that this young man had been unfortunate in Brooklyn. Through Mr. Beecher's influence, and his wife's, he had resolved to try his fortune in the far West.

Mr. Beecher was deeply affected at their earnest desire to have him baptize their only child, and I knew the baby's baptism would be very impressive. As I stepped downstairs for a pitcher of water I met an editor of one of the papers, whom I had formerly known. I told him to come upstairs, that Mr. Beecher was about to baptize the child of one of his parishioners. It was indeed one of the most beautiful ceremonies I ever witnessed. We were all deeply affected.

He questioned them considerably concerning their circumstances, and asked me to see that they had tickets for the lecture that night.

The man had to hurry back to his work in the mine. Mr. Beecher asked the mother to accompany him with her baby to a clothing store across the street, where he purchased a suit of clothes for her husband, giving instructions for them to be sent to his house at once. He then allowed the mother to take her baby home, not without a recommendation to be sure she brought her husband to the lecture that night. The woman replied that she had no one to leave the baby with.

"Bring the baby," said Mr. Beecher. "If there is no one else to take care of it, I will, or I will have Pond tend it."

She was very much overcome with all this unexpected kindness. Her eyes were almost bursting with tears of gratitude as she walked away from the store.

After her departure we went to a dry-goods store, where Mr. Beecher told the proprietor that he wanted several things. First, everything complete for a child of ten months, such as dresses, flannels, and such pretty things as a child wears, even to the little shoes and stockings, cloak and bonnet. Then he told him that he wanted some goods for a dress for a woman who was in poor circumstances but very worthy—something that she could wear to church. He bought two or three calico dresses besides, and such other articles as he thought a poor family would most need, and ordered them all sent to the house. I paid the bills, and have them, receipted, now. They were altogether $83.

WHO IT WAS GOT NEAREST TO MR. BEECHER'S HEART

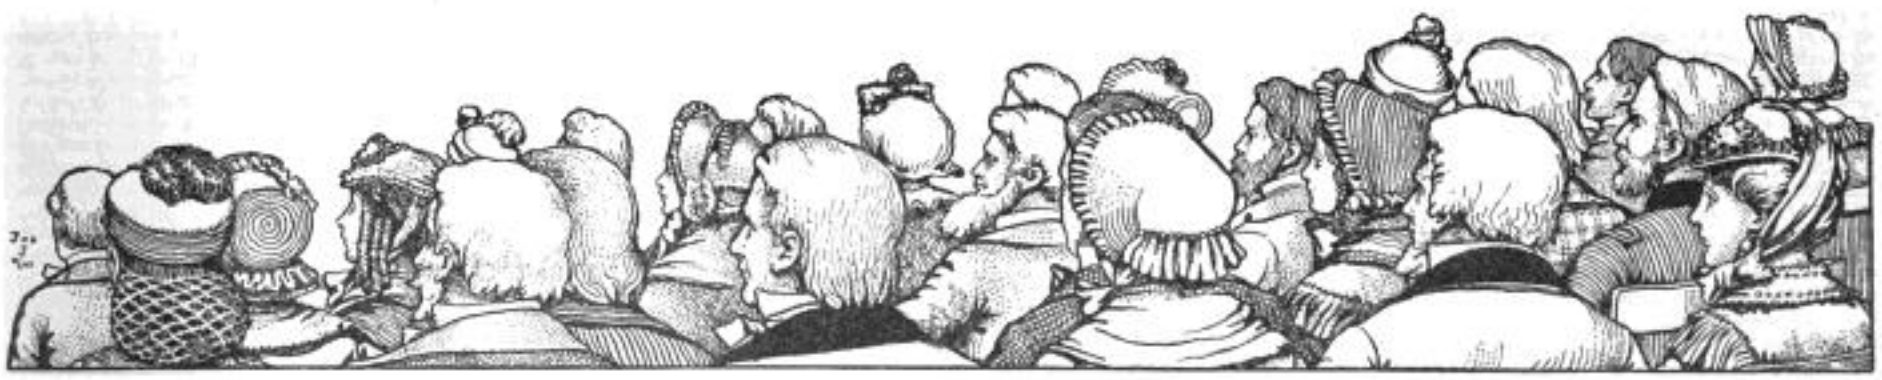
That evening Mr. Beecher lectured to an immense audience, all the seats having been sold in advance. We succeeded in placing two chairs at one side near the platform, which this little Plymouth family occupied. They were very attentive and enjoyed the lecture immensely. The baby was quiet and playful during the early part of the evening, then fell quietly asleep in its mother's arms. No one was in the least disturbed. I believe the orator got his inspiration for that occasion from this little party.

At the close of the lecture there was the usual rush to congratulate and shake hands with Mr. Beecher, including the Mayor, who presided, and the best people of Butte. I think he hardly noticed them, but made a break through the crowd and went direct to his former parishioners and congratulated them on the good behavior of the baby, told them many things of Plymouth Church and Brooklyn, enjoying it much more than all the congratulations the people had to offer afterward.

As Mr. Beecher and I returned to the hotel that evening I said: "Mr. Beecher, it seems to me there are few men who would devote themselves for a day to a kindness like that."

He replied: "Next to my own children are the members of my church."

REPELLING BOARDERS WITH A RED-HOT POKER



Mr. Beecher spoke in Bloomington, Illinois, being introduced by an old gentleman, a former friend of Abraham Lincoln. He was a very old man, and I could see that he was very much respected. As he approached the audience to make the introductory speech he hesitated for a word, and after a moment felt in his pockets for his manuscripts and discovered that he had forgotten them. Poor old gentleman! He was dreadfully embarrassed, and so was the audience for him. Mr. Beecher helped him out, and explained it to the audience as a common mistake among speakers, of which he had himself often been guilty.

He was to speak in Decatur that night, and I was obliged to secure a special train, as the regular train was four hours late. I secured a caboose and engine on the Illinois Central Railroad. We reached a small station about half-way to Decatur. We had to take a side track and wait for an upcoming train to pass. I saw a great crowd at the station, but our side track took us to one side of the town. We had no more than stopped when, looking back, I saw the crowd rushing toward our car. It was during the period when Mr. Beecher was most liable to insult, and I instinctively felt that that crowd were not coming to do him honor. We had a large coal stove in the caboose. It was red hot. A heavy iron poker lay on the floor. I ran the poker into the stove and let it heat. The mob came on and insisted on getting into the car. As I was watching the front door Mr. Beecher called, "Pond!" I looked around and saw that they had forced open the back door. I at once asked them to leave, as it was a private car and a special train. They kept crowding in, and I saw trouble ahead if they persisted. I caught the poker (which had become red hot) out of the stove and went for them. I jabbed it straight into them, and they began to get out.

I know that one of those roughs, if he is living, bears a scar, as I sawed the poker square across his arm.

We reached Decatur in time for the lecture, and went to Springfield the next day.

Editor's Note—This is the first of two papers devoted to Major Pond's recollections of Henry Ward Beecher. These articles are two of a series upon the celebrities of the past and present generations. Each is complete in itself.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
421 TO 427 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA

February 17, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription
5 Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

The Mystery of Military Bravery

NEWS letters and official reports from the Philippines and South Africa contain so many stories of military bravery that the world is compelled to wonder anew at the mystery of the human quality which is most conspicuous in battle. That the stories themselves are untrue, or that the facts are exaggerated, is extremely improbable; reports of extraordinary bravery of detachments and individuals will not be doubted by men who themselves have been "under fire," of whom we have still nearly a million in the United States, and all of them know that on this subject "truth is stranger than fiction."

The conduct of soldiers in action has been the subject of numerous explanations, none of which explained. It is the fashion of all nations to idealize their soldiers into men who became heroic through love of country and faith in the justice of their cause, but no view, whether casual or careful, of any body of troops will be rewarded by the spectacle of men of more than average human quality. Whether conscripts or volunteers, white, black, brown or yellow, soldiers' faces are very like those of civilians. Nor can their deeds in war be attributed to savagery of nature, for soldiers off the field are quite as peaceable and kind-hearted as home bodies. In the days of solid military formations it was said that soldiers fought because they were pressed upon the enemy by the human mass behind them; when solid columns and squares were abandoned and men fought in lines only two ranks deep it was explained that they stood up to their work because any attempt to run would be stopped by the swords and bayonets of the "file-closers" who stood behind each and every company.

But all the old-fashioned fighting methods have been ignored in the Philippines and South Africa, as they were two years ago in Cuba, and as they have been for a quarter of a century by the British in India and by our Army in its fights with the redskins; yet the common soldier, raised to the responsibility of an individual fighter, and with the individual fighter's chance to skulk, fights even more bravely than his kind did in older days.

He used to have the incentive of loot and license should his side conquer, but even that is now denied him. When armies were recruited principally from the prisons, the slums and the highways, the bravery of the common soldier was attributed to callousness, apathy, and the lack of any incentive to live. When men followed only leaders of their own choosing bravery was supposed to be a result of hero-worship, yet the modern soldier will follow any stranger, of any rank, who manifests willingness to lead. A full stomach, preferably with some alcohol in it, was supposed to be conducive to bravery, yet soldiers on half rations fight as bravely as any others, as many of our men who charged in Cuba and raided in the Philippines (or did both) have abundantly proved.

Military bravery cannot be explained by the theory of fatalism, for soldiers as a class are not fatalists. Neither is it due to abnormal natural courage, for soldiers are recruited from among all classes, including the gentlest. It does not come of temporary insanity caused by extreme mental and physical strain, for never are the soldier's faculties more alert and well "in hand" than when in battle; the excitement at the beginning of an engagement is so great that a compensating calmness inevitably follows, and quickly, too. Possibly satisfaction at having an opportunity to do the work for which he has been trained is a partial cause of the soldier's bravery in action; the man who has learned any other trade spends half his waking hours at it, but the soldier who has given one hour in twenty-four of his term of service to actual fighting is a rarity.

Still, despite all theories and explanations, military bravery remains one of the most mysterious of human qualities, and the men who best exemplify it are as powerless as any others to explain it.

—JOHN HABBERTON.

We are almost as much interested in colonial questions now as we are in the man who moved to another town a year ago.

Keeping Up with the Procession

LIFE is composed of adjustments. From one point of view life is adjustment. The infant adjusts itself to seeing, feeling, talking. The child goes to school and adjusts itself to instruction. Once in school, new teachers and new objects of study require new adjustments. The graduate must adjust or adapt himself to the ways of business or professional life. As a bridegroom he is again face to face with new conditions, new duties, new obligations, and he must study them and adapt himself to them. As a father, still others confront him and call for further adaptation. In short, there is no period, no condition of life free from the necessity of adjustment. Inability to adjust one's self to new conditions means stagnation; then death. The survival of the fittest means nothing more than the survival of those fit or able to adjust themselves to the constantly varying environment. There is constant change of environment; there is constant need of adjustment to it.

What is true of life in general is true of life in particular. Take man in relation to his business or profession. In the former there is a constant change requiring constant study and adaptation. The successful business man is he who sees the changes and accordingly adjusts himself to them. How often do we hear it said of an old firm that business grew away from them. What does it mean? Simply that the firm stood still while business changed.

In professional life the same principle applies. The surgeon who refuses to adopt the principles of antiseptic surgery has fewer and fewer patients, and the lawyer who knows only the common law of bygone days has no clients. Medicine of to-day is vastly different from medicine of fifty years ago. It has been revolutionized. Law, the most conservative of professions, the conservator of customs, nevertheless changes greatly in fifty years, both in methods and subject-matter.

The constant need of adjustment is nowhere more keenly felt than among the industrial classes, and in no other class is there less adaptability. The continuous line of improvements in mechanical devices continuously throws large numbers of employees out of adjustment. No one would halt the march of mechanical improvement, and yet we feel sad when we contemplate the condition of the men and women who are thrown out of employment and are unable to adapt themselves to the changed conditions. We recall the outcry against the introduction of sewing machines, and yet the sewing machine was a blessing when viewed from a broad standpoint, although sewing women in great numbers suffered. But no one now seriously proposes that we go back to hand work. The women suffered not because of the machines, but because they lacked the power of adjustment. We are witnessing the enactment of the same tragedy at the present time in the introduction of the typesetting machines. Our sympathy goes out to the hand-setters, but we realize that they must adjust themselves to the change or go to the wall.

What is true of individuals is true of communities, of nations. There has been a continuous adjustment of American governmental methods to meet new conditions and new demands. America, because she has been able to do this, is known as a growing nation, a living nation. Spain, because she is unable to do this, is known as a decaying nation. Is there not a moral in all this?

—CLINTON ROGERS WOODRUFF.

There are quite a few people in this country who could get along with only one Presidential election every six years.

The Hat and the Home

CERTAIN men, unclassifiable, yet somewhat alike in a general way, are in the habit of saying, with pleasant reference to their nomadic life, that they are at home wherever they hang up their hats, or that their hats are their homes. Our day of commercial travelers and peripatetic agents of a thousand sorts has doubtless greatly modified the domestic economy and the home administration of many excellent people. This could not be avoided, but outside of the special circles thus affected by the exigencies of business there is a distinct tendency in American life toward avoiding a permanent domestic centre, which is, in fact, the only true home. Such a trend may be the incipient stage of a complete breaking up of Anglo-Saxon civilization as a well-defined mode of human motion, and a merging of its strongest distinction in the composite forces of the world at large.

The home has always been the most influential source of Anglo-Saxon influence and prestige, because the home has ever served as a sort of church, school and sanitarium all in one, out of which men were sent, full grown and ready for life's battle, imbued with all that a father's, a mother's, a sister's and a brother's loyal love and bracing influence could afford. The home hearthstone was, from the earliest days, a shrine, an altar and a forge. There prayers were said, there noble sacrifice was offered, and there was generated the unquenchable heat of race pride and imperious patriotism. A man's home was not only his castle, but his sanctuary and his domestic nest. A woman's home was where her husband built it, and there she was delighted to dwell, rearing meantime a brood true to all the best traditions of an ancestry whose loyalty to race and country had never been questioned. Whatever limitations may inclose a civilization based upon the home life, the beauty of steadfast loyalty to itself can never be matched in a cosmopolitan system which from every centre looks abroad for its model.

It may be well enough for the commercial agent or the professional traveler to be at home whenever he is under his hat: that is business; but the average citizen, the incalculably valuable common man, he upon whom rests the responsibility of informing true society and true political life, must have a home from which to draw his knowledge of what society and the political organizations need. A mother, a wife, a sister, a daughter, all drawn together in a home under the best domestic influences, form just the combination to imbue a man with a true sense of what legislation women need for their largest happiness. Likewise the home, where men have been well bred in the atmosphere of love, manly self-respect and high courage, is the fountain from which the statesman can safely draw inspiration for his application of law to the needs of an advanced human society which is strongly rooted back in the family.

No earnest observer, no conscientious student of the times, would presume to say what is going to be the outcome of present movements. Humanity is a refractory and perverse quantity. Still, judging by the past, we must recognize certain persistent traits in our race, and certain recurring and apparently ineradicable characteristics of our civilization, which would seem to forecast great trouble to the world when we shall have abandoned the old Anglo-Saxon regard for the home as the cradle of all that makes for the permanence of virtue, love, law, obedience, justice and high patriotism. The man's hat should hang on the peg at home.

—MAURICE THOMPSON.

Out of every hundred homes in this country only fifteen have servants. Happy eighty-five!

Our Modern Brains

SOMETIMES it is hard to be an optimist. When we read about the germs fighting within us for our destruction, the gentle prophecies that the human race is becoming bald and cross-eyed, and the cheerful predictions that the human stomach will come to an infantile diet, about the only consolation we can find is that we shall probably be off the earth before these things are fully realized.

But there is one thing that does touch our pride. We like to think that we know more and do more than any other generation in the history of the world. But here comes a new preacher and prophet showing us that we are not only below the standards of previous ages, but that we are steadily deteriorating.

Mr. Ellsdale, in the Nineteenth Century, accepts Mr. Gladstone's confession that the brains of the modern Briton had less power than those of the Elizabethan period, and, after telling us that the ancient Greeks' brains represented the high-water mark of the human intellect, he calmly informs us that the tide is now steadily receding, and he gives the reasons.

First, the tremendous increase of knowledge has developed our receptive faculties at the expense of the creative faculties. Second, the mental impatience of the age has hurt our brains, and, instead of thinking steadily and systematically, we are victims of a hop-skip-and-jump literature. Third, the democratic spirit had led to the leveling of thought, and thus we dare not have higher convictions. Lastly, the pursuit of the almighty dollar, involving love of luxury and ease, is the great cause of "the scant development of really first-class and commanding intellect" in the United States. Mr. Ellsdale does not offer very much hope, although in order not to leave us in absolute gloom he thinks that possibly some of the great world-movements will bring about a new order of things in which there will be worthier ideals of sacrifice and devotion resulting in better men and women.

Anybody can prove that people are not what they should be. The trade of the pessimist is easy even in times of great activity and prosperity. He flourished in years gone by, and his prophecies come down to us as interesting curiosities of the past. He is the same "old inhabitant" speaking of "the good old times," and we listen to him with some impatience, and proceed on our destiny trying to do a little and be a little better every day. Even Mr. Ellsdale would hardly have us go back to the days of Elizabeth, who swore like a trooper and flirted like a summer widow, or to ancient Greece, where they had no football or department stores. The present is all right, and there are prospects. Everything is becoming a trust nowadays, and possibly that world-movement which he dimly sees is really an assembling of the mental forces of mankind as the essential preliminary to a golden age of life and letters.

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

Next to the mosquito and the borrowing neighbor, the friend who is continually telling other people things for their own good is the most unmitigated nuisance in the world.

Digitized by Google

At the English Court

A LETTER has just been received by a friend in England from an officer besieged in Ladysmith. The "Dick" referred to is an officer of Gloucestershires captured at Nickolson's Nek.

"I want you," the officer writes to his English friend, "to release me from a promise Dick and I, individually and collectively, made you. You will remember that we undertook to be in Pretoria for Christmas. I find I can't by any possibility get there quite in time, so am obliged to ask you to release me from my part of the bargain. Dick, however, as you know, was always a beggar to keep his word. He has managed to get to Pretoria like the good officer he is, and at the head of his men. By the way, if you are thinking of sending me a turkey for Christmas, please pick out one that is strong on the wing and good for a fifteen-mile burst of speed, and have the pigeon-post people fling it in the air at Colenso. Kindly tell the bird that if its ambition is to be dined off by one of Her Most Gracious Majesty's officers it had better fly high."

MR. PENNELL'S ADVENTURE WITH THE BEAR

IT IS giving away neither a trade nor a professional secret to say that no book will appear dealing with Mr. Joseph Pennell's unexampled and hair-raising trip into that unexplored Czardom, Russia. Pennell recognizes that it would require the pen of Mark Twain and the pencil of Verbeck to do justice to that trip, and, moreover, Pennell recognizes that he possesses neither, so the journey stands in danger of being unrecorded. But the salient points can be put in a paragraph, and this paragraph will show the world what it, the world, is likely to miss through undue modesty of the celebrated artist. One day Mr. Pennell awoke and found his soul filled with a desire to visit Russia, to see her minarets and spires, her barbarous splendor and semi-Oriental edifices and customs, and all that—in fact, to visit the colossal Bear in its den. Now the Bear has entertained certain other Americans who could write and sketch, and when the Bear woke up in the morning, after reading George Kennan's work and scanning Mr. Frost's drawings, the Bear had a very sore head. But the Bear does not often say much; he mouches on and lies low. So when Joseph Pennell applied for passports he was readily given them, and they were willingly, even eagerly, initialed, and all that by the Bear's Ambassadors in Washington and London. They, the Ambassadors, patted Joseph on the back, wished him the best of luck, and assured him that he and the Bear would get along like a house afire. Pennell, I think, first journeyed to Vienna, and from there struck out for Russia, his pockets stuffed full of passports and credentials. A few yards after crossing the frontier the train pulled up at a siding, the door of Pennell's compartment was flung open and in stepped a polite inspector who demanded the traveler's passport. When Pennell handed it to him the man instructed the artist to ask the station master for it at the next stopping-place, who would return it. Meanwhile it would be inspected. On pushed the train, and at length the station was reached. Pennell did as he was bid. "What?" cried the station master, his brows lowering into a suspicious frown, "have you parted with your passport?" "I gave it to an inspector," answered the artist. The station master gave a few hurried instructions to subordinates, who scattered away at breakneck speed. Turning to the astonished American he said, "You have done a most serious thing. You had no right to let your passport out of your possession, and you must consider yourself now under suspicion and closely watched by the police. You may be who you say; I don't know. If you are, and if you really had a passport, it is, no doubt, by this time, in possession of a Nihilist, and we must hold you responsible for anything that occurs. You will go to such-and-such hotel and there stay until you have satisfied us that you are genuine. All your communications must pass through my hands."

THE CZAR'S DENTIST TO THE RESCUE

Mr. Pennell was personally conducted to the hotel named. From there he sent cables to Washington, London, and wires to the American Ambassador in St. Petersburg. No answer to one of them! The Chief of Police visited him the first day, the second day, and on the third day asked him point blank how it came about that none of his country's representatives would have anything to do with him. That afternoon, Joseph, wandering wearily and anxiously about the hotel, heard the sound of a familiar song sung in good American accent. Diving into the room, he came upon an evident Yankee and explained the situation to his surprised compatriot. The man of course knew Pennell's worth "down to the ground," and thought he could help him, although the crisis was most grave. "Now see here, Pennell, you've got to get out of Russia somehow. I carry some weight, being dentist to the Czar, and I'll do my level best for you." In the end the kind dentist got the artist aboard an outgoing train and across the border. When Pennell reached safety he met a knowing friend. "Hello, Joe; finished with Russia already?" Pennell began an explanation. "Oh, I know; lost your passport; deuce of a hubbub; marched off to a hotel; met a Providence-sent countryman—by the way, what was he?" "Dentist." "Ah, yes; dentist, of course. If you had been an Englishman he would have been a horse doctor to the Czar, a Frenchman and he would have been a dancing master. Joe, my boy, they didn't want you in there, and that's the way they go about it in Russia."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN NOT WORRIED ABOUT THE NORTH POLE

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN did not have a very merry Christmas of it. He is held chiefly responsible for the war and England's unpreparedness, and although Englishmen say little at the best of times, and absolutely shut up when things are going badly, Chamberlain knows right well that the voters are "laying for him." He will not be hampered in the conduct of the business by word or deed, but when it is all ended he will be held strictly to account, and have to pay to the uttermost farthing for any act of omission or lack of skill that he may have committed or shown, and he, better than any man in England, knows that. Therefore it was a very inopportune time to approach him for his support toward another expedition in search of the North Pole, as a certain number of enthusiasts did not long ago. After listening in grim silence to what they had to say, Chamberlain readjusted his eyeglass and calmly gazed upon the deputation for a telling time, then said: "Gentlemen, I am informed that the North Pole is in a place where it will keep sweet for a reasonable length of time. I am trying to discover Pretoria. Good-day."

SNOWIN'

By Paul Laurence Dunbar

DEY is snow upon de meddahs, dey is snow upon de hill,
An' de little branch's watahs is all glistenin' an' still;
De win' goes roun' de cabin lak a sperrit wan'erin' 'roun',
An' de chillen shakes an' shivahs as dey listen to de soun'.
Dey is hick'ry in de fiahplace, whah de blaze is risin' high,
But de heat it meks ain't wa'min' up de gray clouds in de sky.
Now an' den I des peep outside, den I hurries to de do',
Lawd a mussy on my body, how I wish it wouldn't snow!

I kin stan' de hottes' summah, I kin stan' de wettes' fall,
I kin stan' de chilly springtime in de plowland, but dat's all;
Fu' de ve'y hottes' fiah nevah tells my skin a thing,
W'en de snow commence a-flyin', an' de win' begin to sing.
Dey is plenty wood erroun' us, an' I chop an' tote it in,
But de thoughts dat I's a thinkin' while I's wo'kin' is a sin.
I kin keep f'om downright swahin' all de time I's on de go,
But my hea't is full o' cuss-wo'ds w'en I's trampin' thoo de snow.

What you say, you Lishy Davis, dat you see a possum's tracks?
Look hyeah, boy, you stop yo' foolin', bring ol' Spot, an' bring de ax.
Is I col'? Go way, now, Mandy, what you think I's made of?—sho,
W'y dis win' is des ez gentle, an' dis ain't no kin' o' snow.
Dis hyeah weathah's des as healthy es de wa'mest summah days.
All you chillen step up lively, pile on wood an' keep a blaze.
What's de use o' gittin' skeery case dey's snow upon de groun'?
Huh-uh, I's a reg'lar snowbird ef dey's any possum 'round.

Go on, Spot, don' be so foolish; den you see de signs o' feet.
What you howlin' fu'? Keep still, suh, cose de col' is putty sweet;
But we goin' out on bus'ness, an' hit's bus'ness o' de kin'
Dat mus' put a dog an' dahky in a happy frame o' min'.
Yes, you's col'; I know it, Spotty, but you des stay close to me,
An' I'll mek you hot ez cotten w'en we strikes de happy tree.
No, I don' lak wintah weathah, an' I'd wush 't'uz allus June,
If it wasn't fu' de trackin' o' de possum an' de coon.

THE DISADVANTAGES OF BEING A QUEEN'S SON

THERE are serious drawbacks to being a son of the Queen. At the moment of writing the Duke of Connaught is suffering from one of those disabilities that go with high birth. He is a keen soldier, and has easily worked high up in the rank of British officers. Were he a commoner and occupying his present rank in the Army he would be out at the front, leading, in place of some one of the Generals to whom the conduct of operations is given. But he is the Queen's son, and the public in England have an inherited undesire to allow the Royal family to get too firm a hold on the British Army. When the weight of years compelled the Duke of Cambridge, the Queen's cousin, to resign the position of Commander-in-Chief of the Army, a quiet but determined struggle took place between the Throne and the Army over the knotty point of successor. The Queen did not disguise the fact that she wished her son, the Duke of Connaught, to step into the shoes of her cousin, but the Army would not have it, and Lord Wolseley, as his record entitled him, got to the top. On all hands it is admitted that the Duke of Connaught is a most capable officer, who is ambitious not merely to get to the top of the Army, but to see service and to do his best as a soldier. However, the War Office does not consider it politic to send him to the front. He is senior in rank to many already there in responsible positions; but anxious to serve without taking the reins from any hands, he has offered to waive his title to outrank others and to serve in any position. Still the War Office will not send him. It is said that he has threatened to resign his commission in the British Army and to go to South Africa and take a commission in one of the irregular forces now being formed. It will be interesting to see whether he succeeds in getting out to face the Boers. There are drawbacks to being a Queen's son—in England.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD'S NEW BILLET

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD has got a most important command at length. He has been appointed second in command of the Mediterranean Squadron, perhaps Britain's heaviest fighting force. The Channel Squadron is undoubtedly the "swell" fleet, but it is recognized here that when the guns begin to thunder in a European war the Mediterranean Squadron is the one which will come in for the first and the heaviest crash. So although the world does not hear so much of the Mediterranean as of the Channel fleet, it is, nevertheless, the grimmest, most hardworking fleet in the world. It is never idle, and it carries no lame ducks on its register. Lord Charles has now the opportunity of his life. If he has any new ideas in his head, any points on manœuvring or plans of battle he will get a chance to work them out and prove their utility. The greatest attention will be paid to any suggestion he makes. Lord Charles is a "hail-fellow-well-met" with the London newspaper men, and attends all their big dinners when he is in town. He invariably finds himself called upon for a speech, and as invariably delivers a rattling, uproarious one in which the British naval flag floats high above the rest of Europe combined. At the finish of his latest outburst of patriotism up jumped the Chairman and sang out, "Now is the moment ripe for Mr. Ward to sing us Sullivan's The Sailor's Grave. Let us hear of at least one dead sailor." A grin, none too comfortable, stole over the broad features of the fighting lord, every one laughed, and the glorious song was sung.

ALBERT EDWARD'S NEAT COMPLIMENT

THE Prince of Wales is—occasionally, at least—clever at paying a compliment. In connection with the fitting out of the American hospital ship Maine, he was surrounded by a number of American ladies, including Mrs. Bradley-Martin, Mrs. Joseph Chamberlain, the Duchess of Marlborough, Lady Randolph Churchill, Mrs. Ronalds and Mrs. Arthur Paget, when he said, "I have the greatest faith in the good the ship will do; American girls have healed many an Englishman's wounded heart." —E. W. Sabki.

Digitized by Google

The Fitting of the Peats

By S. R. Crockett

AUTHOR OF THE STICKIT MINISTER, THE RAIDERS, THE LILAC SUNBONNET, THE GREY MAN, THE RED AXE, ETC., ETC.

Copyright, 1910, by S. R. Crockett. Copyright in Great Britain

Part III—Ninth Chapter

ADAM stretched himself wearily as he arose and looked about him. He had been sitting beneath the arid and insufficient shade of a gray olive, whose dustily silver leaves shivered and rustled and rubbed their edges together even in the windless noon of May with a certain curious suggestion of life not wholly vegetable.

"I wonder what keeps Glenmorrison," he said to himself; "he is always late."

Adam Home heaved a long sigh.

"After all," he continued, "he has nothing else to do, so he may just as well take up procrastination as a business. There is no other advantage in being in this horrible place."

And yet there were few scenes more beautiful than that upon which Adam Home looked down, as he shrugged his shoulders and blinked with eyes half closed in order to shut out the heat and the dust of that high, glorious day in early summer.

He saw a red-roofed, sunny city, full of Oriental suggestion, with wide balconies of scrolled ironwork and closed sunblinds. He looked upon a rippling river, spanned by an ancient bridge, somewhat ruinous, indeed, upon whose broken arches the children joined hands and sang a quaint and moving ditty. And as the burgher folk went past upon the river bank and heard them, husbands and wives clasped hands instinctively and smiled at each other, always saying the same words and always moved with memories of the days when they, too, sang:

"Upon the Bridge of Avignon,
We're dancing round,
Dancing round!"

Beyond, lifting its yellow-white masses of building against a sky which was just beginning to take on its summer look of brass toward the zenith, extended the castle and palace of the Popes of Avignon.

But Adam Home was tired of the brilliant little southern city. He had grown to hate Rome en poche. He was tired even of the loyalty which kept him there; tired of drawing money drop by drop from a poor tenantry to lend it to a Prince, who, though far from ungrateful, immediately forgot that he had received it and went off to expose his distress to some other adherent suspected of having received a more recent remittance from home.

"At last!" cried Adam, without moving from the sparse edgewise shade of the dry, rustling olive leaves, and making a trumpet of his hands, "Glenmorrison, what news of him to-day?"

A tall, ruddy-faced, elderly man was stepping leisurely up the rocky path toward him, leaning somewhat heavily upon a stick, and occasionally stopping to wipe his brow with a great brown kerchief of the pattern of a Paisley shawl.

So soon as he came within the radius of retort, "Him," he panted indignantly, "him, as ye call your Prince, sir, is, for a wonder, in the best o' health and the worst o' tempers."

"What," said Adam Home, smiling and making room for his friend under the olive, "has he been fretted by the Government order to remove himself from Avignon, or has he not been able to borrow the money to pay his last week's market bills?"

"Neither and baith, sir," said Glenmorrison grandly, and then, quite suddenly becoming familiar and dialectal, he added, "sit farther ower, Aidam—ye are takkin' up every bit o' the caller shade—no that this God-forsaken whin buss gies us onything that can be rightly named a shadow. I wish to peace I was sittin' aneath a decent Scots fir in the forests o' Glenmorrison, watchin' the red deer comin' troopin' bonny ower the Balloch! Aidam, Aidam, what garred us no stick to that douce solid man, King George, and so sit siccar on our lands and heritages a' our days?"

"Glenmorrison," said Adam Home, clapping his hand on his friend's knee, as they sat close together in their doubtful patch of coolness, and watched the yellow sunlight in which the landscape simmered, with the Palace of the Popes rising stern and dignified in the midst, "who was it that persuaded me first to join? Who brought me hither? Who pinches and screws, that 'him' down yonder may have three pennies and a bawbee out of every good Scots' groat that comes his way—who but Glenmorrison? Aye, and who would give up that last bawbee for a clap on the shoulder and a careless, kindly word from Ye-Ken-Wha?"

"I ken—I ken," said the ruddy-faced man, shaking his head; "it's true, Aidam. But it's fair heart-breakin' to see him this day, sitting cheek by jow wi' the Dowager's waitin'-maid, and cryin' every quarter-hour for 'a bottle o' wine and fresh glasses!' wi' never a thocht o' his faithfu' servants that have wearied their a' on him, but only colluguin' wi' Irish rapparees and penniless French rogues. It's a' that woman! We maun kidnap her, I'm tellin' ye, and send her aff to King Louis. He has sae mony sicklike already aboot him that an odd yin or twa mair wad never be kenned. But she plays the mischief wi' oor laddie."

"And think you," said Adam Home, "that if the Walkinshaw were away that we would get back the lad that fought at Gaeta like ten men, and stood like a tall pine beneath the gathering banner at Glenfinnan? No, no; let the lass be, lest a worse thing befall."

The elder man looked up with some surprise at his companion.

"Aidam," he said, "what's gotten ye, Aidam? Has she been at ye hersel'? I thocht that ye were wi' us in separatin' the Prince frae that woman?" Then Adam Home spake more sharply than before—nay, even sternly. "The lass has paid her price for him, and a bonny bargain she has of it! Glenmorrison, I am sick of all this. I am going home to Scotland—aye, though I put my neck in the hemp for it. Even Tower Hill were better than this miserable life of feckless plots abroad and universal cat-and-dog at home!"

"Tut, tut, Aidam," said Glenmorrison, "this will never do! Ye need to be lanced, Aidam. MacWheem maun see to ye. Nocht like bloodlettin' for curin' the megrims! Preserve us—ye to speak o' gaun hame to the gallows wi' a score o' ill-set cousins at Henry Pelham's elbow, and that good uncle himsel' aboot to be inducted into your estates and kindly heritages!"

"Glenmorrison," said Adam Home, "my life here is not worth a docken leaf. I am sick of it—sick, also, God forgive me, of the Prince——"

Glenmorrison arose in a fume.

"I see—I see," he said; "ye wad play 'booty.' Ye wad mak' your private peace. Ye hae been in communication wi' the butchers o' Drummossie. That is the secret o' your defense o' the Walkinshaw. Perhaps ye hae gotten the Dowager's waiting-maid to speak a word to her mistress for ye. But, sir, ye shall not go to England without feeling the point o' a true man's sword. Heavens, sir, I will fight ye here and now for the words ye hae spoken!"

And the red-faced man strode to and fro, snorting and nodding his great head, and with his hand clapped threateningly on his sword. The younger man sat still, leaning his back indolently against the gnarled trunk of the olive, and for answer he cast one shapely leg over the other and stared at his silver shoe-buckle.

"Sit down, Glen," he said; "you and I cannot quarrel. We lay over long together in the cave on Millwharchar Muir. The stead of your elbow is in my ribs yet. Man, you just could not find it in your heart to pink Adam Home with the selfsame hand that used to be laid about my neck in the night-time."

The ruddy man, who had been fanning himself haughtily, flung down his hat in the dust and held out both his hands.

"Aidam," he cried, "ye hath seen baith a mad dog this day and a silly one, too! Gie me your hand, if ye can forgie me for my temper. It's my mither's faut for marryin' a —— reid-headed Heelantman!"

Then the young man, suddenly losing his nonchalance, rose to his feet with a bright smile on his face. He took his friend's hand,

DRAWN BY HARRY C. EDWARDS

WILL BEGBIE WENT DOWN MILLWHARCHAR MUIR LIKE A MAN STRICKEN WITH A DEADLY WOUND, BUT YET CAN JUST STAGGER HOME TO DIE pressed it with a quick enthusiasm very unlike his previous unconcern, and drew him down again upon the roots of the olive.

"Sit down, Glen," he said; "this day is somewhat overhot for emotions. If you are a fool, I am a whole company of them—and a merry-Andrew to boot. For I know as well as you that I risk my neck by going back to Scotland. I have nothing to gain but the gallows. Yet, oh, man, I can hear in my sleep the grouse craw in the heather as he fills his crappan, and the lang-nebbit whaup willy-whaain' doon to his nest in the gloamin'! Man, I'm away back to the cave on the Black Craig o' Dee. My heart is fair sick to see a trout loup in a pool, and to sit where the birks are bonniest and sweetest-scented, and where the larches are hanging out their green tassels like ladies' favors!"

Adam Home uttered the last words with a kind of rapture, and Glenmorrison gazed at him in dumb astonishment, which, however, slowly merged into an eye-twinkling kind of humor. But he did not speak.

"Good-day, Glen," cried the young man, waving his hand; "I'm off to pack my hat-box. Make my adieus and obeisances to the Prince, will you, if ever he asks for me? I will not interrupt him now."

Glenmorrison watched him go, with a careless grace of carriage that had something almost dainty and womanish about it. Then the smile broadened on his face.

"Ohoo, Aidam, lad!" he murmured; "ye are sick to hear the whaup birlin' at his wild sang doon the wind, are ye? And every grouse cock that chunners in a heather bush is happier than ye! An' it's the springtime on Millwharchar Muir, is it? And the Walkinshaw, doon there" (he pointed with his hand), "is a pair lass that has paid her price, and your heart is sore vexed for her. Aye, aye, Aidam! Ow, aye, Aidam!"

And Glenmorrison, sitting with his elbows on his knees, leaned forward till his broad, smooth-shaven chin rested on the ebony handle of his cane, and watched the young man till he lost sight of the tall, slender figure in the press of the country folk on mules and donkeys, all coming out of the city laden with their purchases or rattling the empty baskets of their ingoing merchandise.

"Aye, aye," he communed with himself, well pleased at his own penetration, "I ken. I thocht it wad come. And it will tak' him the sairer noo when it has. There never was a Kilpatrick that could stand against a petticoat. And this yin has been lang in catchin' the fever. It will gang the harder wi' him for that! And a bit slip o' a country lass, too—after haein' escapit a' the brawest dames o' King Louis' Court!"

He arose afterwhile, stretched himself carefully, and with a stiff halt in his gait began to descend.

"Aweel," he mused as he went, "it's nae manner o' use speakin' to the lad. He doesna ken what is the trouble wi' him. And faith, Guid forgie me, Glenmorrison, ye are ower fond o' a bonny bit craitur yourse'f to bar the richt to flyte him!"

"Aye," he added, chuckling, "and feed, too, o' the whaup willy-whaain' doon to his nest in the gloamin'!" He chuckled again.

Tenth Chapter

IT WAS a June morning. Mistress Bell MacLurg was out fitting the peats on the Millwharchar Muir. This is how she did it. It was yet early. The dew was pearled

Editor's Note—The fourth and last part of The Fitting of the Peats will appear in the next number.

Digitized by Google

on the grass, and Bell walked slowly from the little heather-girt farmsteading and down the birch-tree glade. Then still more slowly she passed along the side of the burn that gurgled half hid in the bent grass till she reached the black hags on the edge of the muir.

At this place, having looked at the peats her father had cast, and shaken her head over the delicate problem of where she was to begin, Bell sat down on a knoll of dry heather and gave herself up to the consideration of that and of other problems more or less remotely connected therewith.

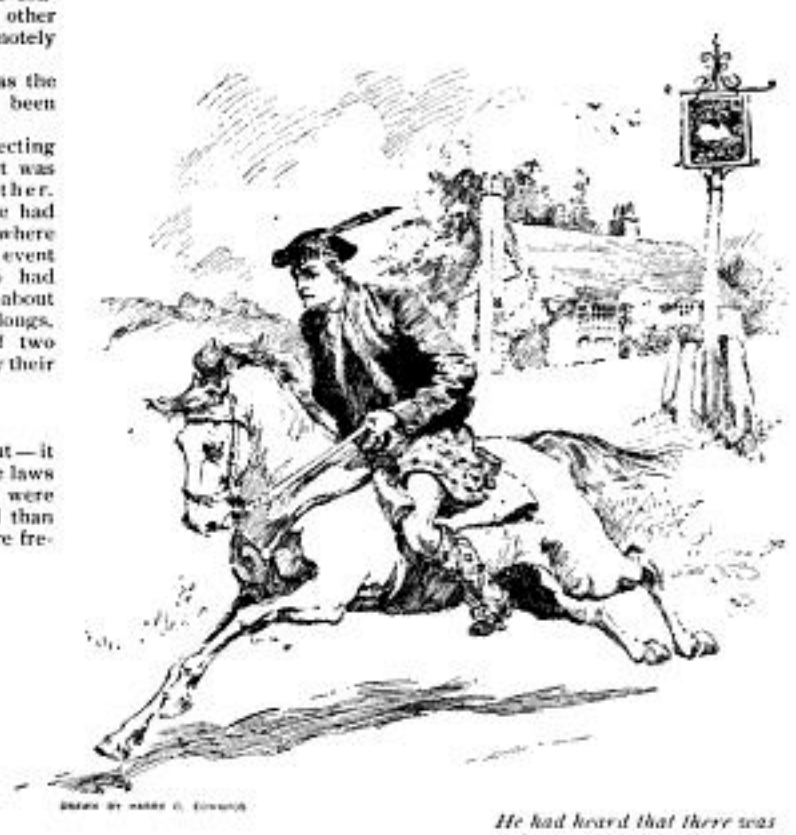
"Here," she said, "was the very spot where I had been kneeling when——

"No," she added, correcting herself, finger on lip, "it was there!" But it was neither. For more of the peat-face had been cast, and the spot where the sacred and unutterable event thus vaguely alluded to had happened was lying all about her in narrow black oblongs, of the shape and size of two bricks fastened together by their ends.

He had promised—but—it simply could not be! The laws against straggling rebels were more strictly administered than ever, the red soldiers more frequent visitors in the glen. She was glad, therefore, that there was no chance of her being interrupted at her work—so glad that as she looked downward toward the Black Craig of Dee, along the line by which he had come last year (was it only a year ago?), the landscape appeared curiously enough to dissolve, running edgewise in both directions, and a dry lump which had been hardening in her throat broke with a sound like a sob.

This was that same Bell MacLurg who had made a jest and a mocking of the rows of young men along the west wall of the kirk on Sabbaths, and even turned on her heel when the young Laird of Duchrae told her that he had seen no girl so pretty in the Assembly Rooms of Edinburgh, asking him if by chance he thought that was any news to her.

Yet it was this very girl who thus saw the landscape waver and melt into a gray blur, like a sum on a boy's slate at close of school.



What—it was raining! Thunder-rain, too, for the drops splashing down flat and large were more than lukewarm. Bell glanced up at the sky. The sunlit blue ran every way, though still a little blurred and dim. The drops must come from somewhere else. It did not occur to her that she had been crying till a shadow fell across the yellow bent and dulled the ruby-hearted heather. She started to her feet; her heart drummed in her ears, and the tears were raining down undisguisedly now. A figure, tall and darkly masculine, was striding swiftly over the peat hags within a score of feet of her. She could not see his face. So silly it was! She darted up her apron, a pretty one with flowers speckled on it which she had put on (one never knows!), and dashed the water out of her eyes.

Some one had hold of her hands. Some one was whispering words in her ear. Will Begbie? No—not Will Begbie—by no manner of means Will Begbie.

"Love—little love," he was saying (Will Begbie forsooth!) "I have come back to you—a thousand miles back for my lesson. Have you forgot that you promised to teach me how to fit the peats?"

But in spite of his cheering words Bell could only sob and sob and hold down her face. She had not really wanted him to come. She had hoped that he would stay away. She was very angry with him for coming. She would tell him so and send him away. Besides, it was very wrong. What would her father say? And at any rate, he could never mean it, but only to make sport of her. He was a great man. She would tell him now to go away and leave her. So she set her hands against his breast, for he was drawing her dangerously near to him and saying—well, things that her ears ached to hear and her heart bounded to listen to.

Then with a tremendous effort Bell lifted her face to speak. She was just opening her mouth to tell him that he must not—when—when something cataclysmic happened. The sky went around and around; the world spun like a top. The earth heaved under her feet. All the wide spaces seemed to grow full of honeysuckle and balm and sweet spices. Odors of the divine and human floated dizzying about her. She trod on the viewless air. Rosy clouds upbore her, and she found herself held very close to a blue silk vest underneath which a man's heart was beating very loud. Her hands, which she could have sworn that she had raised for the purpose of keeping him at a proper distance, were clasped about his neck. It was no use to pretend any more. Also, it was much nicer.

He had heard that there was to be a troop of horse that day

Eleventh Chapter

"BUT you should not have come at all. You know you should not. I did not mean you to come. And you are in danger. You must go away at once, or else I shall not love you!"

The young man, whose face now wore a very different expression from that which we had seen upon it under the olive tree over against the Bridge of Avignon, felt himself held tighter as the tender voice murmured reproachfully, "You must go away again!"

Once on a time, and not so long ago, either, Adam Home had thought that his life was over. With a kind of relief he had felt (as he believed) his pulses beat slower and steadier. He had looked cold and unmoved upon the fascinations of the easy beauties of two Courts. So he was sure that his youth had indeed passed away. But now, held in the light of Bell MacLurg's eyes, exultation took hold of him to find that his heart had never played so rare a tune for any woman, and that this Bonnet Laird's daughter had taught him that there was a sweeter cup to set to his lips than he had ever dreamed of draining on his life's journey.

"You knew you were in danger, yet you have come back to me."

To Bell there was something acutely, even painfully, exquisite in the thought. Fire as well as blood ran in the girl's veins.

"Oh, but you should not—you ought not!" she cried; "you must go back at once! If any one should see you, what should I do? Go! Go!"

But, nevertheless, Adam Home felt himself held tighter, for the face that looked up at him was at once radiant with a maid's love and fierce with a mother's anxiety.

Smiles ran rippling across the girl's lips as often as they were disengaged—while each time she held him at a distance in order to search his face (to see if he really meant it), tears welled in her eyes till they grew large and deep and suffused, being filled with a kind of glorified mist.

And then Adam Home told his tale at length. To do it he made her sit down beside him on a tussock of "ling" in the lee of a great face of peat. Before she did so Bell cast her eye around the horizon and her mind over the possibilities. Her father was at Cairn Edward. He would likely go on to Dumfries. It was market day there, and he might be long detained—might, indeed, not return that night.

Will Begbie—well, it did not much matter where Will was. She held Will in the hollow of her hand. So she thought as she settled herself down on the great tussock of dry, purple heather. There were no King's soldiers in the neighborhood ever since Ligonier's Horse had been called abroad, and with them had marched that young ensign who had come "once-errand," as the country folk say, from Dumfries, just to see whether Bell's eyes were as gloriously blue as had been reported to them. He went back declaring that the half had not been told him—but adding that her heart was as flinty as her eyes were blue.

And there and thus Adam Home told his tale and settled the aching of his heart, feasting his eyes on their desire till the sun rose to the zenith and began to sink again, and still on the wide Millwharchar Muir not a peat was fitted.

Moreover, Bell began to grow hungry. As for Adam, he did not care whether or no he ever tasted food again. Indeed, the very thought jarred upon him. But not so Bell. For, rising at last after many attempts out of the encircling fortress, she extracted from under the lip of a moss-hag a white-wrapped bundle and a brown jug. With these she spread before him her frugal midday meal—scones of flour and farles of cake, in quantity scanty enough for one and a laughing-stock for two—yet very bread of the gods when administered in finger-lengths with spices and condiments, thus:

"Open your mouth, sir—no, you don't! There, now eat that! Did you ever get anything so nice in France? You know you never did. You know it in your heart, sir. I suppose you have been drinking such rare and expensive wines that you turn up your nose at honest buttermilk. But I will teach you, sir, to play your whimsies off on me! Another bite? Ah, would you! One thing at a time, if you please, Master Adam Charles Francis Home! Oho, sir, I have not forgotten your name, you see! Not that I believe a syllable of the Charles Francis, any more than I do of all the other nonsense you have been talking this morning!"

All at once she clasped her hands with a pathetic little gesture of dramatic despair.

"Adam," she cried, "we have forgotten to fit a single peat! What will my father say to me when he comes home? (Thank Heaven, he is at Dumfries by now!)"

Adam Home indicated that he cared not even an infinitesimal coin of the realm what her father said, and that he had not come a thousand miles and a thousand to the back of that only to fit peats all day.

At this Bell's mouth dropped, and she glanced up at him with shocked reproach.

"But you told me when you first arrived that you had come for your lesson, and if that is not true how can I believe anything else you have told me since?"

Adam Home hastened to supply her with an additional and confirmatory evidence.

"Well, if that be true," said Bell, daintying herself after eating, "you must help me with my peats. I must have something to show, you know, or John and Alec will wonder."

"Let them wonder," said Adam Home. "Bell, will you come away with me? I want you to leave all this. Can you take a landless and moneyless man, one without country or kin? Would you leave your people to wander the earth with him?"

Bell put out her hand.

Her eyes were downcast and smiling, yet she did not answer for a while. Then she glanced up quickly at him.

"What do you think yourself?" she said, daring him with her eyes.

He did not heed her light mood, but went on more earnestly and boldly, "Will you, Bell? Take time before you answer, for it means all to me."

"Aye, truly," said Bell, suddenly growing as pale as himself; "I will go with you the world over! You know well that you have made me love you!"

"And I," said Adam Home, taking her hand, "will faithfully serve you, will give my life to keep you safe, my love, my wife! I will joy to do your bidding——"

Bell glanced up with a sudden light in her demure eye and a rush of red back to her pale cheek. "I would far rather that you made me do your bidding."

"I may have to do that, too, madam," said Adam Home, with an answering spark of fire in his eye. "And faith, Mistress Bell, I had better begin now. I have found a safe way out of the country. A French ship sails a week hence from Loch Ryan. She calls at Isle Rathan, whence a boat may be put out to her under cloud of night. My friend, Patrick Heron, though a great King George's man, has there a good Jacobite clergyman in hiding with him—a man, like myself, somewhat tainted in the recent troubles. He will marry us—that is, if between times you do not change your mind. Patrick's wife will welcome you for my sake, for she, too, wears the white rose in her heart. And as for Pat, he will welcome you for your own. For, having wedded one of them himself, he naturally loves all pretty, scornful lasses. Bell, what say you to my plan? Will you come?"

"I cannot even if I would. I shall not have any wedding dress!" she objected, feeling that he was taking things rather too much for granted.

Her pretty lips pouted and her foot kicked at a tuft of grass. "And I had thought it all out during the winter. It was to be white silk with gold broidering—long in the waist, short in the skirt—so pretty over a quilted petticoat of blue, with black stockings and buckled shoes. Bess Kerr told me of one she saw in Edinburgh at the Assembly Rooms, but I knew I could better it. And now I cannot. I won't be married in my old taffeta. It is a shame. But men do not care. I suppose you would be glad if I had only my apron."

"I would, indeed, be well content," said Adam gravely. "I want only you, you see. I did not come from France to marry a 'grande costume.'"

"But I shall not look at all pretty. You will be ashamed of me. In France you will go out with your great ladies and leave me. Are you sure you never will? Tell me—tell me at once!"

Adam told her several times, being held tightly by the lapels of his coat while he did so.

"No, do not bend your head; hold it up—so. I want to see by your eyes if you are speaking the truth. You really love me in this old gown better than all the fine ladies of the Court? And you will always love me just as much, and never, never, never grow tired of me?"

Twelfth Chapter

WHILE Adam was engrossed in the long-continued business of satisfying these and other reasonable inquiries and doubts of his sweetheart, it was natural enough that both of them should be wholly absorbed in their own affairs.

Had either of them turned their heads, all the rest of this story might have run differently. But neither moved, so they did not notice that behind them a man was crouched on the top of the peat bank looking directly down upon them. He could hear the low murmur of their voices. He could see Bell's face turned tenderly and smilingly up, with that look upon it which means happiness to but one man—for it is the unmistakable look of a woman's glad surrender and resignation. He could see, and after that he turned away, Adam Home's face bowed down to silence with a long kiss a pair of appealing and petitionary lips.

Will Begbie went down Millwharchar Muir like a man stricken with a deadly wound, who yet can just stagger home to die. He had come up to the hill with purpose to see Bell MacLurg, and, it might be, help her with her peat-fitting. He had watched her that day as he had done every day since the man whose life he had saved had gone to France. And though for a little while after the lugger sailed from the Water of Fleet with the red-capped sailor on board Bell had seemed pensive, of late all had changed, and her voice was once more heard gay—caroling in the morn, like the mavis in little bursts of song, as she swung her milking-pail or tripped up the loaning to summon home the pasturing kine with the old melodious call:

Digitized by Google

"Hurley, Hurley, hie away hame!"

Will Begbie had loved Bell a long time—indeed, ever since he could remember her, a little, dainty, dotting thing of two or three whom he used to carry afield to gather gowans on the knowes while he mowed the rushy hollows, or to lose herself in the cornfield where the tall poppies waved scarlet like a thousand soldiers' coats.

For years he had counted her as surely his, watching her as she grew up, rejoicing in her beauty, glad when the suitors came flocking, and chuckling to himself with a quiet smile as he saw them betake themselves out of the glen, riding sullenly on their steeds, yet, nevertheless, turning in their saddles to take a last look at Bell as she stood in the doorway waving them off into the great world again.

He had never spoken of love to Bell. But he had depended upon her knowing. And he had liked her to count upon him in all things. It was, "Will, do this," and Will had done it already. "Will, come here," and Will came like a dog. At kirk and market, if there happened to be nobody newer or better, Will was at hand to escort Bell home, never intrusive nor in the way, ready to recognize the interests of sport and keep discreetly in the background so long as he was not wanted, but all the same there—ready and happy to be whistled up on occasion, like his own faithful Bawty.

In short, the relation into which Bell and Will had dropped was precisely that most unlikely to be favorable to the intentions of either.

For Will never doubted but that Bell, when she had tired of novelty and the exercise of her power, would turn to him. Bell, on herself, when she thought of the matter at all, had an idea of making good old Will, faithful Will, happy—by loving him as a sister. This appeared to her an ambition so new, so untried, so laudable, and, moreover, one so likely to meet Will's own views (when properly explained to him), that she never doubted but that all was for the best between them. So she took Will Begbie's arm with a sister's freedom, and patted him on the head as he sat by the fire watching her with adoring eyes, like a big dog. Once at Hallowe'en she had even let him kiss her when the nuts were cracking merrily on the hearth and kissing was in the very air. Will thought of that every night. He was too proud of it ever to try for another. But to marry Will Begbie! Why, Bell never thought of such a thing!

But Will did, and now as he stumbled blindly down the hill, his heart clay-cold and dead within his breast, the whole bright summer landscape running in glorious red and green and purple from verge to horizon verge, gay with flowers underfoot, white-winged with clouds above—all suddenly went ashen gray and lifeless about him.

He looked angrily up at the muir fowl, the clamorous peesweeps, the whinnying snipe, the wailing curlew. They vexed him. He wished he could twist their necks and silence them forever. Bell had been taken from him. Now she could never be his. He had seen it. He had never before surprised that look on a woman's face. Now he never would see it for himself. But he knew its meaning on Bell's all too well.

So he stumbled dully into the stable. It seemed the safest refuge. He would escape from the clamor and the brightness there.

Blossom, Pet Blossom, the little gray mare he had been keeping as a surprise for Bell, turned and whinnied to him. He was used to bring her a piece of sugar in his pocket, concealing it from his housekeeper, who did not approve of luxuries. Now Pet Blossom vexed him, and as she nuzzled against his coat he thrust her fiercely from him, as if she had been responsible for the faithless, cruel girl who should have been her mistress. Then, his heart relenting, he bent his head on Blossom's mane and did what many a man has done before and since, though that which none will ever own to.

Slowly he came to himself, an angry and desperate bitterness rising in his heart. This man, he knew, was a great lord—an exile truly, but still, in spite of that, a great lord. He could mean no good to Bell. He was deceiving her. It might soon be too late. This man had used his hospitality to win away his sweetheart from him. But at this point, with a quick revulsion, his heart refused to give up all hope. Even now it might be possible. All was not yet lost. He might still save Bell.

Even as he thought these things in his heart he was saddling Blossom. That mettlesome little lady threw up her head and moved her feet rejoicingly and expectantly on the hard, earthen floor of the stable.

He had suddenly remembered that Ninian MacLurg would be at market that day. He would warn him of the traitor within his gates. But in the background of Will Begbie's heart there was another and less worthy thought. He told himself that he was a good King's man, with a duty to his country—even if there was an extra loft above the barn at the old farmsteading.

He had heard that there was to be a troop of horse that day in Cairn Edward, under young Ensign Pelham. His herd Jock had seen them riding two by two yestere'en along the military road from the shire. They could not yet have gone. He could make up his mind on the way what he would do if he found them.

So Will Begbie mounted at the stable door, and the next moment, with a glad clatter of hoofs and a ring of bridle-iron, Blossom was flying down the glen toward Cairn Edward.

(TO BE CONCLUDED)

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY LETTER WRITER

By Tudor Jenks

AS THE rose has its thorn, so has the received letter its required answer. Only a Napoleon could leave his mail unopened for the fortnight during which most of the letters would answer themselves. Lesser mortals must expect the joy of reading to be followed by the black care of answering, and exclaim with the wise man of old, "Oh that mine enemy would write a book!" rather than a letter.

The cold world of business and the gilded world of aristocracy and wealth may dictate to a stenographer or delegate to a secretary; but we of the people must snatch a hurried moment from the already overburdened hours, and force the mind into tune with the correspondent. Then from the warmed-over emotions comes the insincere reply that tolls the knell of friendship.

In the old days there were a dozen possible styles of epistolary composition. Aminadab could describe the state of the weather, the condition of the crops; he could rehearse the argument wherein, to believe himself, he overcame the judge, the squire or the rector; he could outline the plot of that rare bird, a new book. And in return Prudence, if a country lass, could intrust to him a commission; she could tell of the charms of the new schoolmaster, knowing well the direful effect of her apparent unconsciousness.

But to-day neither of the lovers has any resource from direct personality. All must be either I, I, I, or you, you, you—the first rank egotism, the second sheer affectation.

Practical-minded folks wholly abandon any but the telegrammatic style. It is: "Baby is well, Maria's toothache better, and mama leaves for the Philippines on Wednesday." None but poets and young girls green with the sweet illusions of adolescence consider letter-writing other than a duty.

It is time that some system was introduced into this interchange of intelligence. The ordinary domestic letter, if analyzed, would fall readily into a simple formula. There would be such a percentage of Endearing Address; such a proportion of Reassurance; a part comprising Conventional Affection; a trace of Actual News; a remnant for Graceful Retreat, and an exaggerated mass of Concluding Phrases. This mixture of ingredients, finished with Signature and Address (in full), furnishes forth quite a respectable Family Epistle, and is received in Plenary Absolution for the sin of an unanswered letter.

An example will do no harm:

"NEW YORK, ——, 1900.

"Dearest Aunt Jane:

"You never forget that your nephew, far from home, treasures the rare letters that come to him as bits of the old home itself. [Endearing Address concluded.] I am quite well and so far have escaped all the ills feared for me by the over-anxious ones at the old homestead. Yes, your letter came safely, and I cannot plead illness as an excuse for not replying sooner, but I am so busy that I can hardly find time to write other than the business letters which I must send promptly. I hear from Cousin Harry that all is well with him, except a slight cold from which he is now nearly recovered. [End of Reassurance Clauses.] I am glad to have even one familiar face within a hundred miles, for you may be sure I often recall the dear ones at home, and would be perhaps homesick if I were not so absorbed in business details. Remember me with love to the family. [Conventional Affection Exhausted.]

"There is nothing much to tell you, except that business is improving and the outlook for the next few months is fairly bright. I met your old friend, Clara Mackenzie—she was Clara Richardson, you know. She is looking well, and asks to be remembered. [Actual News.]

"It is late, and though I should like to write you a good long letter, I fear I ought not to sit up longer, as I must be up early in the morning at this season. [Graceful retreat accomplished.] So good-by, dearest Aunt Jane, and write again soon to your nephew, who will never forget your kindness, and who will try next time to send you a really good letter full of all the interesting things one sees in this new world. [Concluding Phrases used up.]

"With love and warmest remembrances to all the loved ones, I am your most sincerely affectionate nephew,

"JOHN PETER BARLEYCORN.
[Signature with flourishings.]

"MISS JANE PETTIGREW BARLOW,
"18 South Oxford Road,
"Rare Meadows, Lushington,
"Manchester, England." [Address.]

Such is the dutiful family letter.

Now all this should be avoided by a few brief formulæ. There should be printed forms which, by means of gummed edges, might be fastened one below another to any desired length, and these forms could be made to cover all of the ingredients except that falling under the head of Actual News, for which a short slip of blank paper might be made to serve.

Better yet, however, would be a set of conventional abbreviations standing for the different portions of the discourse, missing words and phrases being "understood" as in that delight of boyhood, the Latin Grammar. So treated, the above letter might be thus expressed:

I.	Endearing address:	D—dearest, etc., etc.
II.	Reassurance:	O. K.—everything all right.
III.	Conventional affection:	D. D.—engaged as before.
IV.	Actual news:	C—met, or saw,
V.	Graceful retreat:	Ta-Ta—au revoir.
VI.	Concluding phrases:	D. etc.—well, good-by.

As received, the letter to Aunt Jane would then take the following form:

"D. Jane. O. K., D. D., met Clara Mackenzie, née Richardson, O. K., D. D. Ta-Ta. D. etc. JOHN BARLEYCORN."

The address being added, it will be found easy to translate the above into all the actual intelligence contained in the original epistle.

The same idea might be extended, and needs only "Eli Perkins'" suggestion of using numbers instead of adjectives and other expressions of quality to be almost a complete code. Melville D. Landon in his book Saratoga in 1901 (which seemed absurdly far in the future in those days), suggested that if your friend said it was "a fine day," you might reply, "80 per cent." A pretty girl might be 98½ per cent. Of course a mere acquiescence would be expressed by 50 per cent., scorn by 10 per cent., and complete disagreement might go to the length of negative quantities, such as — 25 per cent.

Combining the two systems, a love letter might begin: D. 250 per cent.; while a mere formal phrase would be D. 20 per cent.; to a brother, D. 90 per cent. would seem about right, D. 100 per cent. being for a parent.

THOMAS N. HART
Mayor of Boston

FEW men stand higher in the business circles of Boston than Thomas N. Hart, Mayor of the City and President of the Mount Vernon National Bank. Mayor Hart retired from commercial pursuits twenty years ago, and was at that time senior member of a firm of hatters. But an active man such as he must have something to occupy his mind. The habits of application, alert attention and constant, regular employment, generated in fifty years of active life, becomes too fixed and hardened to be snapped off at a moment's notice; the man's pleasure is in his work. A brief experience of idleness soon proves to him where his true recreation lies. Such a disposition as his will not permit itself to rust out, and so on his retirement from business he accepted the Presidency of the Mount Vernon National Bank, the affairs of which he has directed ever since.

Mr. Hart is seventy years old, but time has dealt leniently with him.

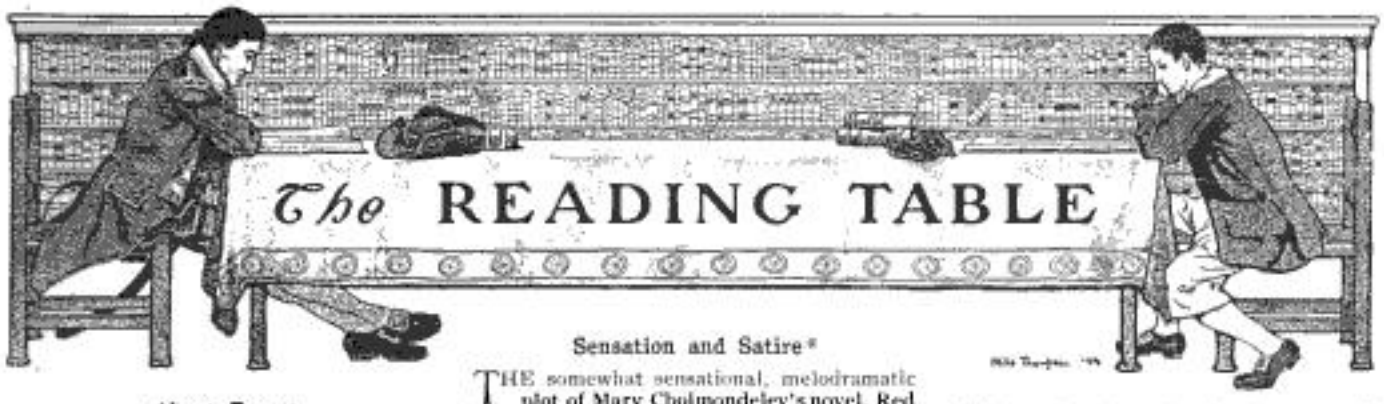
Mr. Hart is essentially a self-made man. At the age of thirteen he left his farm home in Reading, Massachusetts, and came to Boston to seek employment. He soon secured a situation with a dry-goods firm, but after two years' service there entered the employ of Philip A. Locke & Co., hatters. In 1851 Mr. Hart became a member of the firm, and some years later, when Mr. Locke retired from business, Mr. Hart succeeded him and established a new firm in which he acquired his handsome competency.

When Mr. Hart retired from commercial pursuits he began to take a livelier interest in politics than had been his custom.

He was elected to the Common Council and the Board of Aldermen of the city government of Boston, and in 1888 as the Republican Mayor of a normally Democratic city Mr. Hart gave the people of that city a clean, businesslike administration.

Last year, when the Republicans were casting about for a Mayoralty candidate, Mr. Hart was again nominated and triumphantly elected.

Now hear what Mr. Hart says: "Whatever success I have attained I attribute to strict attention to business. The young man who starts out in life with the serious intention of making a reputation and a fortune for himself has a hard and difficult task before him. His path will not be strewn with roses. He will meet with many disappointments. Ideals will be shattered before his eyes, and often the clouds will hang heavily over him.



"The young man who is waiting and watching for the shutters to go up, and is ever anxious to leave on the dot of closing time, who never does any more than is expected of him, will be of little use to himself or his employers. He might as well give up the idea of ever amounting to anything. In my own case, if I may be permitted to make the observation, I worked hard, early and late. I always seemed to anticipate the wants of my employers. I had generally attended to things before they themselves had thought of them. I had always their interests in mind, and thus made myself valuable—so valuable, in fact, that they thought they could not get along without me, and so, one day, made me a member of the firm.

"If there be any such thing as luck I think it consists in being on hand at the right time, and the young man who attends strictly to business is always on hand. That boy is sure to be pushed ahead when a vacancy occurs. Success in life is purchased only at the price of personal sacrifice. My own first appreciable success in life was when I was made a member of the firm of my employers. I did not make a great deal of money in that position, but during those six years the foundation for the business of Hart, Taylor & Co. was laid deep and firm. After that it was smoother sailing.

"When I stop and consider my early struggles for a foothold in commercial Boston I wonder how I ever succeeded, but I attribute it all to hard work, faithfulness to self and employers, honesty in dealing with all, strict attention to business, sobriety, frugality, and living within my means.

"Young men or women who will do this will greatly enhance their chances for making a success in life."

Digitized by Google

About Boys*

READERS of Eden Phillpotts' striking and sombre romance, Children of the Mist, have a surprise in store for them when they make the acquaintance of the author's newer fiction, The Human Boy. Anything more unlike can hardly be imagined, and the difference marks Mr. Phillpotts' versatility. The volume contains a series of eleven short stories of English schoolboy life, for the material of which the writer has evidently drawn upon his personal memories. The various tales are told by as many lads who attend Doctor Dunston's establishment at Merivale, and these narrators are of ages running from ten to fifteen years, the style and orthography being skillfully adapted to the degree of maturity. And very genuine boy-talk it is, full of slang and queer grammar; full, too, of boyish prejudices, likes and limitations, along with such sturdy ideals as pluck, honor and a sort of kindliness—rough and ready, but recognizable, nevertheless—the ideals which make the British the dominant race it is on the face of the earth.

These sketches are delightfully fresh, racy and natural; one learns of studies and sports, the mischief-makings and punishments of the schoolboys; sees the cock of the school in all his glory, the fag at his slaving, the head master judged by those stern mentors, his pupils—and the pretty daughters of the Doctor, too, who draw the boys from the cricket field and give them their first initiation into the mysteries of the human heart.

Sketches like Freckles and Frenchy, Concerning Corkey Minimus, and Gideon's Front Tooth are packed full of human nature, and all of the scenes have a "go" and unction which will make many an old boy, as he reads, feel himself to be whittling the old desk again. The book is a good example of the best kind of art—the art that conceals itself.

The Study of a Striking Personality†

IT IS rather dangerous business to introduce real people, more or less veiled, into fiction. Yet very able novelists—one thinks of Disraeli and DuMaurier, for instance—have done it with no damaging results. Mr. Morley Roberts has tried the experiment in his The Colossus, and few will deny that he has written an extremely strong, clever book.

Under the name of Loder, Cecil Rhodes is the central figure, and the study of this king of affairs is keen and telling. Loder is placed in Egypt, where he has one of his big schemes on to get a railway concession which shall expedite his power both in that land and in South Africa. He is opposed by wily Orientals, and he and his trusty henchmen, of whom several are vividly portrayed, find themselves temporarily blocked. He is helped out of his dilemma by a young woman who loves him as an embodiment of masterfulness, and whom he is mortally afraid of. Loder's attitude toward the fair sex is humorously touched off by the author, and the dialogue sparkles with epigrams, while the action is brisk and the complications well managed.

The Colossus is a bundle of inconsistencies, but uniting them all are the imperial will and the Napoleonic grasp of things which make him a great man of his kind.

Not only the sketch of him, but that of the girl and of the group of English folk directly about Loder-Rhodes, is capitally drawn. One wishes for space to show by quotation the wit and wisdom compressed at times into small compass by Mr. Roberts.

*The Human Boy. By Eden Phillpotts. Harper & Brothers.

†The Colossus. By Morley Roberts. Harper & Brothers.

Sensation and Satire*

THE somewhat sensational, melodramatic plot of Mary Cholmondeley's novel, Red Pottage, reminds the reader that she once wrote that successful mystery tale, The Danvers Jewels. Very likely the majority will be most drawn to this later book by a dramatic central theme full of excitement: The husband of the woman, who has been wronged by another man, forces that man to draw lots as to which one of them shall commit suicide within five months—and thence many complications arise. But to our mind the most valuable part of the story, and that which evokes genuine admiration for the author, is the delicate yet very pungent satire in the social studies of English country and town life; the strong character drawings, especially of the two girl friends, Rachel and Hester, and the really delicious humor which plays on the surface of an underlying seriousness in viewing life, like foam on a mid-sea wave.

The novel is thus at once thoughtful and brilliant and ethically sound, at the same time that its plot will attract those who care for that element alone. It is not surprising to hear that the book is selling well and is already being dramatized for stage purposes. Here again one marks passage after passage as quotable; the writer is never commonplace or obvious. When she wishes to convey the idea that a certain woman has gained in flesh to a point where quiet colors are advisable, she puts it in this way: "Mrs. Pratt had reached the size when it is prudent to concentrate a love of bright colors in one's parasol."

—Richard Burton.

*Red Pottage. By Mary Cholmondeley. Harper & Brothers.

NEWS FROM BOOKLAND

An Author in an Unexpected Place.—Of Miss Gordon-Cumming, the traveler and author, a story comes from London illustrating how closely the world is bound together nowadays. While visiting the Fusan temple, a famous Buddhist resort in the Province of Fokien, China, she engaged in conversation with a plainly dressed Chinaman, whom she thought to be one of the ecclesiastics. He spoke excellent English, though with a very faulty accent, and told her many interesting stories and legends about the place. At the end of fifteen minutes the distinguished author produced her note-book and pencil.

"Pardon me," she said, "but what you have told me is so interesting that I desire to take memoranda so that I can use it hereafter."

"With pleasure," replied the Chinaman; "but I can save you that trouble by giving you copies of the North China News in which my articles have appeared."

Mr. Lloyd's Remedy.—Henry Demarest Lloyd, of Chicago, author of Wealth and Commonwealth, is busy on a book describing his experiences and studies in Australia, where he made an extensive lecture tour. Like Henry George and other American reformers who have been to the Land of the Kangaroo, he received a warm welcome. He found in the Antipodes the same questions and the same schools of thought as mark our own country. Though Mr. Lloyd is a strong advocate of State socialism, he is a conservative in regard to plans and methods, believing that the only way to secure genuine reform is by movements along the lines indicated by natural law. This makes him somewhat of an enigma to those reformers who would revolutionize everything to-morrow. One of this type met Lloyd once and said:

"You admit our social and industrial systems are corrupt and evil?"

"Yes, to a certain extent they are."

"Then why not abolish them at once and give the people a chance?"

"Because," replied Mr. Lloyd, "the people themselves are just as corrupt and evil."

"Then there is no hope for betterment?"

"Yes, there is. You can never have good government without good citizens, nor good citizens without good government. The real problem is how to make them both better."

Mr. Wells' Criticism of His Critics.—H. G. Wells, the novelist, has been greatly mystified by the difference in treatment accorded by English and American critics to his latest work, When the Sleeper Wakes. "This book was written with a double purpose," said the author to an American friend in London recently; "it tried to picture what science would do for society in the next one hundred years, and also what society might do for itself in that period if some of its present tendencies are not modified."

The English critics only saw the first side and referred to the "coming kingdom of machinery" and "the future horrors of science," whereas the American critics went almost to the opposite extremes, alluding to the story as a companion-piece to Bellamy's Looking Backward, an "indirect plea for State socialism" and "a savage thrust at plutocracy." Between the two millstones the author appears to be fairly well ground. Mr. Wells' health has been much better of late, the change being ascribed to his removal to Heatherlea, Worcester Park, and thence to Sandgate, Kent.

A Murderous Game.—Professor Charles Oman, of Oxford, the English historian and military critic, enjoys playing the German martial game known as "kriegspiel." The game involves the use of a regular map with counters, representing infantry, cavalry and artillery, and is supposed to have great educational value in the learning of tactics and strategy. The Doctor played with great regularity, sometimes alone and sometimes with friends. In both cases he would use sanguinary terms commenting upon the various movements. It seems he was overheard by a housemaid, who, after listening a number of times, went in fear and trembling to the doorkeeper.

"Lor', ma'am," she said, "the gentleman is mad with too many books, and is contemplating murder or suicide. He sits at the table all day long sticking blackheaded pins into a sheet of paper, saying to himself in a cold-blooded way, 'Here I'll have to kill a hundred and there I'll drown fifty. I'll do some shooting there, and I'll cut them all to pieces with horses over yonder.' I think it is your duty, ma'am, to send for a straight-jacket or the police."

Mrs. Burnett's Romantic Find.—Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett is conscientious, and even painstaking, in her literary work. Her latest novel deals with the De Willoughby claim and is singularly accurate from a legal and historic point of view. To obtain the information employed in the book, the author while living in Washington spent much time in the record-rooms of the Government departments which have jurisdiction in such matters. Here, she says, she absorbed large quantities of information and book dust. On one occasion she asked a custodian:

"Do any of these old claims contain romantic features?"

"Bless my heart, no," answered the astonished official. "Not a bit; they are simply matters of fact and law."

She started to read one as a matter of duty, feeling that it would be exceedingly uninteresting. To her surprise it was so full of startling incidents as to be almost melodramatic, and when she closed the case she found that several hours had elapsed. To the ancient custodian who stood near she observed, "I found that record quite romantic."

"Indeed!" was the answer. "I have read it several times, but I never thought it was as crooked as all that."

The Box and the Biscuit

The box Uneeda Biscuit are packed in (owned solely by National Biscuit Company) made a revolution in biscuit selling.

The biscuit packed in the box made a new standard in biscuit baking.

Every day the standard of Uneeda Biscuit goes higher. Every batch we bake is better. Every box increases your liking.

Uneeda Biscuit

Is not a nine-day novelty, but an every-day necessity.

Uneeda Jinjer Wayfer too!

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

AT EVERY BOOKSTORE IN AMERICA

WHEN KNIGHTHOOD WAS IN FLOWER

The Book of the Year

A new edition—new plates, new paper, new binding, and a portrait of the author—is now ready.

Illustrated. Price $1.50, postpaid.

THE BOWEN-MERRILL COMPANY
Indianapolis, U. S. A., Publishers

An Instant Success

THE BLACK WOLF'S BREED

A powerful story of adventure in Louisiana and France of Louis XIV. Stirring situations are presented with burly, full-blooded recklessness. Pictures by Relyea. Cloth, $1.50, postpaid.

AT EVERY BOOKSTORE IN AMERICA

"Which Company Shall I Take?"

Is sometimes a question with a young man. After a few relatives die of some hereditary disease the question is: "Which company will take me?"

Better get life insurance while you can. Write for booklet, "How and Why," on Insurance.

PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.
921-923-925 Chestnut Street, PHILADELPHIA

Parquet and Hardwood Floors

Wax Floor Polish, etc.

J. DUNFEE & CO.
Cor. Franklin and Washington Sts, CHICAGO
Send for Book of Designs

Digitized by Google

Tales of Men of Many Trades

Nicholas Richmond's Pulmonary Pills

By Charles Battell Loomis

MILLER & BLAKE'S was as dingy a store as you could find in lower New York. It stood on John Street, not far from William, and at its uncompromising front with four rows of dirty windows were a grim hoistway and a gloomy doorway, covered with dangling signs of Leverett's Hair Rejuvenator, Baird's Bloom of Health, and Ritter's Carbolic Face Powder. Its dark and gloomy interior was filled with littered desks and cases of patent medicines and a pervading odor of carbolic acid, reinforced on certain days by the sickening fragrance of pepsin in the making—it was not the sort of place to promote the building of air castles.

And yet when Nicholas Richmond, fresh from school, and fresh besides with an innocence and gayety that endeared him to women and made men more than tolerate him, came there as clerk, he supposed that in course of a weary time he would become a partner in the concern; and then he would retire with alacrity and live on the profits that would everlastingly flow in. All business was lamentable, he thought; but unless a man could make a fortune as well as a name in letters, trade was a less bitter dose.

Nicholas' father had been "Harry Rockdale," famous in the days of the Knickerbocker Magazine and Pfaff's, when Poe was yet alive. But although Mr. Richmond had made a good deal of money, his day had passed when Nicholas came on the scene, and the boy did not remember the time when his mother had not had to skimp and manage in order to run the house. Both parents died within a few months of each other. Nicholas put away his ambition to go to college and become a writer, and determined to go into business. Although the genial Henry Richmond had always affected a contempt for business, Nicholas' mother had said that five dollars a week sure was better than a hundred dollars a month that you never got. Mrs. Richmond had a way of putting things that might have been valuable if she, like her gifted husband, had held the pen of a ready writer.

How carefully Nicholas had expressed himself in his reply to the advertisement of Miller & Blake for an office boy! He made four attempts before he felt satisfied:

> "In this morning's Tribune I noticed an advertisement to the effect that you were in need of a strong, willing boy in your business. I am he. Hoping to get the situation, as I need the salary, I am, Yours truly,
> "NICHOLAS RICHMOND."

Miller, who was short and stout and jolly, tossed the letter over to his partner, Blake, who was tall and lean, and whose face wore an expression of perpetual surprise, owing to the distance between his eyes and his eyebrows.

"I'll give this lad a chance," said Miller. "A boy with a sense of humor gets along better than a dull boy."

"If he ain't too funny," growled Blake. "That boy's too fresh."

"Well, he won't be fresh long if he comes here," said Miller, with his silent chuckle. And of a truth, the patent medicine business is a great dispeller of freshness.

Some one, probably Tupper, has said that our inability to read each other's thoughts causes many misapprehensions. To Miller & Blake, and to most of the force of clerks in the establishment, Richmond was simply an office boy, who was paid two dollars a week and who probably didn't earn it. That he was the son of "Harry Rockdale" no one knew; indeed, it is not likely that any of the patent medicine crowd had ever heard of "Harry Rockdale" and his Tales of Old New York.

On the other hand, Nicholas felt that he was conferring a favor upon the house in coming. To speak in a paradox, he looked down on the tall Blake and the dumpy Miller from the bottom of his heart.

There was bald-headed Peter Mallon, who had made a fortune out of Mallon's Hair Restorer but had been too busy to restore his own thatch; there was grizzled Doctor Onderdonk, who dealt in some abominable pill; there was—and he was not so bad—red-headed and uproarious Captain Simpson, of the Hypatia, who came in to see Miller at the end of each trip. Human beings all, thought Nicholas, but not a gentleman in the lot.

After one month in the dull store, Richmond knew that all he had imagined business to be was more than true, and he determined to mitigate the drudgery as much as possible. When he came to the store in the morning it was his duty to sweep the aisles so that the place might take on the appearance of respectability, but he was more interested in current politics and in the morning papers than in sweeping. There was so much to be said in favor of Blaine and the need of an honest count in the South, and Schmitt, the other office boy, needed so much to learn that it was only by protection to American industries that the United States could thrive, that it is small wonder if the arrival of one or both of the partners found the aisles still littered with the débris of the previous day.

Imperturbable in the face of reproof, and unaffectedly good-natured and willing in all that did not appertain to the business in hand, Nicholas made a personal success while he was making a failure as an office boy. His grasp of political knowledge was really far in advance of his years, and he converted to Republicanism Dick Slattery, the shipping-clerk, by noontide arguments, which, while they gave edification to the group of loungers that made the shipping department their rendezvous, did not further the interests of the patent medicine business.

"Where would Blaine have been to-day if he had put as little heart into politics as you do into this business?" asked John McMillan, one of the Western drummers, who was preparing for his fall trip, and who had taken a fancy to Nicholas and often rallied him on his lack of diligence.

"Is Blaine, the newspaper editor, remembered nowadays?" was Nicholas' answer. "His heart was in politics, and he got where his heart was. I haven't made up my mind where my heart is, but it isn't in John Street."

"'Tis not always where a man's hairt is that his money is," said John Dempsey, the truckman. "Me father loved horses an' he sunk all his money in 'em—at the races."

"Well, if Nicholas here ever makes a fortune it will be on account of luck—not by his own efforts," said McMillan.

"I guess you're right," said Nicholas, as if McMillan were referring to some one else. "By-bye—I've got to go to Canal Street, and if I sprint I'll save my carfare." And he was out like a flash.

"Pity a boy as quick as him wouldn't settle down," said Dempsey, stroking the red fringe under his chin. "'Tis a nice lad."

"He'll never settle down to this," said Schmitt with a sneer. "He thinks he's above it."

"Thin he'll soon be behind it," said Dempsey sententiously.

Nicholas was not likely to win out on account of his faithfulness or his aptitude for business. Luck must step in. And his father had inadvertently provided for it years before. The boy had been named Nicholas because on the day he was born "Harry Rockdale" was reading Nicholas Nickleby (for the third time). No Richmond in the field, so far as his father knew, had ever been called Nicholas, and his mother would have preferred that the child be named Henry, but Nicholas it was—to suit the author's whim.

That had happened sixteen years before, and now there was another of the name, a physician, who, coming to New York from Albany quite unknown, had become one of the leading specialists in pulmonary complaints by sheer force of brilliancy. Probably his Nicholas was a souvenir of Dutch ancestors: be that as it may, there was no medical man in New York who enjoyed quite the vogue of Dr. Nicholas Richmond.

DRAWN BY F. W. GRUGER

"DID YOU SEND THEM THAT BILL?" SAID BLAKE, HIS EYES BLAZING

Young Richmond was addressing circulars to the different retail druggists throughout the country when Miller came up to him and said, "Isn't your first name Nicholas?"

"Yes, sir."

"Are you related to Dr. Richmond?"

"Not that I know of," said Nicholas.

"All the better. Do you want to sign a paper and get some money for it?"

"After I've read it," said Richmond with admirable caution.

Miller laughed. "You ain't afraid I'd stick you?"

"My grandfather signed away a fortune," was Nicholas' noncommittal answer.

"Well," said Miller, "our chemist has invented a new lung medicine that is going

WARNER'S RUST-PROOF

"Helen herself could serve no daintier cup"

YERBA MATÉ TEA

This health-giving South American beverage was spoken of in the highest terms of praise at the recent International Commercial Congress in Philadelphia, not only by foreign delegates, but by representatives of the United States Government, who knew its good qualities from personal experience.

Hon. Eugene Seeger, United States Consul-General to Rio, said: "The tea strengthens your body, brain and nerves, and enables you to endure all sorts of hardships, fatigue and other effects, and I do not like to see it given up or forgotten."

Captain da Grama, Government Delegate from Brazil, said: "Mate tea is a very strong aid to digestion and acts strongly upon the nervous system. Many will find it helpful in the case of those who suffer from nervous debility and headache."

Senor Carlos R. Santos, Government Delegate from Paraguay, declared: "Mate tea is recommended for the English invalid, as it is invigorating properties by a gentle, lasting and natural action, so that it cannot injure the digestive organs, which often suffer from the use of other teas and coffees."

Dr. W. P. Wilson, Founder and Director of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum, an institution which is in the highest degree the confidence of the government and citizens of the entire world, gave orders for a complete display of the Museum laboratories, of Yerba Maté Tea. The display, which confirms those previously made in South America and Europe, will be published in these pages next month.

Send 5 two-cent stamps for sample of Yerba Maté Tea and illustrated booklet; or, better yet, send us one dollar and receive, postpaid, with the booklet, a month's supply for several persons.

THE YERBA MATÉ TEA COMPANY
Sole Importers for the U. S. and Canada
257 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE NAME THUS Stewart Hartshorn ON LABEL AND AT THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

A New Roller Skate
"Rose" Ball-Bearing Roller Skate. Special features. Revolving axles on ball bearings. Skate adjustable to any shoe. Steel-tired, rubber-cushioned wheels. Indestructible. Send for catalogue.
NATIONAL SEWING MACHINE CO., Belvidere, Ills.

Live Agents Make Big Money.
There is no equal to
The Excelsior Carpet Stretcher and Tack Hammer Combined.
THOUSANDS IN USE
Simple, effective, strong and compact. A child can operate easily.
Postpaid for 65c. Stamps
With first order for one dozen (before the 15th) we propose to furnish working AGENTS OUTFIT FREE. QUICKLY send for free illustrated circulars.
QUICK MFG. COMPANY, Dept. P, Galion, Mich.

The EDGAR Chocolate Grater
(or for Cheese)
40 square inches grating surface. Grates Chocolate fine and dry as meal. Good for Cheese, Bread, etc. Easy to use. No unsightly hands. Ask your dealer for it, or send 30 cents. Circular free. Agents wanted.
EDGAR MFG. CO., (A) Reading, Mass.

WALL PAPER
Send for free sample book of beautiful designs direct from manufacturers and save 25 per cent.
AGENTS WANTED
KAYSER & ALLMAN
1214-1216 Market St., Philadelphia, Pa.

SAVE YOUR OLD CARPETS
We can weave them, to order, into handsome RUGS of no use. Write for particulars.
AMERICAN RUG CO., 30 La Salle Street, Chicago

Digitized by Google

to be the thing if it has a catchy name and is properly pushed. Now 'Nicholas Richmond's Pulmonary Pills' will catch doctors all over the country. I'll pay you ten dollars for your signature and we'll use it as a trade-mark. You write a pretty good hand."

Nicholas looked thoughtful. That very morning he had spent a few happy minutes studying the file of the Daily Graphic in Park Place. News was always more tempting than nostrums, and he whiled away many an agreeable hour reading that illustrated paper. He had read that Charles Hoyt sold his first play for a lump sum instead of on royalty, and it was the buyer who had made a fortune with it. Hoyt had learned his royalty lesson for all time.

"I can't do it on those terms, Mr. Miller," said Nicholas in his most persuasive tones. "Give me a share in the profits if my name is worth something to you and I'll do it."

Miller gave one of his silent chuckles that shook his fat little frame. "I wish you showed as much keenness for us as you do for your own interests. Well, I'll see Blake, and if he's willing I'll give you a share in the first year's profits. Only, I expect you to appreciate it."

Nicholas Richmond's Pulmonary Pills were a success from the start, and although Doctor Richmond soon enjoined them from using the Nicholas, the publicity given to that fact by the newspapers advertised the nostrum still further, and as a result the patent medicine dealers rented a house on Gold Street for the manufacture of the pills, the John Street house being already too crowded with carbolic preparations.

Blake did not like the idea of letting Nicholas in for even an infinitesimal share of the profits—said it was ridiculous—unbusinesslike—unprecedented—but jolly little Miller carried his point. Only, from that time on Blake was not at all friendly to Richmond.

For nearly a month Nicholas felt the obligation imposed upon him—which was doing well for one of his volatile disposition—and although he was no longer a sweeper of aisles, he saw to it that his successor in that line kept them clean. As for himself, he gave politics a rest for a time and showed in a number of ways that it was in him to be a capable clerk, and Miller congratulated himself upon his knowledge of human nature.

But the genius for everlasting application was not in the young man, and he gradually lapsed into the three ins—inertia, inattentiveness and indolence.

One day at noon he was booming Blaine to a knot of clerks and teamsters who were eating their lunches in the shipping-room.

"You ought to be a politician, Doc.," said Dempsey. He had been dubbed "Doc." in honor of the pills, and the name stuck to him to his great annoyance. What would his father have thought if he had known that his son was sponsor to a miserable pill?

"How's your pills sellin', Doc.?" asked an errand boy who had come in for a dozen of Canfield's Carbolated Capcine Capsules.

"I don't know and I don't care, and I want you to stop calling me Doc. My name is Richmond."

"Of course," said the other, "Doc. Richmond. It's on all the boxes."

"Say, dry up," said Nicholas coloring.

The errand boy grinned and passed out into the street. But his words rankled in Richmond's mind. Why had he allowed himself to sell his good name—and for nothing, at that—for he did not believe that there would be any royalty coming to him.

He felt so disgruntled that on being sent over to the west side of town he stopped in at the Graphic office and looked over old files until knowledge of time left him.

When he returned to the office he was confronted by Blake, whose eyes nearly met his eyebrows, they were so big with anger.

"Richmond, you're seven kinds of a fool. Look at that letter and that bill."

The letter ran as follows:

"NEW HAVEN, January 28.

"MESS. MILLER & BLAKE:

"Gentlemen: We are pleased to have been allowed to look at the terms you allow Mess. Carter & Co., of St. Louis, and take it as meaning that hereafter you will give us the same quotations on Haslitt's Kidney Cure and Hogg's Pepsine Pills. Our thanks are due the clerk who inclosed the bill.

"Yours truly,

"CARTER & CO., of New Haven."

"Did you send them that bill?" said Blake, his eyes blazing.

"I did," said Richmond blithely. "You see, I'm used to writing Carter & Co., New Haven, and so I addressed the envelope to them instead of to Carter & Co., St. Louis."

"What do we keep you for?" asked Blake explosively.

"I don't know, sir," answered Nicholas frankly.

Miller would have burst into a laugh at the boy's puzzled look, and that would have ended the matter, but Blake was of a different calibre.

"You go back to Mr. Sutcliff and tell him to pay you up to-morrow and then you git—to-day; now! I wouldn't have had Carter, of New Haven, know that I gave his brother better prices on those staples for all the good-for-nothing clerks in the country."

Richmond said nothing. He was never insolent. He slowly walked back down the length of the store to the cashier's office. On his way there it occurred to him that maybe there was something coming to him on the pills, and that Blake might hold it up unless he got it at once. He heard the tall partner go out and slam the door after him. He went calmly down to Mr. Sutcliff, the cashier, and said casually, "Please figure my royalty. It was payable on the first, I think."

Just then Miller, self-satisfied and smiling, waddled into the office.

"Shall I pay Nicholas his royalty, Mr. Miller?"

Miller was feeling good. He had been dining with Captain Simpson at Gerrish's chop-house.

"Yes, pay him, pay him. It's all he'll ever get out of his pills." And with his characteristic chuckle he went into his office.

"Sign that receipt," said Mr. Sutcliff, after a few minutes that seemed long to Richmond, who expected Blake to return any moment.

Nicholas took it and read it. It was a receipt for $567.32! His heart gave one sharp leap and he choked. He signed his name while phlegmatic Mr. Sutcliff took the check into the inner room for Miller's signature.

He heard a whistle, and then the little man hustled out with twinkling eyes and said warmly, "I congratulate you, my boy; but I tell you frankly you never earned it. How much are you getting a week?"

"Four dollars," said Nicholas briskly. "I'll be frank with you, Mr. Miller. I thank you very much for this, and I want to say that business is all right for those that like it, but I can't make myself think I like a thing I know I don't like. I want to resign and go to college."

It was astonishing, and it really hurt Nicholas to see how pleased the little Miller was at the idea.

"Go, my boy, and good luck to you. You're no fool, but you'll never set John Street afire."

As Nicholas left the office with a little package of his personal effects and his wages and royalty in his inside pocket he saw Blake turning the corner from William Street. Richmond quickened his pace and disappeared down Gold Street, wondering which he should choose—Yale or Columbia.

A Candid Publisher

IN THE recent death of J. Schabelitz, the famous Zurich publisher and author, the world of art and letters has lost one of its extraordinary characters. He was a shrewd business man, an excellent linguist, a skilful writer, and probably the most savage publisher who ever lived. When he accepted the famous memoirs of Count von Arnim, he wrote on the postal card, with the acceptance, the proviso: "I reserve the right to correct your infernally bad grammar."

To an aspiring poet who had submitted manuscript he answered by postal card: "I refuse to be disgraced by printing your doggerel. I don't return the copy because you didn't inclose enough postage. If you will send it, with the price of this card, I will send it to you, but I don't think the stuff is worth the expense on your part."

One of his postal cards to a novelist read about as follows: "For Heaven's sake, come and take away the unnamable mass of paper you left here for me to look at."

An ambitious historian was crushed by the following, written, like all of his correspondence, upon a postal card: "You are making the mistake of your life. You don't want to study history. You want to learn how to write."

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

NEXT WEEK'S ISSUE WILL BE

A Double Number

On All News-Stands February 22

No Increase in Price. Five Cents the Copy

THIS number will contain thirty-two pages of the best stories, articles and pictures obtainable, and a handsome colored cover after a painting by George Gibbs. Among the many strong features of the number will be the opening installment of Doctor Brady's new serial, and stories by W. A. Fraser, Jerome K. Jerome, S. R. Crockett and Charles G. D. Roberts.

THE POST'S NEW SERIAL

The Grip of Honor

O'NEILL, the hero of the story, is a young American naval officer, a Lieutenant of the Bonhomme Richard. His sweetheart is the ward of a British Admiral. While Paul Jones is harrying the coasts of England the young Lieutenant goes ashore in disguise and risks his life for a glimpse of Elizabeth. Fate is against him, and his identity is discovered. He is placed under arrest as a spy, and, after refusing to buy his liberty by betraying his commander, is sentenced to be hanged. The young officer's escape from death—even after the noose is about his neck—is an ingenious story of great power and of strong dramatic intensity. The love interest is powerful throughout, and the story is brought to a most unexpected and dramatic conclusion. This story will begin in next week's POST.

By CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

W. A. Fraser

CONTRIBUTES a striking mystery story that hinges upon the disappearance of a famous gem and an exciting chase for the thief.

The Brunswick Diamond

Chas. G. D. Roberts

THE Canadian poet, author of The Forge in the Forest, tells a pretty, old-time love tale of the Land of Evangeline.

An Acadian Coquette

Jerome K. Jerome

TELLS of the further adventures of his three heroes on their pleasuring through Germany on safety and tandem.

Three Men on Four Wheels

H. L. Fitz Patrick

THIS popular writer on amateur sport contributes a timely article upon poultry shows and fanciers.

Feathered Stars and Amateur Fanciers

Richard Henry Stoddard

AMONG the poetry in next week's POST will be found two exquisite little Japanese lyrics by Mr. Richard Henry Stoddard, the distinguished poet and critic, in title:

A CLUSTER OF CHRYSANTHEMUMS

5 Cents the Copy, $2.50 the Year, or sent by mail 5 months, on trial, for $1.00*

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Digitized by Google

The Rise of Amateur Athletics in the Middle West

By Professor OLIVER J. THATCHER
of the
ATHLETIC BOARD of
the University of Chicago

THE development in college athletics in the Middle West during the last few years has been so rapid and along such wholesome lines that their condition to-day is, on the whole, satisfactory, and the outlook exceedingly promising. From the first, the greatest dangers here have been connected with the financial management of the teams. A few years ago this was wholly in the hands of students, generally of a small body of them, who were united in some form of athletic organization. Since the highest end which such an organization had in view was the winning of games, its efforts, as well as its treasury, were exhausted in securing the best players who were to be had for the money. Many members of teams were in residence only during the season of play, others were only nominally in residence, and it occasionally happened that a man was not even matriculated in the institution which he represented on the athletic field. Even the playing of hired coachers was no uncommon thing. There were absolutely no restrictions or qualifications imposed by the faculty; athletics were left to take care of themselves. From the point of view of amateur athletics it is evident that a worse state of affairs could hardly have existed.

The University of Chicago took the first step in the much-needed reform by putting not only the financial management, but even the athletics themselves, entirely in the hands of the faculty. For the first three or four years the students were dissatisfied with this arrangement. There was a loud demand for winning teams, and all defeats were charged up by the students to the defects of the system. The stock arguments in favor of student control were used, and the athletic successes of the teams of other institutions under student management were pointed to. But faculty control was eventually justified by winning teams, and was adopted, either wholly or in part, in all the universities of the Middle West. With the athletic treasurer and manager accountable to the faculty for every expenditure, it became well-nigh impossible to hire athletes without the knowledge and connivance of at least some members of the faculty.

THE FIRST STEP TOWARD CLEAN SPORT

To improve the general athletic situation and to promote the same standards and qualifications, seven of the larger institutions—namely, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, North Western, Chicago, Illinois and Purdue—agreed to form a kind of Intercollegiate Athletic Board, consisting of one member from the faculty of each institution. This year Iowa and Indiana have been admitted to membership on this board. From the first it was agreed that reform should be brought about gradually. The first important step was the requirement that all members of teams should be bona fide students in actual residence. To have received money for athletic services was, for the present, not to be regarded as a disqualification. This was, indeed, a small beginning. But this board has held one or more meetings every year, and has by successive steps developed a set of excellent rules governing all intercollegiate contests. These rules are as wise, detailed and stringent, I believe, as those of any institution in the country, and are intended to secure absolute purity in college athletics according to the highest amateur standards. They practically give the faculty in each institution the control of its athletic interests.

It has been found easy to enforce the residence qualifications in the case of members of the baseball and track teams, their season coming, as it does, at the end of the scholastic year. But in regard to the football team greater difficulties have been encountered, since the faculty can have only the word of the student that he will remain in school after the close of the football season—it has not yet been possible to secure any final guarantee that all athletic representatives of the university will round out a full year of residence. Within the last two years both Michigan and Chicago have had most mortifying experiences in the withdrawal of some member of the football team as soon as the season ended. For the present it would seem that all that can be demanded is that due precautionary measures be taken, waiting for perfection in this until the time when college sentiment will make such conduct impossible because of the disgrace attaching to it. It must be admitted, however, that that time has not yet fully come, since the students of the two universities concerned do not, as a unit, condemn the conduct of the offenders, their brilliant achievements in hard-fought games being still related with pride by their student admirers.

A scholarship qualification was next adopted, and it was required that all members of athletic teams should at least reach the ordinary standards of scholarship required of other students. All the large institutions which entered into this agreement have shown evidences of their good faith by removing from their teams at critical times one or more of their best players. At first such action was bitterly criticised by the majority of students, but now the sentiment has changed, and the rule is being rigidly enforced without opposition and without exception.

THE SUPPRESSION OF PROFESSIONALISM

The next step forward was to prohibit the playing of all who had been guilty of professionalism. The seven universities agreed to play only those who by the strictest tests were found to be amateurs. Here the most widespread and bitter opposition was met with. Throughout the whole Middle West athletic skill and ability were regarded as a part of a student's stock in trade, and were to be disposed of in such a way as to bring their possessor the most substantial returns. In explanation of this view it may be said that there were scores of young men in these universities who were without means, but possessed with the desire to obtain an education and endowed with a good degree of athletic skill. Take a clever baseball player, for instance. The numerous State and city leagues were always ready to pay him well for his services. In the summer months he could earn enough money to pay a large part of his expenses during the following academic year. Would it not be folly to neglect such an opportunity? Why should a foolish sentiment restrain him? Would not a student, who was indigent but a good runner, be foolish if he refused to compete for a purse and a share of the gate receipts if he could thereby win enough to enable him to pursue, with some degree of comfort, his education at college the next year? These sentiments were so thoroughly ingrained in the mind of the student body as well as of the general public that, at first, reform seemed hopeless. In the face of this sentiment the work of rooting out professionalism was begun. Students refused to testify against their fellows, and even aided them in covering up their transgressions against the rules of amateur sport. Believing that the distinctions between amateurship and professionalism were of no consequence and unnecessary, some did not exert themselves to find out the truth about their athletes; and even when the truth became known they hesitated to put the stigma of professionalism on their mates and remove them from their teams. For instance, Michigan withdrew from the Western Intercollegiate Association and refused to compete because a member of her track team was disqualified for having coached a football team for money. Wisconsin persisted in playing on her baseball teams men who had been members of other teams which were notoriously professional. North Western followed the same policy. Chicago was represented on both the diamond and gridiron by men of whose professionalism proofs could have been obtained.

From this slough of professionalism our institutions have rescued themselves only by the most strenuous efforts. Is it strange that we did not reach perfection at a single bound? The campaign of education begun some years ago is not yet over. But I believe that the nine institutions named above are earnestly and honestly trying to live up to their high ideals as set forth in their body of rules.

THE BANE OF LOCAL RIVALRY

We still meet with a peculiar difficulty in this region. There often exists among neighboring villages, towns, small cities and counties an intense athletic rivalry. Taking advantage of this, the managers of county fairs and similar public gatherings increase the attractions of such meetings by offering purses for foot-races, for the best local baseball team, and the like. As a consequence, many boys still in the schools are persuaded to engage in such contests and thereby become professionals. After a while such a boy takes it into his head to go to college. Desirous of taking part in college sports, and feeling that in spirit he is an amateur and that his boyish offense should not be counted against him, he says nothing about it, but declares that he is an amateur. The facts in some such cases probably never come to light, but occasionally, after becoming a sure-point winner, he is protested by a rival institution and reproach is thereby brought on the university whose colors he has borne. We are still paying the penalty for the rank conditions which prevailed a short time ago. There is still need of a great deal of work. The distinctions between amateurship and professionalism are now being taught to the boys in the secondary schools, and they are constantly warned that their sins in this respect will find them out and that they will not be permitted to take part in college athletics. We can report great progress in this direction also.

A great deal might be said by way of comparison of ours with Eastern teams, but there is danger that it would be nearly profitless. An adequate idea of our standards can be acquired only by a perusal of the rules now governing the nine universities named above. These rules will also measure the progress we have made in the last seven years. They are as follows:

THE NEW STANDARDS OF THE WEST

1. No one shall participate in any intercollegiate game or athletic sport unless he be a bona fide student doing full work in a regular or special course as defined in the curriculum of his college, and no person who has participated as a college student in any intercollegiate game as a member of any college team shall be permitted to participate in any game as a member of any other college team until he has been a matriculate in such college under the above condition for a period of one year, or has obtained a college academic degree; and in the institutions represented in this conference preparatory students shall not be eligible to membership on the college teams.

2. No person shall be admitted to any intercollegiate contest who receives any gift, remuneration or pay for his services on the college team.

3. No student shall participate in a particular sport upon the team of any college or

It Takes Longer
To Reach the Bottom of a Barrel of
Franklin Mills Flour
A Fine Flour of the Entire Wheat

Because it nourishes as it goes, and being rich in brain, bone, nerve and muscle-making substances of the entire wheat, less of it is required. It is a little off white—that's where the richness lies, in its tint.

If your grocer does not keep it, send us his name and your order—we will see that you are supplied.

MARRIED TO GLUTEN

See that the Flour delivered bears our label; avoid substitutes.

Send for Booklet.

THE GENUINE MADE ONLY BY THE
Franklin Mills Co., Lockport, N. Y.

D & C ROSES
ON THEIR OWN ROOTS
Make rose growing easy. No failures. Fragrant flowers all summer, from June until severe frost. The Golden Wedding edition of "Our New Guide to Rose Culture" for 1900, the leading rose catalogue of America, gives you the benefit of a lifetime experience in growing Roses and all other desirable flowers. 130 pages, profusely illustrated, free on request. Also sample copy of our floral monthly, "Success with Flowers." Free for the asking. Send to-day.
THE DINGEE & CONARD CO.
West Grove, Pa.

You need no other seed catalogue if you have
Burpee's for 1900
While not the largest, it is the brightest and best. It is a book of 140 pages, carefully written among the growing crops at Fordhook Farms—the largest trial grounds in America. We cannot afford to waste copies to those who want only the "pretty pictures," but shall be pleased to send it FREE to all who intend to plant seeds in 1900.
Write TO-DAY!
W. ATLEE BURPEE & CO.
PHILADELPHIA

Begonia, Vulcan; Favorite Asters, Mixed; Pansy, Deep Red; Sweet Peas, Grandiflora.
Cultural directions and catalogue for 15 cents and three names of flower lovers.
MENDENHALL, Florist, Box 985, Minneapolis, Minn.

STARK TREES BEAR FRUIT
Best by Test—74 Years. Largest annual sale. High quality—not high price. FRUIT BOOK free.
We PAY CASH WEEKLY and want more salesmen. STARK BROS., Stark, Mo.

POULTRY PAPER, illustrated, 20 pages, 25 cents per year, 4 months' trial 10 cents. Sample Free. 64-page practical poultry book free to yearly subscribers. Book alone 10 cents. Catalogue of poultry books free.
POULTRY ADVOCATE, Syracuse, N. Y.

9 for 10 Cents
We will send to any one 9 handsome 7 in. Battenberg designs, all different, stamped on white cambric. Also our new 100-page catalogue of Fancy Work Novelties and Needlework. All for 10 cents.
C. S. DAVISSON & CO.
391 Broadway, N. Y. Dept. 69

Digitized by Google

SICHEL MADONNA

(DETAIL)

A platinum print of the above beautiful Madonna, 7¾x9¾ inches on 11x14 mount, sent to any address on receipt of Fifty Cents.

Celebrity Photo and Art Company
256 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

FREE SAMPLE

Consisting of two bottles containing enough of

"Our Favorite" GOLD ENAMEL
(Washable)

To gild a small frame, also a brush to apply it with, to any one mentioning this magazine and inclosing a 2-cent stamp for postage. As brilliant and smooth as Oxidized. Ready for use. A child can apply it. Shows no brushmarks. Can be washed without tarnishing. Gilds everything, such as frames, chairs, bric-à-brac, fancy articles, chandeliers, baskets, etc. Also made in ALUMINUM SILVER. When not sold by dealers, will send full-size box (gold or silver) for 25 cents, express paid. Address Department 7,

GERSTENDORFER BROS.
43 Park Pl., New York. 175 Randolph St., Chicago

HOME STUDY

of BOOK-KEEPING SHORTHAND BUSINESS FORMS PENMANSHIP, etc.

with our Private Lessons BY MAIL open up to Young Men and Women good paying positions. We give just the training needed for success in business. No interference with work—only spare time required. The cheapest and best method of study. Highly indorsed, national reputation, established 18 years. We also teach English, Civil Service and other courses by mail. Total lesson, 30c. A fine Catalogue free.

BRYANT & STRATTON, 155 College Bldg., Buffalo, N. Y.

Lowney's COCOA and CHOCOLATES FROM THE BEAN. PURE! HEALTHFUL!

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.

Learn to Draw by Mail

Home lessons by well-known illustrators, in newspaper, magazine, book illustrating and design. Adapted to men and women, beginners and advanced students. Catalogue free. Successful students.

N. Y. School of Illustrating, 114 W. 34th St., New York

"Mizpah" Valve Nipples
WILL NOT COLLAPSE

And therefore prevent much colic. The valve prevents a vacuum being formed to collapse them. The ribs inside prevent collapsing when the child bites them. The rim is such that they cannot be pulled off the bottle. Sample Free by Mail.

WALTER F. WARE, 808 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Music Sale.

To close out one stock we send by mail 70 pieces, full sheet music size, all genuine copyrights, all for 20c; or 4 lots 50c. If not sold, NOT TIME IN THE OLD TOWN, and 100 Songs with Music, 5c.

S. A. HATHAWAY
599 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

MENTAL NUTS Can You Crack 'Em?

A book of 100 rare, old catch problems with answers. They create no end of talk and study. Mailed, 10 cents. Stamps.

HOME SUPPLY CO., R 132 Nassau St., New York

Are You Deaf?

We have 25 kinds of Instruments to Assist Hearing. Sent on approval. Write for catalogue.

H. SYDNEY WILLIS & CO., 134 South 11th Street, Philadelphia colleges for more than four years in the aggregate, and any member of a college who plays during any part of an intercollegiate football (or baseball) game does thereby participate in that sport for the year.

4. No student shall participate in any intercollegiate contest who has ever used or is using his knowledge of athletics or his athletic skill for gain. No person who receives any compensation from the university for service rendered by way of regular instruction shall be allowed to play on any team.

5. No student shall play in any game under an assumed name.

6. No student shall be permitted to participate in any intercollegiate contest who is found by the faculty to be delinquent in his studies.

7. All intercollegiate games shall be played on grounds either owned by or under immediate control of one or both of the colleges participating in the contest, and all intercollegiate games shall be played under student or college management, and not under the control of any corporation or association or private individual.

8. The election of managers and captains in each college shall be subject to the approval of its committee on athletics.

9. College football teams shall play only with teams representing educational institutions.

10. Before every intercollegiate contest the respective chairmen of the athletic committees of the institutions concerned shall submit to each other a certified list of the players eligible, under the rules adopted, to participate in said contest. It shall be the duty of the captains of the respective teams to exclude all players from the contest except those so certified.

11. Athletic committees shall require each candidate for a team to represent the university in intercollegiate contests to subscribe to a statement that he is eligible under the letter and spirit of the rules adopted.

12. No person having been a member of any college athletic team during any year, and having been in attendance less than one college half-year, shall be permitted to play in any intercollegiate contest thereafter until he shall have been in attendance six consecutive calendar months.

THE FINAL OUTLOOK

To reinforce and strengthen these there are other stringent rules in force in each of the nine universities, the purpose of which is to guard against the possibility of some peculiar local abuse or danger.

These rules will, I believe, be found amply adequate to the demands of perfect amateurship. The only question, therefore, is one of enforcement. Do the universities concerned live up to them? In spite of some mistakes, I believe they are all honestly and earnestly striving to do so. The men who have charge of their athletics are honorable and worthy of confidence. Of this they have given abundant proofs. Their teams are to-day clear of known professionalism, and, I repeat it, the condition of college athletics in the Middle West is, on the whole, satisfactory and the outlook exceedingly promising.

SAMUEL W. ALLERTON

AND HOW HE WON SUCCESS

SAMUEL W. ALLERTON is the founder of the live-stock trade in Chicago. He has been associated with every important civic enterprise of that city for forty years, and in 1893 was the Republican candidate for Mayor. He is a millionaire many times over.

"How did I get my start in life?" repeated Mr. Allerton when the question was put to him. "That is easily answered. I got my start by following the advice of my oldest brother, who was a cripple. The way of it was this: I was the tenth child born in my father's family. The other nine were given good educations, and were well taken care of by my father, who was in the manufacturing business in New York State. But in 1833, when I was four years old, the tariff was taken off the products of his factory, and not long afterward he failed in business. He went to Iowa to get a new start, but when I was twelve years old his health failed and he had to return to New York. I was obliged to go to work to earn a living, and at fourteen I rented a farm on my own hook in Gates County, New York. That farm I worked until I was nineteen years old, and during those five years I saved enough money to buy a farm for my father. I had left, after doing this, about six hundred dollars' worth of horses and tools.

HUNDREDS GROW TO THOUSANDS

"I then rented another farm, and in three years saved three thousand two hundred dollars and, besides that, built up something that was far more valuable to me—a character and a business credit. At twenty-two I could easily have borrowed five thousand dollars on my note, and that was a larger sum then than now.

"I debated somewhat whether I should continue as a farmer or embark in the cattle business, in which several of my forefathers had engaged, and finally decided upon the latter course. When it became necessary for me to leave home for the West, my brother gave me the advice which has guided my course through life. He said to me:

"'When you go out into the world you will meet many sharp, tricky, crooked men, but you will find that they always die poor. If you can form a character and establish your credit there can be no question about your ultimate success. Most failures in life are due to deficiency in character and a consequent lack of credit.'

"This bit of counsel is the key to whatever success I have achieved, and I believe it is the secret of all success, for a man can establish a credit in other things than business.

THE SECRET OF IT ALL

"Well, I settled near Bloomington, Illinois, and began buying, grazing and feeding cattle. I soon began to prosper, and built up a lucrative trade, shipping cattle to Chicago. But the panic of 1856 swept away pretty nearly all my capital, and I made up my mind to come to Chicago, where the world turned around once every twenty-four hours. There was then no packing done here, and no stock market, except for about three months in the year. I began by buying right through the whole year, and this was the making of the stock market in Chicago. Although nearly half a century has elapsed since I listened to my crippled brother's advice, I still think it broad enough to apply to the life of every man and woman."

OLD VALENTINES

By Carolyn Wells

HOW rapidly Time shifts the scene!
Again it is St. Cupid's day,
And I must send to my Rosine
A gorgeous valentine bouquet.
Last year I sent the same to May—
Heigh-ho! I've led a blithe career—
They'd make a rather long array,
My valentines of yester-year.

In years beginning with 18—
I was unfettered, free and gay;
Each maiden seemed to me a queen,
And to each one my court I'd pay.
Now I'm engaged. Ah, well-away!
Rosina is a perfect dear,
But I would better not display
My valentines of yester-year.

No memories shall come between
My love and me. And I'll essay
To keep her life calm and serene,
And love her when she's old and gray:
Her lightest wish I will obey,
But still—I hope she'll never hear
Those verses that I wrote in play,
My valentines of yester-year.

L'Envoi

Cupid, my secrets ne'er betray,
Let me not realize my fear;
And may they be destroyed, I pray,
My valentines of yester-year.

Automatic Go-cart

Baby not compelled to sit up as in other go-carts

Handsome go-cart and lovable baby carriage combined, $5 to $25. A slight foot pressure lowers back, raises foot-rest, and your go-cart becomes a roomy carriage, comfortable as a cradle. So simple a child can operate it; no screws nor bolts.

As a Go-cart.

As a Baby Carriage.

As suitable for a child as for an infant. Overcomes every objection to the old style.

Also furnished with parasol. Write for catalogue.

We are builders of Baby Carriages, Invalid and Reclining Chairs. Write for Catalogue.

IF YOUR DEALER WON'T SUPPLY OUR GOODS, WE WILL SHIP DIRECT FROM FACTORY

Philadelphia Baby Carriage Factory
713 and 715 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia

Buy at First Hand

Deal with the makers direct and secure handsome, staunchly-built, latest-style carriages and high-grade harness, with only one moderate profit added to the cost of making—Dealers' Profits Cut Off.

Our Catalogue will help you to choose from the biggest and fullest assortment of carriages, buggies, harness, robes, blankets and horse equipments. It accurately pictures and describes all the many styles, and fully explains our method of selling direct. Mailed free.

No. 2060 Phaeton Price, $92.50

THE COLUMBUS CARRIAGE AND HARNESS CO.
Columbus, Ohio

DANCE CALLS

This Book contains over $25.00 worth of new copyright dance music and calls in it. The "calls" for square dances are under the notes, like words in a song, so the player can also "call off" the figures. JUST THE BOOK YOU WANT for home parties, the only one published with "calls" under the music. Send to-day and be ready for the next party. Price 50 cents (stamps accepted). Address

WILL ROSSITER
56 Fifth Ave., Chicago, Ill.
The Largest Song-Book Publisher in the World.

IT PAYS TO BE A Writer

Journalists and authors win money, fame and power. Men and women can qualify themselves for practical literary work during their leisure hours. Practical training in reporting, editing and story writing at home.

Journalism TAUGHT BY MAIL

Thorough knowledge of newspaper work. Actual experience from the start. Corps of instructors composed of eminent journalists. An instructive book, giving full details, mailed free.

National Correspondence Institute (Inc.)
1012 Second National Bank Building
Washington, D. C.

Digitized by Google

A Charming Ride

By Madeline S. Bridges

SHE (radiantly): Such a delightful evening for a drive! (mentally) and I am sure the dear fellow only asked me so that he might have an opportunity to ask me something else. (To him.) I am so fond of driving. I've often wished to have a——

HE: Whoa, there! Steady! steady!

SHE: They're a tiny bit wild, aren't they? The lovely things!

HE: So-o-o, Dan. Are you nervous?

SHE: Nervous? I could drive to the end of the world.

HE: He'd like to take you to the end of the world.

SHE (archly): Who would like to take me to the end of the world?

HE (innocently): Dan would. Once he gets going, you know——

SHE: This twilight landscape reminds me of the sweetest poem. It is called The Lovers' Ride.

HE: Quiet, Fanny! She's a regular bundle of nerves. There, little lady! there!

SHE: The lovers were riding at night——

HE: You see, she's not used to going in team like this. Beg pardon!

SHE: I was speaking of a poem——

HE: One moment. I think the check has —— No; it's all right. Hold up, you rascal! He'd pass everything in sight if I'd let him.

SHE: By the way, Mr. Chatman told me you were talking to him about me the other night. Would you dare to tell me exactly what you said?

HE: Why, of course. Let me think. I said—— Confound that girl! She deserves to have her neck broken. Did you see how she ran her wheel under the horses' very feet? More bicycle fiends! But we'll soon be on the river road, that's one comfort.

SHE: And it's so lovely and quiet there; (softly) and then you must let me drive.

HE (promptly): You? I wouldn't let you take hold of these reins for a fortune. But, I'll tell you what. We'll give them a regular spin, if you don't mind? They'll go so you won't hear yourself think.

SHE (disappointed): Oh, then we can't talk.

HE (contentedly): No—can't talk—when you ride, you ride. Now, now, sweetheart! What's the little matter with her? So-o-o, beauty!

SHE (mentally and disquietedly): There seems to be no trouble about talking to the horses! (To him.) I was sorry not to meet you at Mrs. Hoppup's the other night.

HE: Yes? Here, old fellow, this is the corner you like to turn. He just loves the river road. Shall we let them make time? We can go the stretch in twenty minutes.

SHE (with wild sarcasm): Oh, how very delightful! Then we can be at home so much the sooner?

HE: Yes. And they'll enjoy it.

SHE (as before): I am so charmed to know that they really will!

HE: Is your hat fast? Now, Dan, get up and go! Now, little beauty! Hay—o-o-oh! Is that a pace? Can they go, or can't they?

SHE: Wonderful! But don't talk to me. Give your attention to the horses. (He does.)

IN THE DARK WITH THE DREAM

By FRANK L. STANTON

I AM here in the dark with your face, Manette—
Here in the dark with your face;
I see o'er the dear brow the ringlets of jet
(Do you think of the kiss that I left on them yet?)
And the cheek where the rose-dimples race.

I am here in the dark with your face, Manette:
I have said, "It has faded away;
It passed with the spring suns that sorrowing set,
Where the joy and the moan and the melody met,
In the beautiful gardens of May.

"It passed like the mystical light
Of a star—like a wandering beam,
Revealing the darkness that dwells with the night—
The darkness the kiss of God's morning makes white—
Like a spirit that moves in a dream!"

But, lo! it is here, and I stand
And stare at the darkness alone.
Am I longing to-night for the touch of your hand,
As memory leads to Love's beautiful land
Where the roses are ever Love's own?

I know not. This only I know:
The grief and the glory are past;
And if it be roses, or if it be snow
In the vales where Love blossomed and sang to me so,
I shall rest in that Love's smile at last!

It is over—the peace and the pain:
Life's winter is white on the sod;
Perchance I shall dream all the dear dreams again
Under the sunlight, the rose and the rain—
Under the daisies of God.

We have no agents or branch stores. All orders should be sent direct to us

New Spring Suits, $5

SENT FREE
Our Catalogue and Samples upon request

Our Spring Catalogue

of Tailor-Made Suits and Skirts is now ready. We picture in it all of the newest styles, and will mail it free, together with samples of the materials, to the lady who wishes to dress well at moderate cost. No ready-made garments, but everything made to order; we show you exclusive things that cannot be found elsewhere.

Our new Spring Catalogue illustrates:

Tailor-Made Suits, $5 up
New Skirts in the latest Paris cut, $4 up
Wash Suits, $4 up. Wash Skirts, $3 up
Rainy-Day Suits and Skirts made of double-face materials
Bicycle Suits and Skirts, Jackets, Riding Habits, Golf Suits and Skirts

We also make finer garments and send samples of all grades

We Pay Express Charges Everywhere. If, when writing, you will mention any particular kind or color of samples that you prefer, we shall be glad to send you an assortment of the kind you wish. Write to-day for Catalogue and samples—we will send them to you free by return mail.

THE NATIONAL CLOAK COMPANY, 123 W. 23d Street, New York

Protection FOR PLANTERS

Seed is the planter's ammunition, and good seed is just as important to the man behind the plow as good ammunition is to the "man behind the gun."

Our 1900 Catalogue of

EVERYTHING FOR THE GARDEN

is a 190-page book, 9 x 11 inches, containing over 700 engravings and 6 superb colored plates of Seeds and Plants—a perfect mine of information on garden topics. To give our Catalogue the largest possible distribution, we make the following liberal offer:

EVERY EMPTY ENVELOPE
Counts as Cash

To every one who will state where this advertisement was seen, and who incloses us 10 cents (in stamps), we will mail the Catalogue, and also send, free of charge, our famous 50-cent "Harvest" Collection of seeds, containing one packet each of New Large-flowering Sweet Peas, New Giant Pansy, New Giant Comet Asters, White Plume Celery, French Breakfast Radish and New Freedom Tomato, in a red envelope, which when emptied and returned will be accepted as a 25-cent cash payment on any order of goods selected from Catalogue to the amount of $1.00 and upward.

PETER HENDERSON & CO.
35 and 37 CORTLANDT STREET, NEW YORK

Profit for Maker Only

We Have No Agents

No. 712—Canopy-Top Surrey, with double seats. Price, complete, with carriage all around storm apron, sunshade, lamps, and pole or shafts, $75; just as good as sells for $90 more.

We manufacture everything we sell, and in consequence can sell you a better vehicle for the money than you can buy anywhere else. We have the largest selection to be had. Large illustrated catalogue FREE.

ELKHART CARRIAGE AND HARNESS MANUFACTURING CO., Elkhart, Indiana

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded A° D° 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Volume 172, No. 35 PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 24, 1900 Cents the Copy; $2.50 the Year

The GRIP of HONOR

By Cyrus Townsend Brady

The Curtis Publishing Company Philadelphia

THE CENTRAL NEWS COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA, GENERAL AGENTS

Digitized by Google

IT will pay you to make a clean sweep this Spring. Collars, Cuffs and Shirts unmated pull out at the buttonholes, strain seams apart, and constantly wear on the nerves. LION BRAND Collars and Shirts, made for each other, with Cuffs to match, wear longer, feel better, and look best all the time. Throw out all the old stuff. Start fresh. It's cheaper.

Two Collars or two Cuffs cost 25c. It doesn't pay to pay more. Shirts cost $1.00, $1.50 and $2.00, depending on the kind you want. Ask your furnisher.

UNITED SHIRT AND COLLAR CO., Makers, TROY, N.Y.

Those women who are up-to-date
Have brilliant intellects, you know.
The reason is not hard to state—
They polish with SAPOLIO.

For household slaves they will not be:
They've done with methods old and slow;
They've time to polish mentally
Because they

USE SAPOLIO

ROYAL WORCESTER CORSETS

Are acknowledged to be the best designed, finest fitting, and most comfortable corsets ever manufactured.

THE DOWAGER CORSET

FOR STOUT
FIGURES

Worn by thousands and indorsed by them as

The Best Corset

ever produced

MADE IN FOUR LENGTHS—
Extra Long, Long, Medium, Short.
Sizes, 22 to 43 inches.

STYLE 550, Heavy Coutil, Satteen strips. Sizes, 22 to 30, $2.00; 31 to 36, $2.25; 37 to 43, $2.50. White, Drab, Black.

STYLE 550, SUMMER NETTING. (White only.) Sizes and prices same as above.

ROYAL WORCESTER CORSETS AND THE DOWAGER CORSET

Are sold by leading dealers everywhere. Ask your dealer FIRST. If he can't supply you, a Money Order sent us, with size, length and color plainly marked, will bring corset to you free of expense.

LADIES ARE REQUESTED TO SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE

WORCESTER CORSET COMPANY

WORCESTER, MASS. CHICAGO, ILL.

The

Singer Cabinet Table

THE TEA PARTY. USING THE TABLE CLOSED.

Sold on Instalments.
Old Machines Taken in Exchange.

The Singer Manufacturing Company

"Sewing Machine Makers for the World"

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Founded Aº Dº 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Copyright, 1900, by THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 425 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post Office as Second Class Matter

The GRIP of HONOR

By Cyrus Townsend Brady

AUTHOR OF FOR LOVE OF COUNTRY, FOR THE FREEDOM OF THE SEA, ETC.

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

First Chapter

THE wind is freshening; we gain upon her easily, I think, sir."

"Decidedly. This is our best point of sailing, and our best wind, too. We can't be going less than ten knots," said the Captain, looking critically over the bows at the water racing alongside.

"I can almost make out the name on her stern now," replied the other, staring hard ahead through the drift and spray.

"Have you a glass there, Mr. O'Neill?" asked the Captain.

"Yes, sir; here it is," answered that gentleman, handing him a long, old-fashioned, cumbrous brass telescope, which he at once focused on the ship they were chasing.

"Ah!" exclaimed the elder of the two speakers, a small, slender man, standing with the careless confidence of a veteran seaman, lightly poised on the topgallant forecastle, as he examined the chase through the glass which the taller and young er officer handed him; "I can read it quite plainly with this. The M-a-i-d—Maidstone; a trader, evidently, as I see no gunports nor anything that betokens an armament." He ran the tubes of the glass into each other and handed it back, remarking, "At this rate we shall have her in a short time."

"She is a fast one, though," replied the other; "it's no small task for anything afloat to show us her heels for so long a time. Let me see—it was six bells in the morning watch when we raised her, was it not, sir?"

"Yes, 'tis rather remarkable going for a merchant vessel, but we have the heels of her, and will get her soon unless she goes to the bottom on those reefs around the Land's End, yonder. It's a nasty place to be tearing through in that wild way," he added thoughtfully.

"Shall I give her a shot, sir, from the starboard bow-chaser?"

"Not just yet; it would be useless, as we are not quite within range, and she would pay no heed. Besides, we shall have her without it, and 'tis hardly worth while wasting a shot upon her at present."

This brief conversation took place forward on the forecastle of the American Continental ship Ranger, between her Captain, John Paul Jones, and her First Lieutenant, one Barry O'Neill, Marquis de Richemont, sometime an officer in the navy of His Most Christian Majesty, the King of France.

O'Neill was the son of a Marshal of France, an Irish gentleman of high birth and position, who had gone out as a mere lad with the young Stuart in the '45. His property had been confiscated, and he himself had been attainted and sentenced to death for high treason. Fortunately he had escaped to the Continent, and had entered the service of the King of France, where, through his extraordinary ability and courage, coupled with several brilliant opportunities he had made and improved, he had risen to exalted station and great wealth. He had always continued more or less of a conspirator in the cause of the Royal Stuarts, however, and his son, following in his footsteps, had been mixed up in every treasonable Jacobite enterprise which had been undertaken, and was under the same ban of the British throne as himself.

When Paul Jones, in the historic ship Ranger, came to France, O'Neill, moved by a spirit of adventure and his ever-present desire to strike a blow at King George, with several other French officers received permission to enter the American service temporarily. The Ranger was already some days out on her successful cruise when, early on a morning in April, in the year 1778, they had sighted a ship trying to beat around the Land's End. Sail had at once been made in chase, and the stranger was now almost within the reach of her American pursuers.

"It seems to me, sir," said O'Neill to the Captain, "that unless she goes about presently she won't weather that long reef over beyond her, where those breakers are."

"Aye," answered Jones; "and if she goes about she's ours, and——" He paused significantly.

"If not, sir?"

"She's God's!" added the Captain solemnly.

The wind was blowing at a furious rate. The Ranger had a single reef in her topsails, with her topgallantsails set above them. The masts were straining and buckling like bound giants, and the ship quivered and trembled as she pitched and plunged in the heavy seas. The wind roaring through the iron-taut rigging and the wild spray dashing over the sides rendered conversation almost impossible. The motley crew of the Ranger were gathered forward, clustering on the rail and lower shrouds, keeping, of course, at a respectful distance from their Captain and his First Lieutenant and some of the other officers grouped near them.

"She must tack now," said Jones at last, "or she's lost! I know these waters; I have sailed them many times when I was a boy, and I doubt if they can weather that reef even—— By Heavens! There's a woman on board of her, too!" he exclaimed, as his keen eye detected the flutter of drapery and a dash of color among the little group of men on the deck of the Maidstone.

"See everything in readiness for quick work here. Gentlemen," continued the Captain, "to your stations all. Mr. O'Neill, remain with me." The men hastened to their places at once, and there was a moment's silence.

"You may give her a shot now, Mr. O'Neill," said Jones at last; "it may bring them to tacking and save them from wreck. Pitch it alongside of her; we don't want to hurt the woman, and it's not necessary to touch the ship."

"Clear away that starboard bow-chaser," called the Lieutenant, and the men, scarcely waiting for his word of command, cast loose the gun. "Aft, there, stand by to give her a touch of the helm!" he cried with raised voice.

"Aye, aye, sir," came the prompt reply.

"Price," continued O'Neill to the captain of the piece, "you need not hit her; just throw a shot alongside of her. Are you ready?"

"All ready, sir," answered the old seaman, carefully shifting his quid and squinting his eye along the gun.

"Luff!" shouted O'Neill. The Quartermaster put the wheel over a few spokes, and the Ranger shot up into the wind a little and hung quivering a moment with checked way.

"Give her a touch with the right-hand spike, lads," said old Price. "Steady; shove in that quoin a little; easy there; overhaul those tackles. All ready, sir."

"Now!" cried O'Neill.

A booming roar and a cloud of smoke broke out forward. The ball ricochetted along the water and sank just under the quarter of the chase.

"Let her go off again," called O'Neill to the Quartermaster; and a moment later, as the sails filled and she heeled once more to the wind: "Very well dyce; enough off," he cried.

"A very good shot, Master Price, and a glass of grog for you presently in reward," said Jones quietly. "Ah! we shall have some answer, at any rate."

At this moment a small red flag broke out from the gaff of the English vessel.

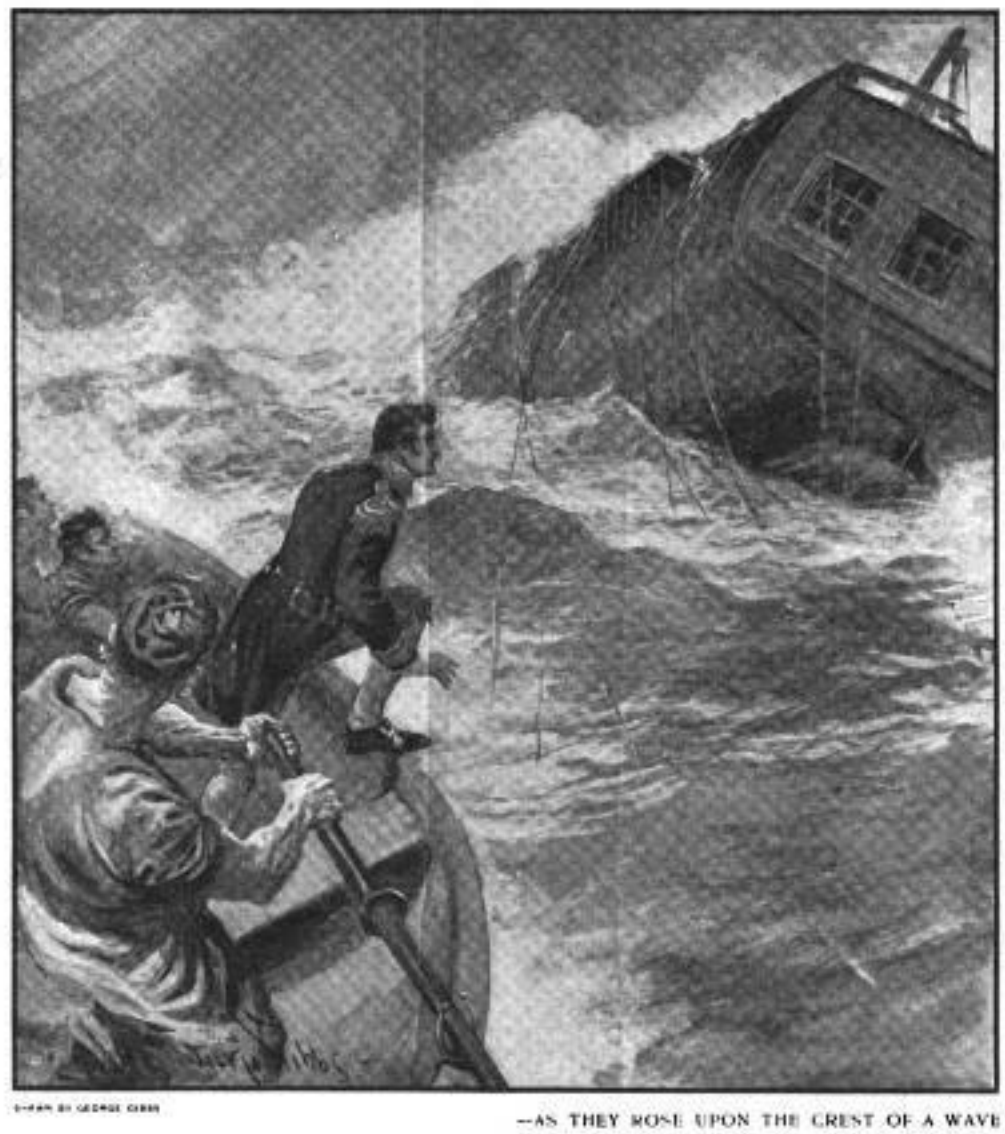
"Show your colors aft, there," cried the Captain, "though they can scarcely see them. He's a plucky one. What's he doing now? 'Fore Gad! he's got a gun over the quarter—a stern-chaser. Must have arms."

The Ranger was rushing through the water again at a rapidly increasing rate, almost burying her lee cathead in the foaming sea under the freshening breeze. She was now very near the Maidstone, which at this moment discharged the small stern-chaser which had been dragged astern. The bullet passed harmlessly through the bellying foresail above their heads.

"Give her another, Price," said O'Neill at a nod from Jones.

"Into her this time, sir?"

"Aye; anywhere you like."



The Ranger luffed again, losing a little distance as she did so, but weathering appreciably on the stranger, and this time the flying splinters from the stern of the chase showed that the missile had met its mark. There was a sudden scattering of the men upon her quarter, and most of them disappeared, but the young girl could be seen holding on to the weather spanker-vang and apparently looking defiantly at them. O'Neill took up the glass.

"Faith, sir, she looks as pretty as she is brave. See for yourself, sir," he added, as he handed the telescope to the Captain, who took a careful look through the glass.

"You have a good eye for the beautiful," he replied, smiling, "even at a long range. Secure the bow-chaser, sir; we are within musket range of her."

While this was being done, the Ranger had crept up on the stranger till her bow began to lap the weather quarter of the other vessel. As they held on recklessly together the speed of the chase diminished suddenly. Her helm was put down, and with sails swaying she swung up into the wind.

"We have her now," cried Jones, springing on the rail and leaning over forward. "Nay, it's too late. Missed

—AS THEY ROSE UPON THE CREST OF A WAVE HE SPRANG OUT INTO THE WATER

Digitized by Google

stays! By Heavens, she's in irons! She's doomed! Aft, there; steady with the helm! Give her a good full."

In the next instant, with a crash heard above the roar of the storm, the ill-fated Maidstone drove upon the reef, broadside on. The shock of meeting was tremendous; her masts were snapped short off, and the howling gale jerked them over the sides, where they thundered and beat upon the ship with tremendous force. The girl disappeared.

"Breakers ahead!" on the instant screamed out a half-dozen voices in the forecastle.

"Breakers on the starboard bow!" came the cry from all sides.

"Down with the helm—hard down!" shouted O'Neill with a sailor's ready instinct, and without waiting for the Captain. There was a moment of confusion on the deck.

"Steady with the helm; steady, sir!" cried Jones in his powerful voice. "Silence fore and aft the decks! Every man to his station. Keep her a good full, Quartermaster. Keep that helm as you have it. Look yonder, sir," he added, pointing to larboard to another danger. "Ready about; stations for stays! Aft with you, Mr. O'Neill, and see that the helm is shifted exactly as I direct. Make no mistakes. Lively, men, for your lives!"

The eager crew sprang to their stations. There was another moment or two of confusion, and as they settled down the silence was broken only by the wind and the waves. The water was seething and whirling under the forefoot of the Ranger. The reefs upon which the Maidstone had crashed were dangerously near. But the keen eye of the Captain had seen on the other side a slender needle of rock over which the waves broke in seething fury as it thrust itself menacingly out of the angry ocean. They were right among the reefs, and only the most complete knowledge and consummate seamanship could save them. It was there.

To tack ship now and come up in the wind would throw them on the rocky needle; to go off would bring them down upon the other reefs. Jones, entirely master of the situation, perfectly cool in appearance, though his eyes snapped and sparkled with fire, leaned out above the knightheads and keenly scanned the sea before him. There was just room for the Ranger to pass between the two reefs. A hair's breadth on either side would mean destruction. As the Captain watched the boiling water he seemed to detect through a slight change in the course a tremor in the hand on the wheel.

"Aft, there!" he shouted promptly; "what are you about? Steady with that helm. No higher—nothing off."

"Aye, aye, sir," replied O'Neill, standing watchfully at the con. "I will mind it myself."

The crash of the breakers as they writhed their white-crested heads around the ship's bows and on either side was distinctly audible to every one. They were right in them now—passing through them. The rocky needle on the port hand slipped by and drew astern. The wreck of the Maidstone was lost sight of in the flooding waves and driving spray of a rising gale. The ship was rushing through the seas at a terrific rate. The strain upon everything was tremendous; a broken spar, a parted rope meant a lost ship.

"Very well dyce," said the Captain, casting a glance aloft at the weather leach of the topsails shivering in the fierce wind, the quivering masts and groaning yardarms, the lee shrouds hanging slack, the lee braces and head bowline taut as strung wires, the tacks and sheets and the weather shrouds as rigid as iron bars, the new canvas like sheets of marble. The ship heeled over until the lee channels were almost awash, the spray coming in in bucketsful over the lee cathead. She was ready if ever she would be; their fate was at the touch. "Now!" shouted Jones in a voice of thunder, "down with the helm! Over with it. Hard over!"

The old experienced seamen put the wheel over spoke by spoke, slowly at first, then faster until they finally hauled it down hard and clung to it with all the strength of their mighty arms.

"Helm's a-lee, hard a-lee," cried O'Neill at this moment.

"Rise tacks and sheets," roared the Captain.

The ship shot up into the wind, straightened herself as its pressure was removed from the sails, lost headway, the jibs swinging and tugging in the gale as she began to swing to larboard away from the reef on the starboard side. She worked around slowly until the wind began to come in over the starboard bow.

"Haul taut!" shouted the watching Captain. "Mainsail haul!"

The great yards, with their vast expanse of slatting, roaring, threshing canvas, whirled rapidly around as the nimble crew ran aft with the sheets and braces. The Ranger fell off quickly and drifted down toward the needle, the after sails aback.

"Board that maintack, there! Man the head braces; jump men! Lively! Let go and haul!"

There was a frightful moment. Would she make it? She stopped—then gathered way again, slowly, then faster.

"Right the helm. Meet her—so. Steady! Get that main tack down, now; tail on to it, all of you; sway away! Get a pull on the lee braces, Mr. O'Neill, and haul the bowlines. Ah! That's well done!"

They were rushing through it again; the white water and the breakers were left behind. A sigh of relief broke from the reckless men, and even the iron Captain seemed satisfied with his achievement as he walked aft to the quarter-deck.

"Get a good offing, Mr. O'Neill," said the Captain, "and then heave to. First send the hands aloft to take in the topgallantsails, and then you may get a boat ready. We must see if there are any poor creatures left on that ship yonder."

"Very good, sir," replied the Lieutenant, giving the necessary orders, when presently the ship, easier under the reduced canvas, was hove to in the beating sea.

"Shall I take the weather whaleboat, sir?"

"Yes," returned the Captain; "I think you would better try to board under her lee, if it be possible to do anything among that wreckage. I doubt if there be anybody left alive on her, but we can't afford to risk the possibility, especially in the case of that woman whom you found so beautiful," he added with a smile.

"Aye, aye, sir," said the Lieutenant, blushing beneath his bronze in spite of himself as he directed the boatswain to call away the whaleboat. Manned by six stout oarsmen, with himself at the tiller, it was soon cast into the heaving sea. Meanwhile the Ranger filled away again and beat to and fro off the coast, taking care to preserve the necessary offing, or distance from shore.

—"Good mister pirate, don't hang us, sir!"

DRAWN BY WILL CRAWFORD

Second Chapter

IT WAS a long, hard pull, and only the great skill of the officer prevented their capsizing before the whaleboat finally drew near the Maidstone. The ship had hit the reef hard at flood tide, and the waves had driven her farther on. Every mast and spar was gone, wrenched away by the storm and the waves. It was manifestly impossible to approach upon the weather side without staving the boat, so O'Neill cautiously rounded the stern of the wreck and briefly considered the situation.

He did not dare bring the boat near enough to enable him to leap upon the deck through some of the gaping openings in the sides made by the tremendous battering of the massive spars, and he finally concluded that the only practicable access to the Maidstone was by means of some of the gearing trailing over the side and writhing about in the water. Intrusting the tiller of the whaleboat to old Price, the veteran gunner, he directed that it be brought alongside as close as consistent with safety, and at exactly the right moment, as they rose upon the crest of a wave, he sprang out into the water and clutched desperately at a rope hanging over the side of the wreck.

The men swung the boat away from the ship instantly, and he found himself clinging to a small rope and wildly tossing about in the tumultuous sea. He was dashed to and fro, and the waves repeatedly broke over his head. The life was almost buffeted out of him, but he held on grimly. Fortunately the other end of the rope was fast inboard.

With careful skill, and husbanding his strength as much as possible, he pulled himself along the rope through the water until he drew near the side of the ship. Then, though the operation was hazardous in the extreme, he began to pull himself up hand over hand on the rope along the side. In his already exhausted state, and with the added weight of his wet, sodden clothing, the effort was almost beyond his strength.

He endeavored by thrusting with his foot to keep himself from being beaten against the side by the waves, but without success; for when he had almost reached the rail an unusually large breaker struck him fairly in the back and dashed his head against a piece of jagged timber, cutting a great gash in his forehead. Blood filled his eyes; his head swam; a sick, faint feeling filled his breast; he hesitated and nearly lost his grasp of the rope. The men in the tossing boat, a little distance away, held their breath in terrified apprehension. Summoning all his resolution to his aid, he made a last desperate effort, breasted the rail, and fell fainting upon the deck of the ship.

A few moments in the cold water which was flooding over it revived him somewhat, and he arose unsteadily to his feet and looked about him in bewilderment. The change from the tossing boat to the motionless rigidity of the vice-held wreck was startling. There was not a sign of life on the ship. She was breaking up fast; rails were stove in, boats were gone, three jagged stumps showed where the masts had been, and only the fact that she had been driven so high on the reefs prevented her from foundering at once. There was a dead body jammed under the starboard fife-rail forward, but no other sign of humanity. In front of him was a hatchway, giving entrance to a small cuddy, or cabin, the roof of which rose a few feet above the level of the deck.

As he stood there striving to compose himself, in a brief lull in the storm, he thought he heard a faint voice; it seemed to come from beneath him. He at once turned and with uncertain steps descended the hatchway. Reaching the deck below, he stood in the way a moment brushing the blood from his eyes. Gradually he made out the details of the cabin, dimly illuminated by a skylight above, and saw a woman on her knees praying. She had her face buried in her hands, and did not see him until he spoke to apprise her of his presence.

"Madam," he began thickly.

The woman raised her head with startled quickness and gave him one terrified glance. The glass had told him truly: she was beautiful, and young as well, scarcely more than a girl. Even the dim gray light could not hide these things. As for him—he was wet, hatless, his clothing torn, a great red wound in his forehead intensifying his pallor. He had a heavy pistol in his belt and a cutlass swinging at his side.

She stared at him in frightened silence and finally arose to her feet, and he saw that she was above the medium height. At the same moment from an obscure corner there rang out shriek after shriek, and another woman rushed forward, threw herself on the deck at his feet and fairly groveled before him.

"Oh, sir, for Heaven's sake, sir," she cried frantically, "good mister pirate, don't hang us, sir! We never hurt nobody. Oh, sir, take us away; we'll do anything; we——"

"Silence, you coward!" commanded the other imperiously. "Get up! Prayers are of no avail with such as——"

"Nor are they necessary, madam," replied O'Neill. "We are not pirates, and I am come to save you, and will do it. Will you please come on deck?"

"I would rather have gone down on the ship," answered the girl defiantly, evidently disbelieving him; "but you are here, and you are master. Give your orders, sir."

"Very well," said the Lieutenant, calmly accepting the situation; "you will go up on deck at once." The girl motioned him forward.

"After you, madam," he returned, bowing courteously, and she stepped haughtily up the companionway, followed next by her terrified maid, and lastly by O'Neill.

"Are there any others left alive on the ship, think you, madam?" he asked.

"No one," answered the girl. "Many were thrown overboard or killed when we struck on these rocks here, and the rest abandoned us—the cowards!"

"Do you wait here for a moment while I take a look forward to assure myself," said O'Neill, stepping rapidly across the raffle of rope about the decks and making a hasty inspection to make sure that no unfortunate was left. Having satisfied himself that they were alone, he returned to the quarter-deck where the two women stood. He looked at them in some perplexity. It would be a matter of great difficulty to get them in the boat, but he promptly determined upon his course of action—they would not like it, but that would be no matter.

Signing to the coxswain, old Price, the boat, which had been riding to a long rope from the ship, was skillfully brought alongside as near as was safe. One end of a long piece of louse gear was thrown over to the boat, where it was made fast. A bight of the rope, properly stoppered to prevent undue constriction, was passed around the waist of the maid, at which all her terrors were resumed.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, for the love of Heaven, as you have a mother or wife, do not hang us here. If we must die, let us drown on the ship like good Christian people. Oh, please, good mister pirate——"

But O'Neill was in no mood to pay attention to such trifling, and fastening the bight around her waist, without more ado he lifted her upon the rail and bade her jump. She clung to him with the tenacity of despair, crying and shrieking in the most frantic manner, until finally her overwrought nerves gave way and she fainted. That was just what he wanted. Singing out to old Price to haul in on the line, and having taken a turn around a belaying pin with his end of it, he promptly threw the girl into the water. Of course she was dragged under at once, but in a moment she was lifted safely into the whaleboat, where she was shortly revived by the ducking she had received.

"Now, madam, you see you need fear nothing," said O'Neill peremptorily to the other woman; "I trust I shall not be compelled to throw you in, too?"

"Not at all, sir," she replied, trembling violently, but striving to preserve her self-control. "I presume you reserve me for a worse fate."

The young Lieutenant's face clouded at her suspicion.

"I—— No matter; I came to save you," he said, as he stepped toward her to assist her to make the leap.

"Please do not touch me," she answered. "I am no fainting fool. Give me the rope. What is it you wish me to do?"

"Pass it around your waist. Allow me. Now stand there, madam, and when I say the word, jump."

"Very well," she said, stepping upon the rail, where perforce he was compelled to hold her to keep her from falling.

"Now!" he said, as the boat rose toward them. Without a moment's hesitation she leaped into the air, and after a swift passage through the water she was hauled into the boat by the rough but kindly hands of the old sailor. Making the end of the rope fast around his own waist, O'Neill, watching his opportunity, sprang after; but he seemed fated to misfortune that day, for a bit of timber torn that moment from the wreck struck him in the head as he touched water, and it was a senseless man Price hauled into the boat. The old seaman laid his officer down in the stern-sheets, where the young girl was sitting with her maid crouching at her feet. Necessarily he lay in a constrained position; there was nothing to support his head but a boat stretcher.

She gazed upon his pallid face with its disfiguring wounds; he was a murderous pirate, no doubt, and deserved it all; still, he had saved her life, for the Maidstone was breaking up; he was so handsome, too, and he looked like a gentleman. She was a woman, well—she finally moved her position and lifted the head of the unconscious sailor to her knee. Taking a handkerchief from her neck, she dipped it in the salt water and bathed his head; and then she poured between his lips a few drops from the flask of rum that Price handed her after the old man had insisted that she take a draught of the fiery liquid herself.

Under these pleasant ministrations O'Neill opened his eyes for a moment, gazed up into her face with a smiling glance, and, closing his eyes immediately lest she should release him, lay quite still while the men pulled away toward the Ranger. And in that manner they reached her side. His heart was beating madly—that look had been enough. She was his prisoner—but her captor was captured!

Third Chapter

EAGER eyes on the ship had noted the every movement of the whaleboat as she drew near the Ranger. Old Price saw that a whip and a boatswain's chair had been rigged on the main-yard-arm to swing his passengers on board. The sight of the dangling rope awakened a fresh fit of apprehension on the part of the timorous maid, and it was with great difficulty that the amused seamen persuaded her that she was not to be hanged outright. Entirely unconvinced, but resigning herself to her fate, she finally sat down on the small board and was swung to the gangway.

Her mistress gently laid the head of the prostrate officer against one of the thwarts and, leaving the handkerchief as a rest for it, followed the maid. Then the old coxswain secured the Lieutenant to the chair, and when he had reached the deck, where he opened his eyes and recovered consciousness with incredible promptness, the boat was dropped astern, the falls hooked on, and she was smartly run up to her place at the davits and the Ranger filled away. O'Neill was assisted to his cabin, where his wounds were attended to by the surgeon.

When the young woman joined her maid on the deck she saw a curious scene. In front of her, hat in hand, bowing low, stood a small, dapper, swarthy, black-haired man, in the blue uniform of a naval officer. He had the face of a scholar and a student, with the bold, brilliant, black eyes of a fighter. Surrounding him were other officers and several young boys similarly dressed. Scattered about in various parts of the ship were a number of desperate-looking men in nondescript apparel. None of the navies of the world at that date, except in rare instances, uniformed its men. On either side of the deck black guns protruded through the ports, and here and there a marine in uniform of white and green paced a solitary watch.

"I bid you welcome to my ship, madam; so fair a face on a war-vessel is as grateful a sight as the sun after a squall," said the officer, bowing elaborately.

"Sir," began the young woman, trembling slightly, "I am a person of some consideration at home. My guardian will cheerfully pay you any ransom if you spare me. I am a woman and alone; I beg you, sir, to use me kindly," and she clasped her hands in beseeching entreaty.

At this signal the fears of the maid broke out afresh, and she plumped down on her knees and grasped the Captain around the legs, bawling vociferously.

"Oh, sir, for the love of Heaven, sir, don't make us walk the plank!"

The seamen near enough to hear and see grinned largely at this exhibition, and the Captain with a deep flush and a black frown on his face struggled to release himself.

"Silence, woman!" he cried fiercely at last. "Get up from your knees, or by Heaven I will have you thrown overboard; and you, madam, for what do you take me?"

"Are you not a—a pirate, sir?" she answered hesitatingly. "They told me on the ship that you——"

"No pirate am I," interrupted the man proudly, laying his hand on his sword; "I am an officer and, with these gentlemen, am in the service of the United States of America, the new Republic. This is the American Continental ship Ranger. You are as safe with us as you would be in your own parlor at home. Safer, in fact; there you would be surrounded by servants; here are men who would die to prevent harm coming to you. Is it not so, gentlemen?"

A deep chorus of "Aye, ayes" rang through the air. The Captain continued, with sudden heat:

"'Fore God, madam, I don't understand how you could insult me with an offer of money!"

DRAWN BY WILL CRAWFORD "Now!"

"Oh, sir," answered the girl, visibly relieved, "they told me that you were a pirate, and would murder us all. Are you not——"

"Captain John Paul Jones, at your service, madam," interrupted the officer, thrusting his hand in his bosom with another bow.

"Yes," said the young woman, "they said it would be you. Why, every newsletter in the land describes you as—as——"

"Pirate, madam. Say it. You have not hesitated to speak the word heretofore. A rebel—a traitor—a pirate," he returned, throwing up his head proudly; "'tis a penalty one pays for fighting for freedom; but you, at least, shall be able to speak unequivocally as to our character, for I pledge you my word you shall take no harm from us, though I doubt not my young gentlemen here will be raked fore and aft by the batteries of your bright eyes. Now will you vouchsafe me your name and some of your story, that I may know with whom I have to do?"

"My name is Howard, sir; Elizabeth Howard," replied the girl, brightening as her fears diminished. "I am the ward of Admiral Lord Westbrooke, the Governor of Scarborough Castle. I have no father nor mother."

"Another claim upon our consideration, ma'am."

"Sir, I thank you. I was going to visit friends in Liverpool when that unfortunate ship there was wrecked. Oh, what will become of me now!" she exclaimed, her eyes filling with tears.

"Liverpool lies in our way, Mistress Howard, and 'twill give me great pleasure to land you upon some convenient point on the coast in a few days if the wind hold and no mischance arise. And now may I present my officers to you, since we are to be fellow-passengers all?"

Upon receiving the desired permission from the grateful girl, in whose pale cheek the color began to come again, the Captain, who was a great stickler for etiquette, brought forward the little group of officers and introduced them one by one. There was much bowing and curtsying on the quarter-deck, which even the seamen seemed to enjoy.

"This is all, I believe," said the Captain, having stopped with the smallest midshipman, who, in comical imitation of his elders, announced himself in his boyish treble as "Vastly honored, ma'am."

"The gentleman who brought me here?" questioned the girl, blushing faintly; "I trust he is not seriously injured?"

"Ah!" replied Jones, "my First Lieutenant, Mr. Barry O'Neill, a volunteer with us, and an officer in the service of His Most Christian Majesty, my friend, the King of France."

On the ship O'Neill had elected to sink his Marquisate.

"He is not much hurt, Mistress Howard; only battered about a bit and pulled down by the nervous shock and efforts he underwent," said the Doctor. "Why, here he is now! Did I not warn you, sir, to stay below?" continued the Doctor, shaking his finger as O'Neill, pale and languid, came slowly up the companionway.

"Oh, I am all right, Doctor," returned the Lieutenant rather weakly, but smiling with the audacity and gallantry of his race as he spied the girl. "The thought of the presence of this lady above him would lift a crusader from his tomb."

"Allow me to present you in due form to Mistress Howard, Mr. O'Neill," said the Captain severely, evidently desirous of observing the proprieties.

"Sir," said the young girl, looking gratefully at the Irishman out of her violet eyes, "I have to thank you for a most gallant rescue, made doubly hard by my perversity and foolish apprehension."

"'Twas a pleasure to serve you, madam; may I continue to enjoy it. We would sink another ship for such another chance," said the Irishman lightly.

"Now I propose to give up one of my cabins to Mistress Howard and her maid," said the Captain, "and I presume that she will need to rest, after the exciting incidents of the day, until supper is served. If you are able, Mr. O'Neill, I should like to have you join us there, with Mistress Howard's permission, of course, since the ship is hers." He smiled toward her, and when he smiled he was irresistible.

"I am honored, sir," replied the girl graciously. "And I thank you, Captain; I shall be delighted," she added, laying her hand in his own as he led her aft to the cabin door in the break of the poop. Before she entered she turned and made a graceful curtsy; her glance swept toward the young Lieutenant. From that moment O'Neill was no longer a captive—he was a slave.

"Gentlemen, good afternoon," she said, comprehending them in one brilliant look, and smiling again. It was enough; that glance had given O'Neill any number of rivals.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

An Appeal from a Soldier's Widow

ONE of the most touching letters ever received by Major-General Oliver O. Howard, U. S. A., retired, while he commanded the Department of the Atlantic with headquarters on Governor's Island, was from a woman whose son was in trouble. It read as follows:

> "My Dear General: I want to call your attention again to my son. I know you have been kind to him, but cannot you do more? He is my only boy. The other died while he was fighting with you during the war. I know he did not mean to do wrong when he deserted. He is such a good boy when he is sober. I did not know he had deserted until he was arrested, and I do not know what I am to do if he is kept in prison. Do what you can for him and a soldier's widow will remember you in her prayers."

Since his retirement from the regular service the General does not get so many of these letters, but it is said—and it is to his credit—that there never was such an appeal made that did not meet with a quick response. Though the General was a disciplinarian, he was one of the most merciful of officers.

Digitized by Google

Queen Anne Cottages

A Comedietta in ONE ACT

By M. E. M. Davis

REMEMBER, JOSEPH, THERE ARE NINE PARCELS

DRAWN BY HENRY HUTT

CHARACTERS:

MRS. THOMAS JEFFERSON DILLINGHAM.
MISS ANNE WESTWORTHY.
MISS SUSAN MARSH.
SARAH.
MR. HENRY HARRINGTON.
MR. ROBERT BARTON.
MR. CHARLES MARSH.
JOSEPH.
YOUNG LADIES and GENTLEMEN.
SCENE: At Pass Christian.
TIME: June; morning.

SCENE I

A cottage on the Bay shore. A wide hall, front, furnished with rattan chairs, tables, etc.; a hat-rack on one side. Veranda in rear with vine-wreathed pillars. Bay in distance.

(Enter from veranda, ANNE and SUSAN. They wear white duck dresses with sailor hats. White gloves. Each carries a small leather bag and an umbrella.)

ANNE (putting bag on a chair): Well, this is too lovely!

SUSAN (putting bag and umbrella on chair): Isn't it! But (laughing) I would like to see your respected Aunt Polly Westworthy's face when she gets your note informing her that you have eloped—with me!

ANNE (laughing): Instead of staying for her dinner-party! So would I. Fancy the dear old match-maker giving a dinner-party in town, in July! For the purpose of presenting her impecunious niece to a new eligible! Poor Aunt Polly! (Drawing off gloves.) She has married me off so many times already—in her roseate dreams! And I have endured with Christian patience all the other eligibles she has raked and scraped for me. But when it comes to Mr. Henry Harrington I draw the line. I've never seen him, and I never will if I can help it. Conceited idiot!

SUSAN: I do not blame you, Anne, dear, for running away. But really, I do not think he can be so bad as that! Brother Charles traveled over Europe with him last year. He says he is a trump.

ANNE (impatiently): I beg your brother Charles' pardon, Susan, but I know Mr. Henry Harrington is horrid, though I hear that he is simply dying to meet me.

SUSAN (drawing off gloves): That, at least, is to his credit. Well, he will not have the pleasure to-night, at any rate.

ANNE: No, thank goodness! But I can tell you, Susan, I was at my wits' end yesterday when Aunt Polly's note came commanding me—you know her style—to dine with her to-night, in my best bib and tucker, at eight o'clock, in company with Mr. Henry Harrington, "a charming young man (quoting and mincing), just returned after a prolonged stay abroad." And mama, of course, begged me with tears in her eyes not to offend Aunt Polly by refusing. It made me ill—positively ill! (Walks about, fuming.) But do you believe in fate, Susan Marsh? (Laying her hand impressively on SUSAN'S arm.) I do, for in the afternoon's mail here comes dear Mrs. Hartley's letter from New York. She offers me her Queen Anne cottage at the Pass for a week, for a month, for the whole summer! I am to fill it with guests, if I like. I am to do exactly as I please within its wistaria-hung walls. She calls it "Wistaria Cottage."

SUSAN (interrupting): But that is not wistaria, Anne. (Walks to veranda and inspects vine.) It is honeysuckle.

ANNE: It doesn't matter what the old vine is!

ANNE (continuing): So I read Mrs. Hartley's letter. Then I fly around to see you. We arrange our plans. This morning I send a note of regrets to Madam Polly. We steal unnoticed to the train, and here we are—for a couple of days, at least. (Tosses up gloves.) Hurrah!

SUSAN: Hurrah for the Hartley-Harrington-Aunt-Polly combination! (Blows imaginary kisses.)

ANNE: Now—let—me—see. Mrs. Hartley wrote that I should find the room on the right of the hall in perfect order. Mrs. Hartley has the most exquisite taste.

SUSAN: I thought she said the room on the left.

ANNE: Perhaps she did. We will try them both. You explore the left, while I investigate the right. (Goes into room on right; SUSAN into left.)

ANNE (coming out, calling): This is it, Susan. It is not what one would call dainty, however. Looks massive and majestic. I never imagined Mrs. Hartley had such severe ideas. It proves how little we realize the inner feelings of our friends! But it is comfortable. Come and see.

(SUSAN emerges from room on left. She carries her own hat in her hand, and has a tall, antiquated beaver perched on her head.)

SUSAN: I suppose Mr. Hartley inhabits the apartment on the left when he is at home. He must have exquisite taste also, judging from his headgear!

(Both girls laugh gayly. SUSAN puts the hat on a chair. They carry their bags into room on right, and immediately reappear minus hats.)

ANNE: And now for breakfast. (Touches bell on hall table.) The walk from the station has made me ravenously hungry. Aren't you famished? Mrs. Hartley says in her letter—oh, here it is! (Produces letter from pocket and reads): "The old woman in charge—the caretaker—is stupid. But she is staid and respectable, and will serve at need both as a cook and a protector. Her name is Jane."

SUSAN: Here she comes. (Enter SARAH from rear. Young and pert-looking in maid's dress.)

SARAH: Good mornin'. I seen you comin' up from the dee-po, an' I says to myself

ANNE (aside to SUSAN): I would not call her staid.

SUSAN: Nor as old as Methuselah, nor as respectable as your Aunt Polly Westworthy!

ANNE (to SARAH): Well, Jane——

SARAH (with curtsy): Sarah, miss.

ANNE (aside to SUSAN): Mrs. Hartley certainly said her name was Jane!

SUSAN (aside flippantly): Perhaps she has been changed in the cradle!

ANNE (aloud): No matter, Sarah. Your mistress has loaned me her house——

SARAH: You don't say so! I took youse two for book-agents.

ANNE (giving her some money): We shall be here for a couple of days. And now, Jane——

SARAH: Sarah, miss.

ANNE: Sarah, you will give us some breakfast.

SARAH: I ain't the cook, miss, but she's not in, miss, and I'll do the best I kin for youse.

ANNE: And Sarah——

SARAH: Yes, miss.

ANNE: Lay the table here. (Stepping near veranda to right.) In the shadow of this wistaria vine.

SARAH: All right, miss. (Exit.)

SUSAN: All the same, it is honeysuckle. Well, never mind! Oh, Anne! (Seizes ANNE'S arm excitedly.)

ANNE: What is it, Susan? Oh, what is it?

SUSAN: I've just remembered. Brother Charles is coming over from Bay St. Louis this morning with a crabbing party! (Looks at watch.) They are due here in half an hour. Lets——

ANNE (joyously): Oh, yes! Come right along. Let's leave a note at the station for them so they will come right here. We'll go crabbing with them after breakfast. What fun! Hurry, Susan! Hurry! (They dash into room right, and rush out putting on their hats. Exit from veranda.)

SCENE II (Same)

(Enter HENRY HARRINGTON and ROBERT BARTON. They wear white flannel suits. Each carries a large leather bag, an umbrella and a bundle of fishing-tackle.)

HARRINGTON (depositing bag, etc.): Welcome, old boy, to Jessamine Lodge!

BARTON (depositing impedimenta): Thanks, awfully, old man. But where is your jessamine?

HAR. (with a comprehensive sweep of his arms toward veranda): Behold, blind and skeptical mortal, behold!

BAR. (critically): That? That is honeysuckle.

HAR.: No matter. (Dramatically.) It affords a secluded and secure retreat; a sure shelter from pursuing virgins; an impenetrable asylum from match-making aunts! I knew the city would be hot and dull at this season of the year, so I sent my agent here in advance to look up some quarters where I could camp and fish for the summer. He found Jessamine Lodge for sale completely furnished. I got his letter informing me of the purchase yesterday.

BAR.: I say, Hal, I thought from a word or two you let drop as we walked up that there was a woman in the case?

HAR. (laughing): There is. There was! At least, a woman tried to get into the case. A Miss Westworthy——

BAR.: What!

HAR.: Do you know her?

BAR.: No. Never saw her in my life. But I hear she's a stunner. Half the men in town are dangling after her.

HAR. (shortly): I'm not, and I do not intend to dangle after her. I have never seen her myself, and do not wish to (hooking his arm confidentially in BARTON'S and walking forward). Well, you know, Bob, I am unfortunate enough to have inherited a few hundred thousand dollars—— And—I say it modestly, Bob——

BAR.: Go on, old man; don't mind me!

HAR.: But there are fortune-hunters and match-makers abroad in the land! I do not mean to say that Miss Anne Westworthy——

BAR.: I should think not, confound your impudence! Do you know that she is a reigning belle?

HAR. (continuing): But her aunt, Mrs. Polly Westworthy, whom I know quite well, has a sharp and shrewd eye to the main chance. I had hardly dropped into a hotel, by Jove, when that wily old man-hunter was after me. Gets up a dinner-party for to-night and invites me to meet Miss Anne Westworthy. I did not wish to meet her, though I understand that she is most anxious to meet me. And so——

BAR.: You bolted.

HAR.: So I bolted. Well, Jessamine Lodge, as the agent had written me, was ready, even to one servant, a good, reliable old woman who answers to the name of—(takes letter from breast pocket)—answers to name of Martha. Room on left of hall, he says, is ready for occupancy. Let us have a handwash, Bob, and order breakfast.

(They go into room on left, carrying bags, etc., and reappear.)

HAR.: The previous owner seems to have been of a sombre turn of mind, eh, Bob? Did you ever see such a lugubrious-looking retreat? "Gay and cheerful appointments," the agent assured me.

(BARTON sits down on the beaver hat. Jumps up.)

BAR. (holding out beaver): Ha! Ha! The late owner's style in dress evidently corresponded with the funereal furniture! (He touches bell on table. Enter SARAH.)

HAR.: Martha——

SARAH (with curtsy): Sarah, sir.

HAR.: Eh? I thought he said Martha. Sarah, I have bought this house——

SARAH: Lor', sir, I took youse two for book-agents!

HAR. (giving her money): And you have been highly recommended to me. If you give satisfaction I shall be glad to retain you in my service.

SARAH (coquettishly): Lor', sir, I'll give satisfaction, sir.

HAR.: You will see that we have something to eat at once.

SARAH: I ain't the cook, sir, but I'll do the best I kin.

HAR.: And Sarah——

SARAH: Yes, sir.

HAR.: Place the table here. (Indicating spot on left near veranda.) In the shade of the jessamine vine.

SARAH: All right, sir. (Exit.)

BAR.: I'd swear that it is honeysuckle!

HAR.: Have your way, old fellow. Only, in that case, why Jessamine Lodge? (Exeunt.)

SCENE III (Same)

(Enter SARAH, carrying a small wicker table with dishes, etc. She puts it down in centre of hall.)

SARAH (hands on hips): I never see such a mix-up! But 'tain't my business to dispoot orders, s'long 's I'm all right here. (Slaps money in apron pocket.) Now, where-ever am I goin' to put this here table? The young man have give me the most money. But the young lady looks the born missus. Well (briskly), I reckon I'll let 'em fight it out among 'em! (Places table on left and exits. Enter ANNE and SUSAN.)

ANNE: That was a happy thought of yours, Susan. I suppose by the time we have breakfasted they will be here. Why, dear me (observing table), I told Jane distinctly to put that table over there where we get the finest view of the Bay. (Rings. Enter SARAH.) Jane——

SARAH (curtsy): Sarah, miss.

ANNE: Sarah, you have put the table on the wrong side.

SARAH (cheerfully): To be sure, miss. I disremembered! (Moves table and exits.)

ANNE: Come, Susan, let us get off our hats.

(They go in room on right. Enter HARRINGTON and BARTON.)

HAR.: Hello! The table is in the wrong place. I distinctly told Martha to put it here (indicating spot on left), where we get the breeze. (Rings. Enter SARAH.)

HAR.: Martha——

SARAH (curtsy): Sarah, sir.

HAR.: Eh? Oh, Sarah. You will put the breakfast-table here. (Shows place on left.)

SARAH (cheerfully): To be sure! I disremembered! (Moves table and exit. HARRINGTON and BARTON retire into room on left.)

ANNE (looking out of door on right with hand-mirror and brush in hand): Is that you, Jane? Well, really, this is too much! (Observing table.) Jane! (Rings violently. Enter SARAH carrying a saucepan.)

ANNE: Jane!

SARAH: Sarah, miss.

ANNE: What possessed you to change that table again! Put it back at once!

SARAH (sullenly putting saucepan on chair): Yes, miss. (ANNE reenters bedroom.)

SARAH: Plague take 'em all. (Grabs up table, strides to middle of stage and sets it down with a jerk. Enter simultaneously from rooms right and left, ANNE, SUSAN, HARRINGTON and BARTON. Exclamations.)

Digitized by Google

HAR. (to SARAH, not seeing girls): Martha!

SARAH: Sarah, sir.

HAR.: Oh, confound your name. Put that table where I ordered you to put it, will you?

SARAH (frightened): Y-yes, s-sir. I dis-re-rem-mem-bered. (Starts to left with table.)

ANNE (imperiously): Jane!

SARAH (trembling, mechanically with curtsy): Sa-Sa-Sarah, miss!

ANNE: Sarah, put that table where I ordered you to put it!

(HARRINGTON is overcome at sight of girls.)

SARAH (hysterically): Y-y-y-es, m-m-mum. I dis-re-m-membered. (Starts to right with table.)

HAR. (aside to BARTON): By Jove! Friends of the late owner, I suppose. Say, he had better taste than his furniture would indicate, eh? (Aloud.) Ladies, I beg pardon for my apparent rudeness. (Bows. To SARAH): Do as the young lady bids you.

ANNE (recovering herself, aside to SUSAN): Friends of Mrs. Hartley's, of course. (Aloud to SARAH): Never mind about the table, Jane. Leave it where it is.

SARAH (sobbing): Y-y-yes, miss, s-sir. (Exit.)

ANNE (graciously): We are about breakfasting. If you gentlemen——

HAR. (eagerly): Oh, certainly! Thanks, Miss——

ANNE: Thompson. My name is Thompson. And this is my friend, Miss—Miss Harris, Mr.——

HARRINGTON: Harris—er—ah. My name is Harris and this is my friend, Mr. Thompson, Miss—er—ah—Thompson. (Aside to BARTON): Gad, I haven't a spark of sense left. I couldn't think of any other names!

(ANNE and SUSAN bow with great solemnity.)

SUSAN (gushingly): What a charming coincidence! Quite like a story book, isn't it?

BAR. (gravely): It certainly is.

(They all bring table to centre and front of stage.)

ANNE (ringing): I must beg you to excuse shortcomings. We arrived only an hour ago from the city.

(Enter SARAH with tray, coffee-pot, cups, etc. They all sit at table. HARRINGTON sits down unconsciously on beaver hat. BARTON on saucepan. Much confusion.)

HAR. (passing the bread): Is this your first visit to Jessamine Lodge, Miss Thompson?

ANNE: To Wistaria Cottage, you mean, of course, Mr. Harris. Yes, my first visit. Do you take sugar, Mr. Thompson? (Pours coffee.)

VOICE (on veranda without): Bring in the bundles, Joseph. Remember, Joseph, there are nine parcels. The large valise, the small valise, two handboxes, the shawl-strap, the rubber pillow, the lunch-basket, the parrot and the flower-pot, Joseph.

VOICE (outside): Yes, mum.

SARAH (dropping the tray): Lor' a massy! The shore-enough missus! Now youse'll catch it. An' me, too!

(Enter MRS. THOMAS JEFFERSON DILLINGHAM, a severe-looking elderly lady in duster and exaggerated bonnet. She is followed by JOSEPH, a man-servant, who staggers under the bundles.)

MRS. DILLINGHAM (glaring around): What is the meaning of this unseemly invasion of Honeysuckle Villa?

BAR. and SUSAN (triumphantly, to nobody in particular): Honeysuckle! I knew it! I said so!

MRS. D: Who are these disgraceful rioters, Sarah?

SARAH (sniffling): Lor', mum. I don't know.

MRS. D. (as she suddenly catches sight of the mashed beaver hat, shrieks and seizes it): What sacrilege! The sole remaining memento of my idolized Thomas Jefferson Dillingham! Thieves! Robbers! Leave my house instantly.

JOSEPH (starting toward veranda): Yes, mum.

VOICES (without): Cr-a-a-bs! Fe-esh! Sh-w-i-mp! Fre-sh fe-e-esh!

(Enter bevy of young women and young men, all clad in white duck and white flannel, with fishing-poles, crabnets, etc., over their shoulders.)

ONE OF THE YOUNG WOMEN: Oh, you darling, darling Anne! So this is your own-own-owny house. How nice of you to send for us! (She snatches up the saucepan, another young man takes parrot cage, etc. All dance about crying, Cr-a-bs! Sh-w-imp! Fresh F-e-e-e-sh! Fe-e-sh!)

MRS. D. (furious): Robbers! Thieves! Police!

HAR. (who has been vainly trying to make himself heard): Madam, you are laboring under a delusion. Permit me to explain. This house belongs to me.

ANNE (rushing forward and standing by his side): How noble and generous of you, dear Mr. Harris, to seek thus to shield me from the wrath of this madwoman. (HARRINGTON looks bewildered.) But I cannot accept such a sacrifice. Madam, these are my friends, especially Mr. Thompson and er—ah—Mr. Harris. And I am in lawful possession of Mrs. Hartley's home, Wistaria Cottage. She has loaned it to me for the summer. Here is her letter——

MRS. D. (interrupting and suddenly good-humored): Ah, I see! Never mind the police, Joseph. Young man (to HARRINGTON), if you have bought Jessamine Lodge, your property, a Queen Anne cottage, exactly corresponding in style to this, is just on the right. Wistaria Cottage, my dear young lady, which belongs to my friend, Mrs. Hartley, is the Queen Anne cottage of the same pattern on the left.

(Enter CHARLES MARSH, running, a bucket on his arm.)

CHARLES: Hurrah! Hurrah! I've got the bait, Miss Westworthy! (Stops and stares at HARRINGTON.) Why, hello, Harrington, where did you drop from? Glad to see you, old fellow! (Shakes hands heartily.)

HAR. (aside): I have dropped up into the seventh heaven. (Aloud to ANNE): "Anne?" "Miss Westworthy?" Then—then—you are not Thompson?

ANNE (smiling): And you, it seems, are not Harris? But how about Aunt Polly Westworthy's dinner-party?

HAR. (coolly): Oh, I heard you had come to the Pass, and I——

ANNE (archly): Escaped Aunt Polly, eh?

(Enter JOSEPH with telegram.)

JOSEPH: A telegram for Miss H. Anne Westworthy. (ANNE tears it open and reads aloud):

"My dinner-party will take place at the Live Oak Hotel at the Pass to-night at eight o'clock. Have notified Harrington. Signed, POLLY WESTWORTHY."

ANNE and HAR.: Oh, how delightful! How charming!

SUSAN (to ANNE): Do you believe in fate, Anne?"

(ANNE and SUSAN converse apart with MRS. D. and crabbing party.)

HAR. (solemnly): Bob, I have been a most confounded ass! She is ravishing! (Looks at ANNE.) And I will make her Queen Anne of my cottage or perish in the attempt.

ANNE (aside to SUSAN, looking at HARRINGTON): Aunt Polly certainly has fine judgment!

(BARTON and HARRINGTON join them.)

BAR. (to SUSAN, confidingly): My name is not Thompson. It is Barton.

SUSAN (delighted): Not Bob Barton? Really? Why, Bob, how you've grown! I'm Susan Marsh. By the way, I haven't seen you since——

BAR. (joyously): Since you were my baby sweetheart, Miss Susan! How awfully jolly!

(They walk to extreme left of stage. HARRINGTON and ANNE are on extreme right. MRS. D. in centre. Others in groups.)

HAR. (to MRS. D., gallantly): Madam, I trust you have already pardoned our intrusion. And now will you and all these ladies and gentlemen honor me by adjourning to Jessamine Lodge for breakfast?

ANNE: On no account! You will all breakfast with me at Wistaria Cottage.

MRS. D. (majestically): Stuff and nonsense. You will do nothing of the kind, young people. You will breakfast with me, right here in Honeysuckle Villa. Joseph, assist Sarah to prepare the morning meal.

(CURTAIN)

A Cluster of CHRYSANTHEMUMS

By Richard Henry Stoddard

I

I CANNOT find his grave,
Though I seek it far and nigh;
But I seem to hear from the cedars
A voice like the wild dove's cry.

It may be the fitful wind
In the branches overhead,
Or the sigh of the last leaf falling
On the water I pour for the dead!

I pray, and yearn, and watch,
And something flutters by:
Is it a sign from his spirit,
Or only a butterfly?

II

The poor last flowers of the plum-tree
By my desolate eaves,
Perceiving, lamenting her absence,
Are closing their leaves!

They worship her; she was their goddess,
The soul whence they drew
The life of their freshness and fragrance—
Their sunshine and dew!

Earth never knew such another,
So fair and so sweet;
The flowers that she trod upon loved her,
And kissed her white feet!

Digitized by Google

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

THESE COMMITTEE-ROOMS ON THE HOUSE SIDE ARE DINGY-LOOKING PLACES

WASHINGTON, January, 1900.

THERE never was anything more true than that Congressmen and Congressmen's wives are "chosen of the people, for the people, and by the people." This has been borne in upon me by the Tuesday receptions which I am holding. I have never been so surprised in my life as by the people who have come to my house on these days. I am thankful, however, that even when the most impossible women in the most impossible clothes have filed in through my doors I have been able to keep the fact uppermost in my mind that these people are all more or less constituents, and that they may mean votes from husbands, fathers and brothers at home, and therefore must be treated with all graciousness and consideration.

I will confess that it was a sore test of courage and good-humor on my part last Tuesday when one awful woman claimed my attention just as I was welcoming Page's two swell diplomatic friends, who were making their first call upon me, and whom I am to dine shortly. This terrible little woman was of the sort who would be likely to hang over her own back fence to talk to a back-door neighbor. She pitched her voice so high that everybody could hear her, and her theme was her husband's brother's store out in Spruce City, and every tone was a nasal reminder that she and her husband's brother's vote were not to be slighted lest there should come a day of reckoning for Robert John Slocum. The grave, respectful way in which Mr. Morelos and Mr. de Courcelles listened to her horrible remarks was a lesson in good manners. I do not know how I bore it, but I know that I had a strained smile on my face, and that I finally got rid of her by asking her to have a cup of tea. I heard her say at the top of her lungs, as Page, followed by Mr. de Courcelles, led the way to the tea-table, that she never had any hankering for tea, but she would take a "stoo" if we had one.

MR. BEVERIDGE, THE BRILLIANT YOUNG SENATOR FROM INDIANA

This woman, awful as she was, was not the only visitor who caused me uneasiness. There was a beautiful unknown young woman who came sailing in. I do not know how it happened that her name was not announced. She came in with all the assurance and familiarity of an old friend. She was well bred, and was perfectly groomed and perfectly gowned in the very latest fashion. She talked of people whom I knew. She was posted in current political happenings. No one seemed to know her, though for some unknown reason everybody who came in or went out stared at her. She stood about, first in one room, then in another. She inspected everything, listened to every word that was spoken, and sampled everything on the tea-table, and after asking for the names of Page's two diplomatic friends she suddenly vanished. I asked the footman what name she gave him. "None, madam," he replied. I asked for her card, but she had left none. She had not asked for a "stoo," as the other horrible woman had, but she gave me a feeling of mysterious uneasiness which stayed by me throughout the rest of the day. However, I have had the proud satisfaction of knowing that there have been some very desirable people among my visitors on these Tuesdays. Various of the high officials, with their wives and daughters, have come, and some few of the old residents of the town have returned my visits with gracious promptness, and those of the débutantes whom I have entertained have brought their mamas to see me. As to men, there have been a score or more of them, all more or less young and nondescript, and wearing an air which some one has styled "pigeon-toed grandeur." This manner would be altogether laughable to me if it were not regarded so seriously by other people. One among these men, who perhaps is the most pronounced type of "pigeon-toed grandeur," goes by the euphonious name of "Pinky." Fancy it!

I have wondered down in the depths of my heart why so many of these young men have come flocking to my doors. At first I thought that it was Page who was the attraction, as she is so universally popular. Then for a brief moment I fancied that it might be my own mature charms, enhanced as they are by the best art of the modiste and the milliner; but now I am convinced that it is "Jules" who brings them to my house.

Jules is my chef, and for the sum of $5000 a year he has engaged to give us dinners, luncheons and breakfasts fit for the gods. It is true that I have had to eat more queer, outlandish things with unpronounceable names than I ever dreamed could be concocted; and Robert has growled openly at what he characterizes as "messes," but I am determined that Robert shall not make war upon Jules, for I should not like to have repeated the experience which a recent Administration had with their White House chef, who was found taking all his meals at Chamberlin's, and when asked why he did so said with a shrug:

"Monsieur, ze President he haf no taste for my art; he prefer ze corn beef an' ze cabbage, an' for me, I cannot eat ze corn beef an' ze cabbage, so——"

With this story in my ears, and with the similarity of accent and country of Jules, I am wondering if he might not have been one and the same man with the White House chef. But Jules stoutly denies ever having lived at the Executive Mansion. Anyway, it is evident that Jules' reputation as a cook and mine as a dinner-giver have gone forth, which is something of a triumph in this town of perpetual dinner-giving, where the menus may be simple or elaborate, long or short, but they must be perfect, one requisite of them being that at least one course of lion must be served with each dinner. This lion may be statesman, admiral, diplomat or scientist, but he must be tracked to his lair, dragged forth, and served up with the rest of the bill-of-fare.

The first time that Jules was to serve a formal meal to us was on the occasion of a luncheon to some of the débutantes, and I told him what I wanted. He said, in broken English:

"Ah, for ze demoiselles; then madame must haf it as airy as ze wings of ze butterfly."

That luncheon was a dream! Later, I asked him to serve again, at a dinner, some of those same dishes. He said gravely:

"It depends, madame, on ze age an' ze character of ze company."

I told him they were all to be officials.

"No wing of ze butterfly, madame, will do for ze high in position. We must haf ze saddle of ze Southdown an' ze terrapin. Ah, I haf it all." And he served a dinner that would have tempted an anchorite. It is his cooking, I am convinced, that brings these men here, and that has put me on the list of invitations to those carefully select Bachelors' Germans, to go to which is, to the aspirant for social recognition, as potent as a patent of nobility; and this reminds me that through the medium of Jules I am doing my first bit of lobbying.

Robert told me some days ago that he was anxious to get Senator P—— to vote for the confirmation of a certain postmaster out in our district, and for some reason Senator P—— is holding up the nomination on the plea of Senatorial courtesy. As soon as Robert explained the situation I told him that I thought I could help him.

In matters of diplomacy and finesse Robert is about as subtle as a sheep, but in this instance he did faintly surmise my purpose. He asked, "Ah, you'll begin on his women folks?"

Robert always will call the women of a family "women-folks."

"No, I won't," I said. "In the first place, I should not bother with women anyway, and in the second place, Senator P—— has left all the women of his family at home and is here en garçon. I have already met the Senator, and we will give him a dinner. Now, Robert, you will take me to the Senate to-morrow, and after sitting a while in the private gallery I will send my card in to the Senator with a message. He will come up to the gallery, and I can have a chance to arrange a dinner in an offhand way."

Sure enough, the next day Robert escorted me to the Senate gallery, but we had both forgotten that it was the day for the maiden effort of the brilliant young Senator from Indiana, who was to speak on the Philippine question, and of course there was a tremendous throng; but I was given a good position in the gallery, and I prepared to bide my time.

OVER IN THE SENATE THE COMMITTEE-ROOMS ARE QUITE REGAL

It seemed to me that not a Senator was missing from his seat, barring the sensational Mr. Pettigrew, who had incontinently fled the Senate chamber as though knowing what was coming. Half the members of the House were scattered around like a fringe outside the railing. As soon as the President pro tem. recognized the Indianian he arose, with every eye on the floor and in the gallery focused upon him.

Mr. Beveridge has a thick mane of hair which he parts in the middle, and the face beneath the hair is quite all that it should be: pale, thin, intelligent, and the face of the orator. It was known before he began to speak that he would champion the Administration, but it was not known that he would prove so powerful and so convincing. He spoke with a passionate fervor and a dramatic force which held everybody captive. I became so absorbed and enthusiastic that I forgot what had brought me to the Senate, and sat in fascinated quiet, watching the uplifted hand which would sweep the crescent locks of hair out of his eyes as his strong words fell from his lips, and then I would glance at the uneasy shifting about of Mr. Hoar, who sat only a few paces away from the speaker, and who was becoming worked up to a high pitch of excitement under the torrent of eloquence.

When Mr. Beveridge had closed a powerful peroration and Mr. Hoar had risen to reply, he was so choked with indignation that he was almost inaudible. I was recalled to my own affairs by seeing that Senator P—— was glancing up at the gallery where I sat, and that very shortly he sauntered out of the Senate chamber. In less than five minutes he was leaning over the back of the gallery seat and was saying in his deep, resonant voice:

"What can I do to serve you, Mrs. Slocum?"

"First, Mr. Senator, what do you think of this speech of Mr. Beveridge's?"

"It was a rattling good speech, Mrs. Slocum. I'd no idea he had so much in him, and the Administration is to be congratulated on this new champion. You see, there is to be an organized attack on the Administration, and these young men like Beveridge can often carry more influence than we old ones, who have been so long in the business that the public is tired of us. The Administration likes and needs new blood, and no wonder, for the Cabinet is almost destitute of practical politicians. Long has had perhaps the most experience, but he has no real liking for politics. Gage knows absolutely nothing of the game, and is under fire himself. Smith knows only what any onlooker would. Wilson has a certain political shrewdness. Root is strong enough, but he's all lawyer. As for Hitchcock and Hay, they're good men, but—well, I think Beveridge will perhaps be added to the council that advises the President."

ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL HEATH, WHO IS SKILLED IN POLITICAL MOVES

"Who compose this council? I never heard of it before."

I was much interested, and wanted to hear what Senator P—— thought of the situation.

"Oh, well, the President has, of course, many advisers in both the Senate and the House. He sends for any of us who can in any way help him, but there are two or three men from the departments who are simply invaluable to him. There is Heath, the Assistant Postmaster-General, who is skilled in political moves and in the manipulation of men. There is Dawes, the Comptroller of the Currency, who is wonderfully resourceful in suggesting ways and means of getting out of awkward situations and avoiding hurtful criticism; and Austin, of the Bureau of Statistics, who furnishes

Editor's Note—The series, of which this is the third paper, began in the Post of February 3. Each article is complete in itself.

Digitized by Google

the arguments that may be found in figures to vindicate the record of the Administration, and figures do not lie. These men all possess a thorough knowledge of how the machine ought to be run. But I did not mean to talk shop; I was in hopes there was something I could do for you?"

"Go on, Mr. Senator, and tell me what you think of the outlook."

"No, no, Mrs. Slocum; I am not going to say another word about politics. I want to be asked to do something for you."

"Well, there is something. I want you to promise to dine with us day after to-morrow."

He did not reply at once, but seemed to be listening to Mr. Hoar's retaliating words spoken in thin, high, excited tones which floated up from the floor below. At last he said:

"Mrs. Slocum, I rarely go to large dinners. I am rather out of my element. I——"

"Oh, but it is not to be a large dinner. I never have many people at one time. I have lately been reading Tacitus, and I was so struck with what he said of those wise old Romans who limited the guests at their banquets to the number of the Muses that I have adopted the idea myself."

Senator P—— looked down upon me from over the high back of the bench in a surprised way. This mention of Tacitus was only a bit of a pose on my part, but it served. He said slowly:

"You read Tacitus, do you? Then perhaps you can tell me who it was that said that society has only two classes—those who have more dinners than appetite, and those who have more appetite than dinners? I'm afraid I belong to the former, but I will come to your dinner. You could not be persuaded to change the Muses to the Graces, could you, Mrs. Slocum?"

"Why not, Mr. Senator? The Graces it shall be!" I said gayly, though I was much tickled inwardly at the idea of dear, ponderous old Robert and this long-headed, gray-bearded Senator posing as Graces. The Senator said reflectively:

"Let me see; it is your chef who is so wonderful, I am told. I know of only one way in which to do justice to him, and that will be to follow the example of the gormand Pithylus, who always wrapped up his tongue when not using it so that he might keep his powers of taste intact."

We both laughed at this odd conceit, and I was beginning to find the Senator delightful. I had had no idea that he would be so responsive and approachable. I had heard that he was an uncompromising man of whom most people stood in awe, but I was entirely at my ease with him, and determined to be very tactful and adroit in the matter of getting his vote for our postmaster.

I did not remain long in the Senate after that, and Senator P—— escorted me all the way across the Capitol to the House side, where I was to meet Robert at his committee-room, and he talked brilliantly all the way thither. I was actually sorry to have him bow himself away, especially as I had to wait an unconscionable time.

These committee-rooms on the House side are dingy-looking places, with smoky old ceilings, dim frescoes and dilapidated desks, though they have regilded the mirrors lately, which is some improvement. Over in the Senate the committee-rooms are quite regal. They think nothing over there of spending several thousand dollars for soft-cushioned, luxurious chairs, rich rugs and silver inkstands.

It seems that the bulk of real legislative work is done in committee, and that there are more than sixty committees in the House alone. The work is very heavy and arduous in the important committees, though I am told that there are some committees that never have a bill or a resolution come before them; some of them never even organize. Robert has been assigned to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Chairman has put him on the sub-committee on desertions, with the instruction that no leniency is to be tolerated.

When the committees are not in session the rooms become quite a rendezvous for members who want to discuss the political situation, or they are a refuge to the much-badgered member from the ever-persistent office-seeker, and as often as not they shelter a whist party, or a luncheon, so that along with the hard work there is a good deal of fun behind those closed doors.

I became tired of waiting outside this particular closed door, and as Robert did not appear I finally left the Capitol. I had a busy afternoon before me. What with visits and teas, and that night the first of the Bachelors' Germans was to occur, at which I was to chaperon Page, who was going to dance with Mr. de Courcelles. Mr. de Courcelles had invited himself to my house that afternoon, ostensibly to drink five-o'clock tea; in reality he hoped to lead me into talking about Page, for this poor young Frenchman is hopelessly in love and is frankly miserable. I foresee my part in this international love affair: mediator, go-between, friend and general adviser. The strange thing about it is that I already have a leaning toward this young sprig of a foreigner.

COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY DAWES, WHO IS WONDERFULLY RESOURCEFUL

MR. AUSTIN, OF THE BUREAU OF STATISTICS, WHO FURNISHES THE ARGUMENTS THAT MAY BE FOUND IN FIGURES

The Brunswick Diamond

By W. A. Fraser

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company. Copyright in Great Britain

WHEN Viscount Mordaunt was murdered there was queer work over some family jewels. Circumstantial evidence, the trump card of Fate, had been played heavily against his nephew, but there was another, Jules Vaughn, mixed up in it. There was no direct evidence against him beyond that he was much with the Viscount, and was as plausible a gentleman as ever stole a gem or slit a throat. Also, friends of the nephew asserted that he had been with the Viscount the night of the murder, and knew all about it, even if he himself weren't guilty. My mission was to obtain his confidence and fasten the guilt on the right man.

I had an ambiguous photo of Vaughn, sufficiently indefinite to do duty for every third man in the Empire; but Jules had lost the first joint of the index finger of the right hand, and carried a scar in the palm of it which could not fail to identify him; that was something.

Presently Vaughn disappeared. That is why I went to Calcutta.

I may say that my registered address was John Mara, Scotland Yard. A detective's trade is to become acquainted with everybody and known to nobody. In Calcutta there was only one man who knew me. My cousin, William Mara, was City Editor of the Englishman; it was only six months since he had gone out to that appointment.

At the tiffin-table in my Calcutta hotel each day I sat next a pleasant gentleman named Rainsford. This little intimacy, which ripened somewhat during the few days I spent in Calcutta looking for traces of Vaughn, led to an invitation to spend an evening at his quarters to see a wonderful Hindu juggler who had come down from the North. Mr. Rainsford was the resident partner in the great jewelry firm of Hammond & Co. The firm occupied an immense isolated white building on the main street. Mr. Rainsford had for his quarters the whole upper flat of this building, the first floor being given over to the jewelry showrooms and the workshops.

I had read much of the power of these native jugglers, but that night the realization was something that I hesitate to write. If it were not that it had much bearing on the fate of the Brunswick Diamond I should pass it over. In the East there are things which cannot be explained, and until seen are open to disbelief.

A dozen guests had been invited by Rainsford to see the wonder-working of Ramatha, the Hindu Juggler. These wonders were performed in our host's large drawing-room, and I noticed that the juggler wore only a loin-cloth tightly bound across his hips. Ramatha was tall and gaunt, and intensely black. His teeth were even and brilliantly white; his features classically cut, and of delicate contour. It was said that he had been bred in the shadow of the great black temple at Pooree, though he had perfected his art with a hermit in the Himalayas.

After some minor tricks, Ramatha took a little earth from his basket, made a mound the size of a bowl on the hard floor, poured a little water on it from a brass lota, placed a cloth the size of a large silk handkerchief over it, and for the space of a minute made weird, soft music on a reed pipe. With a graceful sweep of his long, sinewy arm he flicked the cloth to one side, and the sprout of a mango leaf was disclosed peeping through the earth mound. A dozen times he repeated this, and at each removal of the cloth the mango tree had grown a few inches, until finally it was three feet high.

I remembered explanations of this trick in which hypnotism had played a part; but Ramatha plucked his tree by the roots and, coming among the guests, distributed leaves and bits of branches, and I knew that there was no hypnotism about that. What it was I do not know; simply that I remembered these wondrous things when the mystery of the loss of the Brunswick Diamond was given me to solve.

Next the Hindu brought forth a ball of twine and, having placed the loose end under his toe, threw the ball up against the ceiling.

There it remained. He clapped his hands twice, and through the purdah of Rainsford's bedroom a small, dark Hindu lad glided up to the juggler, went up the string hand-over-hand, and disappeared through the ceiling. I rubbed my eyes and waited. A second before I had seen him, and now he was gone.

Ramatha pretended to be dumbfounded also. "The rascal is hiding," he said; "he must be in the other room." He slipped into the bedroom, pretending to look for the boy. We sat silent, waiting. In a minute or two he came back—there was no boy. "The Destroyer has taken him," he said with dramatic sincerity.

That may have been hypnotism—I do not know; I tell only what I saw. There was no corporal evidence that the boy had been there. Ramatha did not offer us a finger or a toe to convince us, as he had distributed the leaves of the mango tree.

Rainsford declared that no boy had come with the juggler. While Ramatha rested a little, Rainsford sent for the dwrwan (doorkeeper) and questioned him. No boy had come in, neither had one gone out; there were eight of his jat (caste), four on the front door and four on the back, sitting and sleeping—always some of them on guard, and no boy had passed.

Then somebody asked for another trick—only they didn't seem to be quite like tricks—and Ramatha begged, in the profuse politeness of his Oriental speech, that the Sahibs might arrange themselves in a semicircle. He had something in his hand; Rainsford, whose business was of jewels, said it was a jadestone figure. I could see that the Thing had evil red eyes like a karait's. The host said they were ruby eyes.

Ramatha came down the circle, placing his hands upon the wrists of each guest. I felt the tips of his fingers scorch like the fire end of a cheroot.

Suddenly he stopped, with his hands on the wrists of one of the party. His black body quivered; with a quick motion he drew the man forward and placed his hand, palm downward, upon the white Penang matting which covered the floor.

Then he released the wrist and stepped back. There was a red print on the floor like a bear track.

Everybody crowded near in intense eagerness and looked at this extraordinary thing; it was blood.

I saw that the first joint of the index finger was not marked. I looked at the man whose face I had not observed before; I felt certain it was Vaughn.

That was the last thing Ramatha did.

Rainsford tried by bright chatter, and starting up a song at the piano, to dispel the eerie feeling that had settled down over the guests because of that thing on the floor; but everybody wanted to get away. I asked Rainsford carelessly who the gentleman was. He answered that his name was Burroughs; he had met him casually a few times in Calcutta and had taken a fancy to him. He was stopping at the Punjaub Club in Chowringhee; he would introduce me—so stupid of him not to have done so before; he was awfully sorry.

The next day Burroughs had disappeared; he had gone away from the club—to Bombay, they thought. But it is the simplest thing in the world to trace a white man in or out of Calcutta, and I discovered that he had gone to Rangoon. There was not another steamer for three days; therefore for three days of waiting and three more of passage to Rangoon I must defer the developing of that acquaintanceship so auspiciously begun. It was tantalizing; but now that I was on his track, and the scent was hot, it would be only a question of time and delicate manipulation until I had mastered his secret.

As had been my daily habit, I went to the office of my cousin, Editor Mara, to have a chat over old times. He was out, but would be in presently, a clerk assured me; so I took a seat in his editorial chair to wait. Taking off my hat, I picked up a pencil and was jotting down a few figures when I heard a step at the door. Looking up I saw Rainsford.

"By Jove! Mr. Mara," he exclaimed, "I'm deuced glad to see you."

I returned the compliment and asked him to be seated. I felt justified in this, because I was considerably at home in my cousin's office.

"You know," he said, drawing his chair close up to mine, "something serious has happened—something very serious, and I wanted to speak to you about it; in fact, I want your assistance in the matter. It's very fortunate we're acquainted, really."

I assented. He bent his head over, and said, speaking in a low, intense voice: "The Brunswick Diamond has been stolen."

"The Brunswick Diamond?" I repeated questioningly in my astonishment.

Digitized by Google

"Ah! I see you haven't heard about it yet. That's good. This jewel was stolen from my place last night, and I want you to keep this fact out of your paper. You're sure to hear about it."

I saw in an instant that he had blundered. Finding me there, he had mistaken me for Mara, the editor. Evidently he was not personally acquainted with my cousin. He was proceeding with his narrative, when I interrupted him. "Excuse me," I said; "I'm awfully sorry, but I'm not the editor. He will be here in a minute."

He stared at me in astonishment.

"You're not—what?"

"The editor," I answered. "His name is Mara also; he's a cousin of mine."

"I understand," he said. "It's my fault—you will not——"

"No," I said; "I'll say nothing about it if you wish."

At that moment the editor came in and I introduced Mr. Rainsford.

"You see," he said, "the Brunswick Diamond is a well-known stone. It was in the Empress Eugénie's collection. It is a peerless, rose-colored gem of the purest water. It is worth at least twenty thousand pounds, and was sent out to us on commission sale; if its loss becomes known, that fact will cause me great inconvenience, and perhaps prevent its recovery. Of course I had to make some inquiries, and was afraid the fact might get into your columns."

My cousin promised to suppress all reference to the theft. Rainsford was profuse in his thanks as he prepared to depart.

"If you don't mind," I said, "I'll walk with you as far as your office. I should like to talk over this matter."

We went up to his rooms.

"Look here," I began, "I've an idea that Fate, who is always meddling in the affairs of men, placed me in that seat to-day to await your arrival."

He questioned me with his eyes.

"You were kind enough to intrust me with your secret."

"I really didn't mean to," he laughed.

"Well, I'll return the compliment. That will even up things, won't it?"

"Ye—s," he replied dubiously, politeness struggling with his apparent lack of interest in my proposed confidence.

"I'm a detective," I continued, speaking with abrupt sharpness.

"You're——"

"Yes—Scotland Yard."

He took out his handkerchief, mopped his forehead, and exclaimed: "By Jove! What luck! I shouldn't have thought it, though. Are you out here on business?"

"Yes," I answered. "I've come out to make the acquaintance of an interesting gentleman."

He smiled. "I know," he said, nodding his head; "wanted at home, eh? Do you find him?"

"No; my friend that is to be has gone to Rangoon for change of air. The next steamer does not leave for three days. If I can be of any assistance to you——"

"You certainly can," he interrupted eagerly. "But you leave in three days," he added regretfully. "That's too bad; but," and he brightened up, "I'm not sure but that you'll be going in the very direction. Let me explain.

"The thief will have great difficulty in disposing of the Brunswick Diamond. He will not attempt to sell it here. It is likely he will go to Delhi; that place throngs with native jewel merchants whose scruples are—well, Oriental. Or he may go to Mandalay. King Theebaw is a great buyer of gems, and his scruples—well, he has none. Do you see the point?"

"I understand. Whom do you think stole the diamond?" I queried.

"Ramatha," he answered without a moment's hesitation.

"The juggler?"

"Yes; nobody but he could have taken it. The reward for its recovery will be five thousand pounds."

"A goodly sum," I exclaimed; "I hope I may be able to claim it."

"So do I," he rejoined. "You leave for Rangoon in three days?" he asked.

I nodded my head. "In the meantime——"

"Yes; in the meantime what had we better do?" he demanded.

"Find Ramatha."

"That's it!" he ejaculated. "I'll give you my bearer to help; he knows every Hindu corner in Calcutta. I'm afraid Ramatha will have gone to Delhi, though," he added despondently.

To insure his complete confidence, I showed him my credentials from Scotland Yard. "Not necessary—not necessary," he demurred.

I asked him to describe the missing jewel.

"There's a model of it in the museum here," he said. "The Brunswick Diamond is twenty-two karats, but the great value lies in its unrivaled beauty of color and its exquisite facets. It is of the most delicate rose tint, and so evenly cut that it will cling to the underside of a sheet of glass by its flat surface. You can't make any mistake in the Brunswick Diamond," he added fondly; "it's peerless. I'll show you where it was taken from."

I followed him. We passed from the drawing-room into his sleeping apartment, through the door from which had come Ramatha's boy.

In one corner of the room was a strong steel safe, set with a combination lock. "I keep a few rare gems and some papers here close to my hand," he said; "the bndwash took it out of that. What do you think of it—clever, eh?"

"Was the safe locked?" I asked.

"Yes."

"Did anybody know the combination?"

"No; not a soul."

"You think Ramatha——"

"Yes; one of his devil tricks; like the red hand, or the boy. He must be in league with Old Nick to have done those things—don't you think so?"

"That's the easiest solution," I affirmed. "But how do you account for his getting the diamond out of the safe?"

THERE WAS A RED PRINT ON THE FLOOR LIKE A BEAR TRACK

"I don't account for it, any more than I attempt to account for the things we saw last night. We saw them, and now the diamond is gone; and that's all there is about it—only to get it back, of course, if we can."

I examined the room. Another door led from it to a hall. At the farther end of the hall was a stairway leading down to a cookhouse and servants' quarters.

"It's possible," I suggested, "for some one to come up this way to your room; probably Ramatha's boy did so."

"No, the back door is locked at night immediately after dinner. The durwans spread their charpoys (beds) across the outer passage, and sleep there. Besides, the safe was locked. Nobody but a man like the juggler, who can do supernatural things, could have opened it."

"Are you sure the stone was in the safe last night?" I asked.

"Yes; I showed it to the Maharaja of Darwaza, who was here late in the afternoon. I put it back in the safe and set the combination while he was still present."

"Did anybody else see it? Was anybody here with the Maharaja?"

"His secretary, of course, and—by the way, Burroughs and Tremayne, whom you met last night—they were here when Darwaza called."

"Could either of——"

"Impossible!" he interjected; "there was no chance, even if they had been so disposed. I set the combination, and nobody knows it."

I sat for a moment pondering over the problem, while Rainsford rolled a cigarette, lighted it at a fire ball on the centre table and puffed in nervous silence. Either Ramatha or the gentleman I was after, Vaughn, had taken the stone, I felt sure. Eliminating the essence of jugglery, it seemed more likely that Vaughn had stolen it. His English education had been somewhat along these lines. According to Rainsford, neither one knew the combination. Without this knowledge Vaughn could not open it. Judging from what I had seen of Ramatha there was no limit to his powers.

"It looks like Ramatha," I said at last.

"Yes, it does," assented Rainsford emphatically, driving the cigarette smoke out with a decisive whiff.

"At any rate," I said, "we must try and catch him with the jewel in his possession."

"That's the idea," he concurred. "I'll send the bearer, Tez Singh, along; you can trust him."

For two days I toiled hopelessly. There was no evidence that Ramatha had ever existed. The utter absence of information as to his whereabouts was in itself suspicious.

"They don't know," said Tez Singh; "also they will not tell. If the Sahib asks for Ramatha, and Ramatha is not here to answer, then also they think that perhaps Ramatha has offended the Sirdar, and of a surety they will not tell."

On the evening of the second day, as we were driving back in a gharry past the burning ghats north of the Hugli bridge, Tez Singh suddenly clutched me by the arm, and pointing to a carriage just ahead of us, exclaimed: "There is Ramatha! That gharry within is he, because I have seen his head, which was shortly looking at the outside."

His figurative statement caused me joy.

"Tell the driver to follow close," I ordered.

I kept my eye upon the oval tag on the back of the gharry Tez Singh had pointed out. No. 1117 was printed in black figures on its yellow surface. In and out among jute-laden bullock carts and black foot passengers that were numerous as flies we wound at a dog trot.

To the right over the Hugli bridge No. 1117 turned. We followed. Over the long, floating bridge, to the left on the other side, and up into the Howrah railway station jogged the watched gharry. Close behind our driver slashed and coaxed and swore at his knock-kneed ponies; and as No. 1117 emptied itself of Ramatha, and pulled out of the way, our gharry took its place at the steps. I saw the Hindu pass into the station.

"If he has taken the stone he will have it about his neck," said Tez Singh. "The gods who are good to the Sahibs, because they are the fathers of the poor, have so arranged it that Ramatha will have the star-lighted stone with him. He will have it about his neck, Sahib. He is going to Delhi of a surety."

"Remain here," I commanded.

It was certainly a glorious chance. Ramatha would have all his possessions with him.

He was squatted on his heels on the platform beside a small, brass-bound, camphor-wood box. I went in and spoke to the station master. "I want the use of a small room in which to search a native who is accused of stealing a valuable gem," I said.

"You may use my private office," he answered.

I reasoned that even if I arrested Ramatha and did not search him at once he would probably make away with the jewel. I lost no time over it. The station master placed one of the railway police at my services, and together we explained to Ramatha what was wanted.

He was indignant; but it was too serious a matter to allow routine scruples to stand in the way. He was escorted into the office, being watched carefully, and his box brought in also.

The policeman ordered him to strip standing in the centre of the bare floor. His thin muslin coptu was carefully shaken out; his pagri taken off his head and examined; his long black hair let down; the box opened and minutely searched; but there was no Brunswick Diamond—nothing but his juggling paraphernalia and a change of muslin cloth.

I was beaten. If he had taken the diamond it had been sent on to Delhi by some one else; possibly the boy we had seen as in a dream that night had gone ahead with it.

Ramatha had been watching me with a curious expression in his wild black eyes.

"The diamond is not here, at any rate," I said angrily, for I was disappointed; "but I arrest you, Ramatha, on suspicion of having taken it."

I looked at him narrowly as I said this. His face fell. If he had sent the stone away, the possession of the juggler might lead to the finding of it.

He dressed. We placed the box on my gharry, the owner inside, and started back. We drove straight to Rainsford's quarters. I took Ramatha with me up to the rooms and explained matters to my friend.

"We must certainly hold him," the latter agreed.

"Sahibs," said my prisoner suddenly, "Ramatha did not take the jewel. The Sahib with the hand that had been dipped in blood took it."

We looked at each other, and there was a minute's intense stillness.

"What!" exclaimed Rainsford; "Burroughs Sahib stole the diamond, you say? Bosh! that's a game to hide your own guilt."

"No, Huzoor," answered Ramatha impressively; "the Sahib with the hand that was red stole the diamond."

Rainsford was about to speak again, but I stopped him. "Wait," I said. Then I spoke to the juggler. "How do you know this, Ramatha? Did you steal it together?"

"No, Huzoor; Ramatha knows the Sahib took it, even as he knew that there was blood on his hand."

"How can you prove that?" I asked. "Prove it, and help us get the stone back, and you shall have half the reward—half the five thousand pounds."

"By Jove! if that's so we must arrest Burroughs at once," exclaimed Rainsford.

"You can't do that," I answered; "he's gone to Rangoon."

Rainsford looked at me questioningly. "He's——"

I nodded. My friend understood.

"You see Ramatha may be right," I whispered, taking him to one side; "at any rate, it's worth trying, because I'll never let this one out of my sight until I get the jewel."

"Will you get it back for us then?" I asked Ramatha.

Digitized by Google

"If the Sahibs will protect me from this evil Sahib afterward, I will," answered the Hindu.

"Why did you not tell of it before, if you knew?" queried Rainsford.

"It is not good to make an enemy of a Sahib who has blood on his hands," answered Ramatha. That was why he had not spoken—he was afraid that Burroughs would kill him.

"Had we better wire to Rangoon and have Burroughs arrested?" asked Rainsford.

"Huzoor," said Ramatha, "you will then properly not get the stone."

"How shall we recover it?" I asked.

"The ways of my people are, that if there is one false witness, of a surety the other side will get two. Also, if a thing is stolen they will hire a chor (thief) to steal it back."

"We must steal it from him?"

He nodded.

"Who will play the chor?" I questioned.

"Ramatha, Huzoor."

"You are certain you can get it back?"

He salaamed gravely.

"By Jove!" said Rainsford, "I like it."

"So do I," I rejoined, "for it's in my territory, as it were. Besides, if I wire now and arrest Burroughs the other—the pleasant friendship is off, you know."

"I understand," said Rainsford. "Is it something about—the hand——"

I assented with a nod.

"Horrible!" he said. "And I entertained this man."

"You must remain with me all the time as evidence of good faith," I told the juggler. He agreed to this.

The next day we took the Karagola to Rangoon. In three days we arrived.

To my joy, Burroughs was still in Rangoon at Evershed's hotel. I also became a patient sufferer at that wondrously managed place. Ramatha took up his quarters with the servants and foregathered at the cookhouse.

The cook-house in the East is like a telegraph receiving station. From each Sahib's estate runs a direct line of wireless telegraphy conveying all the news, and all the inner things of his life. Each Sahib has a private servant, therefore the telegraph is always in operation. The juggler would know all that Burroughs did, or thought, or said, even as though he were domiciled under his bed.

"Do not take a servant," he advised; "it is well that your affairs be not known."

We had a distinct advantage over Burroughs evidently.

I asked Ramatha when he meant to try for the jewel. "Not now, Huzoor," he said; "have patience. When the Sahib moves he will carry the star-kissed rose with him, then Ramatha will acquire it."

By the purest accident my place at the table d'hôte was next Burroughs; by the purest accident I spilled a glass of water over his plate; and by these chances we became acquainted. The first joint of his right index finger was missing, likewise in the centre of his palm was the scar beyond cavil. That link was forged solid. Now if I could recover the diamond—for I felt convinced he must have it.

How he had taken it Ramatha either did not know or would not tell. Of course if he had stolen it he had managed somehow to get hold of the combination and had seized an opportunity to open the safe.

All this time I was watching Ramatha carefully—he might be playing a deep game. Of course he could not get away from me in Rangoon; that was impossible.

Each day I made a little progress in Burroughs' friendship. I was prepared to spend three months over the English part of it, so I went very gently.

On the fourth evening from our arrival the Hindu assured me that Burroughs was going to Mandalay by that night's train. "And to-night, Sahib," he added, "Ramatha will get the rose-stone as the Sahib sleeps; he will sleep a big sleep, Huzoor," he explained with emphasis.

"You won't do anything serious, Ramatha?" I asked.

He shook his head and showed his white, even teeth.

"No, Protector of the Poor, the Sahib will wake in the morning; but he'll sleep sound. Also you must give Ramatha five rupees as backshish for the guard, so that we can have the compartment alone. The Sahib will travel second class with Ramatha. Is that good?"

I nodded.

The train from Prome left at nine o'clock. The Hindu and I drove to the station in separate gharries. If possible, I wished Burroughs not to see me. I remained in my gharry while the juggler investigated. He also secured the tickets.

Presently he came to me in the dusk and said in a low voice: "Come now quickly, Sahib; it is all arranged."

I followed him. He led the way to a second-class compartment. The carriages were small, and divided in the centre into two compartments by washrooms. The door was at the end, opening on to a platform. A seat ran the length of the compartment on either side, forming a bed. Above were two more which could be let down.

We hastily passed in to our carriage, closed the door, and pulled down the blinds. Burroughs had not seen me.

There was a single light in the ceiling of the carriage. Ramatha pulled the green baize cover over the lamp, and our compartment became quite dim.

"The Sahib is in there," said Ramatha, pointing in the direction of the carriage next ours. It was a first-class, and the door was immediately opposite, across the two platforms.

Presently the guard came, looked at our tickets, closed the door, and the train started. The five rupees had evidently worked; we were alone.

"Sleep, Huzoor," said Ramatha; "I will wake Your Honor when it is time to see."

After a little I fell asleep. I was awakened by somebody tapping me gently on the arm. It was the Hindu. I rose, held my watch up by the bleary, smoking lamp in the car ceiling, and looked at the time—it was half-past two. The train was swaying drunkenly as it rushed over the curved track. The whistle of the engine shrieked back a warning that we were coming to some village; the next minute the loose, silly clack of a switch told that we had passed it. Then my companion took something from the folds of his loin-cloth, rubbed it violently into the palms of his hands, nodded knowingly at me, and, as the compartment became filled with a drowsy odor, opened the door cautiously and passed out. I noticed that his black body was stripped except for the cloth bound tightly about his loins and hips. I raised the blind of the corner window a little and watched, wondering how he would get in the door; Burroughs would surely have locked it.

The Hindu passed over to the other platform and down the steps; my eyes followed him. I noticed that a footboard ran along the side of the carriage. He stood on this, and I could see that he was working at the window. I examined the one I was looking through; it was a drop window. By lifting it a trifle it could be lowered.

For fully five minutes he stood there; then he came back up the steps, crossed over the platform like a black shadow, and down the other side. Either the window had been impossible or Burroughs was sleeping on the other seat.

I could just see a part of Ramatha's body as he stood on the footboard. Once he drew back quickly and crouched on the end of the platform. Had he failed? Had he wakened Burroughs? I was trembling with excitement. The diamond was surely at stake—if he alarmed Burroughs we would never get another chance, I felt sure.

It seemed an age that he crouched there, but it was really only a few minutes. Then he went down on the footboard again; the train swayed and rocked; the carriages jostled and bumped, and the shrill screech of the engine came back every few minutes like a devil-call.

Presently I rubbed my eyes. I could not see the Hindu; my breath had made a moisture on the glass. I rubbed it off and looked. Ramatha had disappeared. Had he fallen off? I waited, with my eyes riveted on the footboard. We might soon run into some station and the whole thing be upset.

Presently a black leg outlined itself against the faintly moon-lighted sky; then more of Ramatha's anatomy crossed my line of sight and silently, swiftly came up the steps, across the platform, and into my compartment.

I looked at him. "There, Sahib," he said in a low voice, "there is the rose-stone," and placed it in my hand.

I pulled the green cloth a little to one side, so that the light fell upon the jewel. It glinted and sparkled in the palm of my hand, shooting back rays of warm wine-light. There could be no doubt about it; it was the missing gem.

As Ramatha moved his hands there was a heavy odor which made me drowsy. "The Sahib is sleeping," he said, nodding his head backward toward the other coach as he passed into the washroom to cleanse the drug from his hands. "He had the stone in a little box hung about his neck. There was another Sahib, and Ramatha had to put them both to sleep."

"That's rich," I thought. "Burroughs will blame his companion, and perhaps there'll be a fine shindy."

I determined to go back to Rangoon from Prome, to dispatch the jewel by parcel post to Calcutta. It was a tremendous risk to have it in one's possession for even a day. I persuaded Ramatha to go on to Mandalay to keep in touch with Burroughs for me until I could take up the broken-off thread of the other matter.

At Prome I remained in the compartment until Burroughs went to the river steamer for Mandalay. That night I returned to Rangoon, and the next day sent the diamond to Calcutta, with a letter to Rainsford, asking that Ramatha's part of the reward be remitted to Rangoon. This was the juggler's request.

Then I made my way to Mandalay.

The retrospect was pleasant. I had marked down my man, and would never leave him till I had fathomed his secret. Incidentally, by the rarest good fortune, I had recovered a valuable jewel, and there was as good as to my credit over this a matter of two thousand five hundred pounds. I liked India. Thinking about these things, I landed in Mandalay.

A Portuguese half-caste, Gomez, kept a house that, unfearful of the wrath of the gods, he was pleased to call a hotel. The hopeless desolation of the place chilled my soul. I expected to find Burroughs here.

I asked casually, as though it were not of much moment, if a Mr. Burroughs had come to the hotel.

"The Sahib was here yesterday," said Gomez, "but they have buried him that side to-day."

"Buried him!" I exclaimed.

The fat Portuguese bobbed his head solemnly, and tried to look unutterably sad. His verbose recital, condensed, read: Burroughs had been brought in wounded to death the night before. It was something about a diamond, according to Gomez, as big as his fist. A Hindu juggler, or dacoits, or somebody, had driven a knife through the gentleman. The diamond had, or had not, been sold at the palace—Gomez was equally positive on both points.

Nobody else would give any information. Theebaw's men slit the throats of people who talked too much, therefore much silence was in the market. Ramatha had disappeared completely; perhaps he also had been slain.

But Burroughs before he died had got in a vakil (lawyer) and written a confession that he had killed the Viscount. It was witnessed by Gomez, and was in proper shape.

Of course I didn't believe the diamond story at all, for I had sent the jewel off to Calcutta; but Burroughs and Ramatha might have fought over the stealing of it if Burroughs knew.

I got the confession from the vakil and returned to Rangoon.

There was a letter for me from Rainsford. This is what it said:

> "I regret to say that evidently you have been deceived. The thing you have sent is not the Brunswick Diamond at all—it is a rather poor paste imitation.
>
> "I read your letter of its recovery, and either Ramatha himself was the original thief, and having the paste copy for emergencies, pretended to steal it from Burroughs; or Burroughs, being the thief, had the paste duplicate in his possession to guard against the original being stolen, and Ramatha found that. Or, another possibility, Burroughs may have been the thief, and had the original only in his possession; Ramatha got this duplicate made, and when he stole the real stone from Burroughs passed the false one over to you, and retained the true gem.
>
> "You had better look into this at once, for one of these two men has the real gem."

This was a crushing blow. Look into it! Burroughs was dead; Ramatha had disappeared—possibly dead also; and, according to report, the jewel was in Theebaw's possession. It was hopeless.

I wrote Rainsford to that effect, and sailed straight back to England from Rangoon with the papers which made my other undertaking completely successful.

To this day it is not known who stole the Brunswick Diamond, neither has it been recovered.

"YOU WON'T DO ANYTHING SERIOUS, RAMATHA?" I ASKED

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN

A Medical Lesson for Doctor Mitchell

A well-known physician of Philadelphia recently told the following story: "Some eighteen or twenty years ago, when I first began the practice of medicine, I had an experience which I am not likely to forget. I was at that time on hospital duty at the Blank Hospital in Philadelphia. I had but recently graduated from a medical college and felt that what I did not know about medicine was really not worth the bother of looking up. One day a tall, distinguished-looking gentleman came to visit the hospital, and to me fell the task of showing him through the wards. At that time I felt especially gratified that he was a quiet man, because it gave me an opportunity to impress on him my own importance and the vastness of my own knowledge. I took him from cot to cot and from ward to ward, explaining as I went, and he apparently drank in everything I said. Finally we reached a private room occupied by a paralytic patient. The unfortunate man had already been a victim of two strokes, and at that time it was believed that the third stroke of paralysis was inevitably fatal. Paralysis was my special hobby. I had a case of it before me, and a man willing to listen. The result was that I held forth for about fifteen minutes on the causes and effects of paralysis, the dire fatality of the third stroke, and so on, overwhelming my visitor with technical names, with involved and elaborate descriptions, and impressing upon him the profoundness of my learning.

"Shortly afterward he left the hospital, and at supper that night the resident physician asked me if I had enjoyed the visit of the distinguished guest. Not knowing whom he meant, I asked, and he replied, 'Why, Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, the gentleman whom you took through the wards this afternoon.'

"When I heard that all my appetite vanished, and I have never seen the name of Doctor Mitchell without wondering if he ever remembers the callow, pedantic youth who tried to enlighten him on the subject of paralysis."

Mrs. Semple's Old Age

From the peace and quiet of the Louise Home in Washington, Mrs. Semple, the daughter of President John Tyler, is passing the closing days of an eventful life. For many years past Mrs. Semple has lived in the National Capital, and since the completion of the Louise Home has been an inmate of that institution. Though Mrs. Semple's mind retains its vigor, her eyesight has been dimmed by age.

Among the most interesting of Mrs. Semple's recollections are those connected with Daniel Webster, Secretary of State in her father's Cabinet. She knew the great Senator intimately, and describes with great vivacity his appearance in the White House on the occasion of her sister's wedding. He wore his customary blue coat with brass buttons, and gray trousers, and, although neither the best dressed nor the most striking man present in appearance, he was easily the centre of attention. He was not easily moved to talk, but after a few glasses of wine, when inspired by sympathetic listeners, he became an entertainer of magical brilliancy and eloquence.

Within view of the Louise Home stands the Webster monument, which, owing to her blindness, Mrs. Semple has never seen.

A Mutual Desire

The only marital difficulty that Victor Herbert, the composer and director, and Mrs. Herbert ever had occurred, according to Mrs. Herbert, during their honeymoon, while crossing the Atlantic. It was brought about by seasickness. The composer was sick, and Mrs. Herbert was also ill. Their illness took the form of intense irritability and morbid sensitiveness. Each movement of the ship produced a groan from them, and each noise on board the vessel an indignant protest. They tried to sympathize with each other, but their voices lacked sincerity.

At the end of the third day the composer, after recovering from a lurch of the vessel, said:

"Dear, I have one favor to ask. Don't speak to me again on board this ship until we reach shore, or I shall throw myself overboard."

"My dear," answered Mrs. Herbert, with her first sigh of relief since embarking, "thank you; I've been wanting to ask you that same favor myself all day."

Why the Referee was Biased

Two travelers in a parlor car between Boston and New York were discussing a magazine article by Senator Henry Cabot Lodge relating to the Revolutionary War. One of the men had the current number of the magazine and had run across a statement concerning the British occupation of Boston that did not agree with his previous information on the subject, and seemed contrary to the popular idea of the situation.

He explained the discrepancy to his companion and concluded with the remark: "These modern historians are turning things topsyturvy. I wonder where they get hold of all their 'latest information'?"

The person addressed took the magazine and read carefully the offending paragraph, and then returned the book saying: "Well, I'm sure you've got me. According to my remembrance of the matter as told in school histories years ago, your point is well taken."

A gentleman near by was reading the same magazine, and evidently Senator Lodge's article. To him the first traveler appealed for confirmation on the disputed point.

"Well," said the stranger, "I am inclined to side with the author." Then seeing the look of disappointment on the face of his questioner he added: "But perhaps I am a little biased in my opinion."

It happened that a member of the Republican State Committee of Massachusetts was in the car and overheard the conversation. At the first opportunity he asked the first traveler: "Do you know why the gentleman is biased on that question?"

"No."

"He wrote the article. That is Senator Lodge."

Artemus Ward's First Lecture

"I told a story several years ago in my house, when I was living in Philadelphia," said Robert C. Ogden, the famous New York merchant, the other day, "about a traveler on a New England railroad. When I ended it I added, 'So Artemus Ward once said.'

"'Yes,' spoke up John Sears, a Philadelphia journalist of wide fame and broad attainments. 'Yes,' he repeated, 'that is just what Artemus Ward did say.'

"'How do you know?' I asked. Now I had known Mr. Sears for many years and I had never heard him mention Ward before. 'Tell us all about it.'

"'I heard him say it. I was there,' said Mr. Sears. 'In 1859 or 1860 Browne, who had made a great reputation by his humorous work in the West and in New York under the name of Artemus Ward, worked for one of the metropolitan papers. I was employed by another one and we had two friends who were working in other offices. We used to dine together every night. We advised Ward to become a lecturer. We told him that he could make much more money lecturing than writing. But Ward demurred. He was afraid to venture it. One day, however, he went to a lecture bureau and gave his name. He chose for the title of his lecture The Children in the Wood. That night he told us all about it. Within a few days he received an offer to lecture for the benefit of the Mechanics' Library, in Brooklyn, and he told us of that, too.

"'I'm afraid I shall fail utterly,' he said. 'I know I can't face an audience.'

"'But you'll have your manuscript,' some one said.

"'I know it,' he replied, 'but I'll be too flustered to manage even that.'

"'In that case,' I said, 'you can tell stories. Just as you tell them to us, and that will carry you through all right.'

"The night of the lecture we three men went with Ward to Brooklyn and it was just as he had feared. He forgot his lines, and he was so frightened that he even forgot his manuscript. He faced his audience with a blank look of despair that most of the people took to be assumed. But I knew it was real. Then he started off with a story that had no more to do with The Children in the Wood than with the tariff question, and when he ended it he observed, 'That is what I should have told you if I were not lecturing upon The Children in the Wood.' From that he went on in his own inimitable fashion, story following story, until he had his audience convulsed with laughter, and the lecture was a brilliant success. That was Artemus Ward's first appearance on the platform. 'Now, Mr. Ogden,' asked Mr. Sears, 'what do you know about it?'

"'I arranged that lecture,' I replied. 'That is all. I was living in Brooklyn and was interested in the library. We wanted a lecture. I went to the bureau and, seeing the name of Artemus Ward, I engaged him.'"

Russell Sage's Lucky Suit of Clothes

"Whenever I buy anything," said Mr. Sage in telling the story, "I make it a rule to talk with the salesman. I am a member of a great many different boards of directors in a great many lines of investment and I often find this information of great service. Some time ago I went into a large clothing store to buy a suit of clothes at a low price that I had seen advertised. I bought the clothes for fourteen dollars, I think, and in talking with the clerk I found the lot had been sent to his store from a big manufacturing concern to be sold on commission. I got them for less than cost. Now, I have kept a general store and understand that business, and there is no money in that sort of thing.

"A few weeks afterward this manufacturing concern applied to one of the banks I am connected with for a large loan. Their credit was apparently all right, but on the strength of what I had learned I held up that loan and a short time later the concern failed."

Beginning the McKinley Boom

During the sessions of Congress Senator Mark Hanna lives, of course, in Washington. Between sessions he lives in his palatial home, Lakeside, in East Cleveland, Ohio. It was there that the McKinley boom was started.

Here is a bit of hitherto unwritten history: It is told that a year and a half before the nomination Mr. Hanna met in Cleveland twenty or more of the most influential men in the Union. In his house these gentlemen decided to work for the nomination of the present President. This done, Mr. Hanna, it is said, sent out 12,000 personal letters to a like number of politicians in various parts of the country. This was a labor of months, but when it was finished the foundations for the overwhelming triumph of Mr. McKinley at St. Louis were substantially laid. A large number of the delegates were secured before the public knew it.

Digitized by Google

OF THE HOUR

A Texas Ranger as a Reporter

N. A. Jennings, author of The Texas Ranger, was for many years a newspaper reporter in New York, and he showed quite as much courage in this pursuit as he did in fighting the outlaws of the Mexican border. Once, while he was employed by the Evening Sun, he was assigned by Congressman Amos J. Cummings, then the editor of that paper, to report a great public function in New York at which President Cleveland and his Cabinet were to review the National Guard from Madison Square.

"You needn't bother about the details," said Mr. Cummings; "give us a good introduction and have a confidential chat with the President. It ought to make good reading."

Now, of all assignments in New York for an ordinary reporter, next to interviewing Bishop Potter, getting a confidential talk with Mr. Cleveland is the hardest to "cover." But Jennings was not an ordinary reporter. He hurried at once to the Madison Square reviewing stand where the doorkeeper and ushers were preparing to begin work. As luck had it, Jennings wore a silk hat and a frock coat that day. He brushed by the doorkeeper, and spying the head usher at the top of the stairs, he called to him authoritatively:

"Say, there! Everything ready?"

The doorkeeper's protest died unspoken, and the usher, who mistook the reporter for one of the twoscore of meddling committeemen, politely said everything was all right. Then Jennings stepped inside the Presidential box, whence he issued orders at intervals to allay suspicion, and waited for the party to come. Meanwhile some real committeemen arrived and Jennings was soon their bosom friend, or at least they thought he was. One envious reporter from the press seats loudly denounced Jennings as an Evening Sun man, and was ordered by the head usher to "make less noise or chase himself around the Square."

Jennings sat right behind Mr. Cleveland during the parade, and when the President stepped into his carriage with Secretary Whitney and a distinguished Southern Senator Mr. Jennings took the vacant seat on behalf of the committee and the horses started before a change could be made. During the long, slow ride downtown Jennings talked with the statesmen and the statesmen talked with Jennings until the post-office was reached. It was then only an hour before press time and he had to go. Making some excuse, he had the carriage stopped, and after some polite regrets on both sides he raised his hat. Just as he was turning away Mr. Whitney, who knew reporters of old, especially the metropolitan breed, beckoned to Jennings. The reporter went to his side. "Say, young man," he whispered, "what paper are you on?"

But the parade had started again before Jennings could answer. The Evening Sun had the "beat" of the day.

"Uncle Booker" and His People

The latest photographs of Booker T. Washington reveal more plainly than ever the characteristics which have endeared Mr. Washington to the men and women of his race. Throughout a great part of the South the rank and file of the colored people, the farmers, many of whom have never even seen Mr. Washington, speak of him among themselves as "Booker," the expression being not one of disrespect, but rather of affection. One of these men, grizzled with age, was heard soliloquizing about Mr. Washington after this fashion:

"Well, now, what is Booker? He's an educator. Yes, Booker's a great educator, but he's more than that. He's a leader. Yes, Booker's a great leader, but he's more than that; he's the redeemer of his people."

An old colored woman, twice as old as Mr. Washington, was asked to come to the negro conference at Tuskegee.

"An' if Ah come," said she, "will Ah see Uncle Booker?"

"Yes; you'll see Mr. Washington, and hear him make a speech."

"Ah don' keer nuffin' 'bout no speech," she said. "All Ah wants is jes' ter set 'way where Ah kin peep 'roun' some corner an' jes' look at Uncle Booker."

Success Guaranteed

Hudson Maxim is a talented inventor and scientist, like his famous kinsman, Hiram Maxim. One of his wonderful devices is a steel tubular cannon which throws a mountain of guncotton or other high explosive eight or ten miles.

"It would destroy every man on a warship or in a fort, Mr. Maxim?" asked a visitor.

"Yes, sir," answered the inventor. "They would never know what happened."

"Well, supposing the gun went off prematurely?"

"But it could not," replied Mr. Maxim.

"But supposing it did right here?"

Mr. Maxim smiled and answered: "We would not know what happened, either."

The Czarina's Expenses Reformed

Some time ago the Czarina, who is a very philanthropic and religious woman, made up her mind that the lavish use of tobacco in Russia was doing harm. She thereupon prohibited the use of the weed, and especially of cigarettes, in the Court.

The courtiers, with proverbial wisdom, said nothing in regard to the new rule, but the dealers were greatly excited. They waited upon one of the members of the Cabinet, who heard their story and said:

"The matter shall receive full consideration."

A few days after this one of the chief ladies in the Court astonished the Czarina by complimenting her upon her courage, self-sacrifice and generosity. The Czarina was a little bit puzzled, but supposing that nothing was intended beyond a mere compliment, made no comment.

A few days passed and Her Imperial Majesty needed some money. It did not come, even after she had sent a confidential servant to the treasury. At last, in place of money came a white-bearded old man from that institution, with pleasant voice and attractive address.

"There must be a mistake, Your Imperial Majesty. Two weeks ago you prohibited the use of tobacco in the Court, and so great is your influence and so deep the love for you among the people that the sales of the weed dropped down to a fraction of what formerly was the case, and the internal revenue receipts became less than the expenses. The Government appreciated your high munificence, because under the law of the land your income is charged against the tobacco tax of this district, and it was supposed that you had concluded to give up your wealth in order to carry out your views upon reform."

The following week, so the story goes, the rule was relaxed, and the Czarina's sudden poverty vanished as if by magic.

Cutting Down a Tolstoi Novel

Count Leon Tolstoi once unknowingly gave to a New York newspaper man the hardest day's work of his life.

A syndicate dealing in fiction offered to a newspaper a 60,000-word novel by Tolstoi, translated into English by Miss Hapgood. The price was satisfactory and the bargain was soon made. The novel in its entirety would take forty columns of the paper, and only six could be devoted to that purpose, so it was arranged that the editor could use as much or as little of it as he pleased, provided he paid the price.

On Wednesday noon the proofs of the novel, thirty in number, were turned over to the desk man to condense into six columns—9000 words in all—and have the matter ready for the composing-room at midnight. At the stroke of twelve by the office clock the "copy" was on its way up the pneumatic tube to the printers, and in due time it appeared. That ended the copy reader's troubles, but the editor had difficulty in satisfactorily explaining matters to a delegation of Russian subscribers, who had meanwhile got a copy of the complete novel in the original text and complained bitterly of the abridged translation.

"Of all novelists whose copy I have prepared for newspaper publication," recently explained the man who did the abridging, "Tolstoi is the easiest. This novel was really three stories in one. First came the general tale, which ran all through the book. Then came two separate stories, each more or less of a sermon, which dovetailed in with the general story. After reading the story over I found that I could cut out these parts and leave the main story untouched. That is what I did, and so well was the story adapted to cutting that after I had taken out 51,000 words of narrative I had to make less than a dozen changes in the text that remained."

Mrs. Atherton's New Home

Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, excepting her occasional visits to the United States, seems to have permanently joined the colony of American writers who are making England their home. At first she tried London, but she soon tired of society and now has taken a cottage at Bushey, called Merryhill, near the metropolis. Here she does her work. It is essentially the home of a Californian, and bears many traces of its owner's varied tastes and singular experiences. Several years ago Mrs. Atherton settled in New York. She at once became a noted figure in literary circles, and before long she entered into a controversy with Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox. She called the Wisconsin poet a "mouse-colored woman." Before the affair ended honors were easy, however, and Mrs. Atherton then moved upon the National Capital.

Then came London and another conquest. Mrs. Atherton is a rapid writer, and turns out her work with remarkable rapidity while the mood is on her. Her chirography is small and the letters are pointed.

While in England several years ago she studied carefully the problem of international marriages. Her native State had just at that time supplied several heiresses to English lords, and in all cases the unions did not turn out happily. In discussing the subject one day with Dr. Robertson Nicoll, he suggested that she write a novel upon that topic. She took his advice, and the novel, American Wives and English Husbands, was the result. But with charming and characteristic perversity her story did not accord with the popular view of the subject. Her American wife was happy, in spite of her English husband, title, poverty and all.

Digitized by Google

The Making of a Railroad Man

THE LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEER'S VIEWS

By William J. McQueen, Engineer New York Central and Hudson River Railroad

THIS is a particularly favorable time for entering the railroad service in this country. Most of the through and even the local lines have been handling an unusual amount of traffic and, as a result, work is plenty, pay is good, and the demand for experienced and reliable men has never been greater. Then, again, the rewards for persevering industry are increasing year by year as the number of employees grows and their duties become more onerous. Nowadays the railroad fireman and engineer are more than mere workmen. They are intelligent, studious operators in a vast and ever-growing field of industry. The engineer of the present is better educated, as a rule, than his predecessor, is possessed of far more technical knowledge, and is better paid accordingly.

The engineer of the future must make still farther advancement. New devices for saving labor and expense, and inventions for increasing speed are constantly coming into use. These require the services of firemen and engineers who are thoroughly up to date. To do this work, the future engineer must possess more technical knowledge than that of the engineer of the past. He must understand the principles of mechanical engineering to rise to the foremost rank in his calling. And it is for those who are ambitious to excel that this article is written. In addition to these improvements a possible change of motive power from steam to some other force may at any time revolutionize the business of the railroad world. When this change occurs, if ever, only the most studious, intelligent and proficient men will be able to hold their places.

HOW TO BECOME A LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEER

Any young man with a common school education, good health and habits, intelligence, industry and ambition may become a locomotive engineer, provided he is willing to faithfully serve his apprenticeship. An experienced man often earns as much as two thousand dollars a year and, as a rule, he works only half the week. This gives him an abundance of time for study, rest and social enjoyment. His income is decidedly larger than many professional men receive, his working hours are half as long and his place is his for life, unless he deliberately throws his chances away or is the victim of some unavoidable circumstance. Not only is his future secure in his own vocation, but the higher branches of the service are open to him, provided he fits himself to fill them. There are many engineers who have become master mechanics, division superintendents, superintendents of motive power, and some have gone even higher. Angus Sinclair, the author and editor, acquired the foundation of his ripe knowledge while working as fireman, engineer and master mechanic. There he received the practical training which, coupled with his theoretical knowledge, has made him a world-famed authority in his special lines. Promotion depends almost wholly upon the man. Study, thorough and constant care for the interest and welfare of the road and of its patrons, industry and intelligent self-reliance are the keynotes of success.

But how to begin? The usual way to become an engineer is to secure employment as a fireman. This is done by filling out an application blank furnished by the division superintendent of motive power. There are few shrewder judges of men than the officers who pass upon applicants for places in the operating branches of railroads. This is necessarily the case. The lives of hundreds of passengers and scores of train hands are at the mercy of the humblest employee of this service. Most of the men perform their tasks without direct supervision. Upon their fidelity, intelligence and experience the safety of the road depends. No stronger illustration can be given of the care with which beginners are chosen than the fact that less than ten per cent. of the men who enter the service as firemen fail to become engineers.

The chance of securing work rests largely upon the first impression made by the applicant. If a young man is clean in person and neat in dress, is physically sound, writes a plain hand, shows evidences of a fair education, and if his references are acceptable, he is generally put upon the waiting list. There have been times when a young man has had to wait for months and even a year after going on the waiting list before he has been put to work, but owing to the present activity in railroad circles, the successful applicant to-day seldom waits longer than three months, and oftentimes he is successful in obtaining employment within a few weeks.

HOW A GOOD FIREMAN SAVES HIS SALARY

The first work of a new fireman is usually on a switch engine. Sometimes he is so fortunate as to be taken at once into the through freight service. That was my experience. If he enters in the latter capacity he generally serves on the extra list, filling the places of men who are temporarily absent, until he is assigned to a regular engine. Now the young man has his chance. His advancement depends solely upon the use he will make of it. He serves directly under the tuition of the engineer. He learns to keep his engine clean and his fire in good condition. These apparently simple tasks are not to be learned in a month or a year. To perform them well requires a vast amount of patient industry. Then he must watch his coal. Fuel is one of the chief items of expense in the operating service. An economical fireman is often able to save his pay each month to the company. For instance, the New York Central System runs about 1600 engines a day. On the round trip to Albany from New York, about 300 miles, a passenger train averaging eight cars should use between seven and eight tons of coal, considering weather conditions. This consumption might easily be increased by careless firing.

A fireman's pay is better than that given to beginners in most walks of labor. Switch engine firemen average fifty-seven dollars the month, through freight firemen get seventy-five dollars, and in the passenger service the pay runs up to ninety dollars on the best roads.

Right here let me say a word to young men starting in as firemen. It is hard work at first, and only young men who have been accustomed to manual labor are fitted, as a rule, to take the places. To many of these beginners fifty dollars seems a fortune and the tendency to spend it the first, week is strong. Some new firemen, never having had so much money at one time before, live in luxury the first two weeks and run in debt the last two. At the beginning of a man's railroad career he should commence to save a part of his monthly wages. This rule should be followed all through the service. In no other way can he secure an independence or enjoy the comforts of home to their fullest extent.

Before taking up the engineer's side of the making of a railroad man, let me write a few lines regarding my own career. It may be of value to those who intend making railroad engineering their vocation. I was born in Cold Springs, New York, in 1855. My stepfather was one of the pioneer engineers on the old Albany and Schenectady Road and was with the road fifty-two years. Naturally I was ambitious to follow in his footsteps and by his advice I applied to the company for a place. I was made a fireman in the freight service when I was eighteen years of age. I believe the limit of age has now been fixed by law at twenty-one years. That was in 1873, therefore I have been in the employ of the New York Central Railroad for twenty-seven years. In all this period I have not been suspended one day and have only twice been forced to disconnect my engine because of a breakdown or failure of the machinery. When I was twenty-two years old I became a full-fledged engineer in the freight service. In 1888 I was promoted to the passenger service. I now run the Fast Mail and Eastern Express. Occasionally I take out the Empire State Express. I had charge of the engine that drew Admiral Dewey from New York to Shelburne, Vermont, on October 12 last. We made the run from Spuyten Duyvel Creek to Troy, 139 miles, in 139 minutes.

WILLIAM J. MCQUEEN

CAREFULNESS BETTER THAN DAMAGE SUITS

Before a fireman becomes an engineer he should be thoroughly grounded in the fundamental principles of his trade. He should know the engine from tender to pilot. He should be able to run the machine in case of an emergency quite as well as the engineer himself. Indeed he must be able to do this or he would not be fitted for promotion. If much depends on the care given by the fireman to his work, much more depends on the thoroughness of the engineer. A conscientious engineer is in the round-house long enough, before he starts out, to examine thoroughly every detail of his locomotive. He must do this himself and not trust to any one else. No detail should be too small to escape his attention. It takes me from an hour to an hour and a half to do this work every day that I take my engine out, and never, in the twenty-two years of my service, have I delegated it to an assistant.

Prevention is better than cure many times over. A large percentage of railroad accidents results from a failure to minutely inspect locomotives before the trip has begun. Every minute of the engineer's time is occupied when he is once on the road. He must see that the water in the boiler is at a proper height, that he has sufficient air to apply the brakes, that he has steam enough not only to run the engine but to keep the cars warm. He must watch every grade crossing and sound the whistle and he must be constantly on the alert for the block signals. On the Hudson River Division we have four hundred of these signals and they must be rigidly obeyed, for disobedience may mean disaster. When any part of the equipment fails to work repairs must be made with as little detention to the service as possible, and the engineer who thoroughly understands his work is the one who succeeds in this emergency. To prevent these failures, however, he should ever be alert to detect anything wrong with the machinery the instant it occurs.

PITCHING INTO THE HUDSON RIVER

I will give you an illustration from my own experience. In 1893 I ran the Eastern Express from Albany to New York. Coming down from Albany one October night, I had almost reached Hyde Park when I saw ahead of me a freight conductor signaling with his lantern. He was near a switch and I supposed he was communicating with his own crew. After he had swung the lantern three times and started with the fourth swing, it flashed across my mind that something was wrong and I instantly put on the brake, shut off steam, reversed, and sanded the track. We were running at the rate of fifty miles an hour, but before we reached the switch we had slowed down to thirty. Some cars had been derailed and tipped over on our track, and these we struck with such force that our engine, express and mail cars left the rails and plunged into the Hudson River. When we reached the bottom the water was five or six feet over my head. I tried to crawl out of the cab, but was wedged in so that I could not move. I was just giving myself up for lost when I heard something give way about the boiler and the engine partly turned over and released me. I shot up to the surface thoroughly exhausted, nearly unconscious, but otherwise uninjured. The fireman had come up as soon as the engine touched bottom.

I found that the freight train had been derailed near the switch an instant before we came into view. Indeed, the time was so short that the tower man had no opportunity to set the danger signal. The track therefore was apparently clear, and had I not sensed danger from the signaling of the freight conductor, the chances are that most of the cars would have left the track with the engine. As it was, no lives were lost and traffic on the road was only delayed a few hours.

THE SIXTH SENSE OF THE RAILROAD MAN

